In "Irish Pedigrees: Second Series" (M. H. Gill and Son; J. Duffy and Sons, Dublin: Whitaker and Co.; Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., London), Mr. J. O'Hart, Q.U.I., carries on with infinite industry the lines of the chief off-shoots from the Houses of Heber, Ir, and Heremon, sons of Milesius, and Ith, their uncle, from the Saxon Conquest to the present day, or until, at any rate, all traces disappear. Unhappy, we are tempted to exclaim, must be the Irishman—though curiously we find few prominent Home-Rulers in the volume—who cannot claim, with Mr. O'Hart's assistance, collateral, if not direct, descent from bard or Brehon or minor chieftain at the least. An Anglicised patronymic need be no hindrance. Who at first glance would detect, for instance, in the plebeian Hodson or Hudson the chivalrous Mac Aoadh? Yet the transition, once pointed out, is simple enough—"Son of Aoadh;" anglicè "Son of Od"—Od's-son—'Odson—Hodson or Hudson. Of the dedication to Sir Bernard Burke, in which Mr. O'Hart shows so convincingly that Gaelic must have been the speech of Paradise, preserved most happily at the confusion of tongues by the refusal of righteous Ba'ath, the forefather of the Celtic race, to have act or part in the building of Babel, we have no space to speak. The descendants of the mighty Celts of old have every reason to be grateful to Mr. O'Hart; and their number is clearly large enough for him to want no other clientèle.

Why, asks a clever "Hand-book of Home Life and Elementary Instruction" (Chapman and Hall), should not instruction in the three R's be utilised in our Board schools for instruction in the practical duties of home life? Why should reading lessons be all about "Faithful Poodles" or the "State of the Navy in 1841," and not about cookery, needlework, economy, and health? Might not writing be combined with the copying of receipts, and arithmetic with examples of butchers' and bakers' bills? Might not apparatus to play (scientifically) at housewives or shop-managers be provided as readily as apparatus for art and science classes, and might not finally much time be gained by the combination of two useful objects in a single hour's instruction? The suggestion certainly seems worth something, and the Hand-book, showing how it should be carried out, may well be commended to the managers of elementary schools.

We have received the first volume of Brief (Wyman and Sons), a weekly epitome of news of every kind, which cannot fail to be of use to every one, whether busy or idle. It contains in a condensed form current information regarding politics, literature, the arts and sciences, fashion, in fact, every imaginable topic, not disdaining even household recipes; and includes extracts from new books and the magazines, and a concise summary of the opinions of the Press. As a work of reference it will prove very valuable.

"The Congress and Socialism," by Lieut.-Colonel Tyrrell (Trubner and Co.), a little pamphlet on the connection between the burden of Militarism and the passionate character of Socialism abroad; and an "English Student's French Examiner" (S. Low and Co.), by F. Julien, or useful exercises for home practice on the model of the Examination Papers at the London University, the Oxford and Cambridge Local Examinations, &c., scarcely require ampler notice.

The necessity of some better method of signalling than is in use at present between ships at sea has been impressed on the world by so many collisions that "The Stellar Code: International" (J. Brown: Glasgow) of Captain A. S. Harrison claims, as of right, the attention of the expert. Roughly speaking, it is a system in which signals are transmitted by white discs (illuminated at night) on a blackboard, by the aid of which, in a few easily-learned combinations, as many as from thirty-five to forty-five letters can be spelt in a minute, and conversation thus kept up between approaching vessels either in terms of the existing Flag Signal Code, or by the simple spelling out of words. Of the rapidity or the distinctness with which signals can be transmitted on this system in almost any weather there is, we believe, no possible doubt. Only it requires to be universally enforced, and for every signal-man to know how to spell.

"Was Adam the First Man Created?" by Argus (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.), an argument for the theory of a double creation—the first (as in Gen. i. 26) of the original ancestors, male and female, of the Asiatic, European, and African nationalities, the second (Gen. ii. 7) of a later Adam, the progenitor, in truth, of the Jewish people only, though magnified by Hebrew Scribes and Rabbis into the father of the whole human race, is clever and unassuming. We fear, however, while the theologian will hardly accept the writer's standpoint, the sceptical scientist has gone far beyond it.

"Monarchy Defended" (Wyman and Sons), by J. Vickers, or an argument for the superiority of an hereditary and constitutional Monarchy over Republicanism in any shape, is another clever little brochure—albeit given to show one side only of the shield. Its comments on Republicanism abroad seem, however, to our judgment a little superficial, and its writer's faith in human progress simply nil.

RURAL NOTES

The Weather and Harvest.——In all the fields the ploughs have been going, preparing for another harvest—one that, it is prayed, will not be less fruitful than the present has been. With all the bad prognostications we had in the middle of the summer, the end has been far better than expected. The black cloud discovered its silver lining in the latter end of the harvest, and on the threshing floor. Wheat, according to most accounts, has turned out well, and although the prices are comparatively small, taking samples all over, the best ones will pay the growers this year. Barley and oats thresh out poorly north of the Tweed. With reference to wheat prospects, the Farmer says:—"The agricultural markets have been less weak than formerly, the condition of English wheat has given a shade more satisfaction. . . . . American shipments, and the quantity of grain on passage, have each undergone a diminution on the holder's side," &c. Still it would appear that there need not be any fear this winter of having to pay too extravagantly for our bread unless the bakers "put it on."

Sewage Farming.——The Royal Agricultural Society of England is this year offering prizes for the best sewage farms in England and Wales—prizes which we hope will be largely competed for in the interest of the public in all ways, for getting rid of a nuisance and increasing the food of the people. The first prize is for farms utilising the sewage of not more than 20,000 people, and for such profitable provision as the farm can show. The prize of 100*l*. is offered for a farm absorbing the waste of more than 20,000 people. The market gardeners are not neglected. Within a radius of twenty miles from the Mansion House, for farms exceeding ten and not more than fifty acres, 50*l*., 25*l*., and 10*l*. will be given in the three awards; and like sums to other farms of the same compass, situated within a radius of fifty miles, providing they are in the five Metropolitan Counties. The roots grown on sewage farms this year have competed very fairly with those grown on more favourable soils. There is a vast amount of manurial substance that ought to make bread sent into the rivers to kill fish and poison the people who live upon the banks. Mr. Mechi should be appointed one of the Committee to award the prizes. No man has taken greater interest in the work of encouraging the use of valuable material, which, being wasted, does harm. The entries for these competitions close on the 31st October.

Foreign Live Stock and Meat.——From the Board of Trade Returns issued on Tuesday (Oct. 8), we note that the imports of live cattle are considerably more than they were in the previous nine months of last year. The total number of live stock received from abroad—horned, woolled, and haired—were, up to the end of September, 937,857. The cost was 5,848,502*l*. Yearly our cost for killing live stock (there is a great deal of difference between the pedigreed animal and the butcher's price) is growing larger; we might make it less, and, from some out-of-Session speeches by County Members, we fancy that in the course of a year or two they will give their tenants liberty to grow either corn or cattle, as it pleases them, or both, in such manner as they desire—restrictions in cropping being abolished. Such abolition must come speedily. While live cattle were coming in more numerously, dead meat was not imported so extensively. Of fresh meat the value was only 371,693*l*., to compare with 376,000*l*. in the corresponding term of last year. With 12,000cwt. increase on "meat unenumerated, salted or fresh," there was a large decrease; on "meat preserved otherwise than by salting," the sum of 842,174*l*. to contrast with 995,891*l*. in the first three quarters of 1877. There has not yet been much change made in the price of meat to consumers; but if American consignors can, as they say they can, bring healthy live stock in summer, and dead meat in good condition in winter, we ought to have joints reduced a penny per lb.

Miscellaneous.——Mr. M'Combie, the champion at a hundred shows, and twice at Internationals in France, has resolved to dispose of fifty of his beautiful black "pollies." It may be remembered that the Queen honoured his beautiful "Black Prince," which some years ago carried all before him. Those who buy at Mr. M'Combie's sale on the 16th may rely upon true pedigrees.—The Smithfield club gives 3,000*l*. in prizes for stock at the Christmas Show. Entries close on Nov. 1, and Mr. Pullen, Half Moon Street, Piccadilly, will give the information intending exhibitors require.—About a like sum in prizes is offered by the Birmingham people (2,900*l*.). Implement entries in the "hardware village" close on October 19; stock on the same date as at the Agricultural Hall.

THE EARLY SCOTTISH PAINTERS

The fine arts flourish most vigorously in times of peace. When a nation is engaged in war it absorbs attention, and the allurements and excitements of the field attract the youth and talent of the country. Glory and honour may be found there, and the calm retreat of the studio loses its charm to him who is possessed of manly vigour and aspiring ambition. In such times the artist is at a discount, the people are too deeply interested in the strife to give much heed to his works, and the wealth of the land, which might otherwise be directed in fostering the fine arts, is absorbed in the production of war material.

In no country in Europe was this state of affairs more clearly defined than in Scotland prior to the Union. A small country, having a thinly-scattered population, had to struggle against mighty odds in order to maintain her independence, and the intervals of peace were too short to permit of the growth of the national taste. The only art then shown was in the matter of architecture, buildings were absolute necessities, the Church had to maintain its position, and was to some extent exempt from the ravages of war. The abodes of the barons were strong towers, with few comforts within, and paintings were luxuries undreamt of.

The first Scottish painter of any note was George Jameson, who appeared at the close of the sixteenth century. He was the son of an architect in Aberdeen, a city which has since kept up its reputation as a fosterer of artists. It is probable that the nature of his father's calling gave him a taste for drawing. Be that as it may, he left his native city to study under Rubens, and became a fellow-student with Vendyke. This association produced a similarity in their style, so much so that Jameson's works have sometimes been mistaken for those of Vandyke.

When thirty-four years of age Jameson returned to Aberdeen, where he married and settled. At first he directed his attention to historical and landscape painting, but he found the pursuit unremunerative, and took to portrait painting, which he found to answer better, and in this branch of art he soon attained such a position as induced him to remove to Edinburgh, where he might have wider scope for his talents.

Upon the occasion of the King's visit to the Northern metropolis in 1633 Jameson was employed to superintend the decoration of the city. Some of his painted decorations attracted the attention of Charles, who commissioned the artist to paint a portrait of himself, which gave so much satisfaction to the King that he presented to Jameson a ring from his own finger.

Allan Cunningham says of Jameson:—"That he stands at the head of the British school of portrait-painting there can be no question; nor had England an artist of her own worthy of being ranked above him in his own walk before the days of Reynolds. When we consider the circumstances of the painter and his times, the want of instructors and models, and the various difficulties which the fanatical prejudices of that dark age must have presented to the cultivation of the graceful arts, it is impossible not to admit that Scotland has all reason to be proud of George Jameson."

In regard to his style Walpole remarks:—"He was one of the most esteemed of Rubens's scholars, and painted in the broad, thin, transparent manner. His excellence consists in delicacy and softness, with a clear and beautiful colouring; his shades are not charged but helped by varnish, with little appearance of the pencil. He had much of Vandyke's second manner, and to Sir Anthony some of his works have occasionally been imputed."

Allan Ramsay, son of the poet, was born in Edinburgh in 1713. At an early age he displayed a love for art, and when twenty-three years of age went to Rome to prosecute his studies, remained there for three years, and then returned to his native city. Desirous of a wider scope for his abilities, he removed to London, and there he met with so decided a success as to be appointed Court Painter to George III. Not only was Ramsay eminent as an artist, but he was a man of considerable learning, and of him Dr. Johnson remarks: "You will not find a man in whose conversation there is more instruction, more information, or more elegance, than in Ramsay's."

When on a visit to Edinburgh, Ramsay took an active part in the formation of the "Select Society," the forerunner of other societies which have had a marked influence upon the literature of the country. Ramsay was a proficient in several foreign languages, and carried on a correspondence with some of the most eminent men on the Continent. He is the author of several pamphlets, which have been collected and republished.

Finding that his health was considerably shaken from the effects of an accident, Ramsay repaired to Italy with the view of recruiting his health; he remained there several years, and expired on his way to England, at the age of seventy.

As to his qualities as a painter, Northcote says:—

"Now and then we find tints and sketches which show what he might have been if his hand had been equal to his conceptions. I have seen a picture of his of the Queen soon after she was married—a profile and slightly done, but it is a paragon of elegance. A professor might despise it, but in the mental part, I have never seen anything of Vandyke's equal to it."

Alexander Runciman, born in Edinburgh in 1736, like Ramsay, showed an early predilection for art. When fourteen years of age he was placed under the care of John and Robert Norris. After six years' study he set up a studio of his own, but did not receive much encouragement. In 1700 he went to Rome, and when there became the intimate associate of Fuseli. After a residence in the Eternal City of five years he returned to Edinburgh, and was elected to fill the post of Master to the Academy. His bent was towards landscape painting. His works are not very well known; they aim at a high ideal, but are not happy in execution.

In the town of Alloa, on the northern shores of the Firth of Forth, David Allan first saw the light in 1744. From the effects of an accident to his foot he was, when a boy, prevented for a time from attending school or joining in the sports of his comrades. To pass the time he amused himself by drawing with chalk. Upon his return to school, he was detected drawing a caricature of the schoolmaster, which caused the indignant preceptor to complain to his father. The caricature was considered so good, that Allan's father conceived the idea of fostering the lad's bent, and sent him to a drawing academy established in Glasgow.

At the age of twenty Allan followed the usual course of proceeding to Rome to prosecute his studies, which he did with success. His picture of "The Origin of Painting, or the Corinthian Maid Drawing the Shadow of Her Lover," procured him the Gold Medal of the Academy of St. Luke. Upon his return to Scotland he was appointed to succeed Runciman in the Mastership of the Academy in Edinburgh, which post he held for ten years, but his success as a teacher was not great.

His designs, illustrating Ramsay's poem of "The Gentle Shepherd" were much admired and are still prized by collectors, but it was in depicting humorous scenes that he excelled. His "Scotch Wedding" is well known from the engraving which procured a ready sale, and is perhaps the best work he produced. He died at the age of fifty-two.

Henry Raeburn was born in Edinburgh, on the 4th of March, 1756. Having become an orphan at an early age, he was admitted to the benefits of Heriot's Hospital, in which he received a liberal education. Upon leaving that institution he was apprenticed to a goldsmith, but during his leisure hours he took to painting, and ultimately resolved to devote himself to that art, paying a penalty to his master to be freed from his indenture.

Raeburn received no systematic teaching in his art, for, although he received a loan from Martin of some works to study, he got no instructions from that artist. This loan was the cause of a quarrel between these artists which was never cemented, and embittered the feeling of rivalry which ensued between them as portrait-painters. In this contest Raeburn became the victor, and ultimately succeeded in driving his rival from the field.

There is a touch of romance connected with Raeburn's marriage such as the novelist delights in introducing to his pages. One day, when the artist was sketching from Nature a young lady appeared upon the scene, whose figure he introduced as an accessory to the landscape, and from this incident an intimacy ensued, which resulted in the marriage of the parties. Accompanied by his wife Raeburn went to Rome, where he remained for a period of two years.

Raeburn was a man of great energy and industry, for not only did he devote eight hours a day to the practice of his profession, but in the evening he spent much of his leisure in the study of architecture and mechanics. His success was commensurate with his industry, and upon the occasion of the visit of George IV. to Scotland he was appointed Limner to the King, and received the honour of knighthood. He died on the 8th of July, 1823, in his sixty-seventh year.

In his portraits he concentrates his effort upon the head, keeping the costume and accessories subordinate. The character of the sitter is depicted rather than a mere likeness, and the contour is generally mellow and pleasing.

The name of Wilkie is a household word—engravings from his works are scattered broadcast over the land, and are found alike in hall and cottage. Since his time a constant flow of artists has set in from Scotland towards London, and most of them succeed in establishing their position as men of mark.

LADY NURSEMAIDS

Although it is only at intervals—yet with painful iteration—that the complaints against domestic servants, and against the carelessness and cruelty of nursemaids to their young charges, find vent in the newspapers, the evils complained of are ever present, and have come to be accepted in many quarters as chronic, and being past remedy have to be endured with all the patience which can be commanded. Some well-meaning philanthropists imagined that the Lady-Help movement would have diminished these domestic annoyances, but it is hardly in the nature of things that it should do so, for in large households the Lady-Help can only take the place of the mistress or housekeeper, and in small ones the difficulty of finding persons willing to help the Help only reproduces the servant question in an aggravated form: and although it has been suggested that the proper sphere for the Lady-Help lies in the nursery, as head nurse or superintendent, yet this again only applies to large establishments, and leaves the families of middle-class people, who are the chief sufferers, wholly unaffected.

Side by side with the scarcity and consequent dearness and arrogant independence of domestic servants, is presented the undeniable fact that a great number of young people, gently born, and well educated, and brought up in good society, are at their wits' end to find out some means of making a living, and are compelled to compete keenly for situations as governesses, or to resort to shifts which can only afford temporary relief. The repugnance to living in a different grade of society from that to which they have been accustomed induces many a young lady to endure annoyances in a gentleman's house to which the most menial servant in the place would not submit; and it not unfrequently happens that the cook or housemaid is in receipt of higher wages than the gentlewoman who has to educate the children, "as if," as Mr. Ruskin says, "the soul of your child were a less charge than jams and groceries."

Although the problem how to get better servants, and how to find employment for young ladies who have to earn their own living, is essentially a middle-class one, and although the middle class of society, like everything else which is mediocre, is a very prosaic and uninteresting body, any practical suggestions which may tend to produce comfort and economy ought to be worthy of consideration, if only because of the large numbers of persons interested. In a great many cases the girls who seek employment as governesses are members of large families with small means, and consequently have had to make themselves useful in a hundred ways in their own homes, and although they have to do many things there, which, were their parents better circumstanced, would fall to the lot of the servants, they are never thought of or regarded as servants, because their position as daughters is too well defined and upheld. And so in families of the same kind where young girls are visiting it may be their schoolfellows, the visitor helps her friend in her household occupations, and does it gladly, without any idea that she is demeaning herself by so doing, or that she will be less highly thought of than if she held aloof, and this from the same reason as before, because her social position in the house is fully recognised, and not because of her being not obliged to work for her living. When, therefore, as daughter or as friend, a young lady can make herself valuable in the household by looking after the nursery, doing a little housemaid's work, or helping to cook the dinner, why cannot she do the same thing when going amongst strangers, and receiving a payment for the work she does? Without accepting it as the exhaustive reason, there is little doubt that the answer, "Because the master and mistress of the house would not treat her as a lady," is not very far from the truth. In a great number of cases amongst the middle classes, the persons employing governesses are neither so gently born nor so well bred as the girls they employ; they have more money, of course, and take their stand upon that, and assert a superiority in consequence, and it is not much to be wondered at if, in such circumstances, the snubbed and slighted girl takes her stand upon her better breeding, and gives herself some airs which in her heart of hearts she despises herself for being guilty of.

As a rule nursemaids have neither hard work nor dirty work to do, and a superior nurse is almost as much waited upon as the children under her care; there is no reason, therefore, why a young lady should not undertake such duties as these, and there is still less reason why she should lose caste by so doing; let her position as an equal in the family be entirely admitted and recognised, and all idea of her light duties being menial will at once vanish. There can be no doubt of the advantage to the children in having a nurse who will be like an elder sister, and not like a servant, while all mothers ought to be able to appreciate the gain of having the impertinent vulgarity of the kitchen replaced by the gentle manners and ladylike behaviour of the Lady Nursemaid.

There is no doubt that there are hundreds of young ladies quite willing to undertake nursery work under the conditions just indicated. Not long ago a friend of the present writer's advertised for two servants—one of them a nursemaid; the advertisement appeared six times and in three different papers. To these she only had two replies! She afterwards advertised once for a nursery governess and received forty applications, and many of these applicants were willing to go out for less wages than the dirty sluts of servants she had previously employed had demanded for their precious services. Another friend in reply to two advertisements of a similar character received more than 150 letters, and a large number of the applicants in both cases were willing to act as upper nurses as well as instructors of the children. Their letters suggested a very sad amount of misery and privation amongst people little used to it; a large proportion of the applicants were daughters of professional men; the father of one had been a physician, several more were daughters of medical men and solicitors, while clergymen's daughters were very numerous, and comparatively few belonged to the trading classes.

With such a state of things existing it would surely be worth while for young ladies to help themselves, by accepting engagements as lady nursemaids, on the assured understanding that they would be treated as ladies and as members of the family. Let them look at the good nursemaids living near them, and they will notice neat and well-dressed girls, a large portion of whose time is spent in the open air, and whose indoor duties do not severely tax their physical strength. Even the wheeling of a perambulator—that apparently necessary evil—is not very arduous work, and in many places mothers occupying good positions in society are not ashamed to be seen taking their children out for an airing in one of these objectionable but convenient machines. In a comfortable home the work would not be more laborious than that of a governess, and such a situation could be accepted by many a girl whose training and temperament did not fit her for more advanced teaching; and, besides finding suitable employment for many who know not where to turn to find work, an extended adoption of the suggestion would set free a large number of domestic servants, which in itself would be no inconsiderable advantage, and might go far to relieve the aggravation of the seemingly insolvable servant question.

nephew of a member of the late Liberal Ministry, to whose influence he owed his position at the bank.—The other day an extraordinary statement was made at the Hammersmith police court, by a woman who had summoned her husband for assaulting her. The man's excuse was that she was a drunkard, and was carrying on illicit correspondence with another man, and he handed to the magistrate a photograph in which the two were seated side by side. The complainant then said that she had travelled all over the world with her daughter, who was a celebrated gymnast known by the name of "Miss Victoria, the Queen of the High Wire." The defendant was not her father. She fell while performing in Berlin, and was killed. The photograph was the picture of their manager, who had since confessed that he caused her daughter to fall, by loosening the wire and net, from motives of revenge. She had since heard that he was drowned. The magistrate bound the husband over to keep the peace.—It is surely time that something was done to make our police stations more secure. Last week a man named Froman, who has since been given up under an Extradition warrant to take his trial for a double murder in the United States, escaped from the cells at Bow Street, and would probably have got clear away had it not been for the outcry made by another prisoner, who had assisted him in getting the door open, and upon whom he ungratefully slammed it to again as soon as he was outside. On Tuesday another man, charged with highway robbery, managed to "slip away" from the Westminster police court, where, it is said, the "facilities for escape are numerous."

A Curious Natural Honey Producing District is found in Oregon, U.S., a strip of country three miles wide, stretching from the Willamette River to the Cascade Mountains. At the foot of the mountains the honeydew falls so heavily as to encrust the folia and the branches look as if they had been dipped in hot honey syr and then cooled. At one place eighty pounds of honey were tak from the lower side of a pole stretched across a fence, while the be scrape up the ready-made honey, and after filling their hives, be and fill combs on the outside.

Scotch Grouse and Black-Game are to be exported to Dia New Zealand, where the Acclimatisation Society intends to try breed and rearing on the neighbouring hills. Two hundred birds are according being obtained from the moors and packed in special wooden cage fitted in front with wire bars, and blinds to regulate the light, a padded at the top with canvas, to prevent the birds from injur themselves by fluttering. They are fed upon bird-seed, German past hardboiled eggs and wheat, and Norwegian cranberries will be taken f the outward voyage.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett.
"While Mr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing-room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and the roar of rolling winds and blue foamy water; he gives us songs of parting graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships braving midnight sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' attacking under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Mr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman.

AFGHANISTAN—MOUNTAIN BATTERIES OF THE ANGLO-INDIAN ARMY ON THE FRONTIER

Topics of the Week

England and Afghanistan.——It is generally agreed that if Shere Ali is willing to make ample amends for the injury he has done us, we ought not to force war upon him. He has proved himself a rude barbarian, and we all know that he has behind him a Power which loses no opportunity of thwarting us; still, it would be unworthy of a country like England to enter upon a conflict about the justice of which she was not absolutely convinced. Should he prove obstinate—which he almost certainly will—we shall have no alternative but to fight. We do not enter into the question whether the policy either of Lord Lytton or of his predecessors has been perfectly wise. On that point there is room for much difference of opinion; but there can be no difference of opinion as to the effect that would be produced upon the native population of India by our tamely submitting to an insult, whether we have needlessly brought it upon ourselves or not. It would be said that we were afraid either of the Ameer or of Russia; and very little insight is needed to perceive that that would not be exactly favourable to the stability of our rule. If war becomes inevitable, we believe with Sir James Stephen that the opportunity should be seized to obtain, once for all, a safe frontier. As he pointed out in his masterly letter, and as is also shown in the exhaustive paper on our frontier policy addressed four years ago by Sir Bartle Frere to Sir John Kaye, what England has to dread is not an invasion of India by Russian troops. Any one who glances at the map, and sees how far Russia's base of operations is removed from her resources, must be convinced that this danger is a purely chimerical one. But why should she not, by stealthy and perhaps unavoidable advance, attain to a position in which it would be possible for her to arm against us the Afghans and other tribes on our northern frontier? They would be only too glad to undertake over and over again an enterprise that would give promise of almost unlimited plunder; and the respect for our power would be so much broken in India that we should have to increase enormously our military establishments to guard against internal as well as external perils. But let India be made impregnable, and it will be possible greatly to diminish our present expenditure, and to devote our energies almost exclusively to peaceful progress. Russia might then come up to our frontier if she chose; perhaps it would be best that she should do so, for we should have no reason to be afraid of her, and could afford to cultivate with her the most friendly relations.

Cyprus and its Climate.——The British occupation of Cyprus may possibly bear good fruit in the future, but at present the results are all on the debit side of the national account. Of all countries in the world, England—magnificently furnished with colonies, and already overburdened with dependencies, little and big—stood least in need of any accession of territory, and yet we have managed to impress foreign nations with the belief that we, too, as well as Russia and Austria, must have our slice in the virtual partition of the Ottoman Empire which was decreed at Berlin. The actual results of the occupation thus far are that, of a good many British soldiers, who would otherwise have been both alive and in sound health, some are dead, and a great many are at least temporarily invalided. The island may not be absolutely unhealthy to the natives—no inhabited countries are, or they would soon cease to have inhabitants; but it is plain that fever is not merely an occasional, but a regular visitor, and that it forms as ordinary a subject of conversation as colds and coughs do in England. If, therefore, acclimatised natives suffer, newcomers arriving in the height of summer from the chilly regions of the North Atlantic were still more likely to suffer, especially as they were not, as free immigrants would be, their own masters, but were obliged to wear a dress by no means suited to the climate, to sleep in stifling tents, and to perform arduous work under a scorching sun. Putting aside all questions of humanity, when will our big-wigs learn that the British soldier is a costly commodity, deserving of the most careful tending? Much of the work under which our men sickened would have been as cheaply and as efficiently performed by natives; indeed, it would have been far more sensible to keep the bulk of the troops at home till the cold season began, having in the mean time, through the agency of contractors, provided proper barrack accommodation for them. No doubt, in the course of years, when marshes have been drained, and Australian gum trees have grown big enough to diffuse their anti-miasmatic aroma, Cyprus may become tolerably healthy, but even then it will probably still remain a question whether the same money and trouble might not have been more profitably devoted to some other purpose.

Jurymen.——Large numbers of respectable citizens must be highly pleased that the subject of juries and jurymen has once more come up for discussion. There is hardly any public question which more urgently needs to be examined. At best it is a considerable hardship that a man should be dragged from his ordinary employments and forced to serve the public, perhaps for days, either without any remuneration whatever, or with remuneration that is utterly inadequate. Sensible Englishmen, however, would put up with inevitable hardship if it pressed equally on everybody. But this is precisely what the present grievance does not do. Some men pass year after year without ever being called upon to discharge the functions of jurymen; others receive frequently the peremptory notice in obedience to which they must put aside every engagement if they are not prepared to pay a heavy fine. Various theories are offered to account for this absurdly anomalous state of things. Some one wrote to The Times this week, explaining that he is not called because few names begin with the first letter of his surname, whilst a friend of his, who is less fortunate, has often to do his duty as a loyal Briton. Such are the inanities of which the official mind is capable, that this is not at all improbable; and we hope the unlucky people who suffer by the arrangement will make so great an outcry about it that even the official mind will begin to think a change desirable. It is simply a vile abuse that a mere accident should cast upon one section of the community more than another burdens to which all alike are theoretically liable. Various others ought to be attended to at the same time. Surely, for instance, there is no reason in the nature of things why a grand juryman should serve for three days for nothing, while a special juryman is paid for each case he considers. Honest work is done in both instances, and in both it ought to be honestly paid. Jurymen have also a right to expect that they will not be confined in a dull, ill-ventilated room; and there would be no particular magnificence—much less would there be extravagance—in providing them with a substantial luncheon.

Panics.——The sheep-like tendency of the human race, ready to follow the bell-wether and to jump over sticks, imaginary or otherwise, provided the bell-wether has jumped first, has been for ages the theme of satirists, and is notably conspicuous in that special form of terror known as a panic. In a panic, whether induced by the fear of losing money, as in our periodical financial crises, or by the fear of losing life, as in the Colosseum Music Hall at Liverpool, terror begets terror, the alarm as it spreads becomes intensified, till at last the nerves, even of the firmest, give way. Many, no doubt, who read the account of the Paradise Street disaster felt how differently they would have behaved had they been present, how calmly they would have sat amid the most terrifying cries of "Fire," feeling sure that even if there was a fire they had a better chance for their lives by remaining quiet than by joining in that wild stampede for the open air. We do not feel at all sure that this sensible arm-chair philosophy would stand the ordeal of actual fact, and we may also presume that some at least of the poor creatures who were trampled to death were hurried forward against their will by the efforts of others. In this headlong rush nearly forty lives were sacrificed, although the places of exit were, judging by the average of such accommodation, by no means inadequate. But it is quite possible that, with even smaller outlets, fewer people would have been killed, for a tightly-wedged crowd cannot do much mischief; it is when people have space in which to move that the momentum, especially if it meets with an unexpected obstacle, becomes so tremendous. The most efficient remedy against such tragedies as these would be a course of discipline. The higher classes do get some training of this sort, they acquire certain habits of self-restraint both at home and at school, but the lower classes, unless they have served in the army or navy, know little or nothing of such influences. If there was more discipline there would be fewer round shoulders and slouching figures, and less rudeness and shoving. Look at the brave soldiers, drawn up in rank on board the Birkenhead, and awaiting certain death without moving a muscle except in obedience to orders; and then look at that yelling, panic-stricken crowd in Liverpool, almost every man in which was "fighting for his own hand."

The Position of Russia.——There has been a good deal of alarm this week as to the intentions of Russia. All the evidence goes to show that she has been intriguing very hard to induce Turkey to sign a treaty by which the recent settlement would be virtually set aside, and it has been concluded by many observers that the difficulties she is creating are so great that, whether we will or not, we shall be forced into war with her. We are unable to accept this pessimist view. If, indeed, Russia were in a position to fight us, we have little doubt that she would quickly decide in favour of a desperate conflict. It has become more and more clear to her that in the mean time Great Britain is the supreme obstacle to her ambition. Before these Eastern troubles began she knew vaguely that England jealously watched her movements; but now she understands that we have a settled policy, and that it is in some respects flatly opposed to her own. The discovery has excited intense bitterness among the ruling classes, and if war with this country could be conducted under favourable conditions they would look forward to it with delight. Unfortunately for them, they cannot but see that the conditions would be highly unfavourable. The strain upon the resources of Russia has been so great that her finances are in a state of hopeless confusion, and she seeks in vain for temporary relief by means of a loan. Every day that the present confusion lasts she approaches nearer to bankruptcy, and at the same time the Government is confronted by a revolutionary movement, the real force of which it can only guess. Never was Russian society more profoundly agitated. The Czar is passionately denounced in papers which, in spite of the police, are scattered broadcast over the Empire; and the people are asked to consider whether they will any longer tolerate grinding despotism and sham crusades. Is it likely that Russia will in these circumstances dream of plunging into war with a country which, she well knows, would be quite capable of meeting her even if her population were united and her finances prosperous? She will strive a little longer, by all her usual arts, to obtain her will; but she will in the end give way, and await a more fitting opportunity for further action. It would be well if the British Government took some steps to hasten her retreat from her present position. A strong word, which need not be uttered offensively, would be followed by the best results for Russia and for the world.

Music and Dancing Licenses.——This is a subject upon which we have written for several successive Octobers, and we have always taken the view which we are now glad to see is also upheld in a sensible letter in The Times, signed "A Londoner." The two chief points for which we have contended are these, namely, first, that the Middlesex magistrates, if only because they are a fluctuating body, are not the most fitting persons to decide on such matters; and secondly, that the extreme disinclination shown by the magistrates to grant dancing licenses, so far from tending to promote morality, is in itself a cause of mischief. We will here confine ourselves to the last point, namely, the advisability of licensing public dancing places. Nobody will deny that young people delight in dancing, and that few young people get as much dancing as they would like. Even the rich, with their spacious apartments, feel this to some extent; but how much more does it apply to the lower middle classes, whose tiny rooms are usually, after true British fashion, crammed full of furniture? Supposing the existing magisterial prejudices were turned topsy-turvy, and no would-be licensed victualler had a chance of getting permission to sell alcohol unless he could show that he was prepared to provide a spacious saloon for dancing purposes? We should then have Terpsichorean resorts by the hundred. What would be the result? Well, one result would be that, as the respectable far out-number the disreputable, the disreputable element in these dancing-rooms would always—under careful management—be in a minority, and would therefore be compelled at least to simulate respectability. The case of the Argyll Rooms has really little to do with the dancing question. The proprietor lost his license, because, although his establishment was licensed for music and dancing, his visitors did not dance and did not listen to the music, but resorted thither with other objects in view. The magistrates decided, and we think rightly, that the license was being used for a purpose other than that for which it was intended, and therefore declined to renew it.

Austria's Reply to Turkey.——We do not think Austria could have met in a better spirit the charges brought against her troops by the Porte. Her reply is at once calm and firm, and probably the Turks themselves regret by this time that they were induced to write their famous and absurd circular dispatch. That ugly things were done while the Austrian troops were advancing we do not need to be told; no struggle of this kind, particularly no struggle on Turkish soil, is likely to pass without scenes of horror. But we are without evidence that the Austrian troops were guilty of deliberate cruelty; everything rather tends to show that they executed their task with the least possible severity. The Turks undoubtedly injured their cause by their reckless accusations. They offended even the Hungarians, the best friends they have in Europe; and the Austrian Germans, who were also inclined to support them against Russia, are now seriously alienated. If the Sultan is wise he will make amends by signing the Convention which Austria is anxious to obtain from him. This would greatly lighten the duty the Austrians have undertaken, inasmuch as the Mahomedan landowners, now that they have been defeated in the field, would have in the sanction of the Porte an honourable reason for complete surrender. But the Porte itself would benefit quite as much as Austria. What the Russians above all things want is a pretext for regarding the Berlin Treaty as a dead letter. They would not, we believe, hope to effect much at present, even if this object were attained; but it would prepare the way for future attempts to resuscitate the extinct Treaty of San Stefano. Any violation by Austria of the settlement achieved at Berlin would give her this pretext, and it is only too probable that if a Bosnian Convention is refused, Austria will be forced to adopt measures which may, at least, be represented as such a violation. By granting the concession now asked of it, the Turkish Government would make a considerable sacrifice; but it would probably save itself from very much larger involuntary sacrifices hereafter.

CURATES' AUGMENTATION FUND.——This case of embezzlement is of a particularly painful character. The funds of the Society were contributed in small sums from all parts of the country, often at the cost of considerable self-denial on the part of the givers; and the money was destined for the benefit of a body of men who, though better paid than they used to be, are still, considering the costliness of their education and the importance of their functions, very inadequately remunerated. It does indeed seem cruel that seven thousand pounds of this money, gathered together so painfully, and destined for such praiseworthy objects, should have been squandered "in fast living" (we use his own words) by an official of the Fund. But this Marshall, who was paid a salary of 250*l.* a year, was only the Assistant-Clerk. Where, we should like to know, were his superior officers—the Secretary, the Finance Committee, and the Auditors—while Mr. Marshall was playing his villainous pranks? Were they all asleep, or did they consider themselves as a set of ornamental dummies, whose duty it was to place unlimited confidence in their assistant-clerk? A robbery of such magnitude, and extending over such an extent of time, could never have been committed if Marshall had been properly looked after by his superiors. This affair should act as a lesson to other charitable societies, for, if any of them manage their business as the Curates' Augmentation Fund managed theirs, the public will very soon leave off subscribing.

AFGHANISTAN

A MOUNTAIN BATTERY

HERE we have a section of our Indian army which will prove of great utility should an Afghan campaign be definitively decided upon next spring. Large guns with cumbersome limber and heavy wheels are manifestly unfitted for mountain warfare, when the paths to be traversed are frequently but a few feet in width, so that the chief artillery in the Abyssinian and Ashantee campaigns were miniature field-pieces weighing scarcely 150 lbs., but which, with a charge of 8 oz. of gunpowder, could carry with precision for a distance of 1,000 yards. In the Abyssinian war especially these guns, which went by the sobriquet of "steel-pens," did great service, and in the various Indian campaigns with the frontier tribes they have been found invaluable, more especially when, instead of being drawn by hand, they are mounted, as we represent in our illustration, upon the backs of mules, whose sure-footedness and great powers of endurance render them especially fitted for this purpose. The various sketches need little explanation. In two we have the battery on the march, in a third the cannon are unpacked, mounted on their wheels, and drawn up in readiness for action, while the fourth depicts the artillerymen loading the mule with the gun.

CROSSING THE INDUS

THIS great river, which flows from the Hindoo Koosh through our two north-western provinces of India, the Punjaub and Scinde, is of especial interest at the present moment owing to the Indus valley being the route by which a large portion of our forces will reach the frontier. Southwards from Lahore to Sukkur runs the Indus Valley State Railway, crossing the Sutlej, and skirting the Chenab and Ravee, while northwards the railway reaches as far as Rawul Pindee; but elsewhere the journey will have to be accomplished on the march, and the river will have to be forded after very much the same fashion as represented in our illustration. The Indus, however, is not a good river for navigation, as, owing to the arid sandy nature of its basin, and the small number of its affluents, the volume of water, after a certain point is passed, actually grows smaller rather than larger as it flows towards the sea, the river suffering from absorption and evaporation, and also dividing into numerous channels, many of which never return at all to the main stream.

THE EMPRESS BRIDGE OVER THE SUTLEJ

THE State Railway Bridge across the River Sutlej is probably the largest engineering work in India, being four-fifths of a mile long, and placed on seventeen foundations of more than one hundred feet in depth, while it has cost about fifty-nine lakhs of rupees. The bridge is particularly remarkable from the celerity with which it was built, under very trying circumstances, owing to the unhealthiness of the situation. It carries the Indus Valley Railway across the most dangerous and shifting river of the Punjaub, and serves as the completing link between Mooltan and Sukkur. The present complication on the north-west frontier gives this work an especial interest, and it was no doubt with a view to its great strategic importance that the Government of India pushed on the works with such rapidity. Our illustration is drawn from a photograph by Messrs. Shepherd and Bourne, of Simla.

The bridge was completed last June, when, at a public breakfast given in honour of the ceremony, Sir Andrew Clarke, who, by special command of Her Majesty, named it the Empress Bridge, said, in the course of a speech, that sixteen years had elapsed since Mr. Brunton, the engineer, pitched his camp and collected his forces in that then desolate spot, having a task to perform not less vast than that which mighty Iscander undertook when, with his hosts, he crossed the Ravee and the Chenab, and came to this very site for the conquest of India. In bridging the Sutlej a task had been accomplished which had baffled the mighty conqueror, great and interesting engineering difficulties had been overcome, chief of all the vagaries of the Sutlej itself, which was a very Bohemian in its nature and an Ariel in its eccentricities.

OUR OBITUARY RECORD

GENERAL THE RIGHT HON. SIR THOMAS MYDDLETON BIDDULPH, K.C.B., Keeper of Her Majesty's Privy Purse, was the second and youngest son of Mr. Robert Biddulph, of Chirk Castle. He was born in 1809, entered the Army in 1826, and served in the 1st Lifeguards till his promotion to Lieutenant-Colonel in 1857, when he went on half-pay. In October last he became a full General in consequence of the promotion under the new Army scheme. On the retirement of General Sir George Bowles he was appointed Master of the Queen's Household and Extra Equerry to Her Majesty. Afterwards he was appointed Receiver-General of the Duchy of Cornwall, and one of the joint keepers of the Queen's Privy Purse in conjunction with the Hon. Sir Charles Phipps, K.C.B., and in May, 1867, he became Keeper of the Queen's Privy Purse, when that appointment was limited to one official. In 1863 he was created a Knight Commander of the Order of the Bath for his civil services, and was recently made a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council. The remains of the late Sir Thomas were brought from Abergeldie, where he died, to Windsor, where they were interred in the picturesque churchyard of Clewer. The funeral was attended by several members of the Royal Family, and the coffin was completely covered with floral wreaths, one of which was sent by Her Majesty, who had already expressed her profound grief at the loss of one of her most valued and confidential servants, and her sympathy with the bereaved widow, Lady Biddulph.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Hills and Saunders, Eton.

SIR FRANCIS GRANT, President of the Royal Academy, was the fourth son of the late Mr. F. Grant, of Kilgraston, Perthshire, and brother of General Sir J. Hope Grant. He was born in Edinburgh, and commenced his professional career in 1827; but it was not until 1834 that he first exhibited at the Royal Academy (then located at Somerset House). Some years later, when the Exhibition was removed to the National Gallery, he had become a regular contributor, and in 1842 he was elected an Associate. He became an Academician in 1851, and in 1866 was chosen President in succession to the late Sir Charles Eastlake, and received the honour of knighthood in the same year. Amongst the best known of his early works are "The Melton Hunt" and "The Meet of His Majesty's Staghounds," portrait groups of celebrated sportsmen, both of which were engraved. He is, however, best known as a portrait painter, his principal portraits being those of the Marchioness of Waterford, the Ladies Howard, Lady Rodney, Mrs. Beauclerk, Lord Macaulay, the Earl of Beaconsfield, Mr. Lockhart, Lords Hardinge, Gough, Campbell, Derby, Palmerston, Clyde, and Russell, his brother, Sir Hope Grant, and his friend, Sir Edwin Landseer. Sir Francis died somewhat suddenly of heart disease, at his residence at Melton Mowbray, where he was buried on Saturday last, the funeral being attended by a large number of Academicians and Associates. The service was conducted by the Archbishop of York, who is chaplain to the Royal Academy, and who, at the special request of Lady Grant, delivered an address. Our portrait is from a photograph.

CYPRUS—CONVEYING CONVICTS BACK TO TURKEY

WHEN the British took possession of Cyprus numerous prisons were found to be full of convicts undergoing their sentence, and after some discussion it was determined to send them in a British ironclad to Turkey, there to be distributed amongst the various Ottoman penal settlements. Not, however, that their life in Cyprus appears to have been particularly uncomfortable, as these men had been kept in a lax and easy custody, had been permitted to work and sell their work in the bazaars, and it was not an uncommon sight, the correspondent of The Times writes, to see a murderer passing through the streets unguarded, bearing back to prison the money for which he had sold the produce of his labour. So remunerative, indeed, was their work that when they left Nikosia they were owed some thousands of piastres for which they had given credit. These men were the worst criminals collected from different parts of the Turkish Empire, but the Mahomedan population appeared grieved to see them go, and as they marched away the women spectators gave vent to a low monotonous wailing. Nor had all the gentleness of human nature gone altogether out of the rascals, as they had small pet dogs amongst them with which they were loth to part, and which, on marching away, they bore in their arms. A number of these convicts were embarked on board H.M.S. Black Prince, where our illustration depicts them, and were conveyed to the different Turkish ports to which they were to be distributed—some going to Rhodes, some to Acre, and others to Adana.

AFGHANISTAN—CROSSING THE INDUS

costumes, and sketches of primitive rural life we would recommend a visit to the apple growing province of Northern France. The time to go is, of course, the autumn, when the trees are laden—even as we saw them a month ago—with small, bright, pink-coloured apples, sweet and toothsome, and of which you can obtain your fill for a sou. Peep into the tumble-down shed that adjoins yon cottage and you will see a mysterious-looking machine with a handle and three hammers—for all the world like the arms of the Isle of Man, attached to a monster coffee-mill. This is the cider press, where the roseate fruit, packed between two layers of straw, is converted into a square cake of brown madder hue, the juice being squeezed out into a large tub wherein it is left to ferment. Cider-time, like harvesting, is always a period of some little merry-making, the favourite game of bowls, depicted in our illustration, being with the men a frequent diversion during lunch or dinner time. They are very good-natured, are these worthy Normans, and many a time have they permitted the writer, when a boy, to pick and choose among the apples without any charge, and one winter they watched with considerable astonishment the climbing efforts of some English lads to whom they had given permission to mount the trees to obtain some bunches of mistletoe for Christmas decorations. "What can they want with those nasty white berries? Parbleu, one must not wonder at anything with these poor eccentric islanders!" Our illustrations are sufficiently explained by their titles.

EDMUND SANDILLI AND FOLLOWERS AWAITING THEIR TRIAL IN THE YARD OF THE COURT-HOUSE, KING WILLIAM'S TOWN

"This drawing," says our special artist, "represents Edmund Sandilli and other Kaffir prisoners awaiting their trial in the yard of the Court House, King William's Town. The Kaffirs have a mode of sitting on their heels, peculiar to most African tribes, and when in this position they are wrapped up in their sheepskin mantles (wool inside), or their ochre-coloured blankets, there is very little of their forms to be seen; indeed, it often looks as if it were impossible for the whole frame of a human being to be contained in so small a compass. Some long fellows, on rising from this posture, seem to unfold like a telescope, and the uninitiated wonder when it is all to finish.

"The Kaffir on the left, in a light felt hat with a black band, is Edmund Sandilli, eldest son of the late old chief, Sandilli; and on his left is his half-brother, Matanzima, who, as one of the rebels, took a conspicuous part in the late war. Edmund is of a very light colour for a Kaffir; and his brother, Matanzima, has a beautiful, small hand. The two figures squatting on the right, in front, show how their mantles are cut with lappets, allowing the sheepskin wool to be seen by turning it back. In feature the Kaffir is intelligent-looking, and is bodily well formed; though now, from hardship and starvation, the prisoners do not look up to their usual mark."

Political Affairs.——The Afghan difficulty still continues the chief topic of most political addresses. Sir H. James, M.P., speaking at Taunton last week, said that of course Englishmen would never entertain the idea that the existence of the Indian Empire could be endangered. If they had to enter upon an Afghan war they had to fear not what was in front, but what was behind, in shape of Indian discontent. Though caution would have to be pursued, and the stake was great, we might feel confident that English arms would sustain the character and honour of the country. Mr. C. B. Denison, M.P., speaking at Leeds on Monday, said that it would be an evil day for Russia if she pushed England into a corner, for he believed that if we were compelled to put forth our power we could in one or two campaigns undo the work of Russia in Asia for the last twenty-five years.—At the annual meeting of the Midland Arbitration Union held at Birmingham on Tuesday, several letters expressing disapproval of the Government policy with regard to India and Afghanistan were read, and resolutions were adopted condemning the action of the Indian Government as rash, aggressive, and contrary to all principles of right, and as likely to involve England in a war which even, if successful, will increase the suffering of the people, must require an immense sacrifice of life and treasure, and may seriously endanger the stability of British rule in India.—Mr. Blake, M.P., addressing his constituents at Leominster on Wednesday, said that the power of the Crown had formerly been used in moderation, but the whole thing had changed since the present Premier came into office. The members of the Government were dummies—one man had the ear of the Queen, and he had absolute power over his colleagues, who simply followed suit.—On Monday Mr. Jacob Bright, M.P., addressing a Liberal meeting at Newton Heath, denounced the acquisition of Cyprus as a theft committed in the dark, and said that it was only a statesman of the charlatan character who would begin a war in Afghanistan under the pretence of making India more secure.—Mr. Gladstone has received, from the Bombay branch of the East India Association, an address of thanks for the part which he took in the House of Commons in regard to the Vernacular Press Act.—A memorial signed by 65 Armenians residing in England, and principally engaged in mercantile pursuits, has been presented to Lord Salisbury, expressing satisfaction at the prospect of an English Protectorate of Asia Minor.—No fewer than five candidates have entered the lists to compete for the vacancy at Peterborough, Mr. George Potter, the well-known working-men's advocate, who is first upon the list, has written to Messrs. Gladstone and Bright asking them for "some kind recommendations," but has failed to get them from either, the ex-Premier excusing himself on the ground of the inexpediency of fostering any divisions in the Liberal party at so critical a period, and Mr. Bright declining because he once got into trouble for doing something of a like kind. The other candidates are Mr. J. H. Raper, Permissive Bill advocate, Mr. Macliver, President of the Railway Servants' Society, the Hon. J. F. Fitzwilliam, "Independent," and Mr. J. C. Lawrence, Q.C., Conservative.—On Monday, Mr. Morley, M.P., attended a meeting of the Liberal Four Hundred of Bristol, and explained that his wish to retire from Parliament was simply because he was getting old, and needed rest. A resolution was passed thanking him for past services, and asking him to reconsider his intention.

Miscellaneous.——The dreadful accident at a music-hall in Liverpool has been one of the principal topics of the week. It occurred on Friday last in a building occupied by an audience of about 4,000 people, who, alarmed by a sudden cry of "Fire," rushed panic-stricken to the doors, at one of which a block was created. Thirty-seven persons were either suffocated or crushed to death, and a large number of others sustained severe injuries. The building has four exits, but it appears that the doors open inwards, and the passages leading to them are of the most inconvenient description. There is a curious conflict of opinion as to the origin of the alarm, for which as has since been proved there was not the slightest foundation. One theory is that the cry was a malicious one; another that it was caused by the sudden flaring up of the footlights; a third that it was a demand for a song called "Fire;" a fourth that it was one of the audience calling out to a companion who was nicknamed "Fire Dick," and a fifth that the fall of some plaster from the ceiling suggested the idea. The proprietor has offered a reward of 20*l.* for the name of the person who raised the alarm. An inquest has been opened and formally adjourned.—The Board of Trade Inquiry into the loss of the Princess Alice was opened at Poplar on Monday before Mr. Balguy, the Special Commissioner, assisted by Commander Forster and Captain Parfitt as nautical assessors, and Mr. Ravenhill as engineering assessor. On Tuesday, the Committee appointed by the Board of Trade to consider the subject of Thames navigation held their first meeting. It is understood that any evidence which the Committee may take will be published with their Report on the conclusion of their inquiry.—The Report of the Royal Commission on the London Stock Exchange has just been issued. Fifty-three witnesses, officials, dealers, and brokers, were examined, and their evidence occupies 350 folio pages, to which are added a number of appendices containing documents and statements handed in by them.—The twenty-second annual Social Science Congress opens at Cheltenham on Wednesday next, under the presidency of Lord Norton.—On Monday, the balloon "Crusader," employed by the Royal Engineers in the military ballooning experiments at Woolwich, broke from its moorings, and sailed away without any car attached. It descended at Oxford some hours afterwards, and was found to be very little damaged.—The electric light was the other day utilised at Sheffield, by some enthusiastic footballists, who played a match in the presence of 30,000 spectators. Four Siemens' lights were used at the cost of 3½*d.* per hour each, and the experiment was a complete success.—Two men have been killed and a third injured by a collision between two coal trains, which occurred on Monday in a tunnel belonging to the Nunnery Colliery Company at Sheffield.—At Stoke-on-Trent, on the same day, a number of men were very seriously hurt by the explosion of a boiler, which is stated to have been in use for thirty-eight years.—The Shaker community at Lymington are in very straitened circumstances, and are said to be feeding mainly on chesnuts gathered in the forest. Mrs. Girling asserts that she has received a revelation that they will return to New Forest Lodge.

THEATRES

The old-fashioned sentimental drama in which Miss Agnes Leonard has been lately representing the part of the heroine at the Court Theatre has given place to a "comedy drama," entitled Memories, which claims to be new, but is in truth, only a recombination of very familiar dramatic incidents. The anonymous author of this piece has chosen to tell the old story of a rustic maiden of limited education and homely manners who is suddenly discovered to be a young lady of aristocratic parentage. Her birth, we learn, had been the cause of the death of her mother, Lady Gascoigne, who was so tenderly loved by her husband, Sir Jasper Gascoigne, that the sight of his child henceforth became distasteful to him, and he placed her with an ignorant but kind-hearted old farmer and his wife down in Devonshire. This done he apparently thought no more of the matter until she had entered on the state of womanhood, when, for unexplained reasons, he began, as he expresses it, to "hunger for her love," and, therefore, dropped in one day at the farmhouse and claimed his offspring. As Sir Jasper is represented as a person of refined feelings, and it was certainly no fault of his daughter that she had from infancy upwards been led to regard the farmer and his wife as her veritable parents, it might reasonably be expected that the repentant parent would have proceeded with tact and moderation in so delicate a business as that of suddenly declaring himself, and removing the young lady from her old protectors. Sir Jasper bluntly desires his daughter to pack up and depart, and having taken care to insult the old folks in a perfectly needless and gratuitous way he accords ten minutes for reflection, and proposes what he calls his "ultimatum." Naturally enough the young person observes that it was not her father's "place" to neglect her so long; and further shows signs of rebellion; but an offer of 500*l.*, coupled with the discovery that her foster father is sadly in want of that sum, decides her; and "Bell" as she is called, departs to take her place in "society." Henceforth begins the old contrast between rough manners and an exalted station. Bell is sharp of tongue, and much given to lecturing her father on the duties of his station; and her father gives way to frequent explosions of passion. Now and then he indulges in such ejaculations as "Ah! how happy I could be if your heart were as full of love for me as your head is replete with sound common sense and wisdom!" but the audience are unfortunately not permitted to observe many tokens of these latter redeeming qualities. The young lady is, indeed, depicted as a rather shallow and pert person, slightly wanting in the instinctive self-respect of her sex, and wholly deficient in consideration for the feeling of others. Some notion seems to have haunted the author's mind of conveying through the utterances of his heroine a rebuke to pride of birth and the insincerities of fashionable folks; but if so he certainly fails in attaining his object, for his heroine is not merely unfashionable—she is excessively vulgar and selfish. An attempt is made to win sympathy for her by representing her as frustrating the villany of a transparently roguish steward, and thus shielding her father from the consequences of his own infatuated trustfulness; and on this ground the spectator is invited to rejoice over the final permission accorded to her to marry a young man of humble position, whose acquaintance she had made in her Devonshire home. But the dénouement excites only a languid interest, and the pomposity of the dialogue and curious feebleness of purpose of Sir Jasper awaken unseasonable laughter. There is little in the acting to call for comment. Miss Agnes Leonard reserves for herself the part of the heroine, which she plays with sufficient—indeed more than sufficient—spirit and vivacity; but probably no attempt to soften the coarser lines of the portrait would be of much avail

At Drury Lane Theatre, on Saturday afternoon, the 12th inst., a large audience witnessed the opening performance of a series of Operas in English. The representation was The Taming of the Shrew, a comic opera, in four acts, composed by Hermann Goetz, and produced in English for the first time in this country. The music may be fairly spoken of as high-class, and the artists who were selected to render it won deserved applause. Mdlle. Zuliani exhibited sterling histrionic power as Katharine, the Shrew; and Miss Rolt was acceptable as Bianca. The honours of the performance, however, were carried off by Mr. Walter Bolton, who has achieved considerable fame abroad as a baritone. His acting and singing on this occasion were loudly and frequently applauded. The performance was ably directed by Mr. Karl Meyder.

The amusing adaptation of La Boite à Bibi which was brought out at the Folly Theatre last year under the title of A Night of Terror has been refurbished by the adaptors, Messrs. Wyndham and Matthison, and converted into a comic extravaganza with the title of Tantalus. In its new form the piece receives efficient support from Mr. Lionel Brough, Miss Lydia Thompson, and other members of the Folly company; and though it is disfigured by one incident, not of a very refined character, it is unquestionably entertaining.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's Entertainment.——Mr. Arthur Sketchley will give his popular entertainment, "Mrs. Brown at the Play," during the enforced temporary absence of Mr. Corney Grain, who has been ordered complete rest.

THE CORPS OF COMMISSIONAIRES

The neat uniform worn by the above corps must be tolerably familiar to the eyes of most Londoners, and there are few business men who have not at one time or another been glad to avail themselves of the services of one of its members. The public generally, however, knows very little of the organisation of the corps itself or the conditions under which it exists, and a short paper calling attention to the most important features may be interesting. The corps was originally raised by Captain Walter, and is still superintended by him. It is not composed entirely of old soldiers, as many suppose, but candidates for admission must, as a rule, have served in the Army, Navy, Militia, Volunteers, or Police, and be in the receipt of a pension. The corps had but a small beginning, but in the twenty years or so since its first establishment its numbers have increased from a baker's dozen to between, we believe, seven and eight hundred men. Branches have been opened in some of the larger towns, and it is hoped that eventually there will be one in every town of 100,000 inhabitants. A novel and interesting feature has been added this year, namely, a department presided over by a lady adjutant. To her charge all matters relating to the interests of the wives and children of the members will be entrusted. When it is remembered that these form a community of two thousand strong, some idea of the magnitude and importance of the lady-adjutant's duties is obtained, as well as of the additional labour which must hitherto have devolved upon the working staff of the corps. It is important to note, moreover, that the corps is in no sense of the word a charitable institution, though it owes its origin to a charitable impulse. All these women and children are provided for by the exertions of the members themselves. There is an endowment applicable to the expenses of administration, and to which the public or any regiment of Her Majesty's service may subscribe, but for the rest the institution only undertakes to find suitable work for the men, whose honesty and sobriety it guarantees. It brings its members and employers of labour together to their mutual advantage, and moreover its object is to supply almost any kind of labour. Accordingly we find that the services of Commissionaires are available for almost any kind of duty, either permanent or temporary. As messengers they will undertake the charge of property or papers to any part of England and the Continent, or they will go with a note to the next street. More than 150 are employed as ticket-takers, money-takers, or door-keepers. Night watchmen and hospital attendants are supplied, books, circulars, visiting cards or newspapers delivered, and circulars directed and folded. There is a band, the services of which, or any part of it, can be secured for private parties. Moreover there are men of high education or with special qualifications, and who, of course, expect a proportionately higher scale of remuneration. The scale of pay is so arranged as to suit every possible convenience or requirement of an employer. The Commissionaire can be engaged by the day or night, week, year, or season. Where board or lodging, or both, are given, a fixed deduction is made from his pay; and if he should fall ill, his place will be supplied by another, at no expense to the employer.

It is perhaps not a matter for much wonder that there should be a steadily increasing demand for these services. The authorities at the General Post Office have expressed themselves well satisfied with the men they have employed, and there is reason to hope that thus other Government offices will be induced to increase the number of men engaged. As sixty more were added to the roll of the corps, and seventy-three more permanent engagements have been obtained during the past twelve months, it is evident that the institution is gaining in public confidence. Some members, of course, have had to be discharged for misconduct; but it must not be forgotten that the peculiar and confidential duties undertaken necessitate rules and regulations of exceptional stringency. The Commandant of the Corps can have nothing but its prosperity to desire; and for the sake of the members generally, who depend for support upon public confidence, it is necessary to be strict in enforcing discipline. It is therefore impossible sometimes to overlook offences of a certain order which, under different circumstances, might and would be condoned for once.

We have enumerated a few of the services which the Corps of Commissionaires is prepared to render to the public, and have only space to catalogue very briefly the benefits which the men themselves derive from the institution. From time to time the mind of the public has been occupied with the question of providing in some way for the gallant and deserving men who had served it faithfully; but it was left to private enterprise to devise a really practical scheme. The great point, of course, was to enable men still able to work to obtain suitable employment. About this time last year we remember pointing out the difficulty which old soldiers used frequently to experience in doing this. For men who had lost a limb, or had been worn out in the service, so that they were incapable of severe physical exertion, there was no regular machinery provided by which they might find occupation the lighter kinds. In addition to supplying this want, the institution provides, as far as possible, accommodation in the head-quarter barracks, a canteen, a mess, a co-operative store, a savings' bank, an insurance fund, a retiring and convalescent fund, and finally a fair education to those who desire to join the corps, but are unable to satisfy its requirements in this respect. It is perhaps unnecessary to pursue the subject further. Captain Walter's benevolent and comprehensive scheme for the benefit of his old comrades, and veterans of all the services generally cannot fail, we think, to receive the hearty appreciation and cordial support which it so richly deserves from the public as its merits become more and more widely known. And we believe that its great value lies in the fact that it shows, on a small scale, how a question of the highest national importance can be solved, and that the principle, which has been so ably worked out in its smallest details by an individual, can be applied by the State in fulfilment of a national duty.

THE ISLAND OF CAPRI

NAPLES is almost as well known, nowadays, to the majority of regular autumn tourists, as Aberdeen, or the Welsh mountains; and so, they will tell you, is the adjacent island of Capri. But, as a rule, this latter assertion is founded on the mistaken idea that they have succeeded in "doing" the island when they have spent half-an-hour in its famous "Blue Grotto." It is true that Capri is very small, but at the same time it is not all contained in a grotto, and, even without personal knowledge of its beauties, it would be natural to conclude that it must have possessed some other charms to tempt the ancients, and above all to induce Tiberius to build seven villas on it. The ill-used remains of several of these still afford many an interesting hour's study, while collectors of mosaic fragments can indulge their taste in the ruins more harmlessly, perhaps, than anywhere else in Italy. The beautiful old morsels appear to be gathered up chiefly to aid in making floors for halls and rooms in private houses, or else they are smothered under a rank growth of weeds and rubbish, as though it were an object with this age to get rid of even these interesting traces of one of the tyrants who disgraced a past time.

Of course, in this period of hurry and emulation, it is a half necessary object with many travellers "to say they have been there," wherever it may be, but to those who like to see places for the places' sake, and not only because the world goes to see them, or because their friends or rivals have visited them, a stay of three days at Capri can be strongly recommended. It may be as well to note, however, that the excursion should be made in settled weather, or the three days may grow into ten, or even more. The Mediterranean sometimes lashes itself into a state of splendid fury which renders navigation round these rocks far too dangerous to be attempted by the cautious Italian sailors, and although for people with tranquil minds and plenty of time that would be no hardship, the larger part of the world have neither, and would chafe sorely at imprisonment even in such a lovely prison. However, there is quite a little colony of English artists to afford companionship, and, for human objects of admiration, such a number of beautiful native girls and children as a gleaning from the whole of Italy would scarcely afford. The beauty of some of the olive-tinted, oval faces, and glorious dark eyes, is almost superhuman. They captivate the artists, occasionally, who marry their owners, and then send them to school, and try, not always successfully, to teach them to like wearing shoes and stockings better than being beasts of burden for travellers' portmanteaus and labourers' hods, such being their usual occupations.

A new wing was being built lately to one of the hotels. There was a man to oversee and direct, and a boy as foreman; all the rest of the labourers were young girls between the ages of eight and sixteen. One of these young builders, whose chief office appeared to be mixing the mortar, need have feared no rival in any London belle, even as regarded grace of movement, courtesy of manner, or daintiness of the strong little brown hands. Amongst the whole set there was not one who did not deserve a more glowing epithet than "pretty," and who did not look most misplaced in her hard and rough employment. "But," as one of them observed, "how can it be helped? Nearly all the men have to go off to the coral fisheries to earn money for the heavy taxes. And meantime the families cannot quite starve." Most of the inhabitants are on the verge of doing so, however, as a rule, and it is little wonder, under the circumstances, that begging is more universal than it is even in Ireland. In notes I made during many walks on the spot, I find "Capri is the place for beggars, even the babies lisp, 'Un Baioc.'" One cannot blame the poor creatures, when a day's work will not provide a day's sufficiency even of the simple food with which they are contented. One afternoon, as we were returning from Monte Solario, the highest point of the island, about a dozen girls begged and accepted with eager gratitude the small remnants of a frugal picnic luncheon, the whole of which one would not have dared to offer to the most ragged, miserable-looking Londoner. Another time tears of mortified longing came into a cowherd's eyes as he watched me feeding his lean little dog with broken bits of bread I had pulled off the crust. Seeing that, after considerable hesitation, I held what was left out to him. He almost snatched at it, and the dog got no more, not even a dropped crumb. But it is in Capri itself, rather than its inhabitants, that most people will be interested.

The first day should undoubtedly be spent in making the tour of the island. The morning after our arrival we left the hotel at half-past ten A.M., walked down the rough path to the "Piccola Marina," one of the only two accessible landing-places of the whole rock-bound coast, and taking the boat of one Beppino, a Capri favourite, we were rowed round the island by him and two of his companions in little more than five hours. Four hours is enough for the voyage in very calm weather, and then the red groundwork appears just above the edge of the water with the most perfect regularity, while the ornamentation of scarlet coral shines out on its dark hue with dazzling brilliancy. We were rowed into the "Green Grotto," which certainly deserves a share of its "Blue" sister's fame. Then visits were paid to the "Rose Grotto" and the "Sailor's Grotto," into which latter, with its double entrance, the island legend has it, the bodies of Tiberius's victims used to drift when they were flung down the face of that awful rock which is crowned with one of the tyrant's many villas. The "White Grotto" must not be forgotten, looking, with its domed roof, like the side chapel of some fine Italian church. A natural gallery runs round it, which the stalactites have adorned with an appearance of marble, or rather Parian, statues, while the almost pointed entrance arch is draped with stalactites resembling rich and heavy silken fringes.

The last part of the voyage leads through the natural archway in the smallest, and centre, of the three picturesque masses of rock popularly known, not by their guide-book name, but as the "Tre Fratelli." It is impossible, without taking some such voyage, duly to estimate the majestic, and even, in some parts, awful rocks, both composing and guarding this minute island, which generally looks, from Naples, like a fallen purple cloud, only slightly more solid than its higher companions.

Another day may be devoted to the steep climb up Monte Solario, and a visit to the village of Anna-Capri, with its curious old church. The first part of the expedition may be made in one of the only two carriages on the island, along a fine road cut out of the face of the rock within the last few years; but those who can walk had far better linger along on their own feet, for the beauty varies at almost every step, and the really fatiguing climb up old water-courses full of maidenhair fern and violets, and over loose, grey stones, partially bound together by every imaginable wild flower, must be made on foot. The views from the summit of the rugged old mountain are compensation for almost any amount of weariness. The following notes written on the spot about two o'clock in the afternoon give an accurate, though startling, picture of the many distinctly marked colourings:

"Sheltered from the strong wind and the blazing sun, by the nearly two thousand-year-old walls of this, the fourth ruined villa of Tiberius of which we have found remains on the island, we have far below, on one side of us, the deep dark blue Bay of Naples, Naples itself shining like a white line along its edge, the fair gem, Ischia, the favourite flower garden home of Vittoria Colonna, just behind us, and opposite Ischia calm, purple-grey Vesuvius, with its smoke crown settling a short way down like a delicate turban-folded veil. On the other side, just below our feet, under the precipitous cliffs, gleam white rocks beneath the green covering of the clear, far-stretching Mediterranean, while in front we have the brilliant Cambridge-blue Bay of Salerno, with its two groups of corn-rick-like rocks standing out, brown, in the silver-edged water, imagined rather than seen, most beautiful Amalfi, and, far on, the dim desert of Pæstum. Each picture is most exquisite, while each is different, and it is borne in upon the mind most strongly that the heights of Capri, and not Naples, afford the place from which to learn that this Bay of Naples has a wonderful beauty that almost bears down the very power of admiration. Monte Tiberio affords another excursion, more fine views, and the most extensive and best preserved of the ruins; while the difficult, but luxuriant, cultivation of the whole stony island in the minute terraces affords the stranger fresh interest at every step." WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

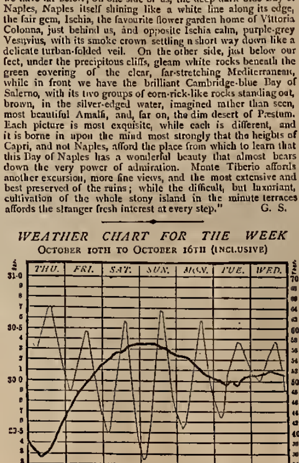
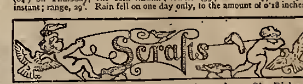
OCTOBER 10TH TO OCTOBER 16TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The seven-day period ending on Wednesday, the 16th instant, opened with a low barometer and rough unsettled weather; but at about mid-day on Thursday, the 10th instant, the mercury began to rise very decidedly, and though the wind continued gusty throughout the greater part of Friday, the 11th instant, the sky cleared considerably and the day was bright. The next three days—Saturday (12th), Sunday (13th), and Monday (14th)—were extremely fine; but on Tuesday, the 15th instant, the weather became very cloudy, and both that day and Wednesday, the 16th instant, were dull and gloomy, with a good deal of haze at times. Lunar halo was observed on two or three occasions at the close of last week. Temperature was rather low about Saturday and Sunday, the 12th and 13th, the thermometer on the early morning of the latter day falling to 35° in the shade. Scarcely any rain has fallen. The barometer was highest (30·35 inches) on Sunday, the 13th instant; lowest (29·27 inches) on Thursday, the 10th instant; range, 1·08 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (64°) on Thursday, the 10th instant; lowest (35°) on Sunday, the 13th instant; range, 29°. Rain fell on one day only, to the amount of 0·18 inches.



THE IRISH NATIONAL GALLERY is to have Sir Richard Wallace and Lord Gough as Trustees.

HERR RUBINSTEIN is writing a new opera, Ivan Kalashnikoff. M. Gounod is also projecting a new work in five acts for the Paris Opera, to be called the Tribut de Zamora.

THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS have lately received a fresh rhinoceros, a full-grown female, from Sumatra. The Gardens now contain five rhinoceroses belonging to five different species—four from Asia and one from Africa—and the only known specimen required to complete the set is the white African rhinoceros (Rhinoceros simus).

THE RUSSIAN PRESENTS TO THE AMEER OF CABUL, taken by the Muscovite Mission, are said to have been magnificent. The "Khillut" included, according to the Times of India, a splendid suite of Parisian jewels, a sabre set with brilliants—the Czar's personal gift to Shere Ali,—some war material, and several unique articles of Circassian art for the Seraglio.

FEMININE BETTING at the various Transatlantic pleasure resorts is said to have been unusually prevalent this summer. During the racing season at Saratoga one lady won twenty boxes of gloves, ten boxes of bonbons, and 40*l.* in money. Not all visitors to Saratoga Springs, however, go there for mere pleasure, for one old lady made it her daily task to go the rounds of the Springs, and consume twenty-one glasses of water per diem.

MR. SYDNEY HALL, who was our special artist during the Franco-German War, has just finished painting a picture of the Marquis of Lorne's Marriage, which his lordship was about to take with him to Canada, but has allowed to remain for a year in this country in order that Mr. Hall may make a copy of it for the Queen by command. Mr. Hall has also been commanded to paint a picture representing the marriage ceremony of the Duke of Connaught, which will take place next February at Windsor.

THE LONDON DEAF AND DUMB DEBATING SOCIETY.—An animated debate took place in the Lecture Hall on Wednesday last, the 9th inst., on the question, "Is the Indian Government justified in going to war with Afghanistan?" It was opened by one of the Vice-Presidents, Mr. M. Cant, who spoke in favour of the war, and the Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. South, who argued against it. Five or six speakers followed, and the result of the votes was 33 Ayes and 5 Noes, thus approving the policy of the Government.

CAMP-STOOL LIFE BUOY.—The camp-stool, as everybody knows, is one of the most familiar objects on board of our pleasure steamers, and Messrs. J. and A. W. Birt, of Dock Street, London Docks, bearing this fact in mind, and also the Princess Alice disaster, have patented a camp-stool life-buoy. Four large pieces of cork are fastened to the legs of an ordinary camp-stool, the article thereby being rendered buoyant, and capable of supporting at least two people in the water. The idea deserves the attention of steamboat proprietors.

THE NATIONAL TRAINING-SCHOOL FOR MUSIC.—The friends and patrons of the above-named Institution assembled in great force at the Mansion House on Wednesday afternoon, to assist at a Students' Concert. The Egyptian Hall, which had been placed at their disposal by the Lord Mayor, was crowded to excess. The students acquitted themselves well—two deserve special mention—Miss Lucy Riley, for her brilliant and finished execution of Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin; and Eugene d'Albert—who is quite a lad—for his masterly performance of Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E Minor.

A SCRAP OF THE SKIN OF ANNE OF AUSTRIA, wife of Louis XIII. of France, is shortly to be sold in Paris. This historic relic is about 4 inches broad and 11 inches long, and strongly resembles, both in colour and substance, the favourite Parisian gants de Suède. Anne's body was buried in the church of the Val-de-Grâce, which was founded by her as a thanksgiving for the birth of Louis XIV., and the morsel of skin was taken from her right arm in 1800 by a Dr. Dabos, physician to the Val-de-Grâce, and had been carefully preserved in the family until, the last descendant having died, his property is to be sold.

LONDON MORTALITY increased last week, and 1,418 deaths were registered against 1,355 during the previous seven days, an increase of 63, being at the rate of 20·7 per 1,000. There were 5 deaths from small-pox, 13 from measles (a decline of 6), 33 from scarlet fever (a decrease of 1), 17 from diphtheria (a decline of 3, but exceeding the average by 7), 52 from whooping-cough (an increase of 12), 34 from different forms of fever (an increase of 6), and 37 from diarrhœa (a decline of 6). Deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs numbered 286 (an increase of 39, and exceeding the average by 59). There were 2,358 births registered, an increase of 71. The mean temperature was 56·9 deg., or 5 deg. above the average. The duration of registered sunshine during the week was 31·3 hours out of 77·3 hours that the sun was above the horizon.

M. THIERS' PHILOSOPHICAL WORK, left unfinished at his death, was regarded by the statesman as greater than any of his historical works, and shortly after its commencement he wrote to his sister-in-law that if he were not spared to witness its success, his wife and she must reap the fame. He began the work in 1864, and worked at it at intervals until his resignation of office in 1874, when he studied botany and astronomy, and consequently made great alterations in his composition. In 1876 he began to revise his manuscript at Lausanne and Cannes, writing each page afresh and tearing up the old copy, while he also wrote an introduction. His duties as President of the Army Commission so occupied his time in 1877 that he could only glance at the beginning of the second volume, and he had merely revised a few pages at Dieppe and St. Germain when he died. Two volumes thus remain to be revised, and M. Mignet is to superintend and edit the copy, the original manuscript remaining in Madame Thiers' possession.

LORD DUFFERIN'S SUGGESTION to form an International Park round the Falls of Niagara is looked upon very favourably in the United States, and the Americans consider that such a step would eventually lead to a coalition of the American and Canadian peoples. Thus the New York Herald declares that if the project were carried out, Niagara would become the great summer resort of both Americans and Canadians, who would there constantly meet together, become knit by social and domestic ties, and gradually advance towards political union. Our contemporary's propositions on the æsthetic view of the subject are, however, better than on the political side. The journal very sensibly urges that in laying out such a park, the great object should be to restore the surroundings of the Falls to their pristine condition, instead of forming them after the plan of prim civilisation. The Park should be wild in nature, and only ornamented in keeping with the subject; the groups of statuary in particular being descriptive of aboriginal life, as Indian scenes would afford plentiful scope for the imagination.

DRESS IN BURMAH is directed by law. Every article of costume or ornament is strictly regulated, and if any of the lower orders usurp the insignia of a higher class, they may be immediately slain by the first person who meets them on the road. Indeed, Mendoon-Men, the King of Burmah, who has recently died, ruled his subjects with an iron hand. His officers of State were entirely dependent on his caprices, and when they fell into disgrace were exhibited on the side of the high road under the burning sun, with a heavy weight on their stomachs, while those in favour were not paid in money, but by a grant of land, or of public labour. Spies and detectives were honourable Court institutions, and the Lord of the White Elephant devoted a certain time daily to receiving the reports of his secret emissaries. Mendoon-men was literary in his tastes, had keen commercial instincts, and heartily hated the British, holding, on the other hand, Italians in high favour. He was much under the dominion of the Buddhist priests, and had greatly increased the taxation for their benefit, while he had covered Burmah with new pagodas, and at the time of his death was engaged in building an immense edifice, to which all his subjects had been forced to contribute.

BRIDESMAIDS IN FRANCE are now replaced by two tiny pages, says Mayfair, who are chosen from the prettiest of the boy-relatives of the bride or bridegroom, and are dressed in velvet of the bride's favourite colour. At a recent wedding the tiny court dress worn was of sapphire velvet, with white silk stockings and velvet shoes with diamond buckles. A bouquet composed of a rosebud, an orange blossom, and a branch of myrtle is attached to the left side. They perform the usual rôle of bridesmaids, carry the bride's missal, bouquet, gloves, and, in addition, meet her and assist her from the carriage-steps. The fashion of adapting reptiles for the tiny porte bouquet has been succeeded by something prettier and more happily inspired. Ladies are now replacing them by butterflies, bees, and birds, with wide-spread wings, in diamonds. H.R.H. the Princess of Wales has adopted the dragon-fly with its sapphire wings for her cognisance. The Princess de Sagan, whom she honours with her friendship, takes the white rose of her family traditions and fastens it in her corsage with a ruby swallow. One of the presents sent to the Princess Thyra by the Empress Eugénie was a butterfly in topaz to fasten in the cyclamen of which the younger Princess is so fond. The Duchess of Teck adopts the bee as the holder of her favourite flower, the daisy, which she wears continually. And so, during the winter, we shall find les dames du beau monde choosing each respectively her own insect and flower.

LORD BEACONSFIELD'S GOLD CASKET

It will be remembered that in August last, soon after the return of our plenipotentiaries from Berlin, they were entertained at the Guildhall, and presented with the Freedom of the City in recognition of the services which they had rendered to the country during the Berlin Conference. The parchment certificates were handed to them at once, but the golden caskets in which they are to be preserved have only just been completed. They were designed and manufactured by Stephen Smith and Son, of Covent Garden. The sides are panelled in eight recesses, seven of which are occupied by enamelled shields representing the arms of the Powers at the Congress, the eighth bearing the arms of the recipient, this being the only difference between the one presented to Lord Beaconsfield and that intended for the Marquis of Salisbury. The cover is surmounted by a figure of Britannia; the base, which is of olive wood, decorated with palm leaves, bears the City arms and the inscription, and has at its four angles models of Landseer's Lions on the Nelson Column.

'TAKE CARE OF THE PENCE"

The Hon. Edward Stanhope, M.P., Under-Secretary of State for India, whose work among the hop-pickers is well known and remembered in the districts where they are employed, has taken great interest in the movement to promote thrift among them, through the agency of the National Penny Bank, of which he is the chairman and one of the most active supporters. The scheme which is being tried is to open penny banks in the hop-gardens at the time the wages are paid, so that any hop-picker who can be induced to become a depositor will, on reaching London, find his money credited to him at any one of the seventy-three Branch Penny Banks now in operation. Our illustration represents an interesting gathering which took place on Sunday, the 22nd ult., at Buffalo Farm, Mereworth, near Wateringbury, when Mr. George C. T. Bartley, the manager of the National Penny Bank, delivered an address, pointing out in a popular manner the advantages of care and thrift in money, and the benefit of making the most and best use of everything we have. We may add that the work of the National Penny Bank is divided into three distinct branches—the penny Bank, the sale of Government securities, and the loans to assist in purchasing houses.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT

The apparatus exhibited by Messrs. Wells and Co., of Shoreditch, for the production of electric light by the Jablochkoff process, and shown in our engraving, consists of a Gramme machine, a section of which is given to show the arrangement of magnets around a central axis. This rotates about 1,100 times per minute, and is driven by any ordinary engine. The Jablochkoff candle consists of two sticks of moulded carbon, embedded in a mass of composition to give them solidity, and are separated by a column of plaster of Paris, which acts as an insulator. The two carbons are connected at top by means of a thin stick of carbon one millimetre in diameter. The entire candle is held in a strong metal clip. Four of these are contained in a lamp, and are burnt in succession, an automatic arrangement shifting the current as each one is burnt out.

Messrs. Wells exhibited three of these lamps inside, and one outside of their large show rooms, the illumination of which was perfect, showing colours distinctly, and, being diffused, did not cast heavy shadows. They afterwards burnt six candles on one stand, simultaneously producing a brilliant light and solid shadows. As to the light itself, there is but little difference, and that only to be noted by experts, between it and the light produced by the systems that have already been adopted in London. It is of a very powerful character, and it extends its illuminating influence for a considerable distance without much apparent diminution of strength. Until Mr. Edison's recently-announced discovery is placed more definitely before the world we must, we think, give the palm to M. Jablochkoff for his electric candle.

Pious Celestials in California go annually to the graves of their relatives to feed the spirits of the dead. They take with them roast pork, a quantity of whisky, and such other food as a well-regulated spirit of the Chinese persuasion is supposed to relish, and place the eatables on the graves, pouring a bottle of whisky on each as a libation. After waiting long enough for the spirits to make a hearty meal, the economical Chinese pack up the food and take it home again.

SKETCHES IN A NORMAN CIDER ORCHARD, I.

His Little Mother

By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman"

PART III.

THIRTY YEARS OLD

THE second decade of Miss Waldershare's acquaintance with the twin brother and sister differed a little from the first one. It flew faster,—years do fly much faster between twenty and thirty than between ten and twenty. How then must it be between fifty-five and sixty-five?—which she was now: no longer an "elderly," but an old lady.

A fact which she had at last learnt patiently to recognise. Like many another active, energetic, and unselfish woman, she had resisted fate to the last, maintained her youth and her brightheartedness; refused to succumb to many a cruel shock; resolved to "die with harness on her back." But the wear and tear of life gradually overcame her. After one bad illness she suddenly found out that she could not revive as heretofore—that she had grown, to all intents and purposes, an old woman.

After that she had to learn to be quiet, to let others do her work instead of doing it all herself; content if she were still the head, though not the hands as well; and more than content, thankful, to see the young rising up to do her duties for her, and to work in her stead, against the time when her place should know her no more.

Something on this wise she wrote to her friend Dorcas Hall. For they had long become in spite of the difference in their ages, and the great gaps of time that intervened between their meetings, owing to the busy life of both. But they corresponded regularly; and Dorcas's simple history, as told in her letters, became the strongest interest Miss Waldershare had. Especially so, when for this active woman all the pleasures of existence slowly dwindled down to her own house and garden: and at last, during the winter months, to the limits of four silent walls.

A pair of friends
Affectionate and true,

Dorcas's letters—they are now arranged and labelled and packed together in a box, to go some day possibly to some rightful owner; if not consigned previously, by still tenderer hands, to that safest receptacle of all treasures—the fire. They began immediately after Cyprian left for India, and were full of him and his doings. Sometimes his letters were enclosed therein—bright, clever, funny, but by no means confidential epistles, if, indeed, he had had anything to confide, even to his "little mother." At first they came every mail, then less frequently, then they stopped entirely for a while; and Dorcas had to deaden her anxiety by the brief tidings she got of him through father and step-mother.

After that—sudden, startling news! Cyprian was married—actually married! at the age of two-and-twenty; unknown to any one, and to a girl whom nobody had ever heard of. He had met her at some hill-station—a mere child of sixteen—most charming, in spite of a slight touch of the despised Hindoo blood shining through her beautiful brown face. So said Cyprian, who had fallen madly in love, and in three weeks brought her home to Calcutta as his bride. But the father—irritated, and not quite without cause, at such an imprudent proceeding—turned him adrift, thus depriving him of his clerk's salary, the only income he had.

"Yet he is so clever—has so many friends—he will speedily find other work," wrote the sister, trying to look on the bright side of things. And it was so; for Cyprian seemed always to fall on his feet. But the breach between him and his father was made—and made for life.

This was Dorcas's agony; not the marriage. She forgave that. In the heart of the "little mother" jealousy—sisterly jealousy—was impossible.

"He was sure to fall in love; and to marry early was the best thing that could happen to him. I always told him so. Cyprian could never do without a woman to take care of him. Only I wish he had waited till he had just a little more money—and—I wish he had not vexed Papa! For all else—look at her likeness. Isn't it a sweet face? My pretty 'sister!' How could he help loving her? And after all, dear friend, don't you think that love is best?"

Whether Miss Waldershare did or not—that Dorcas did, she knew. For James Moffat had just persuaded her to wait indefinite years, till the Fellowship he now held should result in a College living.

"We are not like Cyprian"—and her friend fancied she could almost have seen the smile, half-tender, half-amused, yet just a little sad, with which Dorcas always spoke or wrote of Cyprian—"we can wait. Papa will never need to be angry with us." Which indeed was not likely, as Mr. Hall, senior, had always been too indifferent to his daughter to feel either pleasure or displeasure at any of her proceedings.

So time went on; and Dorcas still lived with Miss Moffat, upon a very small allowance, apparently—for she began to supplement it in various silent ways—especially in selling her drawings, which were remarkably good for an amateur. It was a dull life; except in the long vacation, when Mr. Moffat came to share her devoted care of his infirm old aunt, and to speculate with her on the chances of that college living which was to open all Paradise to these simple souls. But more than one living fell in, and was given to somebody else—somebody more "pushing," or with more College influence than honest James Moffat. Year after year went by, and he was still a Fellow—and Miss Hall a spinster—travelling through her twenties as she had done through her teens—complaining to no one and troubling no one. Few even knew that she was engaged—she and James being both silent people, who preferred not to perplex any one with their affairs.

Thus she drifted on, till she had ceased to feel herself a girl any more, and one day told Miss Waldershare, with a sort of pathetic amusement, of somebody who had called her a "born old maid." This was about the middle of the ten years. Very soon after, she arrived, quite suddenly and unexpectedly, at Miss Waldershare's door; dressed in deep mourning, looking pale and grave, but with a strange smile, not at all of hopeless misery, creeping about her mouth.

"I come to you in my trouble," she said; "I wanted to consult you—James would not understand—it is only a woman that would understand."

"What—what has happened?" looking in dread at her black dress. "Not—not Cyprian?"

"No—his wife—poor Issa. She has died, and left him with twins. Think, twins—brother and sister—just like Cyprian and me!—only a month old."

And then her self-restraint of many hours gave way, and Dorcas burst out weeping in her friend's opened arms.

It was a very sad story, to which, elderly and prudent woman as she was, Miss Waldershare could not refuse her sympathy. Rash and foolish as the young couple had been, they had paid for their folly in keen suffering. At the last, the poor dying mother would have wanted the commonest comforts of life, but for the kindness which even strangers often show to one another in India.

"And what of the babies? Surely your father will relent now, and take the poor helpless babies?"

"N—no," said Dorcas, looking down. "In fact, Cyprian would not have let them go. He preferred sending them, in charge of his wife's ayah, to me."

"To you? Good heavens!"

"Oh—you could not say I am not to take them! My poor little babies—Cyprian's own children. Where should he have sent them except to me? I was his 'little mother,' you remember?"

"But the burthen—the trouble—the expense even—in case he does not send money enough to maintain them."

"He will, or if not I can work," said Dorcas, calmly. "I do work as it is. It will be merely keeping the money here instead of sending it."

Here she stopped, blushing so violently that Miss Waldershare turned her head another way. But she had only found out a fact long guessed, that every penny the sister earned and could spare went out to the poor young couple in India.

"God bless you, my dear. If you come for my advice, it is—just follow your own. But—Mr. Moffat?"

"James is a man who always does his duty—he will never hinder me in doing mine," was the answer, given with such proud confidence that Miss Waldershare smiled—and sighed.

"Well, and when do your twins arrive?"

"Cyprian put them on board a merchant vessel in charge of the captain and his wife. They may arrive any day. Only think—me with my two babies—my dear little twins!"

"You foolish girl! and how do you intend to manage them?"

"Doesn't somebody—yourself, I think—say that any woman with common sense and a motherly heart can soon learn how to manage a baby?"

So, caught in her own trap, Miss Waldershare ceased to look "severe," and entered heartily into the joy, which almost extinguished grief, that filled the heart of Cyprian's "little mother" in having these motherless babies to take care of. The burthen of them—and Miss Waldershare foresaw how heavy it was likely to be, for willing shoulders never lack a weight—was wholly forgotten in the inexpressible pride and delight.

So the two spinsters, young and old, made every preparation for the reception of the babies, feeling as happy as children with a new doll. It was foolish, perhaps, but natural, considering the sort of women they were, women whom it often pleases Heaven to make childless, if only for the sake of the many children in this world who are, outwardly, or in reality, motherless.

And when at last the twins arrived—two poor little skinny things, with great dark eyes and brown, wizened faces, not at all like wholesome English babies—their aunt's pride in them knew no bounds. For were they not her very own flesh and blood—Cyprian's children, bearing his name? And as they began to improve in looks, not unlike him—or she fancied so. Her happiness in them was something absolutely inexpressible.

And when, after a month or two, the ayah sailed for India—no slight relief—she took them entirely under her own charge, and, despite the forebodings of neighbours and friends, made such a capital nurse, that instead of dying, which everybody fully expected, the twins—"Miss Hall's twins," as they were somewhat oddly called—were, though still brown and thin, as nice, and even as pretty children as any on the Terrace—nay, in the whole town. Even old Miss Moffat was proud of "our children;" and in her second childhood rather enjoyed having the silent house filled with young voices and the sound of pattering feet. Especially as, being thoroughly healthy, happy, and well-cared for, they were almost always good. Their education, begun by their aunt at two months old, and never entrusted to any one but herself, was certainly no failure, as many a grave matron had prognosticated it would be, in smiling over the proverbial perfection of "old maids' children."

"Trouble?" wrote Dorcas, in answer to some questions of Miss Waldershare's, "the poor little things are no trouble at all. I never amuse them—I teach them to amuse themselves. 'Two kittens and a ball of worsted'—the grand remedy for low spirits: —why, my 'kittens' are far the best, and they never hinder work" (the work which she now owned had become vitally necessary) "'Auntie busy—must not interrupt auntie,' they say, settle together in a corner of my painting-room—their 'den' we call it, and there they play together for hours. I keep an eye—or half an eye—upon them, and that is all; they never trouble me. They are such good little children."

It did occur to Miss Waldershare that a good nurse generally makes good children, and that those who complain of unruly ones might often, if they looked within, find better cause to complain of themselves. But she said nothing. There is a common but shrewd proverb, "The proof of the pudding is in the eating," and certainly no one could see the merry, wholesome, easily managed children and their contented aunt without feeling that, however she did it, she contrived to make both them and herself thoroughly happy, without interfering with the happiness of anybody else. Even Mr. Moffat, though at first a trifle jealous, soon became quite satisfied. For he saw her satisfied; with her heart full of love, and her life full of duties, which, though not always easy, were always sweet.

And Cyprian?——

Cyprian's letters—which Miss Waldershare sometimes got sight of—were clever and charming as ever, and became gradually less and less sad. He was not of the temperament that grieves eternally, even for a lost wife. And presently he found plenty of work to do; though it was hard work, and such small pay, Dorcas said, that it was "fortunate" she herself was able to maintain the twins entirely. Dressed very plainly, and brought up simply, they were yet children whom any father might be proud of; and so would their's be, she hoped, when he came home.

"Papa's coming home,"—the ideal "Papa" whom the twins were constantly told of, and taught to believe in with a passionate admiration, as soon as their little minds could take in anything—was now the dream of Dorcas's life.

"If I could see him once again!—give his children into his arms, and watch him with them—he used to be so fond of children, and such a favourite with them, as he was with everybody. It is very hard for him to be parted from his pretty twins—many things have been very hard for him; but I think all is brightening. He is much better off now than he was. Poor Cyprian!"

In spite of the advancing prosperity, which showed itself, if not in regular payments, in very valuable Indian presents, "from Papa"—she still called him "poor Cyprian!" But—it was a curious fact—she never by any chance called Mr. Moffat "poor James!"

No, not though he worked hard and had few pleasures; his Fellowship barely gave him enough to live on, and the College living still hung afar off "in the clouds." But he trusted Dorcas and she trusted him; they wrote constantly and met occasionally, whenever they could. And what is it that makes happiness? I think, not prosperity; not even the attainment of all one wishes, but the power of enjoying what one has. A clean heart, a quiet conscience, a loving and faithful soul—these, in spite of outward circumstances, will create a happy, at least a not unhappy life. Therefore, I refuse to consider James Moffat and Dorcas Hall altogether miserable.

Miss Waldershare, seeing this, ceased to be needlessly miserable concerning them. In truth, as the years slipped by, her restless anxiety over those she loved somewhat abated. She learned to trust Heaven a little more, and herself a little less; to believe that the Father above would take care of her dear ones as well as she could—possibly a little better. Therefore, though she and Dorcas, tied by many duties, seldom met face to face, still she rested content about her friend; until one day, when, to her great surprise, she got a letter from Cyprian.

"I am not quite easy concerning my sister," he wrote; "and would be grateful to you to tell me exactly how she is. She rarely speaks of herself, but now she owns to being 'not strong;' and is very anxious that I should come home. Why? She is young still—we are not thirty yet"—that half-comical, yet infinitely pathetic "we" of twins. "But if her health is really failing, what should I do? Who would take care of my children? I trust to you, her faithful friend, to tell me the exact truth concerning her."

Which, having exerted all her small strength in a four-days' visit to Dorcas, Miss Waldershare did.

"I do not consider your sister 'failing,'" was the letter that went out to Calcutta by the next mail, "but she is naturally delicate, and she has had a hard life. Two children to bring up—first to earn the money, and then expend it" (Miss Waldershare could be severely candid when she thought right) "a feeble old lady to take charge of, and the anxiety of a doubtful future; being torn in two, as it were—for when Mr. Moffat does get the living, which is promised him, and seems very near now—what is she to do? No man likes to enter on married life burthened with another man's children. Yes, my dear Cyprian, though not failing now, she may fail. I do think it would be right and best for you to come home."

Having written thus strongly, and without delay—for she felt these things ought to be said, and who was there to say them but herself?—Miss Waldershare was a long time before she heard any further. For, shortly afterwards, she fell ill, and lingered weeks and months in that sort of semi-existence when everything but the things close at hand seems to grow dim, and she began to understand clearer how, by and by, the outside world and all its interests might fade away from her altogether, almost without pain.

She had been a little surprised that Dorcas Hall never came to see her, never offered to come; though writing regularly, and telling all the news about everybody, except herself. But these letters, so sweet and cheerful, as well as punctual, took away all suspicion that anything was wrong.

More especially as each letter brought brighter tidings. Mr. Moffat had at last got the expected living, in Derbyshire, such a pretty neighbourhood and a prettier parsonage, everything they could both desire. And Cyprian was coming home—they hoped in time for the marriage. Also, not alone. The twins would have to welcome not only their unknown father, but a stepmother—young, and, by her letters, very sweet and good.

This last piece of news Dorcas communicated by word of mouth, waiting beside Miss Waldershare at the station, whither, on her way to Buxton Baths, the invalid had begged to be met. By a battalion, as it turned out; Mr. Moffat, Dorcas, and the little twins, now growing quite big children.

"I have told them they must learn to say 'Mamma,' and that they are sure to love her. I was not surprised—indeed I was quite glad," she added. "Cyprian needed a wife so much, and he has waited a long time."

"Yes, six years is a long time, and men don't like waiting," said Miss Waldershare, rather satirically. "There is almost no such thing as a faithful man."

"Except James," said Dorcas, gently, as she held out her hand to him with a smile. To the end of her days Miss Waldershare will never forget that look and that smile.

Somewhat to her friend's surprise, Dorcas never referred to the question as to what was to be done with the twins when their father came home, or after he went back to India again. Nor did she speak much of her own future, scarcely of the future at all. She seemed quite absorbed in the happy present.

"Only to think, in one week Cyprian will be at home. After ten years—ten long anxious years. He will look quite middle-aged, I dare say. I shall hardly know him—or he me. Oh yes, we shall—we shall! And I shall show him his children, just like what he and I were, in the days when I was his 'little mother.' Do you remember?"

Miss Waldershare did remember; and thought, irradiated by this wonderful flood of joy, Dorcas, pale and thin as she was, looked almost like the little Dorcas of the children's tea-party, so many years ago. They spoke of it—and of heaps of other things—spending a most merry hour together: till at last the train started, and Miss Waldershare caught her last glimpse of the little group standing as they would so soon stand on Southampton Quay—Dorcas with her two children, one in each hand—waiting for the ship with "Papa" on board.

After that day, for more than ten days she heard nothing of the Halls. She thought, perhaps, they were too happy to remember her, and, being very suffering herself, was almost glad. When just making up her mind to write and say so, in the tenderest and least obtrusive way, she took up a two-days' old Times, and there read, in that fatal column which we often glance over so idly—as being no concern of ours—the "Deaths."

"On the 24th, very suddenly, aged thirty years, Miss Dorcas Hall."

That same day a letter from James Moffat, brief and subdued, full of the quiet grief of one who knows he has half a life-time still to work and to grieve in, explained everything.

People have died of joy, it is said: if any one ever did so die, it was surely Dorcas Hall.

As they found out afterwards, she had been ailing for some time, but said nothing; and had even supported, with a marvellous courage, five days of killing suspense, when the Indian mail became overdue; and there were vague reports of some terrible disaster having happened in the Red Sea. But on the sixth day there came a telegram from Southampton, from Cyprian: "Arrived safe and well; shall be with you this evening."

It was too much. Uttering a cry, almost a shriek, of joy, she clasped her hands in thankfulness, then put them suddenly to her heart. In a moment, without word or moan, with the smile still on her lips, and the telegram grasped in her fingers, Dorcas was "away." She had Taken up her crown and gone home,

according to a sweet childish song—American and negro—which she was fond of singing to her little twins. All that day and night it rang in Miss Waldershare's half-stunned brain,

> She has taken up her crown and gone home,
> And the angels are waiting at the door.

But—poor Cyprian. Feeble as she was, the very next day Miss Waldershare put herself in the train, and went to see Cyprian.

The Terrace looked exactly as usual; just as it had done twenty years before, when she went to the children's tea-party. Old Miss Moffat sat at the open window, basking in the summer sunshine, in her peaceful second childhood. There were no blinds down; of course; all had happened a week ago; they had resumed that old life—Dorcas was quite—quite "away."

Miss Waldershare was shown into the drawing-room, where sat writing a tall handsome bearded man—farther off a lady, very sweet looking, was trying to amuse two children—her children.

"We try to make them happy, and we shall succeed by-and-by," said Cyprian, after the first bitter half hour. "They are our own dear children."

"And such good children," added Cyprian's wife. "I never saw such good children."

"It is all her doing," the father exclaimed. "You knew what she was; and what she was to me, even when we were no older than these twins. They will never forget her—nor I. She has done everything for me all my life; and now when I might have done something for her——"

"God has done it differently," said Miss Waldershare, laying her hand on the shoulder of the big strong man, who had sunk down sobbing like a baby. "Be content. He knows best."

"I believe that. But oh! my 'little mother'—my 'little mother!'"

THE JAPANESE NAVY: PAST AND PRESENT

"Look on this picture and on that!" Here we have a Japanese war-ship of the olden time—not so very old either, for such high-bowed, high-pooped, queer-looking craft bore the Shogun's flag over the narrow seas of Japan not more than twelve years ago.

A wondrous vessel she is, with her clumsy looking helm, her mast consisting of several poles lashed together, and the crest of the Shogun or Taïkun displayed on her oiled-paper lantern and her huge single sail. What a contrast between her and His Imperial Japanese Majesty's corvette Seïki (The Brilliant), one of the tightest, best built, and most completely equipped men-of-war of her class that ever sailed the high seas, and rendered famous evermore by the fact of her being not only the first modern sea-going war-vessel built in a Japanese dockyard, but also the first vessel belonging to his Imperial Majesty the Mikado which has ever visited Europe! One of our sketches represents the quarter-deck of the Seïki as it appeared on Friday, the 26th of July, when the ship, then lying in the Thames off Greenhithe, was the scene of a splendid entertainment given by Captain Enouyé and his officers to the friends of Japan in London, who had been bidden to the feast by the Imperial Japanese Legation.

Were it not for the unmistakeably Japanese features of the officers and crew, for the white flag with the red device of the Sun-Circle, for the strange character in which the ship's name was emblazoned on the men's hat ribbons, and for the superb Japanese furniture, lacquer-work, wood-carving, porcelain, and brocade in the captain's cabin and ward-room, the visitor might easily have fancied himself on board one of Her Britannic Majesty's smartest ships. As great as the contrast between war-junk and corvette is that between the Japanese Admiral "all of the olden time" (1867), and gallant Captain Enouyé of the Seïki. A contrast in outward appearance and in naval knowledge only, for both in the Great Revolution of 1868, and in the Satsuma Civil War of 1877, Captain Enouyé has shown that by cutting off his "magé," or top-knot, and adopting a uniform almost identical with that of our Captains, R.N., he has not foresworn the true "Yamato Damashi," that fine "spirit of Old Japan" which yet animates the gentlemen of the Empire of the Rising Sun, and to this day bids them lay down their lives cheerfully for their country and their Emperor.

Next, are contrasted a Japanese "sendo," or sailor of the old régime (1867), scantily attired in a "fundashi," or loin cloth, and the jolly Japanese tar of our days, his muscular brown limbs encased in an exact imitation of our own blue-jackets' "rig," which he wears with a jauntiness and smartness truly British. Then a Japanese "Kaï-Heï," or marine; of 1867; amphibious by profession, "half-and-half" as to his equipment, which is a strange mixture of Japanese and European arms and accoutrements, he represents the transition period. As a contrast, we have the bugler of the Seïki—Nagata Masakata, best of buglers, and as bold a little warrior as ever sounded the "Advance;" for Nagata has a decided liking for the "Advance!" and the only instance of disobedience on his part—in its humble way as sublime as Nelson's disregard of the signal at Copenhagen—is that, when at a critical moment of the struggle in Satsuma in 1877, the sturdy little marine would not hear the command "Retire!" but kept on sounding the "Advance!" (and firing an effective shot now and again) until his side had won the day. This man may be taken as a very fair specimen of the average Japanese sailor, and a glance at his career will explain how it is that at every port at which the Seïki has called—and she has visited nearly every naval station of importance in Europe—the conduct of her men, when on shore, has been so exemplary.

Nagata was a "Samuraï," a two-sworded man, a nobleman, before the Revolution of 1861, which threw him (and the whole class to which he belonged) out of his employment, which had hitherto chiefly consisted in the practice of military arts and the study, to a certain extent, of native literature. Thus obliged to work for a living, the great majority of the "Samuraï" class joined the services which were so congenial to their tastes, but as they could not all be officers, the bulk of them went to make up the rank and file of the Imperial navy and army, and so we find a corvette manned by gentlemen in the best acceptation of the term, and rejoicing in the possession of a ship's bugler, who, besides being a doughty warrior, twice wounded in battle, has received a remarkably good education, who speaks very fair English, and whose manners would do honour to a Master of the Ceremonies. The last sketch represents an incident of the grand reception on board off Greenhithe. Some of the charming young English ladies have gone below on an exploring expedition, and have penetrated to the sick bay, where a poor Japanese seaman lies in his hammock nursing a sore eye, and listening in amazement to the popping of corks and the sounds of the woefully European string-band on the upper-deck.

The Seïki was designed in Japan under European supervision, but from the moment that her lines were down she was taken in hand by natives, and she has been entirely built, fitted, rigged, and engined by Japanese, at the Imperial Naval Dockyard at Yokoska, and almost entirely with Japanese materials. Her principal guns are German breechloaders from Krupp's celebrated factory at Essen, but she also carries a small Armstrong breechloader. The rifles of her crew are Martini-Henry's, the fire-arm of the day, their revolvers are Adams's breechloading, but the cutlasses, axes, the boarding-pikes, and bayonets are all made of the far-famed Japanese steel. No European has a berth on board, and the only officer who has ever left Japan before is the first-lieutenant, Mr. Etzuki, who served for some years as midshipman and sub-lieutenant in the British Royal Navy.

When we compare the Japanese Navy of 1867 with that of 1878, we cannot help admiring the wonderful progress of that nation, which now modestly claims a place in the great fraternity of civilised peoples, but whose flag is destined one day to float over the Eastern seas as an emblem of progress, prosperity, and culture.

We are indebted for these sketches, and for the above particulars, to Mr. Arthur Diosy, R.N.A.V., known in Japanese circles as Shüyama Sama.

Magazines

The place of honour in the Fortnightly Review is occupied by Mr. Lowe's paper on "Imperialism," but this has already been so fully discussed and commented upon in the daily press that we need not dwell upon it here. It may be enough to say that it is in the main an apology for—rather, indeed, an encomium of—that policy of strict non-intervention steadily pursued by this country from the close of the Crimean war until a very recent date. We should imagine that Mr. Lowe's appeal will be addressed to deaf ears. Nothing could better show his want of sympathy with the present, and, as we believe, the abiding, mood of the bulk of his countrymen, than his language here touching India. If Englishmen have a national purpose at all, it is that they mean to hold India at all costs and against all comers. But India, in Mr. Lowe's eyes, is simply a wolf we have by the ears, which it is as difficult to let go as to hold; and he would plainly be glad to be quit of the great dependency if he could see his way to withdrawal from it without over-much discredit. The article strikes us as another instance of that curious mental twist in its author which stands so much in the way of his playing that part in public affairs to which his splendid abilities and eminently sound opinions on many subjects so well entitle him.—Another political paper is Mr. Ralph Earle's on "Mr. Gladstone and the New Equilibrium," a criticism on the late Premier from the point of view of intelligent and cosmopolitan Liberalism. Even in the fervour of his anti-Turkish crusade, Mr. Gladstone, says Mr. Earle, never could get rid of the idea that Russia was a Power whose aggressive tendencies Europe had to dread and guard against. He failed to see how completely the unification of Germany had changed the former state of affairs. It is essential to Germany to put a curb to Russian aggression, and we may safely leave that task to her. But the "new equilibrium" for Europe will only have been secured when the Slavs, like the Italians and the Germans, have attained their just position—that is, when Russia has been allowed to come down to the Ægean. Disagreeing as we do with much that is advanced in this paper, it is impossible not to recognise and admire its thoughtfulness and ability.—Mr. Frederic Harrison's essay on the theory of Sovereignty as laid down by John Austin, and Mr. Romanes's on the beginnings of nerve-tissue as first found in the ascending series of animal life in the Medusæ, or jelly-fishes, are both singularly able papers, but, as may be imagined, of a highly technical character.—Mr. Walter Pater gives us a "study" of Charles Lamb, admirably written, of course, but somewhat thin and unsatisfactory. We fancy Mr. Pater is trying to persuade himself that he values and enjoys Lamb a great deal more than he really does.—We must not omit to mention Mr. A. C. Lyall's poem, "A Rajput Chief of the Old School," a vigorous, picturesque, and sympathetic picture, even if it can hardly rank high as poetry.

English periodical literature not affording a sufficiently ample field for Mr. Gladstone to disport himself in, he appears this month in the North American Review as the contributor of an article styled "Kin Beyond Sea," a title the meaning of which is not very clear. We must confess that there seems to us only too much truth in the criticism that has been passed upon it—that Mr. Gladstone contemplates the prospect that America will probably in the not distant future wrest from this country her commercial primacy too much as if such a prospect afforded him gratification. But his account of how the Queen's Government over the British Empire is actually carried on by that "fourth estate" of the realm—the Cabinet—cannot but be read with much interest, coming, as it does, from a statesman who has been a prominent member of many Cabinets, and at the head of one. The Review further contains a valuable paper on "Torpedo Warfare," by Admiral Porter, U.S.N., and another—not very valuable—by Mr. G. W. Julian, entitled "Is the Reformer any Longer Needed?" and intended as an attack on the laissez-faire theories as to matters political and social put forth by Mr. Herbert Spencer and his school.—Mr. Perry's notice of Alfred de Musset, whom he calls "the most poetical of modern French poets," is also worth looking at.

In Fraser Mr. M'Coan continues his series of papers on Turkey by an account of Slavery and Polygamy, such as they are at present. The latter institution, he thinks, may safely be let alone, and left to run its comparatively harmless course, and die the natural death which inevitably awaits it.—The article, "Is Schoolmastering a Learned Profession?" insists on the necessity—inter alia—of doing away with that Boarding-House system, which, it is urged, makes the schoolmaster seem to have more in common with the butcher and the baker than with members of a learned profession; and we have a very candid, not to say appreciative, paper on "Some Aspects of Modern Nonconformity," which is very well worth reading. We are told, too, something more about the Burmese, and about "M. B. E.'s" holidays in Eastern France.

The Cornhill contains an ingenious article on "Literary Coincidences," giving a curious and entertaining collection of the gross plagiarisms which eminent men of letters have unconsciously committed.—We have a very readable paper on "Colour in Painting," the object of which is to assert—in no spirit of condemnation, be it observed—that bright hues, red, purple, orange, and yellow, are to be found in greater proportions on the canvas of painters than in the average every-day scenes of external Nature or human life, and to inquire how the fact comes to be so. The sketch of Runeberg, a Swedish poet of our own century, all but unknown in England, is also praiseworthy.

The feature of chief interest in the Gentleman's Magazine is a paper by Dr. Richardson on "Ether-Drinking and Extra Alcoholic Intoxication." It is an account of ether-drinking and its consequences, as witnessed by himself in Draper's Town, a village in the north of Ireland. Ether intoxication, it seems, is produced much more rapidly than intoxication from alcohol, but is also much quicker in passing away; so that a man may get drunk half-a-dozen different times in the course of the twenty-four hours if he has a mind. Farther, from the rapidity with which ether intoxication comes on, its victim can only for the very briefest space be dangerous or troublesome, as he soon passes into complete insensibility. At the same time Dr. Richardson has no doubt that ether-drinking is a bad practice, attended with many dangers; though, as a choice of evils, he thinks ether less hurtful than alcohol.—Mr. R. A. Proctor's exposition on scientific grounds of the essential unfairness, and therefore immorality, of all betting on races, is forcible enough, though, perhaps, he may be considered to write with somewhat more warmth than the occasion calls for.

We have a very fairly good number of the University Magazine, the most noticeable among its papers being, one on Adam Smith by Mr. Eric S. Robertson, and another, which has at least the merit of freshness and variety, by the Marquis de Nangis, entitled "The Monk's Nemesis." It is quite a new experience to come across a writer in a periodical of these days who manifestly sincerely believes that a curse attends those families who continue to hold property torn from the Church at the Reformation.

We have received the first number of a new serial publication, "The Lives of the Cardinals," by Mr. P. J. O'Byrne (Roland, Ladelle, and Co.), to be completed in seventy-five shilling numbers, issued weekly. Each number will contain a memoir of one of the members of the Sacred College, together with his portrait. Of course the work starts with a sketch of the career of His Holiness, Pope Leo XIII., accompanied by a very finely executed likeness, and, if we may judge of the rest of the work from this specimen, its portraits of themselves ought to win for it a large measure of popularity. During the progress of the work, we are told in a prospectus, some chapters will be devoted to the history of the Origin and Development of the Sacred College of Cardinals, the Origin and Functions of the Congregations, and the Procedure of the Conclave, all matters of some interest, as to which it is exceedingly difficult to obtain really trustworthy information.

The rapprochement between the progressive West and the (so-called) immoveable East is illustrated by the success of the An-Nahlah, or Bee, an Anglo-Arabic illustrated magazine which has now survived the first year of its issue, and may therefore, it is to be hoped, be considered to have made for itself a firm footing. The Bee comes out once a fortnight, and the editor, the Rev. J. Louis Sabunje, deserves great credit for the excellence of the illustrations which he provides for his Eastern readers, and also for his carefully-selected articles on science and literature, his biographical sketches and portraits of British and other eminent men, and his succinct summaries of news. We are glad therefore to learn that this unpretending little periodical is gaining appreciation in India and throughout the East.

Mr. S. C. Hall is often spoken of as a "veteran littérateur," and we are well aware that he was industriously catering for the public before many of our present celebrities were born or thought of; at the same time we are unable to trace any senility about the editing of Social Notes, which, for those who take an interest in something beyond mere frivolity, and who desire to make their fellow creatures happier and better, is one of the most readable magazines of the day. Indeed, it is just because it is so readable that we so seldom notice it. The editor takes it home in his pocket for the amusement and instruction of his family, and it is never seen again. Part VII. now before us is fully equal to any of its predecessors.

AUTUMN: IN A SICK ROOM

They tell me the Summer is over,
The Summer is dead,
The thrush and the linnet are silent,
The swallows are fled;
And the perishing leaves of the forest
Hang fevered and red,
Waiting the hands of the Winter
To smooth their death-bed.

O, why did'st thou tarry no longer,
Thou Child of the Sun,
Who made our chill pulses beat stronger,
And thrill every one
With magical senses of gladness
And joy re-begun?
O Child! thou art gone ere we knew thee,
And gladness is done!

To-day the whole heaven is darkened
With clouds and with rain:
The winds are all wailing and sighing
In terror and pain.
Is the great world itself dying?
Or praying in vain
The beautiful death-stricken Summer
To waken again?

A Railway up Vesuvius is to be constructed within the next few months, if the threatened eruption does not interfere with the present plans. There will be a double line of rails laid on an iron framework, supported by iron pillars, on which will run eight small carriages, drawn by a wire rope instead of the usual locomotive, and so arranged that four will be making the ascent as the four others descend. These carriages will hold four persons apiece, and will be kept some two hundred yards apart, while strong automatic brakes are to be fitted, so as to stop the carriages immediately if the rope should break. The line will be rather over half a mile long, and the gradients very steep—1 in 2. The carrying out of this project will put a stop to all such attempts to levy black mail from travellers as the episode recently related by a correspondent of The Times. Two American ladies and a gentleman, with a courier, lately ascending the mountain at night, were fastened upon by ten hangers-on—extra guides, torch-bearers, &c.—who, when at the summit, tried to force the ladies to descend into the outer crater, in order to obtain extra fees, and on their refusal fairly fought the courier; the party being unable to get away from their persecutors for two hours. In the previous week also a gentleman met with similar annoyances, but another party courageously refused to accede to any exorbitant demands, and effectually cowed the Italians by a fictitious display of rage.

THE PENCE"

ESSING HOP-PICKERS AT MEREWORTH, KENT

New Novels

"Lady's Holm," by Annie L. Walker, author of "Against Her Will," &c. (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley).—We find in Miss Walker's new story the same careful and conscientious workmanship, and the same power of drawing characters whom we feel to be natural, and just what such people must have been with such surroundings, that we noticed in "Against Her Will." The first volume is, indeed, in its way very nearly perfect. Nothing could be better than the picture of little Mary Langford's childhood under the care of her "Aunt Maynard"—a childhood "repressed, emotionless, artificial," because the woman of many sorrows, old before her time, held down all feeling within herself with such an iron grasp that she was simply incapable of showing the little one how dear she was to her, and the child felt herself a person merely tolerated, and of no use or importance to any one—and of her awakening to liberty, life, and love on her first visit to beautiful Lady's Holm, a sort of glorified farm-house, originally one of the smaller religious foundations, the home of her bachelor uncle, Stephen Langford. Excellent, also, and very amusing, is the story of the taming of the arrogant and conceited little heiress, Millicent Lyndon, the other heroine of the piece, by the clever, motherly governess, Mrs. Ryan. Nor do these young ladies lose their interest when grown up, though with most readers Mary will rightfully be the favourite, and the story of their respective love affairs, which at one time threaten to be troubled enough, forms thoroughly pleasant reading. The sensational element which the author has thought fit to introduce into her novel we confess we do not find attractive. It seems rather an incumbrance on the tale than an aid to it. Secret marriages, mysterious deaths, foundlings, witch-like old women, magic rings, and visions, are matters with which Miss Walker—not at all to her discredit, to our thinking—has manifestly no skill in dealing, and which belong to writers of an altogether different school. She is quite strong enough to swim without the aid of any such corks; and if she will take our advice she will keep to those scenes of simple, ordinary life which she understands so well how to paint. In the main, and in its best parts, this story consists of such scenes, and it is on this ground that we think it worthy of no small admiration, and heartily recommend it to the reader's notice.

"Caleb Booth's Clerk," by Mrs. G. Linnæus Banks, author of "The Manchester Man," &c. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—This is another tale of manufacturing life such as it was some thirty or forty years ago, when the masters were often as rough and uncultivated as their workpeople, and some of them, as the Mr. Marsden who plays so prominent a part here, coarse and brutal domestic tyrants besides. As novels go the book deserves praise for its homely vigour, and for many scenes which we feel to be life-like; but it certainly cannot stand on the same level as "The Manchester Man," the tale on which it is clear that the author lavished the cream of her own recollections and experiences. Daniel Dent, the scheming clerk, is a rather conventional and stagey kind of villain, who, with his plotting and unscrupulous sister, keeps on reminding the reader too much of Uriah Heep and his mother. There is, indeed, overmuch conventionality in the leading personages of the tale generally; the only one of them—of the likeable amongst them, that is—quite free from it being the quick-witted and lively Sophy Marsden. The tale, too, is put together not a little clumsily. Nevertheless, though we cannot speak of "Caleb Booth's Clerk" as we have spoken of former works of the author's, we fully recognise that there is a substantial character and animation about it that separate it widely from the mere pointless and empty tales of the season.

"Virgin Soil," by J. S. Turgénief, translated by Ashton W. Dilke (Macmillan).—There is little doubt, we should say, that Mr. Dilke is justified in his surmise that those who read this novel of Turgénief's with understanding "may retain a more correct impression of Russian Socialism than many who have studied the question through the light of correspondent or essayist." The tale is chiefly interesting as a picture of various phases of Russian society of our own day; but many, if not most, of its leading personages are of strong and clearly marked individuality. Nedjánof, the hero, is the natural son of a Russian noble, a young man whose aristocratic tastes and fastidious personal habits are always in the way of his becoming that rough-and-ready man of the people which, in accordance with his democratic principles, he ought to be. Hence Nedjánof is a sceptic, "a Russian Hamlet," as he is called by one of his intimates; doubtful, first, of his own power to work for the triumph of that Socialistic or Nihilistic cause to which he has pledged himself; doubtful afterwards whether he really believes in the cause, or thinks its success possible. In strong contrast to this self-questioning dreamer who has undertaken that rôle of revolutionary conspirator which he is so ill-adapted to sustain, we have the thorough-going enthusiasts, Markelof and Ostrodúmof among the men, and Mashurina and Mariánna among the women, with the latter of which heroines Nedjánof, after a feeble, hesitating, passionless fashion, is in love. But the interest of the book, as we have already said, is rather political and social than personal. It vividly depicts the vague restlessness and discontent with all existing institutions which is so widely diffused throughout Russian society outside official circles, though for the present this discontent would seem too blind and too much without definite aim to constitute a serious menace to the Czar's Government. But no one who, in Mr. Dilke's words, reads the book "with understanding" can look upon the condition of Russia as one of stable equilibrium.

We have also received "Eyes So Blue," by Agnes Law (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley), a novel of which it seems enough to say that its plot is unpleasant, and its style, so far as we have had the patience to examine it, feeble and commonplace.

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE IN THE HOLY LAND, IX.

ANCIENT SCROLL OF THE PENTATEUCH

After the return of the Jews from the Captivity, the breach between them and the Samaritans widened. In Nehemiah's time the mutual enmity burst forth. After the Samaritans had failed to prevent the Jews from rebuilding their walls, and the Jews had banished all non-Jewish women from their community, the Samaritans founded a holy city and a sanctuary of their own. Mount Gerizim was selected for this purpose, and the town of Shechem (now Nabulus) at its base thus rose in importance, while Samaria declined. After the Christian era, as most of the Samaritans adhered to their old religion, they frequently came into collision with Christianity and with the Roman Emperors. Afterwards many of them fled to Persia, while others embraced Christianity. In the 12th century there were about 1,000 adherents of the sect of the Samaritans at Nabulus, but there are now only forty or fifty families, who live in a distinct quarter of the town. Their synagogue is a small, plain, whitewashed chamber. When the ancient Samaritan Codex of the Pentateuch (represented in our engraving) is taken out of the box, all present press forward to kiss it. The antiquity of this MS. is undoubted, but it is not older than the Christian era, and the current report that it was written by a grandson or great-grandson of Aaron is a myth.

CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE

The present church, which stands on the reputed site of Golgotha, is for the most part a modern building, as the former church (much of which, however, dated only from the eighteenth century) was burnt down in 1808. The chief façade of the church is now on the south side, as represented in our engraving. The ornamentation is interesting. There are two portals, each with a window above it. The arches are of a depressed Pointed character. The columns adjoining the doors, probably taken from some ancient temple, are of marble. They have a common connecting beam, adorned with foliage and other enrichments. The bas relief over the left portal represents scenes from Bible history; that over the right portal is an intricate mass of foliage, fruit, flowers, &c.—This and the engraving of the ancient scroll are from photographs by Mr. Frank Mason Good.

A DANCE AT JERICHO

The Jericho of the New Testament is not the Jericho which travellers stay at on passing from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea. It is in the village, called the Modern Jericho, where the visitor finds whatever accommodation there is to be had en route. It was just as the sun was setting when we arrived at the collection of miserable mud hovels and dirty-looking tents which constitute the village. Having been previously warned against the dirt and vermin of the inn of the place, we had commissioned our dragoman to provide us tents in its garden.

After a dinner, which might have done justice to a better dining-hall—for, after all, we were obliged to dine in the inn—the mosquitos and sand-flies having driven us away from our tents, our Shêkh appeared and wished to know if we would like to see a native dance performed; so we lit our tobacco and sat down under the verandah. The night was very dark, and the Chinese lanterns hung to the portico only gave sufficient light to distinguish our entertainers. Lying around in a semi-circle were Arabs of all ages, dirty and ragged, squatting on the ground, or lounging against the portico of the house. Presently from out of the darkness which closed around our paper lamps came shrill cries, and two hideous women appeared, and entered the space cleared for the dancers. After snatching a scimitar from the scabbard of the Shêkh and another from a bystander, they approached us, still keeping up their weird cries, and advancing their faces to within an inch of ours, made horrible grimaces, rolling their eyes, showing their toothless gums, and wrinkled tattooed faces. Skipping back a little, they would then spring forward, and make passes with their swords, as if to shave off our ears and noses. After these cheerful and amusing preliminaries, they settled down to real business, whirled into the semi-circle, and danced a pas de deux, flashing the scimitars through the air, while the rest of the women advanced and retired in two lines, clapping their hands and hooting. The first five minutes of this entertainment is indeed novel, but longer becomes monotonous, so we gave the necessary backsheesh, and retired to our tents, skirmished with the bugs and beetles in our beds, and fell asleep, while our Shêkh kept guard outside, for the inhabitants of the village are sad thieves.

AUSTRALIAN GUM TREES

One of the Australian gum trees (Eucalyptus globulus) has been largely planted in North Africa and South Europe as a remedy for malaria. Through its agency the ruin-dotted Campagna, some say, is once more to be thickly peopled. The purifying influence steams from the leaves, being one of the volatile oils which make the air of the Australian bush so deliciously fragrant to the camped-out traveller, awakened to see the sun rise by the harsh and saucy-sounding cackle of the laughing jackass; but which, when the sun has attained his full strength, give to the atmosphere, where the scrub stands thick, somewhat of the oppressiveness of excessive incense.

The eucalyptus which has found favour with European planters is the Blue Gum, so called from the colour of its leaves, but four stand above it in the list of richness as oil-yielders.

First stands the Dandenong, or Narrow-leaved Peppermint (E. amygdalina), a tree which is known to have attained the height of 420 feet. Another measured eucalyptus was as high as the Great Pyramid; and it is supposed there are even loftier trees of the kind. Before these Titans were discovered the greatest tree giant known in Australia was a Karri 400 feet high, within whose hollow trunk three mounted men with a led horse could turn. It would seem then that even Californian pines are over-topped by Australian gum trees; and after such figures "as tall as the Monument" sounds somewhat like "as big as a shrimp." As a timber-tree, the Peppermint is chiefly useful for the construction of the grey railed fences with slip-panels which form so characteristic a feature of the landscape in settled and semi-settled Australia—a poor substitute, in a picturesque point of view, for our variously luxuriant hedges, which, I believe, have been reproduced in Tasmania. Coarse paper might be made from the inner bark of the Peppermint; its bark, generally, contains 20 per cent. of tannic acid; and it exudes a gum-resin.

Next comes the Mallee tree (Eucalyptus oleosa), a small tree covering thousands of acres of what is called from it Mallee scrub. It may be called a vegetable camel; its roots retaining so much water that travellers through the wilderness rip them up for refreshment.

The Ironbark (E. sideroxylon) stands third. Its name explains itself. It might be called the rhinoceros of timber-trees. The wood which its rugged bark covers is close-grained, greasy, and almost imperishable; and accordingly is used in ship-building, and for cog wheels, spokes, shafts, and poles.

The White Gum (E. goniocalyx), which follows, is another giant, utilised by builders and sometimes by coopers. Packing paper can be made from its bark, which yields about 18 per cent. of potash; its wood about 20 per cent.

Bloodwood (E. corymbosa) exactly ties Blue Gum as an oil-producer, each yielding 12.50 per cent. Its bark makes strong wrapping-paper. Its wood is red (as might be inferred from the name), and of a good grain, but so thickly veined with resin that it is chiefly used for fuel.

The Blue Gum runs up to a height of 300 feet, half of the huge bole without a branch. House-builders, coach-builders, ship-builders, and civil engineers make good use of it, and from its bark also paper can be made.

Stringybark (E. fabrorum or obliqua), is the next in order. It is a huge tree occurring in vast numbers, and although it warps and (dry) rots readily, it is much used for fences and shingles because it splits so easily. The blackfellows make spear strings out of its fibre. Printing paper and pasteboard can be made out of its bark, which is used for roofing bush huts.

Messmate (E. fissilis) yields a bush carpenter's and wheelwright's wood. The blackfellows use it for spears.

Another Peppermint (E. odorata), on whose leaves the opossums feast, save for the oil in them is not a very noteworthy tree. Woollybut (E. Woollsii) yields a hard, red, straight-grained timber.

The Red Gum (E. rostrata) is the common gum tree of Australia, growing plentifully along the banks of creeks and rivers. It yields a hard, red, curly-grained wood, almost as indestructible as that of the Jarrah, or Swan River mahogany, which defies wet, dry rot, and white ants. Its gum is prescribed for chronic diarrhœa.

The Manna Tree (E. viminalis) runs from 50 to 120 feet in height. The blacks make canoes and drinking vessels out of its bark, and shields out of its wood. Its leaves in early summer are covered with white manna, which falls like snow when the wind stirs them. Another kind of manna, the secretion of an insect, candies the leaves of a eucalyptus in the Mallee Scrub. A delicious lemon-scented perfume is obtained from the leaves of the Eucalyptus citriodora. An Australian town was for some years lighted with gas distilled from gum tree leaves.

There are other eucalypti: amongst them, the Box (E. leucoxylon), which yields a timber hard and greasy like the Ironbark's; the Grey Box (E. dealbata), very similar in its qualities; the Mountain Ash (E. inophloia), supposed to resemble its European name-giver, the Mountain White Gum Tree (E. Gunnii), which grows to a greater height on mountains than in plains; the Broad-leaved Box (E. acmenoides), and the Blackbut (E. persicifolia), which yields a timber like the Bloodwoods. Altogether, the gum tree has good right to be called the Australian oak, and can far more safely be introduced at random into an Australian picture than a palm tree into an Indian one.

The wedge-tailed eagle circles high even over its high head, and builds his nest within its forks. The silver and black little wood duck splashes up from the winding creek to perch upon its branches, on which the drowsy nankeen night heron mopes, and the bronze-wing pigeon plants himself where the glowing sunshine can best fall upon his burnished wings.

High on the gum tree, also, the green thrush ever begins the sweet little song, which can find neither a middle nor an end; and between the gum tree and the ground bell-birds flutter up and down, ringing out their "ting-ting, ting-ting." The satin bower birds, when weary of their polite pranks in their curious nests, pay visits to the gum tree, and tiny spotted diamond sparrows dodge twittering about its boughs. The screaming, gorgeously-plumaged Blue Mountaineer and the green paroqueet probe its yellow blossoms with their beaks. The red-shouldered paroqueet pecks on the ground beneath them, and glossy magpies and crows hop about silvery logs and felled and fallen monarchs of the forest, liquidly fluting, mellowly croaking.

The weird, arid, weary-eyed iguana writhes up the gum tree's bole; myriads of locusts clatter upon it in summer; rare butterflies flutter about it; in its hollows bees, wild, and run or flown wild, hide their rich stores of honey. In its hollows, also, the opossums make their homes; coming out after sunset, to scamper up and down, growling under their breath; or to make themselves, as they sit here and there upon the lofty boughs, blots of blackness on the grey-pearly moonlit sky.

New Music

Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co.——A bass song, written and composed by Charles Swain and Ciro Pinsuti, entitled "Tom the Sailor," displays an equal lack of originality on the part of both writer and composer.—A brace of pianoforte pieces by Fritz Spindler are, the one very good, entitled "Die Fahnen Weh'n;" the other, of but mediocre style, "Am Neckar Am Rhein."—Tuneful, with well-marked time, are "The Assault of Arms," a march by Claude Davenport, and "The Love Bird's Polka." The latter especially may be recommended for schools in anticipation of Christmas, when dance music, well played, takes precedence of classical compositions.

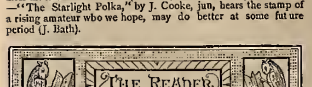
Messrs. Weekes and Co.——Far beyond the vicinity of Penzance, for which town they were composed by H. G. Trembath, Mus. Bac. Oxon., will "Hercules," a march for the organ, and "Andantino in G," for the same, find a welcome.—Under the ostentatious title of "The Fantoccini Polka," a morceau de salon for the pianoforte, D. H. Wilson has brought out a very common-place composition.

Joseph Williams.——Accustomed as we are to associate the quaint old sixteenth century words of "O! by rivers" with Bishop's madrigal and Saville's Appendix (The Waits), it is impossible to accept Florian Pascal's setting of the same in the form of a serenade in 6-8 time, albeit the music is melodious. Many before him have tried in vain to improve upon an old established favourite with an equal lack of success.—Far more satisfactory is "Dreaming," a pleasing idyll in 12-8 time, compass from E on the first line to F on the fifth line.—By the same composer is a pretty little sing-song ballad, "Bird of Day," the tame words by F. Enoch.—"Lady of the May," words A.D. 1580, is a singable but commonplace ballad for a soprano or tenor by F. Pascal.—Sentimental young damsels will admire and take up "My Hero," a song of medium compass, written and composed by Reginald Barnett and J. B. Waldeck.—Florian Pascal has done well with "Pensées Celtiques" (rapsodies Irlandaises), pour violon et piano. They will serve to pass away many a dull winter's evening.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co.——The appearance of each succeeding number of "The Dictionary of Music and Musicians" is eagerly looked for by all who are interested in music in its many forms and bearings, ancient and modern, English and foreign. Part IV., Vol. I., is fully up to the high standard of excellence and completeness required by its able editor, George Grove, D.C.L., and to be anticipated from its staff of talented contributors. Amongst numerous interesting contributions may be specially mentioned an account, by M. Gustave Chouquet (of the Conservatoire de Musique, Paris), of the "Concert Spirituel," a great musical institution of France, dating from the reign of Louis XV. The first of these concerts took place on Monday in Passion Week, March 18, 1725; they ceased to exist in 1791, but were revived in 1805, and the Sacred Concerts given during Holy Week in Paris still bear that name.—E. Prout also gives a very comprehensive and useful explanation of the nature of a concerto, its birth and origin; whilst Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, Bart., does the same by "Counterpoint;" in his clever treatise he gives illustrations of plain counterpoint in its five forms, or species, which will be of assistance to the student of harmony.

MESSRS. NOVELLO, EWER, AND CO.—From this firm come the three latest numbers of "Music Primers." "Plain Song," by the Rev. Thomas Helmore, M.A., is at times somewhat beyond the comprehension of any but the most advanced student; yet the ordinary reader and elementary student who will patiently and carefully read this clever work from beginning to end will gain much valuable information therefrom.—James Higgs, Mus. Bac. Oxon., deserves the thanks of all whom it may concern and interest for his Primer on "The Fugue," a difficult subject, which he has treated so skilfully as to make it comprehensible to the general reader, whilst the erudite scholar will gain further knowledge from its perusal.—"The Tonic Sol-Fa" Primer, by John Curwen, is, as the author explains, "not intended to teach those ignorant of music how to sing, but to explain the Tonic Sol-Fa Notation and method of teaching to those who are already familiar with the established mode of writing music by means of the staff." There is much to be said in favour of this form of notation; and some readers of this book will doubtless become converts to the system.—In readiness for the winter season, Philip Armes, Mus. Doc, Oxon., has brought out a neatly got-up, though inexpensive, edition of "Hezekiah," a short oratorio by him, which has already produced a favourable impression in musical circles, and is well adapted for the use of choral societies. The words are selected from the Book of Isaiah.—The two latest numbers of Novello's "Original Octavo Edition" are Dr. Stainer's sacred cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus" and Astorga's "Stabat Mater," both admirable works in their way, and in their present form will be found useful for limited as well as extensive choral societies.—In family circles where the female element predominates, "The Sleeping Beauty," a cantata for female voices, will be acceptable to pass away the long winter evenings. The music, by Henry Lahee, is light and melodious, the poetry is by Alfred Tennyson. This cantata is arranged with accompaniments for the harmonium and pianoforte.—Part 40, Vol. V., of The Organist's Quarterly Journal contains, as usual, some sterling good works, namely, an "Allegro" and "Allegretto" by Gustave Merkel, both showy and effective; a soundly-written, well-worked out "Fugue," by E. W. Hedley, Mus. Bac. Oxon; "Communion," Nos. 1 and 2, by Perrio Tozer; and "Festal March," by C. S. Heap, Mus. Doc. Cantab., a spirited composition, suitable for the opening of an organ in a hall or on any festive occasion.—"Marche Solennelle," composed by Charles Gounod, for full orchestra, and transcribed for the pianoforte, is but a poor, shadow-like specimen of his genius.—Berthold Tours has skilfully transcribed a pleasing "Gavotte," by Rameau, which will catch and retain all musical ears.—Quaint but encouraging are the words and music of a song for a mezzo-soprano, written and composed by Betsy Jennings, entitled, "Sweet Hope that Singest."

MISCELLANEOUS.——A somewhat pleasing and well-written tenor song, written and composed by R. Crompton and S. S. Stretton, is "The Lover's Star."—By the same composer, words by E. Oxenford, is a bass song, "The Woodman," dedicated to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, who, by the way, modestly owns to an ignorance of all musical subjects, and is therefore all the more liable to accept the dedication of such feeble compositions as the above-named song (Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.).—Two satisfactory and taking pianoforte pieces are "Graziosa," a melodie caprice, by C. A. Ebrenfechter (G. Jefferys), and "Sabbath Evening Bells," a reverie by A. J. Howard (Messrs. Shepherd and Co.).—"Eclipse" is the unmeaning title of a pleasing tenor song, written and composed by L. S. Bevington and Mary C. Carmichael.—A poetical and well-designed frontispiece calls us to expect something super-excellent from Carli Zoeller's "May Flowers," an "idyll" for the pianoforte, which after all is but a feeble composition (Messrs. Neumeyer and Co.).—"The Starlight Polka," by J. Cooke, jun, bears the stamp of a rising amateur who we hope, may do better at some future period (J. Bath).



THE READER

"STIRRING TIMES, by the late James Finn; or Records from Jerusalem Consular Chronicles of 1853-6, edited and compiled by his Widow, with Preface by the Viscountess Strangford" (2 vols.: C. Kegan Paul and Co.), are a curious and opportune addition to the many recently published volumes of European experiences in Syria. Mid-way in point of date between the late Consul Barker's reminiscences of the days of semi-independent Pashas and the journals of modern Palestine explorers, they bring before us Syria as it was when Abd-ul-Medjid was still young. The Pasha of the Djezzar type had long since been improved away, the memory even of the stern but short-lived Egyptian occupation had grown dim when Mr. Finn began his record. A Protestant Bishop had for some years been installed at Jerusalem. A brand-new Patriarch, a nominee of the French, had more recently superseded the old Franciscans of the "Terra Santa" as the supreme protector of the Latin Christians. Among the little Consular colony of which Mr. Finn was the doyen there were rivalries and aspirations; the representatives of the Latin races grouping themselves, though not without occasional jealousies, around the French, the Austrian and the Prussian hardly disguising their sympathies with Russia, sympathies which did not, however, preclude the last from certain visions—they could scarcely be called more—of an occupation of the Holy Land by Prussia as the one disinterested and Protestant Power of them all. Turkish authority, though, of course, fully re-established since 1840, was still fitfully and feebly exercised. To the natives of Syria, engrossed in their own local blood-feuds, the war which agitated the greater world was matter of absolute indifference. No Border reiver of the fourteenth century ever cared less for the doings of the Black Prince in France than did the Sheikh of Hebron or Nablous for events in the Crimea or on the Danube. "That is not what I want to know," screams a woman, to whom, demanding tidings of the war, Mr. Finn has explained the position at Sebastopol; "but has Kâsim el Ahmed joined with Abdu'l Hadi?" It is true there are echoes of the war at times, among mysterious pilgrims at Jerusalem from Hindostan, among the Jews when it is known that Kars has fallen, and that the "Prince of Rosh, Mesech, and Tubal" (Russia, Moscow, and Tobolsk), was thus far on the way to the Holy Land, or when there was enlisting for Bashi-Bazouk regiments under English officers. On the whole, however, the war caused little stir in the vicinity of the Holy Places for whose protectorate it had nominally been waged, and fills but little space in our Consul's pages by the side of pictures of Syrian life and Turkish rulers, or of Jew and Christian in Jerusalem. One of the most interesting chapters is the account of the visit of the Duke and Duchess of Brabant to the Holy Sepulchre—the first time the sacred precincts were unclosed to a Giaour—of the singular stratagem by which the safety of the visitors was secured, and of the resignation of the Moslems, when all was over, to the sovereignty of accomplished facts. Of equal interest, though in a different way, is the description of the Jewish settlers in Jerusalem—settlers for whom, until Mr. Finn came to the rescue, was neither work nor wages; whose Rabbis, indeed, held that the Jew of Palestine should not work, but only pray for the restoration of Jerusalem, living the while upon such wretched alms—collected painfully among his Western brethren—as filtered down to him through the hands of these worthy chiefs of Ashkenaz and Sephardim. The political moral of these instructive volumes will vary, we fear, with "the proclivities" of the reader. To some they will but be fresh proof of Turkish incapacity for rule—incapacity past, present, and to come. Others, like Lady Strangford, may see in them certain evidence of progress, slow but actual—progress which, had not England waxed indifferent and remiss, might have solved the Eastern Question without bloodshed by the "levelling up" of subject races. But to both alike they will be widely useful as a perfect store-house of information on things in Palestine twenty years ago.

With Russian Generals and Russian Grand Dukes more than one "special" has made us tolerably familiar. It has been reserved for Mr. Drew Gay, of the Daily Telegraph, Commander of the Osmanié, and Plevna Medallist, author of "Plevna, the Sultan, and the Porte" (Chatto and Windus), to introduce us in the same familiar way to the private apartments of the Yildiz Kiosk, the summer villa of the Commander of the Faithful, and to the trenches from which Osman Pasha—foe to "specials"—kept so long at bay the armies of the Czar. Mr. Gay, however, as we gather from his book, was not so much a "special" of the common or reporter type as a commander of "specials"—a superior person, whose office it was to send this or that man to the front, but to remain himself by the side of Abd-ul-Hamid, hardly more for the purpose of studying his character for the instruction of the British reader than of enabling the Sultan to thoroughly understand the principles and course of British policy. It was only when no news arrived from Plevna, and no correspondents could get admittance within Osman Pasha's lines, that Mr. Drew, in the interests alike of the Telegraph and of the Sultan, deemed it expedient to proceed thither himself, directly fortified with a "Commission from the Palace" before which, as in the presence of a brother soldier, the scruples of the Ottoman Commander fell necessarily to the ground. Of the trying journey from Stamboul to Plevna, of the arrival in time to witness the battles of September, of the hair-breadth escape to Orkhanie across the Russian lines and amid swarms of hostile Cossacks, and of the lengthy interview on his return with Said Pasha and the Sultan, a few days after which the silver medal of Plevna was fastened on the Correspondent's coat, we have no space to speak. From Osman Pasha, "grim and desperate," to Mr. Gay, calm and collected on his white horse, the mind wanders in perplexed admiration, uncertain whether to extol most the coolness which can count the falling shells, or the self-denial which, with rouble notes to be bought at 3½*d.* apiece—the Russians throw away their paper money when they run, possibly to check pursuit—can yet resist all temptation to a "deal." No Turcophile who would slay his Russians over again can do without this amusing volume.

A graceful in memoriam chapter to the memory of his soldier-servant Radford, containing, amongst other things, a spirited account of how Baker Pasha, with 2,400 men, held the Russian advance in check at Knimarli, and a new preface on the Anglo-Turkish Convention, and the necessity of not allowing it "to become a cypher"—a point on which men much less Russophobist than the writer will probably agree with him—make the seventh edition of Captain Burnaby's "On Horseback through Asia Minor" (S. Low and Co.) something more than a cheap reprint. Were it, however, no more than a reprint, we could have only welcome for a pocket edition of a work which with all its exaggerations is eminently and invariably readable.

The clever, caustic, amusing sketches of politics and society across the Channel collected out of the Daily News, by W. Grenville Murray, under the well-known title "Round About France" (Macmillan and Co.), are worth studying even after the occasion which inspired many of them has passed away. For Mr. Murray knows his France as do few Englishmen besides, and amidst every shifting of the scene—with Liberal or Conservative, Clerical or Freethinker, a De Broglie or a Jules Simon to the front—can bring out with admirable effect the true French character which lies under it all, and which itself is still the same, however the surroundings change, though gaining rapidly, we are fain to think, under the Third Republic in "self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control." Slight as many of these sketches are, they will tell their readers more of modern France than can be learned from books far exceeding them in bulk and in pretension.

Though somewhat gushing in style and diluted in substance, pretty illustrations and pleasant letter-press make "Our Woodland Trees" (S. Low and Co.), by Mr. F. G. Heath, a very agreeable gift-book. It is not scientific in any way; but it will tell town-born readers how to discern by fruit or foliage most British woodland and garden trees, will describe to them (by no means badly) the life of a tree from the seed to the full growth, will lead them half a dozen pretty walks in Epping or even the far-away New Forest, and discourse sagely—though to our judgment with much too strong an inclination to glorify foreign towns, like Brussels, at the expense of London—on the beauty of trees in streets and in the neighbourhood of dwellings. Altogether a volume of excellent intention and far from unsatisfactory execution.

"Teatre Catala," by Joan Maluquer Viladot (Barcelona: Imprenta de la Renaixensa), an essay (historical and critical on the Catalonian stage, its traditions and its present state (in Catalan), we regret to leave to readers better skilled than ourselves in the Romance languages and literature. The subject is certainly an interesting one, and the essay, we should add, received honourable mention at the Barcelona Floral Games in 1876.

"Aldermen of Aldersgate, 1451-1616" (Golding and Lawrence, Great Russell Street).—Here we have a charming little volume, which will delight the hearts of heraldic antiquaries. It is a fac-simile of an heraldic MS. by John Withie, in the Harleian collection, and is skilfully reproduced by Mr. Francis Compton Price, who has also added some racy notes, which show that he thoroughly understands the epoch of which he is treating. Among the Aldermen whose armorial bearings are here reproduced is Sir Bartholomew Reade, who, being Lord Mayor in Henry VII.'s time, imitated Cleopatra with her pearl by swallowing a pulverised precious stone for the sake of showing the French Ambassadors what "warm" men there were in the City of London. It is interesting, too, to note that Lord Cranbrook bears the same arms as one of these Aldersgate worthies, namely John Hardy, who was Sheriff in 1527. It is a matter of regret that, as far as we are aware, there are not equally full heraldic memorials in existence for the remainder of the six-and-twenty City Wards. For what he has done, Mr. Price deserves our best thanks.

"The Days of the Year" (J. F. Shaw and Co.)—This is one of those pretty little birthday books which are now so deservedly popular with young people. We say "deservedly," because these little volumes, in which we inscribe the date of various friends' birthdays, act as kindly remembrancers of the friends themselves. In the volume before us each day of the year is illustrated by three proverbs, and the child must indeed have been born on an unlucky day who cannot find some wise, pithy, and appropriate saying opposite his own birth-anniversary.

The growth of the early Christian Church, and the history of those great men who devoted their lives to proclaiming the Gospel, are treated practically and briefly in several series of works on ecclesiastical history, issued by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, the curt treatises being intended to afford an accurate and comprehensive view of Church affairs. To deal primarily with "The Fathers for English Readers"—the Rev. H. S. Holland, in the first of the series, "The Apostolic Fathers," presents a sketch of the state of the Church at the close of the Apostles' labours, the difficulties with which she had to contend, and her eminent early supporters—thoughtful Clement, the enthusiastic martyr Ignatius, and saintly Polycarp. The Rev. F. Watson delineates "The Defenders of the Faith," and gives some excellent abstracts of the apologies or arguments set forth from the first to the third century in support of the Christian religion. Turning from a general survey to individual biography, the life and writings of the greatest of the Latin fathers, "St. Augustine," are described by the Rev. W. Clark, who supplies a slight outline of the part taken by Augustine in the great controversies of his day. The portrait of "St. Jerome," however, is the most life-like of the collection, and the Rev. E. Cutts gives not merely the dry bones of his subject, but vivid sketches of the scenes and social life in which Jerome moved. Spreading from its Eastern cradle Christianity is now chronicled in "The Conversion of the West." The labours of the Apostles of Scotland and Ireland are narrated by "The Celts," wherein the Rev. G. F. Maclear pictures Celtic heathendom and its fall. Further, in "The English," the same author ably describes the struggles, failures, and eventual triumph of the Roman mission to Britain, and subsequently depicts the conversion of the Scandinavians in "The Northmen." Dean Merivale contributes the fourth of the series, "The Continental Teutons," and includes a large amount of information in very confined space.—A highly interesting account of the Sinaitic Peninsula forms the latest volume of Ancient History from the Monuments, "Sinai"—the fruits of the Sinaitic Survey Expedition of 1869, related by Major H. Palmer, himself a member of the Expedition. A lengthened report of the explorers' work was published in 1872, and on this the present narrative is based. Major Palmer writes with the ease of actual experience, and his geographical and historical descriptions are lucid and picturesque.—Fitly related to the search for the Mount of the Law is "The Jewish Prophets"—the history of the Jews from their return from the Babylonish Captivity to the close of the Old Testament canon, in the form of a commentary on the Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, and the three last prophets.—From the Jewish Scriptures to the Mahomedan sacred writings, Sir W. Muir, in "The Corân," reproduces his "Testimony borne by the Corân to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures," which has long been out of print, and now affixes a terse summary of Mahomet's life and the teaching and compilation of the Corân, the whole forming a volume of special interest now that British and Mussulman interests are so closely intermixed.

The career of the great Florentine reformer, Girolamo Savonarola, finds a fresh chronicler in the Rev. W. R. Clark, whose "Savonarola, His Life and Times," is the first of another series, the Home Library, published by the same Society. Steering a middle course between the blind admiration and fanatic abuse of diverse critics, the author has produced a calm, unprejudiced composition, lacking dramatic interest, it is true, as though he had not warmed to his subject, but abounding in valuable extracts from the best biographies of the fervent prior of St. Marco. The other volumes of the Home Library are for Sunday reading. "The Inner Life," edited by the Rev. T. Erskine, consists of extracts from the correspondence of noted Churchmen and women, and mainly relating to the trials of daily life. Bishops Gray, Wilson, and Patteson, Keble, Kingsley, Wilberforce, and Arnold are among the chief writers quoted. Thoughts which should be inspired by our parish church are brought forward by "The House of God the Home of Man," and the Rev. G. E. Jelf in a series of admirable chapters presents the different aspects of the church as the House of Rest, of prayer, of Teaching, &c. The same author furnishes an excellent commentary on the Decalogue, "The Rule of God's Commandments," adapted for Sunday Schools and confirmation classes; while the Rev. W. C. Bromehead's "Step by Step," couched in simple and reverent language, illustrates and comments on the Communion Service. Good old Bishop Ken's "Manual of Prayers for Winchester Scholars" appears anew in its quaint, heartfelt language, while comforting meditations for old age are contained in "The Aged Pilgrim's Staff," by the Rev. R. Grant, printed in large type for failing eyesight.

The shooting season has brought out a well-timed volume for votaries of the rod and gun, "Sporting Sketches with Pen and Pencil" (The Field), wherein Mr. Francis Francis supplies the entertaining letter-press, and Mr. A. Cooper the effective drawings, the head and tail-pieces to each chapter being specially tasteful. An old tried sportsman, the author has something lively and to the purpose to say on all styles of shooting and fishing, and can supply plenty of good stories. Londoners looking over these sketches will refresh many pleasant recollections of holidays on moors and rivers.

Two capital French primers have been compiled by M. Henri Bué, the "First French Book" and "Second French Book" (Hachette). The first work has been adopted by the London School Board, and is thoroughly fitted for beginners, who are instructed in the regular grammatical routine, and taken through a rising scale of exercises and practical conversations to a series of short and amusing readings. The idioms which form so great a stumbling-block to students of the Gallic tongue are specially located in the "Second French Book," which, while retaining the features of its predecessor, further contains a synopsis of the previous lessons, a short explanation of certain grammatical difficulties, a list of the irregular verbs, and some examination papers. Really useful sentences are utilised in the exercises, and a vocabulary is appended to each volume, so that the student need not turn aside to a dictionary. Altogether M. Bué's productions, small and cheap as they are, will prove valuable aids to the teacher, and will really interest the pupil.

The Crisis in the East.——Now that Austria has succeeded in completely occupying Bosnia and Herzegovina, she is busy organising the government of those provinces, and is already talking about partial demobilisation, though what proportion of the forces will be recalled is as yet uncertain. The Turkish circular despatches, declining the Convention and complaining of the "atrocities" committed by the Austrian troops, have, as might be imagined, aroused profound indignation throughout the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and in Hungary, where great sympathy has been expressed for the Turks throughout, the most intense irritation is felt. The Austrian Government has made a calm and dignified reply to the Porte, whom it reproaches with having brought such accusations before the Powers without first communicating with the Austrian Government, which would have given every facility for inquiry. The sacking and burning of Serajevo (which appears to have been reported by Hafiz Pasha on mere hearsay evidence) is emphatically contradicted, while there was not a single case of pillage on the part of the troops, who, indeed, prevented the natives from pillaging. "Notwithstanding the most savage treachery on the other side the army, conscious of its own honour, acted in the spirit of the proclamation. The calumnies brought forward cannot reach it, but as they acted on public feeling in Austro-Hungary it became a duty to repudiate them, and to point out to the Porte the regrettable effect they have produced." To say the truth, however, the Porte is somewhat ashamed of its violence, and is now doing all in its power to be polite to the Austrian Ambassador, and the Sultan in personal interviews has reiterated the expression of the "friendly feelings" by which he is animated towards the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Indeed, the Porte has been showing signs of conciliation to all this week, and owing to stringent orders from Stamboul the Albanians has surrendered Gussini to Montenegro and Vranje to the Servians. The Constantinople newspapers have been ordered to give vent to no more anti-Russian sentiments, as Turkey is again on "most friendly terms with Russia." The Porte is also busy negotiating the supplementary treaty with Russia provided for by the Treaty of San Stefano, but at present declines to make known any of its provisions, while in the mean time the Russians refuse to make any further retreat on Adrianople, alleging that the Turkish authorities take no measures to secure the tranquillity of the districts which are vacated by the Russian troops. With England the Porte is especially friendly, and the scheme for the proposed reforms in Asia Minor is said to have been accepted by the Porte, the stipulations being somewhat as follows: A corps of gendarmérie to be composed both of Christians and Mussulmans, and commanded by British officers, an English assessor to be attached to every Court of Appeal established in the chief towns, of which the Governors are to be appointed for five years with the consent of England, whose sanction is also to be obtained to the nomination of a Defterdar, or general receiver of taxes in every vilayet. The rival railway plans of the Duke of Sutherland and the Hungarian General Klapka will probably result in a combination of the two plans. Since the publication of the two last Circulars of the Porte the Powers appear to have made very urgent representations as to the necessity for immediately carrying out the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin, and this, combined with the refusal of the Russians to withdraw their troops until some definitive settlement had been arranged, probably accounts for the sudden amiability of the Porte. A gratuitous piece of civility towards England, however, has been a leading article in the El Jawaib deprecating Shere Ali's attitude towards Great Britain, and declaring that by making war against the "sole ally of Islam," the Ameer would draw down upon himself the censure, not only of all Mahomedan sovereigns but of every Mussulman.

From the other countries concerned in the Eastern crisis we hear that the Roumanian Parliament has adopted the clauses in the Treaty of Berlin respecting Bessarabia and the Dobrudscha by 48 votes against 8, while Servia has been indulging in a Ministerial crisis, M. Ristics, however, having formed a new Cabinet.

From Cyprus comes the welcome news that fever has nearly disappeared from the island. The invalids have been mostly shipped off to more salubrious climes.

France.——The Senatorial elections are now beginning to engross public attention. The electoral delegates are to be chosen to-morrow week, when 14,021 Municipal Councils will be convoked to choose their representatives. The delegates will number 14,411, composed as follows—173 Deputies, 877 General Councillors, 1,175 Councillors of Arrondissement, and 12,186 Municipal Delegates. The outgoing Senators number 75, and of them only 19 are Republicans, while there are 56 Conservatives, 14 of whom are Bonapartists, so that the Republicans look forward to great gain in the election, more especially as their party is united, while the Conservatives are divided into half-a-dozen different shades. In the meantime, they neglect no opportunity of energetically stirring up their followers, and M. Gambetta has been making another speech, this time at Grenoble, in which be urged the necessity of electing Republican Senators in order to ensure the prosperity and tranquillity of the country, and advised that no member of the De Broglie Cabinet should be voted for, but that only staunch Liberals should be elected. He also took the opportunity of denying that he was hostile to the Church any more than was the Republic. "Religion and liberty of conscience must not be confounded with the spirit of ascendency. A distinction must be drawn between religion and the ministers who compromised it." The speech, as usual with most of the ex-Dictator's utterances, has given great offence to both of the extreme parties, the Marseillaise charging him with aiming at a "Cæsarian Republic." The Conservatives are greatly surprised and considerably discouraged at the elections having been fixed so early, as they had hoped that they would not have been settled until after the meeting of the Chambers, when they trusted that something favourable to their party might turn up from inevitable "scenes" and "crises."

Next to the Senatorial elections, the great topic of the week has been the death of Bishop Dupanloup, a man whose talents were respected by even his adversaries, who, however, heartily detested him, while he was equally adored by the Conservative party, to whom be has rendered important services. The deceased prelate was born in 1802, ordained a priest in 1825, and quickly came to the front, becoming a chaplain to the Duc de Bordeaux, and subsequently to the Dauphine. In 1841 he became Professor of Science of the Paris Faculty of Theology, but owing to his vigorous attacks on Voltaire was compelled to resign, and in 1849 he was created Bishop of Orleans, which see he has held ever since. The Bishop has always avowed the most liberal and independent opinions, even towards the Holy See, and in 1870 at first opposed the dogma of Infallibility. In 1871 he was elected a Deputy, and in 1877 a Senator, and has always taken a most active part in the debates against the Republic, his last speech being a violent denunciation of the proposal for any official recognition of the Voltaire Centenary. In early days Bishop Dupanloup was a great friend of Talleyrand, to whose dying bed he was summoned to hear the great statesman's confession. If, however, rumour is to be believed, the wily diplomatist, with the ruling feeling strong in death, made few revelations—a report which gave rise to the well-known lampoon:—

Il a trompé du même coup
(Si ce n'est vrai c'est vraisemblable)
Le Bon Dieu, le Monde, et le Diable,
Et De Quélen, et Dupanloup.

The Bishop's funeral is announced for Monday.

The Exhibition still continues to attract a daily average of from 60,000 to 80,000 visitors, and Paris is looking eagerly forward to Monday's ceremony and its subsequent festivities, the only grievance being that there is barely room for 21,000 spectators, a very large proportion of whom will be officials. As, however, the medals are not ready, they manifestly cannot be distributed, so that only the 150 diplomas of honour will be handed to their recipients by the Marshal, who, The Times calculates, had he the task of distributing all the medals, would have to remain on his feet bowing and holding out his hand for sixteen consecutive days,—no light work for an American, let alone a French Republican President. The Marshal, however, will make a speech, and M. Teisserenc de Bort, the Minister of Public Works, will make a report of the labours of the juries. On Sunday, the first day of the festivities, eight of the principal theatres will be opened free. The closing day of the Exhibition has now been officially fixed for the 10th prox., but exhibitors will be allowed to hand over their wares to purchasers from the 1st November.

Considerable attention has been excited in Paris by Prince Bismarck's remarks about Socialism having been driven out of France into Germany, and the Republican papers twit the man of iron with having failed to curb by despotism what France has extinguished by liberality. The assertion that the editor of the Frankfurter Zeitung was connected with the French Press is even said to have been discussed at a Cabinet Council. To pass from things political to things theatrical, there has been a first representation of a lyrical drama, by the Marquis d'Ivry, Les Amoureux de Verone, founded, as the title suggests, on Romeo and Juliet. The piece was well received, and is considered to possess no little merit. M. Capoul and Mdlle. Heilbron are the two unfortunate lovers. The Ambigu Comique, hitherto the dirtiest theatre in Paris, has been cleaned and decorated, and has revived with great success the elder Dumas' Jeunesse de Louis Quatorze, a piece which possesses one great advantage—that an Englishman may take his daughter to see it.

Germany.——The debate on the Anti-Socialist Bill has been energetically continued in the German Parliament, which, while approving of the majority of the clauses, has not shown itself backward in rejecting those which it considered to be unjust and oppressive. Thus a clause enabling the Government to arbitrarily suppress Socialist periodicals has been thrown out, while another, authorising the expulsion of Socialist agitators, even from their own residences, has been equally rejected, as the Government declined to entertain a modification proposed by the National Liberals. The House, however, approved the clause permitting the Government to prohibit meetings and expel persons from localities threatened with disturbances, and the Bill, with its modifications, was read a second time on Wednesday; but it is thought that the Government will effect some compromise with the Liberals before the third reading with respect to the rejected clauses. The speeches, though in some cases powerful, present few features of outside interest, if we except one from Herr Hasselmann, a Socialist member, who, after a virulent attack on Prince Bismarck, exclaimed, "I am not personally in favour of revolution. I prefer pacific means. But if we are forced to fight we shall have to fight; and I shall be proud to lay down my life and die on the field of honour. Let Prince Bismarck remember March 18th, 1848." On Tuesday, at a meeting of Berlin Socialists, the same gentleman declared that "Socialism and Democracy were inseparable; there could be no Socialism unless the people—that is, the working classes—had the control of the State." These words were received with frantic enthusiasm, and the meeting then sang the "Petroleum" song and the working men's "Marseillaise."

Italy is annoyed at the rejection of her claim to share in the new Government of Egypt, and the Opinione declares that Italians, "great as may be their resignation regarding politics," cannot resign themselves to seeing their influence in Egypt completely extinguished. Little had been expected from Lord Beaconsfield, "who has revived the ancient tradition of British egotistical policy; but we had a right to hope for the support of Liberal France." As a contrast to this, there has been considerable discussion respecting a pamphlet by Signor Jacini, entitled "A Few Comments on the Treaty of Berlin," wherein the much-abused policy of the present Cabinet is justified, and in which the author tells his countrymen some wholesome truths. After remarking that there are other "unredeemed countries," for instance, France, Germany, and Spain, and yet no popular clamour regarding them, he writes:—"We are too much in the habit of considering whatever question appear above the horizon as one from which we may draw some advantage for ourselves rather than according to its real value. If it were possible to look inside the human brain, we should see, for example, thousands upon thousands of Italians reading to-day's telegrams relating to Afghanistan, and calculating whether perchance, through a war there, the occasion might not arise for our obtaining Trento and Trieste"—in fact, the old story of L'Italia fara da se. In the meantime the Italians are consoling themselves by endeavouring to found a trading colony in Central Africa, and a company has been sent to the King of Shoa. Even here, however, indignation has been aroused by the discovery that French and German mercantile companies are equally on the alert and anxious to obtain the upper hand. On Wednesday the Prime Minister made his long expected speech to his constituents at Pavia. Touching upon finance, he said that a surplus of 2,400,000*l.* was expected next year, of which upwards of 1,000,000*l.* would be devoted to the abolition of the Grist Tax. The new Electoral Bill will give a vote to every citizen above twenty-one who can read and write, and passing on to foreign affairs, he energetically defended the course Italy had taken at the Congress, and pointed out that the interests of Italy were unprejudiced, as the Treaty cannot be modified without her consent.

India and Afghanistan.——The report last week that Ali Musjid had been taken by the British troops was unfounded, having arisen from the fact that the Afghans had been practising firing in the Khyber Pass. It was at one time, however, according to The Times correspondent, contemplated to make a rapid advance on Ali Musjid and seize the fort by a coup de main; but this was abandoned for various reasons, one being that the garrison had been strengthened by large reinforcements of troops, accompanied by artillery. Indeed, it is said that the Pass is defended by stronger artillery than had been anticipated; while 6,000 troops are said to occupy the Pass, so that, even if we captured the fort, it would be very difficult to hold it until our preparations were complete. The inefficiency of transport is another reason for delay; while our envoy has not yet come back from Cabul, which be left on October 6, being expected to arrive at Kohat yesterday (Friday). As he is the bearer of the Ameer's reply to the Viceroy's letter, there is a remote—though, be it said, a very remote—hope of the missive being couched in conciliatory terms. Meanwhile war preparations are being pushed forward actively and extensively, and the whole of India is reverberating with the din of military movements towards the frontier. The official list of the troops told off for frontier operations are:—"The Kuram column, Major-General F. S. Roberts, V.C., C.B., commanding. Three batteries of artillery; a squadron 10th Hussars, 12th Bengal Cavalry, 17th Foot, six regiments of native infantry. Mooltan Division, Lieutenant-General Donald Stewart, C.B., commanding: Eight batteries, with siege train, 15th Hussars, two regiments of Bengal Cavalry, 54th and 60th Foot, and five native regiments. The Quetta column, Major-General A. S. Biddulph, C.B., commanding: Two mountain and one field batteries, three regiments of native cavalry, the 18th Foot, and six regiments native infantry. Sappers and engineers are attached to each column." The Maharajah of Ulwar has offered to equip and maintain at his own expense a corps of camel drivers for service on the frontier, while the Mhairwarra battalion has also volunteered for frontier duty. It is rumoured also that the Shia tribes are threatening to withdraw their support from the Ameer.

It appears that the first account of the interview between Major Cavagnari and the Ameer's Commandant, at Ali Musjid was greatly exaggerated. Although Faiz Mahomed was exceedingly firm in his refusal, he was extremely courteous, and the whole conversation was conducted with true diplomatic politeness on both sides.

United States.——The yellow fever epidemic is slowly abating, but the deaths in New Orleans still continue to average from forty to fifty daily. There was a heavy gale on Saturday on the New England coast. Many marine disasters are announced, and the loss of life is considerable.

Egypt.——The negotiations between England and France have at last been concluded as follows:—All the railways and ports, with the exception of that of Alexandria, will belong to M. de Blignière's department. The new possessions of the Daira will be administered by an Englishman, a Frenchman, and an Egyptian under the control of the new Cabinet. The ancient estates of the Daira remain attached to the Department of Finances. Mr. Rivers Wilson will return to Egypt on the 28th inst., and it is expected that he will sign the treaty of a new loan before returning to Cairo.—The Nile has risen this year considerably above the average.

Miscellaneous.——In South Australia the Ministry resigned on the 27th ult., a new Cabinet being formed under Mr. William Morgan.—In Victoria a telegram of the 3rd inst. tells us that the Ministerial Bill for a reform of the Constitution, curtailing the powers of the Legislative Council, has passed the third reading by 50 votes against 21, in substantially the form in which it was originally presented. It is probable that a Conference of the two Houses will be held to agree upon the amendments proposed by the Legislative Council.—Spain has been greatly excited about the assassination of an official of the Spanish Consulate near Tetuan, in Morocco. The Government has addressed vigorous representations to the Sultan on the subject.—From South Africa we hear that the country appears still to be unsettled; hostilities continue with Secocoeni, and reinforcements have been sent from Pretoria to the front.

THE COURT

The Queen will remain at Balmoral with the Princess Beatrice for another five weeks. Her Majesty and the Princess will then stay a month at Windsor, and go to Osborne for Christmas. Last week the Princess of Wales and her three daughters came over several times from Abergeldie and lunched with Her Majesty, and on Friday week the Prince and Princess dined with the Queen, while Colonel Teesdale, Mr. F. Knollys, Drs. Robertson, Profeit, and Marshall, and the ladies and gentlemen in attendance on Her Majesty, joined the Royal circle in the evening. Next day Sir Stafford Northcote dined with the Queen, and on Sunday morning Divine Service was performed at Balmoral before Her Majesty, the Princess Beatrice, and the Royal Household, the Rev. A. Campbell officiating. In the evening Sir Stafford Northcote dined with the Queen, and next morning Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice went to the Glassalt Shiel.—The Queen intends to appoint Lieutenant-General H. Ponsonby, her private Secretary, to the late Sir T. M. Biddulph's post as Keeper of the Privy Purse, with two assistants, one of whom will be Lieutenant-Colonel A. Pickard, V.C.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and their three daughters left Scotland for the South on Saturday. Wishing to cross the Tay Bridge the Royal party went by special train to Dundee, and as their train was the first containing any of the Royal family which had crossed the bridge since it was opened for traffic, the Dundee authorities were anxious to make some demonstration. The Prince and Princess, however, could only stay a few minutes, so the Provost, magistrates, and various officials briefly welcomed the Prince and Princess at the Tay Bridge Railway Station, the Provost's wife presenting a bouquet of roses and Earl Strathmore two baskets of grapes. The shipping and neighbouring buildings were liberally beflagged, and numbers of persons assembled to watch the passage of the Royal train. The Prince and Princess travelled on to Edinburgh, where they dined, and reached London on Sunday morning. Next day the Prince presided at a meeting of the Finance Committee of the Royal Commission for the Paris Exhibition, and in the evening accompanied his wife and the Duke of Connaught to the Promenade Concerts. On Tuesday night the Prince and Princess and their eldest daughter, Princess Louise, went to the Opera Comique. The Prince and Princess left for Paris on Wednesday night, travelling by Dover and Calais.—The Prince has appointed Sir W. Knollys Receiver General of the Duchy of Cornwall.

The Duchess of Edinburgh completed her 25th year on Thursday. The Duke leaves Coburg at the end of the month to join his vessel, the Black Prince, at Marseilles, whence he will bring her to England in order to convoy the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne to Canada in the Sarmatian. The Princess Louise on Wednesday inaugurated the Leaf Memorial Wing of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools at Russell Hill, Caterham.—The marriage of the Duke of Connaught with the Princess Louise Margaret of Germany will take place about the second week in February at St. George's Chapel, Windsor. The Duke was at the Gaiety Theatre on Saturday evening.

Duke and Duchess Bernard of Saxe-Meiningen (Princess Charlotte of Germany, eldest daughter of the Imperial Prince and Princess) have been staying in Paris as the Count and Countess Altenstein. They kept the strictest incognito, and visited all the Parisian sights and theatres, the Princess even making an ascent in the captive balloon. Prince William of Germany too has been in Paris, and the Crown Prince of Sweden has also arrived, travelling as Count Tullgarn, while the Crown Prince and Princess of Denmark are daily expected, having stopped at the Hague by the way to visit Prince Frederick of the Netherlands. Before their departure the Danish Crown Prince and Princess had their baby daughter christened at their residence, Charlottenlund, naming the child Ingeborg Charlotte Caroline Louise Frederikka.—According to the Dutch Middelburger Courant, the coming marriage of the King of Holland has so annoyed his second son Prince Alexander, that the Prince has gone to Stuttgardt into voluntary exile. The civil marriage of the King and the Princess Emma will take place at Arolsen, and the religious ceremony in the Nieuwe Kerk at Amsterdam.

CHURCH NEWS

The Congregational Union.——The thirty-ninth autumnal session of the union has this week been held at Liverpool. On Monday the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, Principal of Airedale College, preached a special sermon; and the Congregational Total Abstinence Society held a meeting, at which Mr. E. Baines, of Leeds, delivered an address. On Tuesday the business sittings of the Union were commenced under the presidency of the Rev. J. Baldwin Brown, who in his opening address said that, in the matter of love and loyalty to the Gospel, the Independents were the healthiest of all the Christian communities in the land, and he firmly believed that the Churches of the future must increasingly conform to their model. The penalty of the faults of the pre-Reformation Church was the schism of Christendom, the Thirty years' war, and the losses and devastations from which fair regions of Europe had not even yet recovered. The penalty of leaving to the eighteenth century sceptics the sacred mission of the Church to maintain the cause of the afflicted and the rights of the poor, was the French Revolution, and the awful anguish which it inflicted on the world. Monarchy, aristocracy, plutocracy, and the middle classes—the stronghold of commerce, morality, and religion—had in succession tried to rule Europe, and each had failed. Democracy would come next. It was easy to brand Democratic schemes of social regeneration as insane. They were no more insane, nor less, than the schemes of kings, priests, and nobles which had vexed the world." His hope that in England the struggle would be conducted with moderation, and would issue in progress, lay mainly in the influence which might be established over these wild, fierce hearts by the preachers of the Gospel. Resolutions were passed recommending the adoption of some systematic method of teaching the Scriptural principles of Church organisation, of instructing the Committee to make special arrangements for the popular exposition of the principles and history of Congregationalism during the Jubilee year of 1881, and also to enter into immediate correspondence with non-established Evangelical Churches, with a view to a conference at an early date on matters connected with the religious condition of England and the promotion of faith and godliness among the people. The mover of the last-mentioned resolution said that many Churches in all denominations were dying of kid-gloveism and too much dignity, and much had still to be learnt in the way of reaching the masses, and converting the domineering squire and the attitudinising clergyman from the error of their ways. In the afternoon some of the members of the Union were received by the Mayor at an "At Home," held at the Town Hall; and in the evening public meetings were held at various places in the town and suburbs. On Wednesday deputations were received from various Nonconformist bodies, and the President, in thanking them for their expressions of sympathy, said that the noble love and beautiful unity of the free Evangelical churches of England which had been demonstrated that day gave a large promise in the future when that great blighting shadow of Establishment which existed was dissipated, as it must be soon. There was always one great body which was conspicuous by its absence on these occasions. The Church of England seemed to be stone-blind to the ministrations of the spirit. Would she never learn that one of the chief graces of a Church was the power to discern the grace of God wherever it was at work? A large number of subjects were dealt with in the Sectional meetings, some of the speakers indulging in political allusions, and comparisons of the respective policies and character of Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone, mostly in favour of the latter.

Various.——At the Lincoln Diocesan Conference the Bishop said that, from a religious point of view, he looked upon the acquisition of Cyprus as providential, as it might afford an opening for friendly intercourse between the Church of England and the present Church in the East.—At the Oxford Diocesan Conference a resolution was adopted recommending the better observance of the Sabbath throughout the diocese, and it was determined to petition Parliament to close the public-houses on Sunday, or to shorten the time. The Rev. S. A. Knox proposed a resolution declaring that the teaching of Cuddesdon College was not entitled to the confidence of members of the Church of England; but, on the motion of Sir R. Phillimore, the Conference declined to entertain the subject.—At the Winchester Conference the spread of scepticism and the best way of dealing with it was discussed. The Bishop said that there was no use in ignoring the fact of the prevalence of sceptical opinions, but he looked to the future with the most sanguine hope. Lord Carnarvon, who was also amongst the speakers, said that whoever undertook to deal with the question of scepticism, except in private conversation, was bound in the eyes of God to train himself so as to have an absolute mastery of the whole subject.—On Saturday Sir C. S. Reed, M.P., presided at the prize distribution of the Church of England Schools of Norwich, and made a speech in which he said that the few withdrawals from religious instruction in elementary schools showed that the religious difficulty had been met. This was creditable to the people, but not much could be said for the Government of a Christian country that insisted on secular, and appeared afraid to notice or encourage religious instruction.—The Bishop of Manchester, preaching at a choral festival on Saturday, urged the desirability of having such music as the congregation could join in, and said that many of our modern hymns, and some of them the most popular, were strangely namby-pamby, strangely silly. They were full of erroneous conceptions of all sorts of things—of Almighty God, of Heaven, of Hell, of Angels, and he knew not of what besides. Many of them were grossly materialistic, and had he suspected very much tended to form the materialistic and superstitious conception of Christ's presence in His blessed Sacrament. Some of the hymns took what would be called the High Church view, and some the Evangelical view, but to him they all seemed filled with a gross and revolting materialism.—As a pendant to the foregoing, we hear that last Sunday Mr. Spurgeon, after his congregation had sung the first part of a hymn, told them to sing the other verses more quickly, remarking that "this is not a funeral."—The Rev. S. H. Reynolds, vicar of East Ham, Essex, has made a curious innovation in his method of conducting Church service. On Sunday, the 6th inst., he broke off immediately after the Second Lesson, to unite a loving couple in the bonds of matrimony, and, after filling in the register in the vestry, returned to the church and resumed the ordinary service. The parishioners have protested against the change, but without avail, and the churchwarden says that no provision has been made for such a contingency in the Public Worship Act.—The Rev. W. Gaskell, Unitarian minister of Manchester, was on Tuesday entertained at a soirée at the Manchester Town Hall in celebration of the fiftieth year of his ministry. The sum of 2,190*l.* had been subscribed as a testimonial, and a Gaskell scholarship of 70*l.* per annum has been endowed therewith. Mr. Gaskell was also presented with a service of plate of solid silver.—Mr. Ira D. Sankey, formerly associated with Mr. Moody, the Evangelist, has arrived with his family at Liverpool from New York. It is stated that Mr. Sankey contemplates making a religious tour through the country.—The Bishop of Peterborough consecrated the new church of St. Laurence, Northampton, on October 10. This is the first of the churches intended to be built, as funds permit, by the Northampton Church Extension Society. The plan consists of a nave and chancel in one span, narrow aisles, chapel for week-day services, bell-turret, north and south porches, and narthex or western porch. The end arrived at in the arrangement of the plan has been to seat the whole congregation, so that every one may be able to follow the entire service, from whatever part of the church it is proceeding, without sight or hearing being abstracted by the intervention of columns. The whole of the seats are free and unappropriated. The architects have been two of Sir G. Gilbert Scott's former pupils, Messrs. Burder and Baker, of 14, York Buildings, Adelphi.—The Right Rev. Bishop Mackenzie, Sub-Dean of Lincoln, and formerly Bishop Suffragan of Nottingham, died on Tuesday. He was seventy years of age, but although he had long been in feeble health his death was quite unexpected, as he had preached on the previous Tuesday, and taken part in the Diocesan Conference on Thursday last week.

LEGAL

The Electric Light in Chancery.——On Wednesday an interim injunction was obtained against Messrs. Wells, of Shoreditch, restraining them from continuing the use of the system of electric lighting, the apparatus of which is shown in one of our engravings this week. The applicant, a Mr. Wilde, claims that the Jablochkoff system, which is the property of a French Company, is virtually the same as that invented by himself, and for which he took out a patent as far back as 1863.

"Unbending Honesty and Unswerving Truth."——The promoters of a "Universal Society," whose motto was that above quoted, but who seem to have had singular ideas as to its interpretation, have got into trouble at Exeter, where their failure to satisfy a claim made by one of its members has led to a magisterial investigation. It was found that although there was a committee, the chairman was a mythical personage, that another person never knew that his name had been associated with the affair, and that the entire list of names was issued by the London secretary alone. The Metropolitan was mentioned as the bank of the society, but no authority had been given to put the name of the bank to the prospectus, and there had never been any deposit made. The bank had no funds of the society, and at the office no proper account books could be found. The secretary and the local agent were both arrested, and though the latter has been acquitted the former is still in custody on remand.

Sunday Closing in Ireland.——Reports from all parts of Ireland show that the Sunday Closing Act has been received with a good grace. No unusual quantity of drink was sold in the provincial towns on Saturday night, and no organised drinking clubs seem to have been formed. In Sligo and Mullingar, towns notorious for Sunday drinking, there was not a single case of drunkenness. Sixty-nine licensed houses in Athlone were closed, and the police contingent was increased, but no breach of the Act occurred. In Dublin in many places of worship, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, allusion was made to the enactment with the object of interesting the congregations in its success, and even some of the National journals have taken the side favourable to the Act. In Dublin, where the new law only closes the public-houses at seven P.M. instead of nine, there was no appreciable reduction in the number of drunken persons arrested in the streets, while at Cork, another of the five cities which do not come under the general provisions of the Act, a rather unusual amount of intoxication was observed, the people having apparently made up for the shortened hours by a more rapid consumption of liquor. In some of the country districts large numbers of persons went to neighbouring towns and claimed the privileges of bonâ fide travellers. On Monday, Mr. Hugh Birley, M.P., presided over a meeting held at Manchester to celebrate the passing of the Act. More than one hundred letters of sympathy were read from members of Parliament, clergymen, mayors, magistrates and working-men, and resolutions were passed expressing the confident hope that a similar measure applying to England and Wales would soon be passed.

Miscellaneous Items.——William Stafford, the clerk who absconded from the Liverpool branch of the Bank of England, has been arrested at Jersey, whither he had gone in a small yacht hired at Cowes with the intention of reaching the Spanish coast. As soon as the vessel entered the harbour she was boarded by the Jersey police, to whom Stafford at first gave a false name, but subsequently made a full confession, giving up 10,000*l.* in notes, and stating that he had "been defrauded" of the remaining 5,000*l.* by an accomplice, whose name he refused to divulge.—At Birmingham, a "merchant" named George Dunn has just been convicted of some extensive commercial frauds. Having tried his 'prentice hand by becoming a fraudulent bankrupt (an offence for which he served twelve months in prison), he resolved on doing business on a large scale, and accordingly opened a small shop, from whence he sent circulars over all the country requesting orders and remittances on behalf of the "Birmingham Bedstead and General Hardware Company." The scheme answered well, cheques and money-orders came rolling in, followed after a time by complaints respecting the non-delivery of goods, but at length the fraud was detected, the "Company" was sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment, and the sale of the stock in trade realised exactly 6*l.*—Mrs. Weldon again appeared at Bow Street Police Court on Saturday, with the information which she was to make against her husband and the doctors who had signed the certificate pronouncing her insane. Mr. Flowers said that although there were certain statements in it which, if proved, would entitle her to a summons against the parties, others were somewhat vague, and he therefore recommended civil proceedings. Mrs. Weldon said she had been treated with courtesy by the Commissioners in Lunacy, who were unable to help her, as the law did not allow any married woman to institute an action without the consent of her husband, a condition which in her case was not very likely to be complied with.—A provincial publican has had to pay 20*l.* damages for disappointing a lady to whom he offered marriage two days after the death of his first wife.—The other day, at Plymouth, a woman, on being sentenced to a week's imprisonment for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, impudently retorted that she "could do that lot on her head," a contempt of Court which was promptly punished by the presiding magistrate, who told her that as she could do seven days on her head he would sentence her to do seven days more on her feet.—A penalty of 50*l.*, with the alternative of a month's imprisonment, has been imposed upon the proprietor of the so-called "Working Men's Club" at Tottenham. The prosecution was conducted by the Treasury, and it was shown that the "club" was established on premises which the local magistrates had repeatedly refused to license as a public-house, and that drinking, dancing, and card-playing were constantly carried on there at hours when the ordinary taverns were closed, the members paying only a nominal subscription.—A few nights ago a burglar was caught in flagrante delicto at Blackheath by two policemen. He fired five shots from a revolver at one of them, who was so severely wounded that he was unable to appear against him at the first examination before the magistrate.—On Sunday, the Sheffield police visited a house in Pond Street in quest of two men who were "wanted" for stealing some leather. As soon as the door was burst open one of the thieves jumped through the window, carrying with him both woodwork and glass, and falling a distance of twelve feet upon the roof of an outbuilding. He then dropped into a yard to a distance of ten feet, scaled a wall eleven or twelve feet high, and got clean away, although traces of blood showed the course which he had taken.—On Monday, at the Clerkenwell Police Court, a seaman was charged with being concerned in a garotte robbery at Canonbury on the 25th ult. He was apprehended in consequence of some statements made by a female associate during a quarrel with his sister, which was overheard by a policeman. The prosecutor, a diamond merchant, who was attacked close to his own house, identified the prisoner as one of his assailants, and stated that they had robbed him of over 300*l.* worth of property, and that he had 200*l.* worth more in his possession at the time. He said that for two years he had been in the habit of carrying large quantities of jewels about with him, and had never before been molested—a statement which drew from the magistrate the remark that he must consider himself a most fortunate man.—Michael Heraghty, one of the men charged with the murder of Lord Leitrim and his servants, has died in Lifford Gaol of typhus fever, a disease with which the two other prisoners are also laid up in the prison hospital.—A person named Dean, living at Cuddesdon, in Surrey, has been charged with attempting to murder his wife. The circumstances are peculiar. Dean's statement is that early on Sunday morning his wife having left the bed-room, he thought he heard thieves in the house, and taking a revolver, he fired it at the first person he met on the stairs, which unfortunately happened to be his wife. The woman was hit in the arm, and it is said that no medical man was sent for until fourteen hours after the occurrence, when the wound had assumed a dangerous aspect.—The Duke of Montrose, while staying at an hotel at Newcastle, has been robbed of his dressing case containing valuables worth 200*l.*—The Royal Court of Jersey has affirmed the validity of a marriage with a deceased wife's sister in the case of a widow. It appears that she was the third wife of her deceased husband, her sister having been the second wife, and that she sued for her dower. The claim was disputed on the ground of the illegality of her marriage. It was argued that as Lord Lyndhurst's Act, which prohibited such marriages, had not been registered in Jersey, the law had no force in that island. This view was held by the Court, and judgment was given for the widow.

A Compendious Vesuvian Library has been formed by Signor Palmieri in his famous Observatory on the slopes of the volcano, every work relating in any degree to the history of the mountain and written in any tongue having been collected by the energetic Italian. The Observatory has occupied its present perilous position for over thirty years, having been established by King Bomba of Naples.

The Blind Congress at Paris.——The Congress, which has just concluded its sittings at Paris, to consider the best means of improving the condition of the blind, is not the least interesting of those which have been held in connection with the Paris Exhibition. The proportion of the blind to the seeing in Western Europe is about 1 in 1,000, but although this proportion may seem small the actual number of blind is considerable, being about 30,000 in England, 40,000 in France, &c. Putting philanthropy aside, it is a matter of great national importance that these people should receive the kind of education which will fit them to add something to the national wealth and well-being. The first question discussed was the best system of embossed printing, and this was decided nearly unanimously in favour of the Braille system, which has this great recommendation, that it is easily written, and that such writing is extremely legible by touch. Indeed, the Congress in this decision has done little more than record the fact that there is scarcely a blind institution in Europe, and few in other parts of the world, where this excellent educational system is not more or less used. The next most important question decided was that the best mode of educating the numerous blind children who cannot gain admission into institutions is to establish day schools where they may learn the best methods of education by touch, while at the same time they should be encouraged to attend ordinary schools for the seeing. This plan has long been followed by the Indigent Blind Visiting Society of London, and has been found to work very well. A third decision arrived at was the desirability of forming a Society in France similar in scope to the British and Foreign Blind Association, which has already shown how much may be done towards promoting better methods of education. It is well occasionally to pause and see what progress has been made in any particular subject, and such Congresses are useful in drawing public attention to matters which are a little removed from ordinary observation.

A SHIP BESET BY ICE

As Cape Horn extends beyond lat. 55°S., homeward-bound vessels from Australia and New Zealand are compelled to pass through high southern latitudes, where icebergs are not an unusual spectacle. But this phenomenon is chiefly observable during the summer season, when the icebergs have been loosened by the warmth of the sun from their original habitat, and when they are floated by winds and currents towards the Equator until they are melted. The dangers of collision are, at this time of year, lessened by the length of the days, and during winter time, fortunately, the bergs are usually fast frozen up in the rarely-visited regions within the Antarctic Circle. There are, however, exceptions to this rule, ice is sometimes met with in the depth of winter; the writer of these lines came home in a vessel, the Swiftsure, which was for several days beset by ice off the Horn, in July, 1861, and now we have a similar experience to record of the New Zealand Shipping Company's ship Waikato, on her voyage from Canterbury, N.Z., to London. On the 25th July last, in lat. 57° S., long. 58° W., after passing several large icebergs (one about two miles long and several hundred feet high), the Waikato was completely surrounded by pack ice, but by picking out a place where the pieces were smallest, she got through into clear water. At noon, however, the captain of another vessel informed Captain Worster of the Waikato, that there was another barrier of pack ice to the north, and soon afterwards the latter vessel came in sight of it. As night was coming on, and the only clear passage visible was right to windward, Captain Worster resolved, if possible, to keep his vessel in the space between the two barriers until daylight. This was no easy undertaking, as the night was sixteen hours long, and there were every now and then very heavy snow squalls. During these squalls the vessel struck against a great many pieces of ice, and twice went through a barrier, but fortunately kept clear of the bergs. There were three other vessels in the ice at the same time. "At daylight on Friday, July 26th," says Captain Worster, "I found myself close to a large barrier of pack ice, with great quantities of pieces, large and small, all round us. As one of the ships in company, the Ellerslie, from Callao (this vessel is long overdue, and is supposed to be lost), had gone through the barrier, I determined to try to get through also. I did not like the idea of remaining in the ice another night, especially as the weather began to look threatening. I, therefore, steered for the pack, and picking out a place where the pieces appeared smallest, got through, though not without a

After getting through we had comparatively clear water, and on the following day not a particle of ice was to be seen. "DREADNOUGHT" SEAMEN'S HOSPITAL, GREENWICH.——During the quarter ending September 30, 349 seamen have been admitted to the hospital as in-patients from British and foreign ships, of which number 74 came from the port of London, 21 from Liverpool, 24 from Glasgow, 8 from Newcastle, 8 from Hartlepool, and 7 each from Shields and Sunderland. In addition to the British seamen, 80 sailors of different nationalities were benefited. We are asked to appeal for the sum of 500*l.*, which must be obtained before Christmas from voluntary sources in order to meet current expenses.

THE NATIONAL INDIAN ASSOCIATION.——The objects of this Association, which was founded by the late Mary Carpenter, are mainly to create a wider knowledge of the condition of India, and to indicate various practical methods of co-operating with social reformers in that country. The Association seeks to accomplish these objects by the delivery of lectures by Indians and Englishmen; the organisation of conferences on Indian questions between men of both countries; the establishment of Branches of the Association in India, the maintenance of correspondence with the latter, as well as with individuals, and the supply of information and advice when desired; the encouragement of educational work in India (especially for women) by the selection of English teachers, the supply of books and apparatus, and the establishment of scholarships for girls, &c.; friendly services to Indian students visiting this country, by furnishing information as to means of education for various professions, and as to our philanthropic institutions, as well as by introductions to cultivated English society; and the publication of a Monthly Journal relating to questions of interest to social reformers in England and in India. H.R.H. the Grand Duchess of Hesse has accepted the post of President, and takes much interest in the work. The Hon. Secretary, Miss E. A. Manning, 35, Blomfield Road, London, W., will be glad to give full information and to send the printed papers of the Association.

W. C. BENNETT'S NEW VOLUME,
Cr. 8vo., Cloth, 4s.
SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett. "While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing-room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves; he gives us songs of parting—graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' straining under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman

NAWAB GHOLAM HUSSEIN KHAN, C.S.I.

"IT may be interesting," says the Times, "at the present crisis to give a sketch of the career of Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan, the native gentleman deputed by Lord Lytton to announce to Shere Ali Sir Neville Chamberlain's intended Mission. It tends to illustrate the unswerving loyalty displayed by certain sections of our Pathan fellow-subjects—loyalty, unfortunately, not rewarded as it should be; and certainly shows that in no part of Her Majesty's dominions has more unshaken devotion been shown than along the Punjab border.

"Gholam Hussein Khan, whose clan, the Alizae Pathans, have, according to their own traditions, been settled in the Derajat for upwards of 1,000 years, is the eldest son of one Ashik Mahomed Khan, who was ruler of the Tank subdivision of the Dera Ismail Khan district under the Maharajah Runjeet Singh. The country was held under a military tenure by which Ashik Mahomed was allowed the whole revenue of the province, he guaranteeing to furnish the Sikh Maharajah a certain contingent in time of war. On the death of his father, Gholam Hussein Khan went to Lahore, and in 1847, under the orders of the late Sir Frederick Currie, then Resident at the Sikh capital, he, together with other Mahomedan chiefs, attacked the rebellious Bhai Maharajah Singh, completely dispersing his band. The handsome rewards and warm thanks of the British officer apparently won the heart of the Alizae chief, for we find Gholam Hussein Khan a few weeks later earning the approbation of Major R. Napier, chief engineer at the siege of Mooltan. No sooner was that fortress captured than Sir Herbert Edwardes despatched the Tank Nawab to Dera Ismail Khan, with the order to hold the country against the Sikh troops then in open rebellion in Bannu. Their loyal assistance to Lieutenant Reynell Taylor enabled that officer, with a few untrained levies and two old cannon—the only shot for which were stones—to reduce by siege the fort of Laki, which was defended by 500 men and 10 guns. This little-known exploit is, perhaps, one of the finest military achievements in our Indian history. During the siege Azim Khan, Dost Mahomed's son, marched down from Cabul with a strong force, and endeavoured to seduce the Alizae chiefs from their allegiance, but it was of no avail; and, on finding that he could expect no support from his co-religionists in the Derajat, Azim Khan fell back. From 1851 to 1857 Gholam Hussein remained at or near Bannu, aiding his old chief, Major Reynell Taylor, in the civil duties of the place; but on the outbreak of the Mutiny he once more placed his sword at the disposal of the British, and was directed by Sir Herbert Edwardes to raise a body of horse for service in the Derajat, so that the regular garrisons might be detached for service in Hindostan. In a few weeks Gholam Hussein had raised 2,000 men, who were the mainstay of the District Officer on the frontier during the early part of the rebellion. Towards the end of 1857, Sir John Lawrence directed the Nawab to take six troops of his Mooltani Horse to Lahore, where they were formed into a regiment and placed under the command of Captain, now General, C. Cureton. This corps took part in no less than sixteen different engagements with the rebels; and for his services during that period Gholam Hussein received the title of Khan Bahadur, the Third Class Order of Merit, the Mutiny Medal, and a pension of 60*l.* per annum! Many tales might be told of these wild Mooltani horsemen, and of the good service they did in Oude and Rohilkund under Sir Thomas Seaton and Brigadiers Penny and Jones. Perhaps the most characteristic is that, on the first occasion of their being formed up on parade, the rear rank flatly refused to ride behind the front, asserting that they were equal in every way, and, therefore, fully entitled to ride side by side. On the fact being explained that the formation was one for drill purposes and not intended to reflect in any way on either rank, the men consulted among themselves, and finally consented to give way, provided that the rear-rank files should lead every other day. In spite of their slight peculiarities, the Mooltani made excellent Irregular Cavalry, and were as dashing in action as they were willing and obedient in quarters.

"At the close of the Mutiny the Nawab was despatched to Cabul as our Envoy, and remained there until 1863, during which time he did the British Government excellent service. He accompanied the Afghan army to Herat, and was the means of inducing Shere Ali to punish Sultan Mahomed Khan (his own father-in-law), who openly assisted the Mamunds in the affair against us at Shubkudder in 1863. During the five years he remained in Cabul his conduct received the warmest approval of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, who placed on record his appreciation of the wisdom, tact, and loyalty of the Nawab; and Shere Ali himself officially expressed himself thoroughly well pleased with the manner in which Gholam Hussein had fulfilled his duties, naively writing, "God knows there have been few Envoys deputed by the British Government distinguished by so much worth and fitness." On his return from Cabul, Gholam Hussein was raised to the rank of Nawab, and in 1868 he was made a Companion of the Star of India. In the same year he was appointed Commandant of the Army of the State of Bhawalpore; but, owing to a slight put upon him at a durbar before the Nawab, where he, an old and tried servant of Her Majesty and a Companion of the Star of India, was made to sit below many underlings of the Bhawalpore State, he took umbrage and requested to be removed. Lord Napier of Magdala promptly reinstated him in his position of Native Commandant of the Mooltani Horse; and, to show his disbelief in certain charges that had been preferred against Gholam Hussein, appointed him his Aide-de-Camp at the Camp of Exercise in 1873. During the Prince of Wales' visit to India the Nawab was nominated to his Royal Highness's Staff, and subsequently was granted a pension and small estate in the Bannu district.

"On the decision being arrived at by Lord Lytton to despatch a mission to Cabul, the Government of India wisely determined to send Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan as an avant-courier. His personal friendship for Shere Ali and the tact he had displayed while Envoy in Cabul from 1859 to 1864 peculiarly justified this selection. But it seems that, in spite of his diplomatic skill, Gholam Hussein has been unable to avert the coming storm, which he himself predicted would burst if ever a British Resident were forced on the Ameer. It is strange that Sir Harry Lumsden and the Nawab, both of whom have filled the position of Envoy at the Court of Cabul, should have been so opposed to any attempts at imposing a British Ambassador on the ruler of Afghanistan.

"We are glad to learn of the Nawab's safe arrival in British territory. India can ill afford to lose a man of whom one of our best and bravest Punjab officers wrote—'Gholam Hussein Khan is a perfect gentleman, with chivalrous ideas of honour, a peacemaker among his equals, kind and benevolent to those under him. In soldierlike spirit there is not probably his superior in the country.' As long as India contains such men as Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan, and as long as Indian officials can retain their friendship and loyalty, we have little reason to fear discontent within our borders."

Our engraving is from a sketch made by Mr. Sydney Hall when he went to India as Private Artist to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, and the Sirdar's signature is a fac-simile of that affixed by himself to the drawing immediately after Mr. Hall had finished it.

England's Troubles.——There is now little or no hope of peace in the East. Lord Lawrence, indeed, still argues against war, and his services to India were so great as to entitle him to assume an air of even higher authority than he has adopted in this controversy. At the same time, to most of those who judge the question impartially, he seems to leave out the most important element of the problem. Everybody admits the difficulties of the enterprise; perhaps he underrates rather than overrates them. But the question is, Has the enterprise become inevitable? If the Afghans were friendly to us, or if there was no Power behind them which we had reason to fear, England would be only too delighted to leave them alone. There is not, we presume, a single Englishman of ordinary good sense who wishes to add a square mile needlessly to our vast Empire. But if a real danger threatens us, we are bound for our own sakes and for the sake of India to make any sacrifice to remove it; and that there is such a danger is not altogether denied by Lord Lawrence himself, while its existence is beyond doubt, in the opinion of nearly all the highest authorities on Indian subjects. The Russians themselves would probably never think of invading India, but if they were masters of Afghanistan nothing would be easier for them than to despatch against us native armies led by Russian officers, and equipped with Russian money. A disturbed feeling would thus be aroused in India, and we should have to impose fresh burdens on a country already overtaxed in order to secure our rule. The prospect before us, therefore, is a war for our own protection; and although we believe it will in the end save both life and treasure, it will in the mean time put a heavy strain upon us and our Eastern dependency. Unfortunately, if we turn to Europe, we do not find that our experiences in the immediate future are likely to be much brighter. The Russians have not only stopped their march towards Adrianople, but are pouring down troops from Bulgaria into Eastern Roumelia; and they positively declare that they will not leave Turkish soil until a new Convention has been signed by the Porte. As this Convention provides for the payment of an enormous indemnity by the Sultan, it is tolerably certain that the Russians have resolved to remain in Turkey long past the time contemplated by the Congress; and they can have no other aim in doing this than the virtual ruin of the Treaty of Berlin. If diplomatic pressure can alter their determination, it is high time that it were vigorously applied.

Will Turkey Recuperate?——The question is an interesting one, both for the sake of humanity in general, and for the sake of the creditors of Turkey in particular. So long as the subjects of the Sultan continue to be oppressed, and consequently discontented, Turkey will remain a convenient field for the intrigues of adjacent Powers, and the insecurity thus produced will tend to perpetuate the poverty and misery of the country. We might have better hope of Turkish reform if the Empire were ruled by a man who was as much master of his own dominions as the Khedive is of Egypt. The Khedive had the good sense to perceive that, if he followed the course he had been pursuing for some years, he would go to utter ruin, so he has called in Western counsellers to help him out of his straits, and promises to do what they bid him. The Sultan of Turkey may be as sensible a man as the Khedive—Lord Beaconsfield, who ought to know, has spoken of him in terms of the most elaborate eulogy—but is he sufficiently master of his own dominions to carry out any similar project of reform? Is it not rather to be feared that he is the puppet of a Constantinople Camarilla, who take care to thwart his reforming tendencies when they run counter to their own selfish interests? The capital of a country ought to be like a man's heart, the instrument by which the life-blood is made to circulate throughout the body. The capital of Turkey, if all accounts be true, rather resembles a cancer, an alien substance which, instead of nourishing, preys upon the body. The great need of Turkey is a sensible system of taxation. The climate is good, the soil is rich, the people are frugal and industrious. But their energies are paralysed by the wretched and oppressive method of collecting the taxes. For this they have chiefly to thank the bloodsuckers of Constantinople. Yet the financial condition of Turkey is by no means desperate. It is true that she owes a hundred and sixty millions, and has paid her creditors no interest for three years. But even under the present inefficient, yet grinding, fiscal régime, there is a revenue of eighteen millions a year, and, under good management, it might soon be increased. But nothing practical will be done unless the Porte can be induced to enter on a course of genuine reform. Very plain speaking on the part of England and France might conduce to this end. The Turks well know that these two nations really wish them well, that they have no sinister ends to serve, and they will cheerfully endure to hear their rulers rebuked if the rebuke is intended to promote the well-being of the Turkish people.

The City of Glasgow Bank Directors.——The shareholders of the City of Glasgow Bank are receiving a great deal of excellent advice as to the propriety of exhibiting a Christian spirit. It is easy, however, for gentlemen who have suffered nothing to be calm about other people's losses. Those who have been ruined by the hideous dishonesty of men whom they trusted naturally look at the matter from an entirely different point of view. And we are not at all sure that it would be well for them in the general interest to take their misfortunes meekly, for directors are likely to be all the better for seeing that misdeeds of this kind arouse the sternest national indignation. We may hope that several of those now in prison will be able to show that they knew little better than the public what was really going on; but even if they do so they will not have freed themselve from heavy guilt. For they undertook a serious duty—a duty which involved the happiness of hundreds of innocent families—and they acted shamefully in neglecting it. Surely the shareholders of all banks will in future take care that directors are more effectually looked after. Auditors' reports are not always models of accuracy; but the slightest impartial examination of the affairs of this particular bank must have revealed the dire confusion into which they had fallen. Honest directors would themselves prefer that in such vast transactions the whole responsibility should not rest upon them. Meanwhile, the Scotch authorities have displayed commendable promptitude in setting the law in motion against the accused; and intelligent Englishmen are rather inclined to envy the state of things which enables them to carry on quietly the investigations that precede the trial. South of the Tweed the public would have been bored to extinction by the whole story long before the trial came on; and prejudices would have been created when less than half the evidence was known. Might not England take a lesson in this matter from the Scotch?

Gas Shareholders and the Electric Light.——In most cases those persons who invest for the sake of an income, and not for speculative purposes, may be safely advised to hold when a panic affects the stocks in which they are interested. As the panic usually arises from transient causes, everybody who acts thus helps to allay the general uneasiness, and the holders generally find after a time that, even though the nominal value of their property has been temporarily diminished, the income thence derived remains unaffected. But such simple advice as this cannot be prudently offered at the present juncture to gas shareholders. Here the panic is produced—not by political complications or by commercial distresses, all which troubles experience proves to be transitory—but by a belief, which may or may not turn out to be well founded, that a discovery has been made which will render the property of gas companies practically valueless. If Mr. Edison can do all that he boasts he can do, a shareholder had better realise at once, while there is still some doubt existing on the subject, rather than wait until the American inventor's success is so clearly established that it becomes plain to every one that gas is doomed to yield to electricity. In our opinion, however, circumstances do not justify the idea that gas has such a disastrous future before it. The experience of the last century—emphatically a century of inventions—shows that old methods and instruments die hard in the presence of new ones. It took a long time for the spinning jenny to kill the wheel and distaff; steam-horses have made flesh-and-blood horses more in demand than ever; sailing-ships still hold their own pretty successfully against steam-packets. If we turn to the history of illuminating substances, the gas shareholder may find still greater comfort, for whereas our ancestors were only acquainted with wax or tallow-candles and fish oil, we have in addition gas, and paraffin, and colza, and stearine, and a dozen other kinds of light-producers, and yet wax and tallow and fish oil are dearer than they ever were. Then even if the electric light is found suitable for small rooms, its want of heat will still render gas an almost indispensable household agent. We advise gas shareholders, therefore, to hold on obstinately to their shares despite all the sinister growlings of stock-jobbing "bears," and to devote their energies to the encouragement of the use of gas for cooking and house-warming purposes.

France and the Exhibition.——All the world is congratulating France on the success of the Exhibition, and with good reason. Its success has far exceeded anything anticipated by its most sanguine promoters; and the bringing of foreign money into the country is not the only benefit that will result from it. An Exhibition is usually non-political; but politics have had much to do with the triumph scored in the present instance. Had Marshal MacMahon continued his opposition to the national wishes, it is incredible either that exhibitors would have come forward so splendidly or that visitors would have flocked to Paris in such numbers. It was the thorough establishment of the Republic that excited the confidence of the world; and the French will have altogether changed their nature if they are not largely influenced by the universal foreign opinion. The Bonapartiss and Monarchists do not readily profit by experience, but even they must admit that it will not be easy to overthrow institutions which have rendered possible so great a national achievement. There is another way in which the Republic is likely to gain by the Exhibition. Hitherto it has been vaguely supposed that the Republic is not so favourable to industry as a Monarchy or an Empire. This can hardly be urged in future by the most bitter opponents of Republicanism. The truth is that a Republic alone can give French industry a fair chance, for it alone can secure that contentment among the industrial classes which is the first condition of important commercial undertakings. The Exhibition has also brought out the fact that while the Republic encourages trade it is not incompatible with the love of show and splendour inherent in the French nature. In the great celebration on Monday an Emperor was in no way missed. Paris was even gayer and more brilliant than when Napoleon III. made it his chief object to win popularity by magnificent spectacles. It is one of many proofs that Republicanism is adapted to France that it can provide even those elements which were formerly believed to be peculiar to more pretentious forms of government.

Oberammergau at Westminster.——So-called public opinion is not always to be implicitly depended on for judging rightly in every matter, the reason being that even if, as Robespierre imagined, the vox populi were really the vox Dei, it is seldom that the whole people are so strongly interested in any question as to speak out their minds fully. What is usually styled public opinion is merely the opinion of a section, and hence, as has been acutely remarked, it is often just the reverse of the aggregate of private opinion. We think, however, that if the Aquarium manager had persevered in his intention of bringing out the Oberammergau Passion Play he would have had arrayed against him a very formidable phalanx of public opinion, composed of Christians of all sects, and he has, therefore, acted wisely in his prompt and graceful withdrawal. The fact is that the Passion Play, although a survival from a long-past epoch, is essentially a religious ceremonial, and has always been so regarded in the valley (till lately so remote and sequestered) where it has been performed for so long. The mediæval charm and simplicity of the ceremony has been sorely diminished by the increasing throng of sight-seers at each of the decennial representations of the last twenty years, that is, in 1860 and in 1870; but it would become utterly repulsive if transferred to the stage of an ordinary theatre. There would be elaborate criticisms by "our dramatic critic;" such announcements as "Triumphant Success! 154th Night of Herr So-and-So as St. John the Evangelist," and probably a tendency in other quarters to burlesque the performance. It is true that our ancestors went to see Miracle Plays in which scenes of the most solemn character were intermingled with passages of broad buffoonery; but it is sufficient to say, in reply to this, that we are not as our mediæval ancestors, who, in many respects, were simply grown-up children, and were therefore endowed with that peculiar simplicity of childhood which it is so utterly impossible to recal in after life.

The Break-up of Home Rule.——It is highly probable that we shall soon hear the last of the Home Rule movement. The negotiations connected with the Conference at Dublin have revealed profound differences among the leaders; and it is admitted on all hands that the mass of the people have lately taken hardly any interest in the question. Some Englishmen have rushed to the conclusion that Irish discontent is at an end; but this is to take far too sanguine a view. Whether they are reasonable or not, Irishmen undoubtedly dislike England; and many of them detest and loathe her. We, may, then expect, if the Home Rule organisations are destroyed, to see others of a like nature take their place. It is even possible that there may be a revival of the old National party, which will be satisfied with nothing short of a complete repeal of the Union. In some respects this would be an improvement on the ignoble agitation which is now about to cease; the Nationalists would at least have an honest policy, and everybody would know exactly what it was they wanted. That they or any other similar parties could ever succeed no one who has studied Irish history will for a moment believe. Even if England were less resolved than she is to maintain the Union, the character of Irishmen is such that they are incapable of carrying on a great enterprise. This is not solely due to their quarrelsomeness, although that counts for a good deal; it is also caused—to put the matter plainly—by the Irishman's reverence for the interests of number one. It is the fashion nowadays to praise Irish generosity; but the fact remains, as a Home Rule leader has just been telling them, that while they denounce and plot against the Empire they take every opportunity of profiting by Imperial institutions. They come in large numbers to hated England and make a living there which they could not make at home; they crowd into the Imperial army and eagerly compete for offices in the Civil Service. They have not the courage to say openly, "We think the Empire a monstrous injustice, and shall have nothing to do with it;" they say it is wrong, and turn it to the utmost possible advantage. And so it will be in all future so-called revolutionary movements. Meanwhile, by keeping up bad relations with England, Irishmen drive away English capital from their country, and prevent the growth of that prosperity for which they continually envy us.

POSTE RESTANTE.——The fact that we can only express this concise phrase in our own language by some such clumsy periphrasis as "To be left till called for," seems to show that we do not sufficiently appreciate the advantages of the thing itself. "A Traveller" hits this Post Office blot very effectively in Wednesday's Times. Strangers in London who have letters addressed "Poste Restante" are now only allowed to receive them at the General Post Office, and so have to come trooping down from all sorts of remote suburbs to St. Martin's le Grand. Some time ago, we remember, the Post Office authorities declined to deliver letters addressed to initials at post-offices, and now they seem to have carried their repressive tendencies still further. They were supposed to be acting in the interests of morality, as much of the correspondence thus carried on was said to be of a clandestine, and frequently of a disreputable character. But if so, their object in this latter respect has been entirely frustrated, as a number of shops make a very good thing by taking in this species of correspondence. People who want to carry on this sort of secret epistolary intercourse soon learn where these shops are to be found; whereas the stranger in London, who has no reason to be ashamed of his letters, but who simply has no fixed residence, not being aware where these epistolary houses of call are situated, has to go to the Central Office. The same remark applies to ladies and other persons of limited income, who not unnaturally do not wish the correspondence addressed to their own residences. Thus the innocent are punished, and the guilty evade the rules. But are not the Post Office authorities straining at gnats and swallowing camels, while they keep a large staff of clerks at work on Sundays, the chief business of the said clerks on that day of rest being the forwarding of racing telegrams?

SKETCHES IN A NORMAN CIDER ORCHARD, II.

FOREMOST amongst the most important personages of a Norman village is the Curé, who is well versed in all the gossip of the neighbourhood. "I must say, however," writes our artist respecting the subject of the sketch, "he never interferes with political affairs." On the same page is a portrait of La Mère De Mousseux, the landlady of a little country inn; while below is a sketch of an English family who are spending their holiday in Normandy. They have, however, a Breton bonne with them, which, our artist writes, is not an unusual thing even with the well-to-do Normans themselves at the present time. These bonnes, be it said, are exceedingly kind to their little charges, to whom they become very attached, and indeed are frequently somewhat apt to spoil them by yielding to all their little whims and fancies.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION—AWARDING THE PRIZES

THE crowning ceremony of the fêtes attending the Paris Exhibition of 1878 took place on Monday—the distribution of awards by Marshal MacMahon in the presence of some 20,000 spectators, including various princes and other distinguished foreign visitors. The Palais de l'Industrie in the Champs Elysées, where the ceremony took place, is a building all the more fitted for the occasion, as it was built for the first World's Fair ever held in Paris—that of 1855; and the large hall which was set apart for the ceremony still contains the stained-glass windows at either end depicting France convening all nations to the Exhibition, and Equity presiding over the increase of exchange. The hall had been most brilliantly decorated in red and gold, the galleries being bountifully hung with these colours, and the columns being swathed in crimson velvet, and embellished with gilded shields inscribed with "Pax" or the initials of the French Republic—"R. F." Pennons of the various countries represented at the Exhibition hung from the roof, while gigantic shields inscribed with their names were ranged round the galleries. The immense area of red velvet benches beneath also was broken by trophies representing the industrial and agricultural arts; while at one extremity an immense platform had been erected for the Marshal, his guests, the Diplomatic Body, the members of the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies and the chief functionaries of State. Immediately beneath the platform a space had been reserved on either side respectively for the foreign and French winners of gold medals and prix d'honneur, then came an enclosure for the juries, next the general mass of exhibitors, and finally the orchestra, which was composed of the bands of the Garde Republicaine and the 5th Regiment of the Line, and some twenty-three choral societies. The galleries were filled with ladies and other privileged spectators. Although the ceremony was not announced to take place until one o'clock, the stage was filled some two hours earlier, so afraid were the ticket holders lest their places should be appropriated. At a quarter to one the music struck up, the soldiers presented arms, and with M. Grévy, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, began the entry of a long line of distinguished guests, either in the regulation evening dress, or in uniforms resplendent with brilliant decorations. At one punctually Marshal MacMahon, together with the Prince of Wales and various other Royal guests, appeared, and took his seat on the dais, the Prince being on his left, and the ex-King of Spain, Don Francis d'Assisi, being on his right, the Princes of Denmark, Sweden, the Duke d'Aosta, and the Count of Flanders being behind; while Madame MacMahon, with the Princess of Wales, was in a box at the side. Then ensued a picturesque international procession, formed of the regiments which had been sent over by the various nations to watch over their respective sections. These clad in their national uniforms, and bearing their country's flag, formed a most effective feature of the proceedings, as they ranged from the silk-clad Celestials, with their Yellow Dragon, to the United States sailors, with the stars and stripes, from the picturesquely-clad Hungarian to the burly negroes of Senegal, with a perfect Goliath of Gath for their leader. Next came a procession of groups of exhibitors, representing their various classes, also with banners, some of which are said to have cost from 800*l.* to 1,000*l.* After all had passed, Marshal MacMahon made a brief speech, thanking the various princes for the assistance they had rendered to the Exhibition, and congratulating France upon its unqualified success, more especially as at the time that the Exhibition was first proposed France had just passed through "severe trials," while "her industry had not escaped the effects of that vast commercial crisis which weighed on the entire world. Yet the Exhibition of 1878 has equalled, if it has not surpassed, its predecessors." The Marshal was loudly cheered on resuming his seat with mingled cries of "Vive la République!" and "Vive le Maréchal!" and then M. Teisserenc de Bort, rapidly summarised the work of the Exhibition, and MM. Georges Berger and Dietz Monin, the Directors, proclaimed the names of those exhibitors who had been decorated with the Legion of Honour, and the proceedings finally closed with the announcement of the various awards, the President and Vice-Presidents of each group of juries coming up to the dais to receive the crosses and recompenses to be distributed amongst the members of their class, amid the cheers of the assembled multitude.

SKETCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA

"M'NAUGHTEN'S KRANTZ," writes our artist, "is one of the many precipices which rise abruptly out of and about the Peri Bush, and is so called after an officer of Carrington's Light Horse, who lost his life in an engagement with the Kaffirs, which took place on the spot depicted in the foreground of the illustration, and resulted in the driving of the enemy out of his positions behind the huge boulders over the Krantz, which they descended in safety, marvellous to say, although they assisted themselves with grass ropes. In placing themselves in such a position, it is evident the chiefs considered a safe retreat to consist in the inability of their opponents to follow them when defeated. Directly opposite is Murray's Krantz, all around stretches the Peri, the difficulty of penetrating which consists not merely of the extreme closeness of the vegetation, but also of huge rocks, piled and strewn about amongst the trees, but perfectly invisible from outside. Although the Kaffirs are said to be driven out of it, patrols are constantly moving about to prevent any assembling of them, and it was with such a patrol of the Hottentot Militia, commanded by Captain Davies, that I made the sketch."

MAJOR CAVAGNARI AND THE AFRIDI MULLICKS

THE interview between Major Cavagnari and the Ameer of Cabul's Commandant at Ali Musjid is of historical interest. The Mission started from Peshawur for Jumrood on Sept. 21st. It comprised 1,000 persons. Eleven were British officers, four native gentlemen, 234 fighting men, and the rest camp-followers. The cortège consisted of 315 camels, 250 mules, and 40 horses. As it was deemed unwise to send the whole convoy into the Pass until the intentions of the Commandant were known, Major Cavagnari rode forward, taking with him a small escort of the Guides. After considerable delay a messenger arrived, and announced that the Commandant (Faiz Mahomed) would come out to meet the Major and three others at a spot indicated. The Major accordingly, thus accompanied, went forward, leaving the rest of his escort on the ridge. On meeting Faiz Mahomed, Major Cavagnari shook hands with him, and then the two parties sat down, surrounded by a couple of hundred Afghan soldiers. The conversation was conducted on both sides with perfect courtesy; but Faiz Mahomed said that he could not permit the advance of the Mission, and that he had already been severely reprimanded for allowing the Viceroy's Envoy, Nawab Gholam Hussein, to pass. Finally, Major Cavagnari asked whether he was distinctly to understand that the Mission would be resisted by force. Faiz Mahomed replied that he had no alternative if the Mission were pressed. This, and another courteous hand-shaking, terminated the palaver.

Major Cavagnari, we learn from Vanity Fair, is the son of General Adolphe Cavagnari, who belonged to an ancient and noble family of Parma, who was in the French Service under the First Empire, and who subsequently became Equerry and Private Secretary to Prince Lucien Bonaparte. Major Cavagnari, his son by an Irish lady (the daughter of Mr. Hugh Lynes-Montgomery, of Belhavel, County Leitrim), was educated at Christ's Hospital, and was one of the late East India Company's direct cadets. He has shown himself an excellent frontiersman in India, and on one occasion killed in single combat a notoriously troublesome chief. He has long been Deputy-Commissioner of Kohat (where the incident took place which is depicted in our engraving), he has acted as Deputy-Commissioner of Peshawur, and last year was made a Companion of the Star of India for his services. Although of foreign extraction, he is by birth nearly, by education and training quite, English.

"Major Cavagnari," a correspondent informs us, "possesses a more thorough knowledge and habits and temperament of the frontier tribes than almost any officer living. He happens to be an amateur photographer, and in the course of a Durbar held by him at Kohat a few years ago, he persuaded the principal Afridi Chiefs to group themselves, and thus secured the photograph a copy of which we to-day present to our readers, who may wonder how Major Cavagnari managed to photograph himself with the group. This was very simply done. After focussing and preparing the plate he seated himself, and made one of his native servants uncover and recover the camera. Another month may see these Chieftains either our most useful allies or our most troublesome foes, and we hope that Major Cavagnari may be as successful in grouping them by our side in battle, as at his side in the photograph. Their traditions claim for the Afridis and others descent from the lost Ten Tribes, and this photograph certainly shows a strongly marked Jewish cast of feature."—We are indebted to Mr. Crompton, late of the Rifle Brigade, for the use of the photograph, to whom it was given by Major Cavagnari himself.

ATTOCK

THE small town and port of Attock is situated on the east bank of the Indus, close below the point where it receives the waters of the Cabul river, and first becomes a navigable stream. The fortress of Attock was built by the Emperor Akbar in 1581, to command the passage of the river. It is strongly constructed of stone, and the town which it encloses was formerly of much importance; but has now fallen into decay. On the opposite bank of the river is Khyrabad, another fort built also by Akbar, according to some authorities, but according to others by Nadir Shah. The banks of the river are formed of slate-rock, the surface of which, polished by the force of the stream, shines like black marble. They are extremely high and steep, so that the enormous increase of water in summer, caused by the melting of snows on the adjacent hills scarcely affects its breadth, but merely adds to its depth, which at different periods of the year ranges from thirty feet to some sixty or seventy feet. The bridge of boats shown in our engraving is only used in winter, a ferry being the means of communication at all other times. At some distance higher up the river there is a ford, which, however, is seldom used on account of the extreme coldness of the water and the swiftness of the tide. The project of erecting a permanent bridge at this spot, so that the line of communication with the frontier might not be interrupted, has for some years occupied the attention of the Indian Government. Lord Napier of Magdala, when a Major in the Bengal Engineers, designed an iron suspension bridge and submitted the plans; but, for some reason or other, the suggestion was never carried out.

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——Sir Stafford Northcote has made several public appearances during the past week at Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and other places, but his speeches have contained no very startling statements. He defends the acquisition of Cyprus on the ground that it will enable us to teach the Turks by force of example what reforms are expected of them, and, setting aside the military expenditure, he considers that the administration of the island will cost us nothing. The Afghan difficulty is, he thinks, the only cloud on the horizon in regard to foreign affairs, and he of course considers that the sending of our Envoy to Cabul was a reasonable measure, considering that Russia's agent had already been received there. With regard to our financial position, he draws comfort from the reflection that the taxpayers are now paying much less per year than in 1856, and he repudiates responsibility for the annual increase of expenditure, which he points out is the necessary result of legislation effected when the Liberals held the reins of power. The final speech of the series was delivered on Wednesday at Dudley, for which place Sir Stafford first sat in Parliament. After acknowledging his indebtedness to the borough for starting him on his political career he contrasted the present condition of the country with what it was at the close of the Crimean War, arguing that the nation had made a steady advance, not only in political intelligence and power, but also in comfort, education, and independence. He repudiated all plea of "stumping the country," declaring that he had only consented to visit the Midlands because he wished to give pleasure to those who invited him, and because he thought it sound and healthy that Ministers and public men should go amongst the constituencies and have a little political talk with them.—Mr. Chamberlain, on the other hand, takes quite another view of affairs. Never in this generation, he declares, has the political horizon looked darker both abroad and at home. Our Plenipotentiaries have been to Berlin; they have left Europe disturbed; they have irritated France and Italy, and have betrayed the cause of Greece. The Government, too, have wilfully courted rebuff from a semi-barbarous potentate. Trade was bad; but no sooner did it revive than industry was paralysed by fresh outbursts of the disastrous policy of the Government.—Mr. Gladstone (who, by the bye, has just declared the open condition of his mind with regard to Spiritualism) is to address his constituents on the 16th prox., so that he may reply to the Premier's speech at the Guildhall banquet on the 9th.—Lord Rosebery, speaking at a meeting of Liberals at Aberdeen, condemned the acquisition of Cyprus and the engagement which we had entered into with regard to Asia Minor, and said that even India might be kept at too high a price.—Mr. Forster was present at the Mayor's dinner at Bradford on Tuesday, and though he avoided general politics in his speech, he managed to have a slap at the Government by saying that during last Session the House of Commons sat up night after night to try and find out what the Government were doing, but were unable to succeed until the things had been accomplished.—The Peace Society have issued an address calling upon their friends to use whatever power and influence they possess to prevent the country being hurried into a war of aggression, for which the only justification pleaded is a selfish regard to interests which, in their solemn belief, would be far more imperilled than protected by such a policy.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, speaking at Carlisle last week, said that Lord Lytton had proved himself utterly unworthy to be a servant of the Crown and to rule over India. Day after day we were called upon by the London Press to go and chastise the Ameer of Cabul; yet if he had refused to receive a Russian mission, and Russia had gone to chastise him in the way proposed, and teach that barbarous Power a lesson for affronting a civilised Power, we should have had the Afghans spoken of as gallant mountaineers, defending their mountain fastnesses.—The Home Rulers are all at sixes and sevens. Mr. Butt would have nothing to do with the Convention held in Dublin this week. Mr. Parnell, M.P., presided, and the other Members of Parliament present were Messrs. Biggar, O'Sullivan, O'Clery, O'Donnell, Gray, Ennis, Sheil, and O'Connor Power. The meeting adopted resolutions declaring that "Irish members should be called upon to offer determined and energetic resistance to all the enemies of Irish interests; that the inaction of the Council of the Irish Home Rule League is detrimental to the Home Rule Movement;" and that "the only way to obtain our ends is by constituencies electing only those members who will pledge themselves to sustained action in the House of Commons, irrespective of other interests." The public demonstration which followed was more quiet than had been expected, there being only "occasional fights" during the evening, but there was great confusion towards the close.—One of the Liberal candidates at Peterborough having retired from the contest, in obedience to the preliminary ballot, three still remain, and if these all stand the Conservative will, of course, head the poll. The nomination was to take place yesterday (Friday).

MISCELLANEOUS.——On Tuesday the First Lord of the Admiralty left London for Paris on his way to Cyprus and Malta. He would join Colonel Stanley at Paris.—The Social Science Congress was opened at Cheltenham on Wednesday under the presidency of Lord Norton. There was a Council meeting in the morning, followed by a special service in the parish church, the preacher being Dr. Barry, of King's College. The members afterwards attended a banquet given by the Mayor, and finally the inaugural meeting was held in the Assembly Rooms, Lord Norton delivering an address in which he said that secular work and religion could no more be separated than fuel and fire, for social work and mutual duties were the very substance on which religion was kept alive. He then referred in turn to each of the principal subjects which the Congress would have to discuss. With regard to the repression of crime, the system of prison schools and school prisons was a doubly false idea, by which they had shut up in a caged existence, and lost to industry, a large portion of the able-bodied population. As to education, the effect of mixing the two systems, the eleemosynary and the national, was ruining the quality of both, confusing the course and subjects of instruction, and producing ridiculous results. He thought that the present depression of trade was only temporary, trades unions were the workmen's equipoise to masters' meetings, and it would be well if arbitration could be made a condition of service in every engagement, so that every dispute might be referred to an umpire, on some established principle, such as the fixed relation of wages and profits. On Thursday the Sections met for the discussion of a long list of subjects, which were divided into five departments:—Law, with Mr. Miller, Q.C., as president; Health, Mr. Mitchell, Q.C.; Education, the Hon. G. Brodwick; Art, Mr. T. Gambier Parry; and Trade, Professor Bonamy Price.—The electric light is likely to have a fair trial. The Civic authorities intend using it on the Holborn Viaduct and in front of the Royal Exchange, and the Board of Works will give it a three months' trial on the Thames Embankment. It is also to be provisionally adopted at various other places in the kingdom, notably at Dublin, where the harbour is to be illuminated by four lights.—A fatal railway accident occurred on Saturday at Pontypridd, on the Taff Vale Railway, two trains being thrown into collision by the premature action of a signalman, who admits his fault, and will be tried for manslaughter. Twelve persons were killed, and about forty more or less injured.—One of the firemen engaged at a large fire in the Minories on Tuesday fell from a wall, and was so badly injured that he is not expected to recover. The fire, which occurred at a warehouse in which whisky and wool were stored, burnt furiously for several hours, despite the fact that huge volumes of water were thrown on it by sixteen engines.—The United Kingdom Alliance held its twenty-fifth annual meeting on Tuesday. Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Professor Smyth were the chief orators.—Monday last was the seventy-third anniversary of the Battle of Trafalgar. The only surviving officers are Admiral of the Fleet Sir G. Rose Sartorius, K.C.B.; Admirals Robert Patton, W. W. Percival Johnson, and Spencer Smyth; Commanders Francis Harris, and William Vicary; and Lieutenant-Colonel James Fynmore, R.M.—Mr. James Johnstone, who for some twenty years has been the proprietor of the Standard newspaper, died on Monday last.—The death is also announced of Mr. Ben George George, editor and proprietor of "Peter Parley's Annual," a publication well-known to the youth of both sexes.

The late Mr. George A. H. Holt.

WE have to deplore the loss of MR. GEORGE A. H. HOLT, who was the first Chairman of the Company organised for the publication of The Graphic. He died on Tuesday last, in his sixty-seventh year, having been born on the 25th of March, 1812. His great business capacity and unflinching honesty, coupled with calmness and keen insight, were of the greatest value in giving solidity to the undertaking, and confidence to all concerned during the early days of what was emphatically an uphill fight. In every respect MR. HOLT was the beau ideal of what a Director should be: he accepted nothing without himself looking into it thoroughly, and his whole thought was devoted to the interest of the shareholders. MR. HOLT's early life was spent in South America, his first years being passed in Bahia, and afterwards at the River Plate. At the time of his death he was Chairman of the Buenos Ayres Great Southern Railway, Deputy-Chairman of the London and River Plate Bank, and Director of the English Bank of Rio Janeiro.

THEATRES

THE theatre which was known as the HOLBORN until Mr. Burnand during his brief management conferred upon it the name of the DUKE'S, has recently assumed the character of a cheap popular house, with few private boxes and no stalls, and a programme in which romantic drama is the standing feature. Consistently with this policy we lately had here a melodrama—founded on Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables"—which was picturesque and stirring enough, and was performed by Mr. Clarence Holt and his company with spirit, if with no great subtlety or refined art. The Barricade—such was the title of this play—is now succeeded by a revival of Mr. Boucicault's American drama, The Octoroon, which was originally produced at the Adelphi some years ago, not with the same success which had attended the previous production of the popular Colleen Bawn on the same stage, but still with a fair measure of prosperity. The story of The Octoroon strikes the spectator in these days as a rather hackneyed picture of the wrongs of the slave community in the Southern States of America before the Emancipation; the piece belongs to that class of plantation dramas in which a beautiful female slave is incessantly persecuted by the attention of a brutal slave-owner, generally a scheming overseer, who has contrived to plunder and oust from his possessions a former kind and indulgent master. In this case increased sympathy is sought to be awakened by representing the heroine as so nearly a white woman that no subtle art of chemistry could be expected to detect the black blood, which is nevertheless supposed to be within her veins. Even Worcester's and Webster's great American dictionaries are, we believe, silent as to the meaning of an "Octoroon," nor are we able to say more regarding this mysterious term than that it obviously seems to indicate some eighth degree of removal from the pure African type. Nothing further need be noted of the story of Mr. Boucicault's piece. The revival is provided with scenery of a luxuriant and gaudy character, purporting to represent landscapes in Louisiana, and something of the same attributes may be said to infect the acting. Mr. Wilmot, who plays the part of the ruffian overseer, possesses, however, the requisite strength of voice, and the sturdiness of bearing, and stalwartness of appearance which are absolutely indispensable to a part of this kind in a drama of the class of the Octoroon, and Miss May Holt represents the Octoroon girl with spirit and grace. We learn from the bill that the part of Wah-no-tee, the Indian chief, has been played by Mr. Clarance Holt throughout Australia, New Zealand, and America. Practice, however, has certainly not taught him the value of at least occasional moderation and self-restraint, and some of his proceedings seemed more appropriate to the boisterous scenes of a pantomime than to anything in the action of The Octoroon.

The adventures of Jeames at the GAIETY have been cut short after a comparatively brief trial; and, in place of this unfortunate attempt to dramatise the diary of Thackeray's yellow-plush hero, we have now an operetta, and the farce of Stage Struck, which are followed by a revival of Mr. Byron's burlesque of Faust. Of the merits of Stage Struck, which has been performed several times lately at Gaiety matinées, we have already spoken. The mock heroic performances of Miss Lawlee—a young lady of very remarkable talents—and of Mr. Elton, who is no less clever in various ways, cause immense merriment. The improvised Colleen Bawn scene is inexpressibly ludicrous; and the piece generally is performed with a degree of briskness and humour altogether exceptional.

Miss Agnes Leonard's management of the COURT Theatre has been brought to a close not too soon for the reputation of Mr. Hare's house for high-class performances, or for the managerial fame of Mr. W. H. Stephens, who was ostensibly responsible for an ill-advised attempt to secure for a novice in the art of acting a leading position. Miss Leonard is not without qualifications for the stage, but time and study are required before she can assume so much prominence without exciting unfavourable comment. It is to be hoped that the history of her brief reign in Sloane Square may serve as a warning to actresses and actors who may meditate "taking a theatre," as the phrase is, for the sake of performing parts which nobody but themselves would think of assigning to them. It would be as well, however, that the outspoken advice which has been so liberally bestowed on this unfortunate lady should be more uniformly applied under like circumstances. Her experiment, we fear, may derive some excuse from the unwise indulgence which has been too often extended to ambitious manageresses.

In deference to a strong expression of public opinion, the management of the AQUARIUM Theatre have determined not to vary their "variety" entertainment by tableaux representing "The Fall and Redemption of Man." The performances by the Oberammergau peasants will not, therefore, take place.

Mr. Matthison has published his prohibited play, entitled A False Step, founded on M. Augier's Les Lionnes Pauvres. Its tendency is unquestionably not immoral; though subjects are handled in it which are not of a pleasing kind.—The Winter's Tale, at DRURY LANE Theatre, will be withdrawn this evening (Saturday). In its place Macbeth will be performed, with Mr. Charles Dillon and Mrs. Hermann Vezin in the leading characters.—A burlesque of Proof at the ADELPHI has been written by Mr. Burnand. Its title is Over Proof; or, What Was Found in a Celebrated Case. The burlesque will be produced at the ROYALTY Theatre.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL.——Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's present programme sounds enticing and well fulfils its promise. The entertainment begins with the amusing little farce, entitled No. 204, founded on matrimonial misunderstandings occasioned by needless jealousy. This is succeeded by "Mrs. Brown at the Play," read by Mr. Arthur Sketchley. Both reader and subject are too well known to need further notice. Then follows Charity Begins at Home, a musical proverb, in one act, in which Bumpus the Beadle and the elaborate machinery of which he is the outwardly imposing, though actually very humble representative, are held up to well-deserved ridicule and contempt.—A new vaudeville, entitled A Tremendous Mystery, by F. C. Burnand, music by King Hall, will shortly be produced.

EGYPTIAN HALL.——Mr. H. Liston, whose last appearance in London took place about ten years ago, and who has since made a series of successful tours in the provinces, opened the "Drawing Room" at the above establishment on Monday last with his "Merry Moments." His entertainment belongs to the Woodin and Maccabe order, consisting as it does of the impersonation of various phases of character, aided by rapid changes of costume, and enlivened by songs and ventriloquial effects. Mr. Liston possesses a good figure and a very mobile and expressive face; he has a fund of genuine humour, a quality for which some of his predecessors were not particularly conspicuous; and he is at the same time quite free from vulgarity. The characters in which we liked him best were the hearty old gentleman at the commencement, the Irish peasant girl (this was really a remarkable impersonation), and the two public singers, namely, the nervous gentleman who has to take Sims Reeves' place and who swallows his moustache during his vocal efforts, and the ragged hoarse-voiced denizen of the Seven Dials. The entertainment concluded with a comic lecture on Cyprus (in the character of a Christy Minstrel "who has always performed out of London") the puns and political allusions in which were highly relished by the audience. Altogether, a couple of very agreeable hours may be spent with Mr. Liston, who is worth a visit if only for the sake of witnessing his exceptional ventriloquial powers.

Mr. Stanley's Lectures.——At St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, Mr. H. M. Stanley received a most hearty and enthusiastic welcome from a numerous audience, who listened to this the first of his lectures with very great interest. His topic, on this occasion, was his last African Journey from Zanzibar to the Mouth of the Congo; and though many of the incidents and adventures of that great undertaking have become familiar to the public through the lecturer's book, "Through the Dark Continent," they gained a fresh interest from the quiet manliness and modesty of his description. Not the least interesting feature of the lecture was Mr. Stanley's account of the conversion to the Christian religion of the Emperor of Ugandi, the mighty Mtesa, and his chiefs; and the introduction of a very interesting African, Mtesa's favourite page, who seemed much impressed with his reception. The lecture was most attentively listened to, and was received with frequent and hearty applause.

The Turf.——The old-fashioned and always popular Houghton Meeting at Newmarket takes up the whole of the six working days of the week just concluding, and by the time Saturday afternoon comes nearly sixty races will have been decided during that period. The most ardent lover of the Turf can hardly desire more in quantity, and up to the time of making these jottings the quality of the racing has been good, and is likely to continue interesting to the close of the meeting. Bad fields have been the exception, and many have been unusually large, while most of the best animals in training at Newmarket and from all parts of the country have put in an appearance. The Trial Stakes, with which the ball was opened, saw Kaleidoscope still as fresh as paint, and able too add yet another to the long list of victories credited to him since he won the Lincolnshire Handicap at the first legitimate meeting of the year. The good races, however, which Ancient Pistol made with him, told Mr. Gretton something more than he already knew about the prospects of Isonomy for the Cambridgeshire. The victory of Sutler in the next race, the Weller Handicap, also put the Duke of Hamilton and his friends in high spirits as to Greenback. In the All Aged Stakes, Cagliostro, who was thought so highly of for an important sprint race in the summer, but failed to distinguish himself, at last made a winning mark, and was very nearly doing so again on the second day, when in a Three-Year-Old Handicap he ran second to Tower and Sword in a field of sixteen. The Criterion Stakes for Two-Year-Olds, established as long ago as 1829, fell as it often has of late years to a foreigner, M. André's colt, Monsieur Philippe, who beat Lancasterian, Rayon d'Or, and five others. On this performance be was greatly entitled to be made favourite for the New Nursery Stakes on the Wednesday, but he just failed to give 15lbs. to Japonica. Unfortunately he is not entered for any of the "classic" contests of next season. The Cambridgeshire, which was run for the fortieth time on Tuesday, created even more than usual interest, and on no former occasion, perhaps, were so many horses backed to win fortunes. Macbeth, on the strength of a trial some time ago with Julius Cæsar, held the position of first favourite from the time the acceptances were declared, but at the start Greenback shared the premiership with him, both figuring at 100 to 15, Tallas and Touchet (with Fordham up) being next in demand, while Placida, Start, Lord Clive, and Master Kildare stood next on the market list. Only one, however, of those named gave their backers much hope in the race which ended disastrously, as did the Cesarewitch a fortnight ago, for favourites, Isonomy the winner being hardly backed at 40 to 1. Macbeth was another instance of many in the annals of the Turf of the fallacy of private trials, though per contra it must be noted that it was on the strength of one that Isonomy was so heartily supported by his owner to the tune of a 40,000*l.* coup. Touchet, one of the most disappointing horses of late years, ran second, and La Merveille third, both the latter being trained by R. Peck, who through Kaleidoscope had been able pretty accurately to judge her chances of winning the race. Perhaps the best performer was Hampton, who with 9 st. 3 lbs. ran fourth. Since the inauguration of the race in 1839, when the famous Lanercost won it as a four-year-old with 8 st. 9 lbs., this weight has never yet been carried to victory. The competitors on Tuesday numbered thirty-eight—a number which has only been exceeded on two or three occasions. It may be noted that the six first horses in the recent Cesarewitch ran in the Cambridgeshire, but not one of them could get a place. Indeed, Cesarewitch horses have had but poor luck in the shorter-distance handicap, and only three times in the last ten years has an animal which ran in the former won the latter race. The prophets—if, indeed, their spirits have not been below zero ever since the Cesarewitch—must feel terribly crest-fallen at the result of Tuesday's contest, not one, as far as we know, even remotely whispering the winner's name. But they are a buoyant race, and generally "come up smiling" after the most signal reverses. By a curious coincidence Mr. F. Gretton, the owner of Isonomy, not only supplied the first but also the last in the race, Harbinger, the Cesarewitch impostor, getting the latter position. It may be noted, also, that Mr. Gretton and the Kingsclere stable, after a long series of bad luck, now seem to be carrying all before them, being credited with several other good stakes—a phenomenon which frequently occurs on the Turf. The Dewhurst Plate on Wednesday brought out no less than thirteen two-year-olds; but as Lord Falmouth's crack filly, Wheel of Fortune, hitherto unbeaten, was among them, the interest in the race was largely discounted. The talent laid 2 to 1 on her, and, though she required a little rousing at the finish, the issue was never really in doubt, as she won from Flavius by a length. She carried the extreme penalty, and there can be little doubt but that she would have done the same successfully in the Middle Park Plate had she started sound and well. Probably she is as good a filly as the Turf has ever seen, not even Crucifix, Blink Boony, and Achievement excepted. Of course she will not be seen out again this year.

Football.——The contest for the Association Challenge Cup, the interest in which increases yearly, commenced on Saturday last—Barnes playing Maidenhead. The game on the Barnes Ground was continued till almost dark, and ended in a draw.—The Sheffielders have made a bad beginning of their season, having been beaten ignominiously by Nottinghamshire.—The Westminster Boys have beaten the Gitanos.

Cricket.——The Australian Eleven have got as far as San Francisco on their journey homewards, and are now playing a match at that city.—The English Eleven, under the captaincy of Lord Harris, sailed for the Antipodes on the 17th inst. On the 12th of December they hope to play sixteen of South Australia, and on Boxing-Day, at Melbourne, the Eleven which has recently left us.—The death of Walter Mynn, who was one of the Kent Eleven at the same time as his famous brother Alfred, has recently died at Peckham, aged seventy-five.

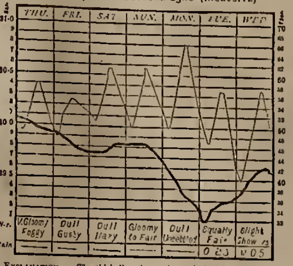
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

October 17th to October 23rd (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——The weather during the earlier portion of this week was dull and gloomy, but very quiet. The changes in barometer and temperature were slight and gradual, and the winds gentle; but on Sunday evening, the 20th instant, a decided fall of the mercury began to take place, and on Monday, the 21st instant, the weather became rather more disturbed. The barometer fell briskly throughout the whole of Monday, the 21st instant, and during the ensuing night a small atmospherical depression passed across the south of England, causing hard westerly squalls and rain. The barometer was at its lowest at about four a.m. on Tuesday, the 22nd instant; but a rise soon afterwards set in, which continued slowly but pretty steadily until Wednesday, the 23rd inst. The winds then subsided, and the weather became a little brighter; but rather strong gusts were experienced at times, and reports from other parts of the country show that the weather is by no means in a settled condition. The barometer was highest (30·06 inches) on Thursday, the 17th instant; lowest (29·08 inches) on Tuesday, the 22nd instant; range, 0·98 inches. Temperature was highest (66°) on Monday, the 21st instant; lowest (40°) on Wednesday morning, the 23rd instant; range, 26°. Rain has fallen on two days; total amount, 0·28 inches. On Thursday morning, the 24th instant, the barometer was again falling fast, with occasional heavy showers of rain, and a strong and increasing southerly wind.

Panics in Theatres—the Use of Handrailings.——Concerning the above subject, Mr. T. H. Hopwood, of 134, Deansgate, Manchester, writes thus:—"A characteristic feature of such panics as the one at Liverpool is, that the fatal results almost invariably arise in consequence of the rush coming from the upper or gallery portion of a building. Now a little reflection will convince any one that it is utterly impossible for a crowd of panic-stricken people to scamper down a public stairway of the present construction without some of their number stumbling forward, and thus causing a block or obstruction either in the passages or landing. And this will always be the case, even supposing the external doorway were as wide as the building itself; the catastrophe is therefore a foregone conclusion, because the mischief is done before the street doorway is reached. But the liability to disaster is increased when the outlet at the inside doorways leading on to the stairway is capacious, and this applies especially to the gallery or any upper story. Any one who has experienced the annoyance of personal pressure from behind when descending a public stairway will conceive what I mean. Under such circumstances there is danger in the merest touch, for, like a row of dominoes set on edge, the fall of one causes the 'knocking over' of those in front. The outlet of the inside doorways of the gallery should therefore be capable of being narrowed, and the street doors widened, this would reduce the number of people on the stairway to a safe minimum, and the struggle would take place near the inner doorways, where the only danger would be a crush such as the British playgoer is used to, thus giving time for those on the stairs to descend freely. But the most imperative requirement in public stairways is a liberal supply of handrails, the width between each of which should be about a yard. A stairway of two yards wide ought to have a central handrail in addition to those at the sides. By the assistance of handrails a crowd may descend much more easily and rapidly than when, as now, the central individuals of the descending mass have no other support for their bodies than their feet and the muscles below the knee. The push of a child against the strongest man, standing at the edge of a stair and 'taken unawares,' would suffice to precipitate him headlong to the bottom if he had no friendly handrail to grasp in his descent. If then the inside doorways are widened, the importance of handrails is much more evident. Given: a thousand people advancing towards a stairway of say, 125 steps—equal to about 40 yards in a straight line, what would be the utmost number required to fill the stairway from top to bottom reckoning four persons on each stair? and the answer is 500. Now the slowest of pedestrians—not enfeebled by disease—could easily walk forty yards in one minute, which is at the rate of a little over a mile an hour, therefore we may infer that with the aid of handrails, the clearance of a gallery containing 1,000 persons would be effected easily in two minutes, even supposing they emerged at the funereal pace of one mile per hour! The above is the engineering phase of the question, and it is one which calls for prompt and decisive action, for I am quite sure that our public buildings are very poorly supplied with the indispensable handrail. Wide as are the stairways of the Free Trade Hall and other public buildings in Manchester, a calamity similar to the one in Liverpool is not only possible, but will some day as surely happen under like circumstances as that a gun properly loaded and capped will go off when the trigger is pulled. Another safeguard would be to have large placards posted up about a theatre, and worded somewhat as follows: 'On any alarm of fire the audience are earnestly requested to keep their seats. The fire brigade is close at hand, and the theatre can be cleared in an orderly manner in four minutes. Disorder and crushing may result in great loss of life. Offenders will be prosecuted with the utmost severity,' &c., &c."

The Crucifix which Louis XVI. wore on the Morning of his Execution has been left to Pope Leo XIII. as a legacy from his cousin Mgr. Prosperi, who has recently died.

Dean Stanley, during his visit to America, has been overwhelmed by invitations from Sunday Schools to address them on the subject of his late remarkable explorations in Africa, if we are to believe the New York Christian Union.

The Grosvenor Gallery Winter Exhibition will include a collection of drawings and sketches by the late French artist, Ingrès. Two of Ingrès' best known paintings, the "Sphinx" and the "Source," are now in the Paris Louvre.

King Louis of Bavaria, following out his usual solitary tastes, intends to have a special performance of Wagner's Nibelungen Ring at the Munich Theatre for himself alone. The Tetralogy will be played on four nights, beginning on the 11th of November.

Great Britain and her Colonies have given a great portion of their ethnographical and educational collections at the Paris Exhibition to the French Government to be placed in the proposed Ethnographical Museum. Russia, Spain, the Low Countries, Switzerland, Austria, the United States, China, and Japan, and other States, have made a similar donation.

Icebergs off Cape Horn.——With reference to one of our sketches, last week, Messrs. George Bell and Co., of Liverpool, informs us that the barque Campana, on her recent voyage from Mexillones, Bolivia, to Hamburg, was surrounded off the Horn by immense icebergs. The mate of the vessel, who had been twenty-seven times round the Horn, says that this is only the second occasion he has met with ice.

Ornaments made of the Blood of Bullocks are the latest mania among fashionable dames, according to the Paris Figaro, ladies admiring the peculiar black tint which pervades the ornaments, and which is absent from those of similar appearance derived from the mineral instead of the animal kingdom. The blood is first dried in a sieve, and reduced to powder, and then again sifted to ensure the utmost fineness in the material. The powder is next fired in moulds and powerfully pressed for five or ten minutes, and is ultimately cut and polished to the necessary shape.

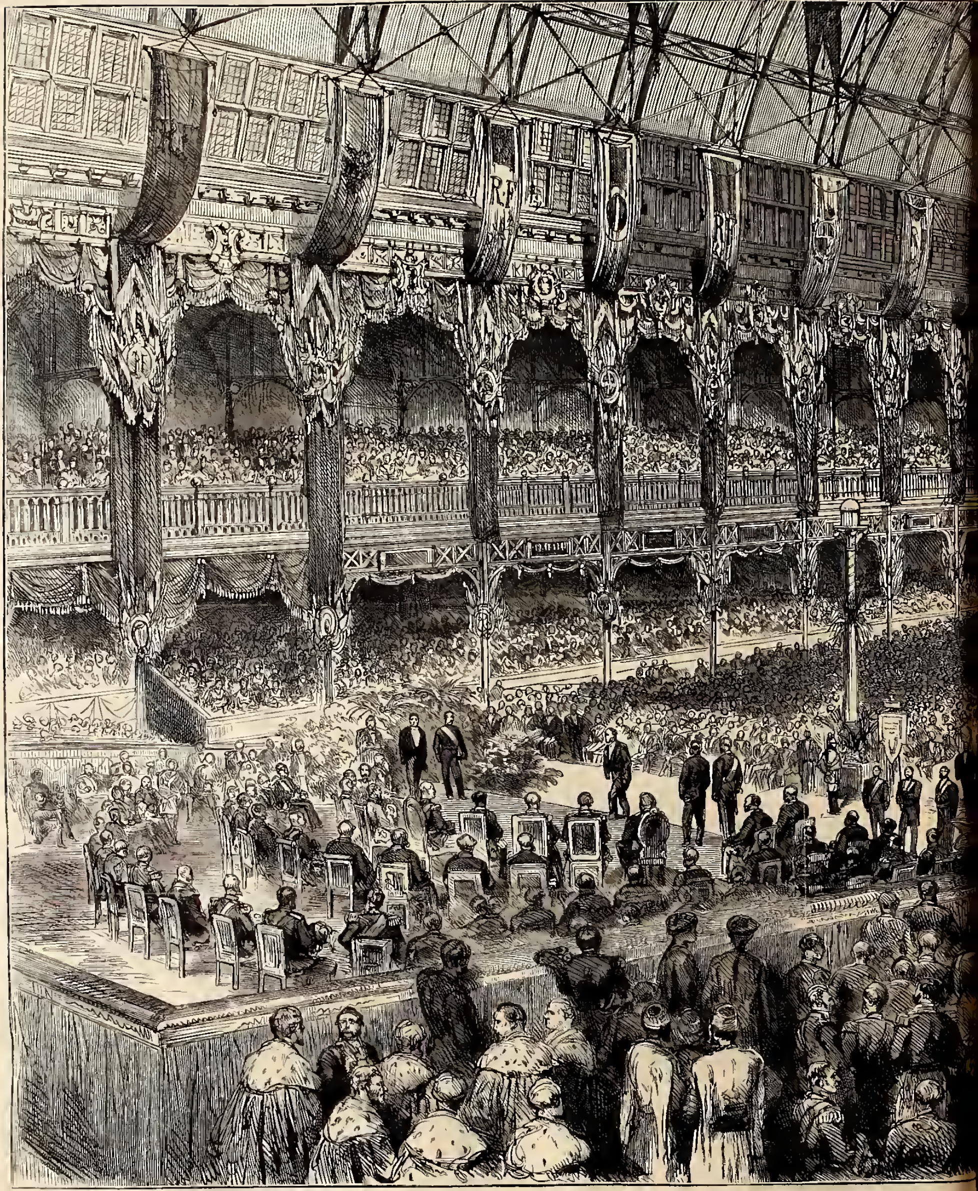
The Sydney International Exhibition is to be held next August under the auspices of the New South Wales Agricultural Society, and will take place in the hall at Prince Alfred Park. Medals and certificates are to be awarded in nine sections, including the fine arts, apparatus of the liberal arts, furniture and domestic articles, clothing, products of mining industry, forestry, chemicals, &c., apparatus and processes of the common arts, food, artisans' sections, and school work. Melbourne follows suit with an International Exhibition in 1880, and a similar display is projected by Queensland in 1881.

British Officials at the Paris Exhibition.——A Committee has been formed, consisting of several prominent Exhibitors, to organise a fund for the presentation of a testimonial to the Staff of the Royal Engineers, the Police, and subordinates connected with the British Industrial Section of the Paris Exhibition, whose services and attention have been exercised during the whole period of the Exhibition for the advantage and convenience of British Exhibitors. Subscriptions will be received by Mr. Iliffe (Elkington and Co.), Treasurer. The list of subscribers will close on Saturday, 26th October.

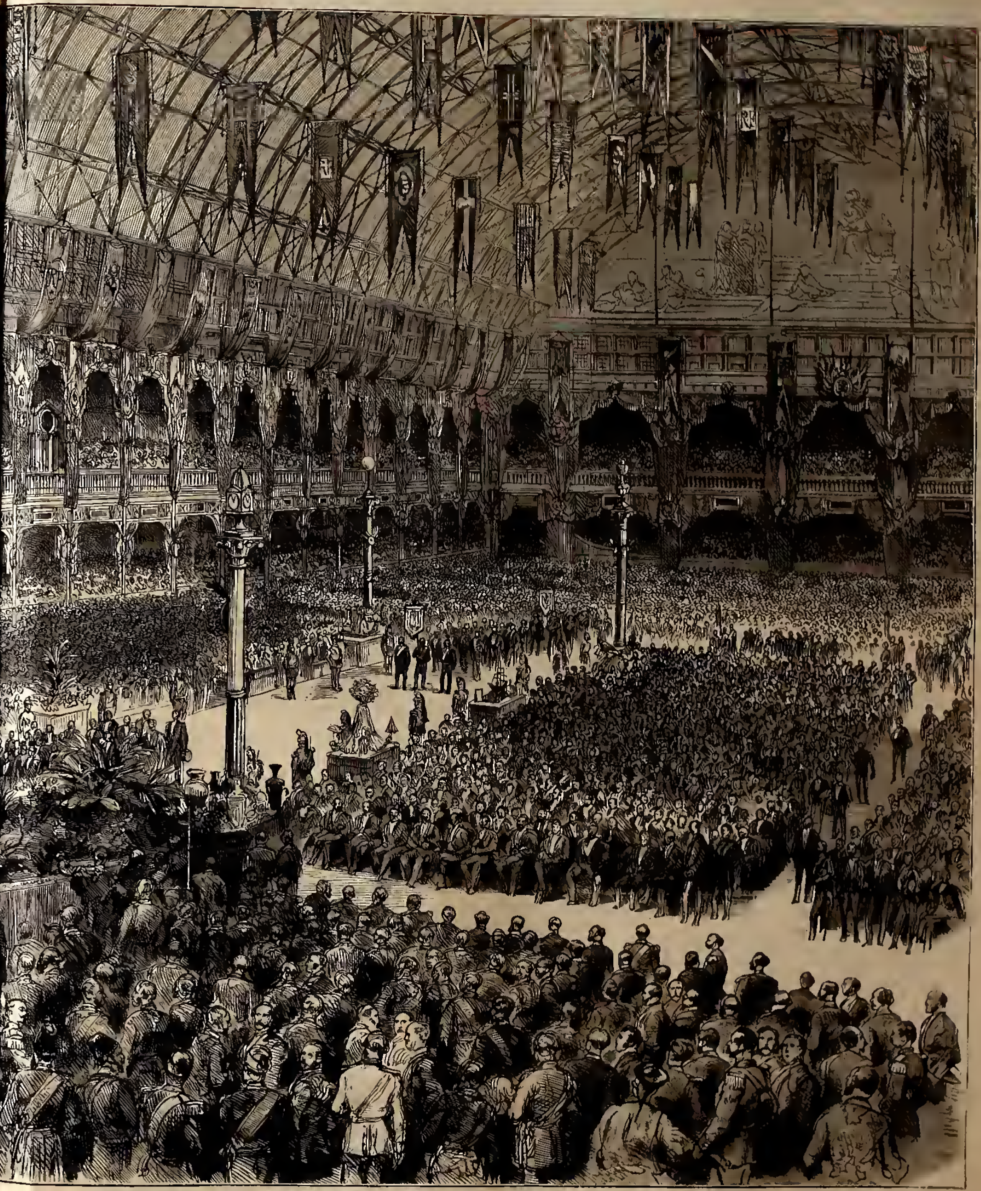
Australian Gum Trees.——A correspondent informs us that the stringy bark (E. fibrosum et obliqua) is much used in the upper districts of Queensland for sewing articles together, and especially opossum rugs. "A friend of mine captured from some Mayall blackfellows about fifteen years ago a beautiful rug of the above description, most exquisitely sewn by the black gins (women). As the country becomes more settled, this particular use for the stringy bark may become a developing trade; if so, the skill of the utterly untutored savage, and use of the commodity, can hardly be beaten by the march of science."

London Mortality decreased last week, and 1,369 deaths were registered against 1,418 during the previous seven days, being a decline of 49. There were 5 deaths from small-pox, 10 from measles (a decrease of 3), 45 from scarlet fever (an increase of 12), 12 from diphtheria (a decline of 5, but exceeding the average by 4), 33 from whooping cough (a decline of 19), 30 from different forms of fever (a decrease of 4), and 36 from diarrhœa. Deaths referring to diseases of the respiratory organs numbered 326 (being an increase of 149, and exceeding the average by 66), of which 216 resulted from bronchitis and 73 from pneumonia. There were 2,558 births registered against 2,358 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 51·9 deg., or 1·9 deg. above the average of the corresponding week of the last sixty years. The duration of sunshine was 18 hours, the sun being above the horizon during 74·2 hours.

Cyprus Wine and Cyprus Cotton are looked upon by the tiny newspaper Kupros, published at Larnaca, as likely to prove very valuable sources of revenue if their production could be well managed by English heads and hands. Hitherto the generality of the native wine has been poor, but the cultivation of the vines has been bad, while under Turkish rule the cultivator could not gather his grapes, even when ripe, until after the visit of the tax-collector, the fruit thus frequently being entirely spoiled. Then the wine was kept in porous jars, coated inside with pine resin, and transported in skins on the back of the mules, the two latter proceedings imparting a peculiar flavour. Wine made by foreign residents, however, was quite equal to ordinary Burgundy. As to cotton, a large quantity is already grown and worked up on the island, both the raw material and the cloth being sent to Marseilles, Trieste, and Italy. The crop, however, like the grapes, was often spoilt by the delay of the tax-gatherers, as it was ready for picking about the time of the first autumn rains. This year there will be a specially good crop, nearly double that of last season. Nearly every Cypriot girl knows how to weave, labour is cheap, and, according to Kupros, there is no reason why cotton mills with superior looms should not flourish in the island.



THE PARIS EXHIBITION—DISTRIBUTION OF THE DIPLOMAS OF HO



OUR BY MARSHAL MACMAHON IN THE PALAIS DE L'INDUSTRIE

FOREIGN

The Eastern Question.——The relations between Turkey and Russia show very little signs of improvement, and the events of the past week appear to point to a revival of English influence with the Sultan. Prince Lobanoff, the Russian Ambassador, has announced to the Grand Vizier that the Muscovite troops will not retreat from their present positions—i.e., Midia Visa, Lule-Burgas, Tchiflikkoi, and a point near Keshan—until some arrangement has been made respecting the refugees who are following the army. It is not true, however, that the Russians are at Tchataldja, as the Turkish outposts are close to the above mentioned positions. Respecting the retirement also of the Russians beyond Adrianople, Prince Lobanoff further declared that this would not be effected until the definitive treaty of peace provided for by the Treaty of San Stefano has been signed. This treaty, indeed, is one of the burning questions of the hour, and negotiations respecting the clauses affecting the indemnity (said to be 300,000,000 roubles), and the withdrawal of the Russian troops are being actively carried on. The Turks, who had expected that the Russians would withdraw their troops when the European fortresses and Batoum were evacuated, are naturally annoyed and disappointed, while the Russians are in no hurry to go, so that the negotiations for the final treaty are not progressing as rapidly as might be desired, notwithstanding that the Turks are very anxious to have the evacuation completed as soon as possible. In the mean time the Sultan is showing every disposition to be civil to England and the English, has entertained Sir Henry and Lady Layard at dinner, has decorated Lady Layard with his newly instituted decoration for women, and hearing from Hobart Pasha that he was suspected by England of inclining towards a Russian alliance, the Sultan assured our Ambassador that he never would conclude such an alliance. The British scheme for the reforms in Asia Minor, however, has not yet been definitively accepted. Much distress still prevails in Constantinople, and very great apprehensions have been aroused as to the prospects of the coming winter, some of the necessaries of life—fuel in particular—are alarmingly dear, while, as may be imagined, money is far less plentiful than usual.

The Eastern Roumelian Commission do not appear to be making rapid progress in their efforts to organise that province, both Russia and Turkey respectively throw obstacles in the way of the Commissioners, Russia declaring that she will not hand the administration over to a Christian Governor until the military occupation is at an end, on the ground that the Treaty of Berlin does not fix a date for the Governor to enter upon his functions. On its side the Porte insists upon having the financial administration handed over to its care. Meanwhile the Russians are still moving their forces southward, and are calculated to have 80,000 men in Eastern Roumelia alone, while General Skobeleff has a large force on the frontier, and 15,000 men are stated to be in Adrianople. In Bulgaria the committee of notabilities, who had been appointed to test the qualifications of the various candidates for the princely throne, have chosen General Ignatieff—the Princes of Servia and of Montenegro having been rejected as likely to be objectionable to Russia and Austria, the Roumanian Minister, Bratiano, as displeasing to Russia, the Servian Minister, Ristics, as obnoxious to Austria, and Prince Louis of Battenberg as not possessing the necessary experience. That the eminent Russian diplomatist who has obtained their suffrages could please any other nation than Russia does not appear to have entered their heads. The nomination will have to be confirmed by the Bulgarian National Assembly, which is shortly expected to meet.

In Bosnia and the Herzegovina, Austria continues to consolidate her rule, and is arranging for the repatriation of the refugees, whom she has been supporting ever since the beginning of the insurrection in 1876, while General Reinländer has occupied the fortress of Kladus on the Bosna-Croatian frontier. The Bosnian refugees in Servia have sent an address to Prince Gortchakoff bitterly complaining of the Austrian "atrocities," which have driven 6,000 Bosnians from hearth and home. The conduct of Austria which, "entrusted with the mission of restoring peace and order, has only destroyed the dwellings of peaceful inhabitants, and let loose the fury of civil war," is contrasted with that of Russia, "who has spilt her blood for the equality of all Christians living under the Turkish rule," and Russia is accordingly urged to interfere and stop the advance of Austria. To turn to Roumania, there has been a triumphal entry of the troops into Bucharest, which enthusiastically celebrated an event that has not occurred during the past three centuries. Bessarabia has been formally handed over to the Russians, according to the report of the new Governor, M. Schebeka, "amid the unbounded enthusiasm of the inhabitants," and the Roumanian Ministers are now devoting all their energies to the organisation of their recent acquisition the Dobrudscha, which is already being occupied by Roumanian troops. In Albania the chiefs of the League repudiate all responsibility in the murder of Mehemet Ali, whose death they ascribe to the excesses of a band of outlaws. This somewhat palpably lame excuse will probably be accepted by the Porte, which has too much on its hands just now to risk a conflict with these hardy mountaineers. As for the Cretan difficulty, Ghazi Ahmed Mukhtar, who was despatched by the Porte to come to terms with the rebellious islanders, has succeeded in his mission, and an arrangement has now been signed by both parties and ratified by the Sultan with one unimportant alteration.

France.——Paris has been wholly occupied with the closing festivities in honour of the Exhibition, and both on Sunday and Monday held high holiday. The streets were gaily decorated with bunting, and on Sunday afternoon there were free performances at eight of the principal theatres, which were attended by upwards of twenty thousand persons, many of whom waited en queue the whole of the night in order to secure good places. Complete order prevailed everywhere, but the aspect of the Opera House during the performance is said to have been most singular. "The Opera," writes the Correspondent of The Times, "never had such an audience as it had to-day. The most luxurious building in Paris was thronged with men in blouses and women in white caps or bareheaded, who, during the intervals between the acts, promenaded up and down the sumptuous corridors and lounged in the balcony. Such a juxtaposition of wealth and indigence has not been seen in Paris, except when revolutionary mobs have taken Royal and Legislative Palaces by storm." At the close of the second act of William Tell—which piece had been selected for the occasion—the "Marseillaise" was loudly demanded, and at once played by the orchestra. Notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, the streets were densely thronged. We have elsewhere given an account of Monday's ceremony of awarding the prizes at the Palais de l'Industrie, but we may mention that the Marshal's speech has given great satisfaction to the Republicans, and has proportionately annoyed the Conservatives, who do not like the President's frank acknowledgement that France has prospered under the Republic, while the fact that the sentiments the Marshal expressed were spontaneous, and not the inspiration of a Republican Cabinet, give them additional value in the eyes of the public in general. To return to the festivities. There were illuminations and popular fireworks on both Sunday and Monday evenings, while on Tuesday night there was a grand ball at Versailles, in the celebrated Galérie des Glaces. Ten thousand invitations were issued, and the Park, illuminated a giorno by the electric light, was thrown open to the general public. The arrangements for admitting the guests, however, were exceedingly bad, some 2,000 persons having to return to Paris without gaining an entrance, while hundreds of ladies with low-necked dresses were compelled to wander about the courtyard, searching for their carriages, not being allowed to stand under the shelter of the corridor by the attendants. On the same day a deputation of British Commissioners, headed by Lord Granville, presented an address to the Prince of Wales, thanking him for his active participation in the "multifarious, onerous, and frequently difficult duties of Chief of the Executive of the Royal Commission," declaring that, had it not been for the personal example and superintendence of the Prince, the Paris Exhibition of 1878 would, as regards the United Kingdom have been a failure, and concluding by mentioning, in the highest terms of praise, the name of Mr. Philip Cunliffe Owen, secretary to the Royal Commission. The Prince made a suitable reply, stating that the hearty participation of Great Britain in the Exhibition should knit together, even more closely than before, the mutual feelings of cordial friendship which so happily exist between France and England, and thanking the authorities for facilitating the arrangements of the British section, the British members of the international jury for their labours, and heartily concurring in the praise accorded to Mr. (now Sir) Philip Cunliffe Owen, whose approaching nomination as Knight Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George is announced. Considerable disappointment has been felt by many English exhibitors that the British Government would not allow them to accept the decorations of the Legion of Honour which the French Government were willing to bestow on them. It appears, however, now, that the British authorities only objected to the decorations being publicly conferred.

To pass to political affairs, there is little or nothing to chronicle beyond that the Budget Committee is energetically continuing its labours under M. Gambetta, that owing to the police having unauthoritatively arrested several asserted Communists, who had without their knowledge been condemned in contumaciam, M. de Marcère has ordered all proceedings against them to be stopped, and that the trial commenced on Tuesday of the 38 persons who attempted to hold a Socialist Congress last September, notwithstanding the prohibition of the Government.

Germany.——The anti-Socialist law, slightly modified by a compromise which had been effected between the National Liberals and the Government, was duly passed last week by 221 votes against 149, all the Conservatives and National Liberals voting in its favour. The Federal Council at once approved the Bill, on Tuesday it was published by the Official Gazette and on Wednesday the law was at once put into force by the prohibition of thirty-four Socialist papers (including the Berlin Free Press), and of various Socialistic associations. Prince Bismarck closed the Reichstag on Saturday, and expressed his satisfaction at the passing of the Bill, declaring the Federal Government were determined, with the means provided by this measure, to make a serious effort to cure the prevalent "disease." They could scarcely achieve this in two years and a half, but hoped for further concessions from the Reichstag.

Italy.——The long-expected Ministerial crisis has come at last, and Count Corti the Foreign Minister, and General Bruzzo and Admiral de Brochetti, the War and Marine Ministers, have resigned in consequence of the manifest sympathy which the Prime Minister, Signor Cairoli, expressed in his recent speech at Pavia with the Irredenta party, and with the right of public meetings and military-political clubs. Signor Cairoli returned to Rome on Tuesday, at once held a Cabinet Council of the remaining Ministers, and on Wednesday himself assumed the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, appointing Lieut.-General Bonelli to the Ministry of War.

The Pope and his Secretary are still busy with foreign affairs, the organisation of the Roman Catholic Church in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the negotiations with Russia as to the Church in Poland, and those with Germany as to a modus operandi between Church and State, the prospect of a serious quarrel with Belgium, the attack of M. Gambetta on the Church in France, and the existing strained relations with the Italian Court, being a series of complicated difficulties which even such astute diplomatists as Leo XIII. and Cardinal Nina will find it no easy task to overcome.

India and Afghanistan.——The Ameer's reply, brought by the Envoy Gholam Hussein Khan, is, as had been expected, stated to be eminently unsatisfactory, and to be couched in an unconciliatory tone, although the exact terms of the letter are not yet publicly known. Thus energetic war preparations are being continued on both sides, the troops both in Calcutta and Bombay having been warned to hold themselves in readiness, while transport arrangements are being made on a large scale. Troops are being pushed on as fast as possible both for Thull and Quettah, while important reserves are being concentrated at Mooltan. According to The Times correspondent, it is now anticipated that there will be three columns of attack, the largest, consisting of upwards of 35,000 men, will be led by the Commander-in-Chief in person, and will make the main advance on Cabul by forcing the Khyber. The Thull column will co-operate by the Kuram route; while the Quettah column will take and hold Candahar. All definitive details, however, are kept secret, as the military authorities are naturally anxious to keep such matters from the Ameer. Jumrood has been strongly fortified and reinforced, and the road to Peshawur is to be thoroughly repaired. All men have been recalled to their regiments, and women and children are ordered to proceed at once from Peshawur to Nowshera. The wives and children of those European officers who are ordered for service in the North-west will also be provided with a free passage home by the Government. The column of advance on Quettah is estimated at 900 British and 3,100 native soldiers, with 4,000 camp followers.

The Ameer, who is also busy with his preparations, is strenuously endeavouring to raise a Jehad, or holy war—hitherto apparently without success; while it is said that he has massed 25,000 troops at Ali Musjid. On the other hand it is reported that his troops are deserting, that the Mohmunds are showing a decided intention of joining the British, and that Ali Musjid is by no means so well defended as is popularly rumoured, while the Khan of Khelat has cordially consented to allow British soldiers to pass through his territory on their way to Quettah. Disguised Russian agents seem to have been busy in Cabul for some months, an accredited Resident is said to have been there for the past six months, while the Russian Envoy, General Stolietoff, is said to have returned to Tashkend with a special Envoy from the Ameer, who at once went to Livadia to see the Czar. As for the report that an Afghan agent has visited Constantinople it appears that the rumour arose through the accidental passage of an Indian Prince on his way from Bagdad to Paris, while the Sultan has told Sir Henry Layard that he has written to the Ameer, calling upon him as a good Mussulman to come to an amicable arrangement with the British Government.

Miscellaneous.——The Emperor of Austria has, in letters to the Austrian and Hungarian Ministers, publicly thanked his soldiers and militia for the promptness with which they responded to the recent appeal for mobilisation. The Minister of War and several of the various commanders have been rewarded with decorations. The Hungarian Parliament opened on Tuesday, when the Emperor congratulated the Deputies that, thanks to the bravery of the Army, the first part of the task cast upon Austria by the Berlin Congress had been accomplished.—In the United States the only news of interest is that the frosty weather is causing a noteworthy diminution in the yellow fever epidemic.—Lord Dufferin left Canada on Saturday.—In Egypt the Nile has broken its banks, causing serious damage.—In South Africa it is feared that Cetewayo will soon break out into open hostility, as his spies are closely watching the British troops. The finds at the new gold fields at Blaauwbank, in the Transvaal, are said to be very large.—In Australia the New South Wales Parliament was opened on Sept. 10, the Governor stating that efforts were being made to bring about a general customs' union, but that the proposed loan of 1,500,000*l.* had been postponed owing to the disturbed state of the English money market.—The report that eight missionaries had been killed and eaten in New Zealand has been contradicted by Sir Julius Vogel.

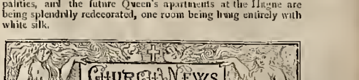
THE COURT

The Queen and the Princess Beatrice returned to Balmoral at the end of last week, from spending a few days at the Glassalt Shiel. On Saturday Capt. Edwards, the Rev. Dr. Taylor, and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach arrived at the Castle, and the two last-named gentlemen dined with Her Majesty in the evening. The Queen and the Princess attended Divine Service on Sunday morning at Crathie Church, where the Rev. Dr. Taylor officiated. Next day Lord and Lady Muncaster lunched at Balmoral, and were subsequently received by Her Majesty.—The Queen has given 50*l.* towards the establishment of a Museum of Hygiene.

The Prince and Princess of Wales continue in Paris. Immediately on their arrival they called upon Marshal MacMahon at the Elysée, and received a return visit from the Marshal and his wife, while the Prince afterwards spent the day arranging Exhibition matters. In the evening the Prince and Princess went to a reception given by the Minister of Public Instruction, where the Comédie Française gave a brief representation. The Prince spent Saturday at the Exhibition, and in the evening went to the Renaissance Theatre. On Sunday night the Prince and Princess dined privately with Lord Lyons. Next day the Prince and Princess were present at the distribution of the Exhibition awards at the Palais de l'Industrie. On Tuesday the Prince received an address of thanks from British Exhibitors at the Exhibition, at the British Embassy, and in the evening the Prince and Princess went down to Versailles, where they dined, and were subsequently present at the fête given in the Palace. They slept at Versailles, and returned to Paris next day for the Prince to attend the fête offered him by the French Freemasons.

The Duke of Edinburgh has also been in Paris for a few days, having left Coburg at the end of last week. He has now started for Marseilles to join the Black Prince, and instead of accompanying the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne on their voyage out he goes at once to Canada to welcome them on their arrival.—Prince and Princess Christian have returned home from Germany.—The Duke of Connaught was at the Folly Theatre on Saturday night.

The ex-Empress Eugénie and Prince Louis Napoleon have come back to Chislehurst from their autumn visit to Arenenberg. The ex-Empress met with a slight accident on arriving at Dover. When landing from the steamer her foot slipped, and she fell, injuring her right cheek, but the injury was not serious, and after a short rest she was able to continue her journey. Curiously enough the widow of another ex-ruler of France, Madame Thiers, travelled in the same train from Dover.—The marriage of Princess Thyra of Denmark is once more reported, the bridegroom elect this time being the Duke of Cumberland. It is stated that the Duke will visit Copenhagen at the beginning of next month, and that the engagement will then be formally announced. The Princess with her mother and father had a narrow escape recently. The Royal party were driving into Copenhagen from their country house, Bernstorff Castle, and were crossing the railway just as a train came up and grazed the very wheels of the Royal carriage. No serious results ensued however. Talking of Royal weddings, the King of Holland is said to be deeply in love with his fiancée, the Princess Emma of Waldeck-Pyrmont. The marriage ceremony will after all be celebrated at Arolsen, whence the Royal pair will go to Amsterdam for the new Queen to be crowned. Grand fêtes will take place at Amsterdam, and there will be a formal entry into the Hague. Presents are being purchased by the different municipalities, and the future Queen's apartments at the Hague are being splendidly redecorated, one room being hung entirely with white silk.



CHURCH NEWS

The Congregational Union.——The Conference meetings at Liverpool were resumed on Thursday last week, when delegates from the Unions of Scotland and Ireland were received. The President, speaking of the Disestablishment campaign, said that it was evident that the next great battle would be fought in Scotland, and that it was his firm conviction that if Mr. Gladstone was ever to return to the post to which it appeared to them the Providence of God had signally designated him, the leadership of the Liberal party, it must be through his perception as a statesman that the period had arrived when the Establishment question, for the sake of the peace, honour, and welfare of the country, demanded immediate settlement.—In the evening several sermons were preached and meetings held. On Friday the delegates spent the day in making excursions to places of nterest in and around the city, and in the evening a Young Men's meeting was held, at which the Rev. A. Norris of Tynemouth spoke on "The Perilous Side of Amusements," contending that the good from theatres in the present day was counterbalanced by the evil, and that modern plays often flung aside the Ten Commandments, and took savage pleasure in outraging all the decencies of life. Mr. Henry Irving was a grand reformer, but the Augean stable was too black with filth to be cleansed with one hand or in one age.

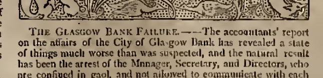
VARIOUS.——The Bishop of Peterborough, in his Triennial Visitation commenced on Thursday last week in the diocesan cathedral, said that the three forces which were now attacking the National Church were Infidelity, Sectarianism, and Democracy. It would be fatal to combat this political attack by mere political weapons; or to disarm attack by divesting themselves of whatever in their character as clergymen might be especially offensive to such opponents, by preaching an undogmatic Christianity, deprecating theology, and secularising their teaching. But the greater danger was in the undue exaltation of the claims of the priesthood, in order, as some thought, to afford spiritual strength to the Church in proportion as her temporal powers and privileges are assailed. The Ritualist excesses, by which certain clergy hoped to restore the masses to the faith of their fathers, could only have a partial and temporary success at the expense of a large and enduring one, more being alienated from the Church than were attracted to it. If any Church could have secured the allegiance of the people by imposing ceremonial and gorgeous ritual, it was the Church of Rome, yet, under her rule, there was more practical and speculative infidelity than in England; and such he was convinced would be the result of the experiment if ever largely tried by the Church here. A narrow spiritual despotism would be established over the few, at the cost of a deep and widespread spiritual revolt on the part of the many. On Saturday the Bishop continued his Charge at Kettering. He quoted statistics showing the progress of church building and restoration, and of education; protested against foolish impatience for great and sweeping changes in the Church; and suggested a scheme for the revival of a permanent diaconate, to which young men should be admitted at twenty-one, but not licensed, except under special circumstances, to preach, and the enrolment of a larger number of lay readers or sub-deacons.—The Home Secretary last week laid the foundation stone of a new church in Kirkdale, Liverpool, and delivered an address in which he said that he did not believe a greater calamity could happen than the disestablishment of the Church of England. Putting it on the very lowest ground, it was one of the greatest institutions we could possibly have for civilising, humanising, and making the people better and happier.—The affairs of the Curates' Augmentation Fund should certainly be subjected to a searching investigation. A poor clergyman, writing to the Globe, tells how he applied to the Society for aid and got no reply for a year; when, on calling at the Office, he was told that his case "would be considered." His character and antecedents were inquired into as suspiciously as if he had been a ticket-of-leave man, and after some farther delay, he was required to obtain the signature of his Bishop and some beneficed clergyman in support of his application, then after a further lapse of three years he received a letter informing him that the Society had granted him 20*l*., but thought it better to withhold payment for a few years longer, as they hoped to raise the sum to 50*l*. He concludes:—"I felt my humiliation only equalled by this evasion; and with what spirit was left in me I instantly requested that my name should be removed from the Society's list of applicants." Perhaps if the Society had not trusted Mr. Marshall quite so much some portion of the 7,000*l*. which he spent in "fast living" might have found its way into the pockets of this poor clergyman.—The announcement that the Oberammergau Passion Play was to be produced at the Westminster Aquarium produced such a storm of indignation that Mr. Robertson has very wisely forgone his intention. Such an exhibition was of extremely doubtful propriety, even in a lonely German village, where it was regarded more in the light of a religious service than as a histrionic performance; but its production upon the boards of a London theatre, before an audience who a few minutes before, or after, would watch with equal interest the gyrations of a ballet-dancer, would have been a spectacle to make the angels weep.—Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, has evidently no intention of hiding his light under a bushel, or of burying his talents in a napkin. Besides being a popular preacher, he is the editor of a publication called the Fountain, which "is given away in thousands" at the door of the City Temple every Sunday. Like other enterprising newspaper proprietors, he has engaged a Special Commissioner, not to go out to Cyprus or Afghanistan, but to visit and describe the establishments of any business firms who are willing to pay ten guineas for such a species of advertisement. This is making the best of both worlds with a vengeance. No wonder that some of our contemporaries suggest that we may before long see the façade of the Temple, and the panels of the pulpit, covered with Messrs. Willing's announcements, and possibly hear the names of this tailor and that wine-merchant worked into Dr. Parker's sermons.

MUSIC

NORWICH FESTIVAL.——This festival has been so genuine a success, that any doubts which may have existed as to the "20th Norfolk and Norwich Festival" being held three years hence are virtually dissipated. The novelty was Professor G. A. Macfarren's third and finest oratorio, Joseph, which, to the credit of Norwich amateurs, was received with no less enthusiasm than attended it at Leeds, in September, 1877. The performance had been carefully prepared, and did honour alike to the leading singers, and to the orchestra and chorus (both excellent), numbering together some 350 players and singers; to the chorus-master, Mr. J. Harcourt, and, last but not least, to Sir Julius Benedict, the conductor, at whose suggestion the oratorio of Joseph was included in the programme. Sir Julius worked assiduously on behalf of his brother-composer, and has every reason to be proud at having introduced so great a work—the greatest work of its kind by an English musician, and the greatest work of its kind since Mendelssohn's Elijah—to his long associated Norwich friends. Professor Macfarren must have been gratified by the hearty welcome with which his oratorio was greeted from all sides, and is not likely to forget the music-loving inhabitants of East Anglia, who thus unanimously conferred upon its author the "freedom" of their chief city. Only a short time ago Professor Macfarren was made "Bard" at a Welsh Eisteddfod; and what future honour are in store for him it is impossible to guess. While such as he, in fact, and the late Sterndale Bennett, spring up among us, there need be little fear of the shoals and quicksands it behoves every earnest musician to avoid. Had Mendelssohn lived till now, Richard Wagner, with all his satanic subtlety, and Franz Liszt, the Frankenstein who created him, their obsequious satellites and incoherently raving advocates, would have been emphatically hors de combat. That the receipts of the Festival have considerably exceeded expenditure, notwithstanding the absence and, to speak plainly, the indifference of many of its most seemingly influential patrons, is due to the earnest efforts of the "General Committee," with Lord Suffield at their head. What the result will bring to the "Charities in the County of Norfolk and City of Norwich" cannot just now be accurately ascertained; but we quite agree with a local paper that the "Patrons," absent and present, should subscribe among them a considerable sum (say 1,000 guineas, which they could easily afford) towards the permanent existence of an institution projected both for the purposes of benevolence and the cultivation of musical taste. What is 250*l*., the estimate already spoken of for charities like those of Norfolk and Norwich, and performances attractive enough to interest all East Anglia? Jenny Lind alone has proved, more than once, that, by the enchantment of her voice, she could not only add wings to hospitals, but occasionally even go far towards building them.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE reopened on Saturday for a series of performances during the autumn and early winter. The opera on the first night was Fidelio, cast very nearly as during the regular season, the only exception being a new Florestan, in the person of Signor Candidus, who, if he did not satisfy all requirements, obtained certainly a succès d'estime. Of Madame Pappenheim's Leonora we have already spoken. Upon Rigoletto and Faust it would be superfluous to bestow many words, but about Carmen, with Madame Trebelli, who replaces the unsurpassable Miss Minnie Hauk in the character of the gipsy heroine—"Mia Carmen adorata," as Don José exclaims after killing her—there will be something to say next week. We have now six performances a week at reduced charges, and with no restrictions as to evening dress. Whether this excess of Italian opera is for the good remains to be proved. At any rate, Italian opera has ceased to be a privileged indulgence for the rich; and, as we have now so few bonâ fide Italian singers, it can no longer be regarded as a thing apart, but must take its chance promiscuously among any other musical and dramatic entertainments. Why the English, like other musically-given people, should not have a permanent opera in their own language is hard to explain. Professor Macfarren, helped out by our poets, from Shakespeare and Milton to Byron and Shelley (not forgetting Burns, Moore, the present Laureate, and our unsurpassable national ballads, English, Irish, Scotch and Welsh), has styled it one of the richest and best suited to musical purposes. Nor can any one reasonably deny the truth of the assertion of that eminent musician, who has set to music both German and English songs in the happiest manner, being as familiar with Schiller, Goethe, Heine, &c., as with his poetical compatriots. Why then, we repeat, in face of the arguments of Sir George Bowyer (who ought to read the letters of Mendelssohn and Spohr about the singing at the Sistine Chapel), should we not possess a permanent English opera? The flying visits of Mr. Carl Rosa are of little use under the circumstances. They merely disturb us (agreeably, it must be owned) for awhile, making us regret the more that we have not a lyric institution of our own. Moreover, Mr. Rosa (the only man to provide us with it) gives comparatively little original English music—M. Guiraud's Piccolino and—mirabile dictu!—Wagner's Rienzi are to be the chief attractions of his next year's London season.

WAIFS.——Signor Bottesini, the famous performer on the contrabasso, and director of music to the Khedive, when that potentate brought out Verdi's magnificent Aïda at Cairo, has lately been married at Geneva, to a lady who will be remembered as Madame Fiorentini, performing at Her Majesty's Theatre (Balfe being conductor, and Benjamin Lumley director), we care not to say how many years ago. No artist ever won more deserved esteem in this country than Signor Bottesini.—Judging from the Parisian musical journals, opinions vary with regard to the merits and actual success of Gounod's Polyeucte. It is said, however, that Mr. Gye has secured the right of performance at the Royal Italian Opera, in which case we shall be able to judge for ourselves.



LEGAL

THE GLASGOW BANK FAILURE.——The accountants' report on the affairs of the City of Glasgow Bank has revealed a state of things much worse than was suspected, and the natural result has been the arrest of the Manager, Secretary, and Directors, who are confined in gaol, and not allowed to communicate with each other, or to receive visitors. Bail cannot be accepted until they are finally committed, even if then. By the Scottish procedure the Crown is, of course, the prosecutor, and the comprehensive nature of the indictment, "falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition," leaves very little chance for the guilty to escape. The accounts have been deliberately falsified for some time past, securities entered at fictitious values, bad debts taken as good assets, and false returns made to the Government respecting the gold which ought to have been held against the note issue. The extent of the falsification shown in the report is 2,103,000*l*. in the liabilities, and 4,680,000*l*. on the assets, making a total deficiency of 6,783,000*l*., of which as much as 4¼ millions arises on four accounts, representing advances to firms engaged in speculative ventures in India, New Zealand, and other parts of the world. The directors, the youngest of whom is fifty-two, were all held in high esteem in society, and took an active part in religious and benevolent movements. Many of them were elders of the Presbyterian Church, and one of them is a deacon; and another was warmly attached to the Free Church, and such a strict Sabbatarian that he refused to take in or read Monday's newspapers because they were printed on Sunday. Mr. J. Nichol Fleming, who was formerly a director, but who left the Board in 1875, is said to have fled to Spain.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND ROBBERY.——William Ohmann Stafford, the Liverpool bank clerk, who absconded with 15,000*l*., and was arrested in Jersey, was taken before the Lord Mayor on Friday last and remanded for a week. It seems that he left Liverpool with a young woman named MacLean and a man named Malcolm Macbeth, telling them that he had just received a legacy. On reaching London, however, he confessed to Macbeth that he had robbed the bank, and asked him to change some of the notes, offering him a share of the "swag." Macbeth feigned consent, and, taking the notes to the Bank, made a statement; but, in the meantime, Stafford grew uneasy, and leaving his female companion at the hotel, quitted London for Cowes, whence he hired the yacht in which he made the voyage to Jersey. The amount given up by Macbeth was 3,000*l*., and 10,610*l*. was found in Stafford's possession, and as upwards of 1,000*l*. of the remaining notes have been traced, the Bank will not be great losers by his defalcations.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——A very important legal point was raised at Bow Street Police Court on Saturday, in connection with an adulteration case. The adulteration was admitted, but the defendant contended that the Act required the adulteration to be "to the prejudice of the purchaser," which could not be held to be the case, when the article had only been bought for the purpose of analysis. Sir J. Ingham said he believed the Lord Chief Justice had upheld a decision of the Scotch Judges to that effect, and adjourned the case for further consideration.—The milkman who, a few weeks ago was sentenced by Mr. Barstow to six months' hard labour for assaulting a policeman has been liberated, the conviction having been quashed by the Middlesex Magistrates, who, however, thought that although it was a case of mistaken identity, the detectives had given a correct and truthful account of the occurrence as far as their knowledge extended.—Two gentlemen named Keene, father and son, have had to pay somewhat smartly for a hasty display of temper. A few days ago, Mr. Keene senior, was taking a carriage drive at Kensington, and his son was riding a bicycle beside the vehicle, when just at the corner of a road the bicyclist came to grief by getting into collision with a cab which was going in the opposite direction. Keene the elder thereupon jumped out of the carriage and ordered the cabman to get off his box, and on his refusal tried to pull him off, the driver's whip being broken in the struggle. Cross summonses were subsequently obtained, cabby being charged with driving to the common danger and assaulting the two Keenes, whilst he charged them with assaults, and sued for the damage to his whip. The cabman was completely triumphant, for the defendants were fined 3*l*. and 1*l*. 3*s*. costs for the assaults, and had to pay 10*s*. for the whip, with 12*s*. 6*d*. costs, while the three summonses against himself were dismissed with 10*s*. costs in each case.—Some strange disclosures were made at Brighton on Monday during the hearing of a charge of fraudulent appropriation brought against the secretary of an Odd Fellows' Lodge. It was stated that the defalcations had only just been discovered, although the defendant's accounts had been audited six times, that the treasurer of the Lodge was unable to write, that the defendant himself was an illiterate man, and that the Lodge had been defrauded to the extent of 167*l*. The Bench sentenced the defendant to two months' hard labour, and expressed a severe opinion at the business of the Society being conducted in such a manner as it was.—Mr. E. Clark, the Edmonton Guardian, who last sessions pleaded guilty to several charges of embezzlement and forgery, was on Wednesday brought up for judgment at the Central Criminal Court. His offence was that for a long time he had altered the tradesmen's accounts, and forged the endorsements to the cheques signed by the Board, pocketing the difference in the accounts. A memorial signed by 500 residents in the district, praying for a lenient punishment, was put in, and a number of well known persons, gave him a high character; but the Recorder, after remarking that Lord Justice Brett and Mr. Justice Hawkins concurred with him in opinion, said that he considered the prisoner's offence was without any extenuation. He had, without being tempted by poverty, grossly abused the confidence which was placed in him, and he should therefore order him to restore the embezzled money, pay the costs of the prosecution, and suffer five years' penal servitude.—In the Holyhead County Court on Saturday the Shipbuilders' and Boilermakers' Trade Society sued a former secretary of the Anglesey branch of the Society for 27*l*. The defendant had been prosecuted and sentenced to three months' hard labour for withholding the money, and the present proceedings were instituted on the ground that the criminal prosecution was no bar to the recovery of the money. The judge said the question raised was novel, and he reserved his decision.—At the Brighton Quarter Sessions, on Monday, two men were charged with stealing a yacht, in which they had put out to sea and got ten miles down Channel before being overtaken. Their defence was that they had taken the vessel "in a drunken freak," and the jury created much amusement in Court by returning a verdict of "Guilty, but not with a felonious intent." The prisoners were of course discharged. The other day, at the Guildhall, one of those peripatetic prestidigitateurs who profess to sell a purse full of money for a shilling, was charged with fraudulently obtaining 3*s*. from a person who had bought three purses from him, believing them to contain silver coins, but in which he found only a few halfpence. The man acknowledged that it was done by sleight-of-hand, and went through the performance in the dock. Alderman Finnis then said that he was convinced that there was a fraud in it, and that the prisoner could not plead ignorance of the law, as there had been found in his possession a printed report of a similar case, in which a man had been committed for trial. To this the prisoner replied that that man was himself, and that the grand jury threw out the bill, on hearing which the alderman remanded him for further inquiries.—A professional runner has been committed for trial for a singular species of fraud, having obtained a prize in a match for which he had entered under a false name, that of another well-known pedestrian.—A verdict of "Not guilty" has been returned in the case of Sir Capel Fitzgerald, who was accused of stealing jewels belonging to "Mrs. Stevens," with whom he recently made a trip to Paris. His counsel urged that the Court had no jurisdiction; but the Recorder, while reserving the point, declined to stop the case, and in summing up left it for the jury to say whether the property had been pledged for a temporary purpose only, or with the intent to defraud the owner of it altogether. Something must no doubt be allowed for the special circumstances of the case; yet it is difficult for the non-legal mind to understand why the plea of "hopeful intentions" should be admitted in one such instance if not in all.—At Chelmsford a precocious criminal, aged ten, has just been sentenced to five years' penal servitude for breaking into a church and stealing a Prayer Book and the contents of the poor-box. Though so young, he had been several times imprisoned, and had been sent for five years to a reformatory, where, however, he behaved so badly that the Home Secretary had ordered his dismissal. Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson, in passing sentence, said that it was painful to deal so severely with a boy of his years, but it seemed the only possibility in the interest of society as well as his own. Several notorious burglars have this week got into the hands of the police. Three men and a woman who are charged with breaking into a house near Regent's Park, and seriously wounding the occupant, a Unitarian minister, have been remanded. The same course has been adopted with another man, who was caught by a policeman just as he was leaving a post-office at Clapham, into which he had broken; and at the Surrey Sessions three others have been sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude for a burglary committed at the Old Kent Road. One of these

He had frequently been seen by them, and would impudently challenge them to follow him as he jumped into his pony cart and drove away.—Seven years' penal servitude has been allotted to one John Bowen, who has been carrying on an ingenious system of fraud through the medium of the Post Office. Obtaining money-orders for small amounts, such as 1s. or 1s. 6d., he erased the figures and writing with some chemicals, filled in larger sums, and then sent them to jewellers and other tradesmen accompanied by orders for goods. The circumstance which led to his detection was that he filled in one of them for 17l. 10s., whereas the Post Office never issues an order for more than 10l.—Major Bellamy, of the 17th Regiment, committed suicide at Shorncliffe on Saturday last by blowing out his brains with a pistol. He had been more than thirty years in the service, and was a great favourite with the men and much regretted by his brother officers. Latterly he had been much depressed in spirits, the result, it is supposed, of pecuniary difficulties, he having spent the whole of his fortune in the Yelverton trial, on behalf of Mrs. Longworth Yelverton, to whom he was closely related.

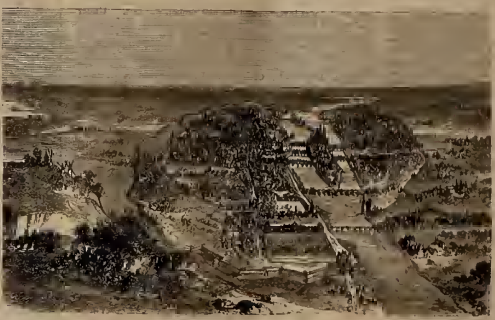
PARIS ILLUSTRATED

THIS year many holiday roads have led to Paris, and never throughout the course of her chequered history have her streets been thronged by so numerous, so motley, and so cosmopolitan a crowd as that which has flocked thither for the great World's Fair of 1878. There have been former Exhibitions at Paris, it is true, and Exhibitions moreover which have been held under the radiancy of an Imperial rule, with brilliant attendant festivities, and with Royal and Imperial guests to grace them, but neither in 1855, nor in 1867, did the tale of visitors attain the figures which have been reported during the past five months. Doubtless this may be partly accounted for by the great facilities which are afforded on all sides for travelling, and which, owing to an admirable system of careful combination and organisation, have reduced a trip to Jerusalem or to Niagara Falls, or for that matter round the world itself, to a mere question of a summer's holiday, and partly by Paris being a species of Grand Junction, where you change for Vienna or Rome, Constantinople or Madrid; but the main reason lies in the intense interest with which all nations have regarded Paris of late years, not simply from the fact of her sturdy resistance to the victorious German armies, but owing to the marvellous manner in which Paris, and, indeed all France, has recovered from the heavy series of disasters which accrued during the Année Terrible of 1870-1. When Jules Favre yielded up the treasured provinces of Alsace-Lorraine, and the German troops peacefully bivouacked in the Champs Elysées, even France's best friends were apt to declare that at last her pride was humbled to the dust, that Berlin would thenceforward become "the centre of civilisation," and take the lead in Europe as much in the weighty matters of International diplomacy, as in the yet important questions of after what colour, form, and fashion the fair sex were to shape their garments for the future.



PARIS UNDER LOUIS XIII.

Paris, however, speedily showed that, although Berlin must for the nonce be accorded a premier place in political affairs, the Parisians were in no way inclined to abdicate their social sovereignty over Europe; does not one of their most popular proverbs state, Il ne fait jamais mauvais temps pour retourner à Paris? and ere long the French capital had to all appearance—save for the blackened ruins which marked the ruthless excesses of the Commune—regained her usual sprightly gaiety, while now there remains little outwardly to mark the difference between Republican Paris and the Paris of the Second Empire. The Boulevards bustle with the same pleasure-seeking throng, the shops are still filled with the thousand and one useless but ornamental wares characteristically called articles de Paris, the same gay cavalcades and humble processional weddings are to be met with in the Bois de Boulogne, the cafés and restaurants are still crammed to suffocation with the most voluble of gastronomes; little red-breeched piou-pious yet make love to gaily be-ribboned nursemaids in the Champs Elysées or the Luxembourg Gardens, while the children play at cache-cache, or excitedly watch the adventures of Guignol, that curious Gallic progenitor of our English Punch. Art, Literature, and the Stage prosper as well—nay, better—than under the doubtfully beneficent patronage of the Emperor; it is true that the pompous consequential sergent-de-ville has given place to the polite gardien de la paix, but this is almost the only external social change between the Paris of to-day and the Paris of the Napoleonic epoch. As, however, the object of the present supplement is to give our readers a brief retrospect of the chief historical and topographical features of the city where so many of them have doubtless been spending some portion at least of the past half year, we will leave the modern city for a while and look back to

ANCIENT PARIS, OR LUTETIA

LIKE London, Paris lays some claim to a descent from Trojan sources, and as the English capital professes to have been founded by Brute, a descendant of Æneas, so Paris claims to have been originated by Francus, Hector's son, who named his new settlement after his uncle Paris, whence, it may be surmised, comes the assertion that the city, like that imprudent Greek who preferred Venus to Minerva or Juno, even in these days is more noteworthy for pleasures than either for wisdom or dignity. The more generally accepted story of the origin of Paris, however, is that the original settlers were Gaulish fishermen, who established a small village on the island in the centre of the Seine whereon now stands the Cathedral of Notre Dame. These fishermen, however, must have possessed some military knowledge, for, thirty-five years before the Christian era, Cæsar in his Commentaries speaks of Labienus leaving with four legions for Lutetia—"The fortress of the Parisii, situated on an island of the river Sequana." Julius Cæsar laid siege to the town, and after some sharp fighting captured it, although the inhabitants did their best to burn it to the ground before it fell into his hands. Julius Cæsar rebuilt the town, fortified it, compelled the Parisii to change the Druidical divinities for the Roman gods, and built a temple to Jupiter in the Cité, another to Mars on Montmartre, and a third to Isis on the hill where St. Germain des Prés now stands. It is thought by some that the Parisii came originally from Belgium, whence they had fled in order to place themselves under the protection of the powerful Gaulish tribe, the Senones. Equally with the origin of Paris and the Parisians is disputed the etymology of the name Lutetia, which some translate from the Latin as a "city of mud," and others derive from the Celtic, "a dwelling on the waters."

THE DOME OF THE INVALIDES

ST. ÉTIENNE DU MONT

THE SAINTE-CHAPELLE

The first really authentic record which we possess of Paris as a town dates from about the middle of the fourth century, when the city had vastly improved, and had become the capital of Northern Gaul. Two bridges then connected the island with either bank of the river, on the shores of which were scattered a few temples and other monuments, of which the most important was the Palais des Thermes, of which the ruins—the most ancient relics of olden Paris—may yet be seen adjoining the Cluny Museum. On the north a wide road led to Boulogne-sur-Mer, while on the opposite bank was the highway to Orleans. The right shore was mainly covered by a forest, the Bois de Boulogne and the Bois de Vincennes being then one and the same, intersected only by narrow paths leading to Druidical altars. The Emperor Julian himself lived in the Palais des Thermes, and in his "Misopogdon" describes the beauties of Paris as it then existed as follows: "My dear Lutetia is built in the middle of a river, upon a little island, which bridges on each side join to the main land. The river does not alter with the seasons, and is as navigable in winter as in summer. The water is excellent to drink. The climate is soft and temperate, perhaps on account of its proximity to the sea; and the vines are of good quality and exceedingly numerous."

Twenty-six years later the Frank invasion, spreading throughout France, reached Paris; and in 500 A.D. Clovis fixed upon the city as his residence; and, if the legend speaks the truth, was converted to Christianity by his wife, Ste. Geneviève, who has since become the patron saint of Paris, and to whom the Church of the Panthéon is dedicated. This lady was originally a shepherdess, and is said to have averted by her prayers a visit from the terrible Attila. Not, however, that Ste. Geneviève was by any means the first saint who had made Paris a home, for some two hundred and fifty years earlier St. Denis had introduced Christianity into the city, and had suffered martyrdom on Montmartre for his pains. During the Carlovingian period Paris remained comparatively stationary, Charlemagne having transferred the capital to Aix-les-Bains; and the reigns of his successors were marked by a series of disasters, the Norsemen ascending the river in their leathern boats, and pillaging and burning all that came in their way. In 885 Paris was once more besieged, this time by an army of 30,000 Norsemen, who, less expeditious than Marshal von Moltke, prosecuted a fruitless campaign for eight months. At the close of the tenth century, however, Paris showed signs of material increase, and the faubourgs of Sainte-Geneviève and Saint Germain-l'Auxerrois were enclosed within her walls. In 987 Hugh Capet, being elected King, once more made Paris the capital of France, a position which it has never since lost, and from that time the city grew apace, and a regular administrative Government was organised for the town, which was presided over by the King's Provost, who was a complete king within the city walls, and by a Prevôt des Marchands, a species of Lord Mayor of the City. Paris now began to develope its commerce, for the vessels of that date could easily ascend the river, and thence arose the arms of Paris which have so often puzzled the casual visitor—the full-rigged galley, and the motto, Fluctuat nec mergitur.

MEDIÆVAL PARIS

WITH the accession of Philip Augustus, towards the close of the twelfth century, began the real architectural era of Paris, as numerous churches, including Notre Dame, the Temple, and the fortress of the Louvre (although the Louvre is said to have been already a royal residence in the days of "good King Dagobert"), together with various aqueducts, gates, and other important works were begun and finished, while the fortifications were still further extended; but by far the most valuable achievement of this reign was the concentrating of the various Parisian schools, which then contained some 20,000 scholars, into a University, which not only speedily rose into world-wide renown as foremost amongst the European places of learning, but by attracting large numbers of scholars from the provinces and abroad, contributed greatly to increase the Parisian population. At this epoch the right bank of the Seine was, as, indeed, at present, mainly occupied by the more wealthy inhabitants, and here stood the merchants' offices and establishments; the island of the Cité was inhabited by more humble citizens; while on the opposite shore little could be seen but churches and monasteries, with well-cultivated large gardens. This portion of Paris lying to the south was called the Latin County (whence sprung the since famous Quartier Latin), the northern shore was known as the Town, while the island still retained its old denomination of the Cité. These three Quarters, as we have said, were connected by bridges, over which tolls were levied, on one of which, the Grand Châtelet, ambulating proprietors of monkeys were passed free, provided they made their charges dance. Thence comes the curious proverb "Payer en monnaie de singe." Philip Augustus, moreover, did not content himself with adding architecturally to Paris, he also tried to improve it from a sanitary point of view, and having one day noticed a frightful stench coming up from some mud in the Cité, which had been stirred up by the passing vehicles, he immediately resolved to have the streets paved, and, summoning the Provost and the bourgeois, he ordered them to have pavements immediately constructed. The bourgeoisie, or middle class, which later on was destined to form a very important portion of society under the name of the "third estate," now for the first time began to be recognised as a weighty factor of the State, and Philip Augustus was the first to grant to the Paris bourgeoisie a legal constitution, notwithstanding the vigorous opposition of the feudal nobility, whose power and arrogance he was anxious to break, and whom he ultimately subdued by the help of the very Communal authorities whom he had enfranchised, and to whom he had granted the favours—hitherto seldom enjoyed by corporate bodies—of legal jurisdiction and the right of coinage. It was in the tower of the Louvre that Philip Augustus confined the chief of his rebellious vassals for twelve years. Under the reigns of Louis VIII. and Louis IX. (St. Louis), a still further number of religious houses were founded, and amongst other churches the Sainte Chapelle was built. The population increased in the same proportion, so that in 1328, under Philip le Bel, the city contained 274,000 inhabitants, and paid a poll tax to the amount of over 60,000*l.*, the total amount of the Paris revenue amounting to 3,000,000*l.* Towards the end of the fourteenth century Paris came to be noted as one of the most important cities of Europe, both from the extent of the population as also from the fact that, as at present, the Parisian possessed almost the monopoly of the trade in objects of luxury.

Already the Parisian tailors were unrivalled for their peculiar cut, the manufactures of gloves, of hats, of plate, and of jewellery were of world-wide renown, while, as we have said, crowds of students from every part of Europe thronged the schools and university. It was about this time also that the Paris Parliament began to hold its regular sittings, while to still further enfranchise the middle class the King inaugurated the custom of ennobling the bourgeoisie whenever a member of the "third estate" was sufficiently rich to render important service to the Court. After the battle of Poitiers Paris was once more extended and refortified, and it was under the reign of Charles V. that the formidable fortress-prison, the Bastille, was begun, and Paris rendered capable of withstanding a most formidable siege, while the architectural improvements that the king made in the Louvre and other public buildings induced the members of his Court to follow his example, and handsome mansions and buildings rapidly rose from the ground in the best parts of the city. Notwithstanding all these improvements, famine and plague frequently devastated the humbler quarters; indeed, in 1437-8, such distress prevailed that the wolves prowled about the desolate streets, while the miserable condition of the poor was not lessened by the extravagance of the nobles and richer classes, whose clothes alone cost a princely revenue. The description of the feminine fashions of this epoch greatly reminds one of the present time, as Robert Gaguin tells us that sometimes they were worn wide and flowing, at others as tight as was consistent with safety. "Occasionally the dresses trail to an inordinate length, while after a while they become absurdly short. Always anxious for novelty, the Parisians can never keep the same fashion for clothing for ten years!" We wonder what the modern Parisians would think of keeping to one fashion for ten years now! In the 14th century, also, pins came into fashion, but this did not prevent the Parisiennes from bountifully displaying their charms or from wearing their dresses partly slit up the side like a Greek maiden of yore, a whim which Robert de Blois describes as follows:—

> Aucune lesse deffermée
> Sa poitrine, pour ceç 'ouvoie
> Comme fetement sa char blanchoie.
> Une autre lesse tout de gré
> Sa char apparoir au côté,

In addition to the vagaries of fashion, literature and art advanced with quick strides during this period, while it was at this time that gunpowder was invented and the first cannon was cast. Under the reign of Charles, also, the number of fleurs de lys on the Royal banner were reduced to three, in honour, it is said, of the Holy Trinity. Under Charles VI. the English, despite all the careful fortifications of Charles V., made themselves masters of the city, whence they were not dislodged for sixteen years. During the reigns of Louis XI., Charles VIII., and Louis XII., there seems little noteworthy to record in Paris beyond the establishment of printing offices and a postal system, although the influence of the middle class continued materially to increase, and Paris became more and more the resort of all who sought Literature, Art, or mere pleasure. The following acrostic is said to have been composed by Louis XII. on his capital:—

> Paisible Domaine,
> Amoreux Vergier,
> Repos sans danger,
> Justice certaine,
> Science hautaine,
> C'est Paris entier.

In the reign of Francis I. Paris began to feel the effect of the Renaissance movement then agitating the south of Europe, the Louvre was partly pulled down in order to be reconstructed, while the first stone of the Hotel de Ville was laid in 1533. Henry II. continued to embellish Paris, while under Charles IX. the Palace of the Tuileries was begun by Catherine de Medicis. The religious troubles that followed the persecution of the Huguenots and the terrible Massacre of St. Bartholomew temporarily retarded the increasing prosperity of Paris.

AFTER THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW

IN this terrible slaughter there perished over 10,000 hapless Protestants in Paris by order of Catherine de Medicis and her weak son, who himself is said to have taken part in the massacre, which was only too vigorously carried out by his fanatical followers, for as Voltaire describes in his Henriade:—

> Quand un Roi veut le crime, il est trop obéi!
> Par cent mille assassins son courroux fut servi;
> Et des fleuves Français les eaux ensanglantées
> Ne portaient que des morts aux mers epouvantées.

Old Admiral Coligny, hardly recovered from a previous attempt at assassination, was first murdered in cold blood by Le Besme, a servant of the Duc de Guise, who awaited the result of the crime in the courtyard below, and then the most terrible massacre in history was carried on without respect to age or sex. The scenes in the streets of Paris on the morning of August 24 have been vividly described by contemporary historians. Nearly 60,000 men perambulated the streets, blaspheming and sacking houses, in which they cruelly murdered all they met. A horrible tempest of yells and shouts mingled with the report of pistols and arquebuses and the pitiable shrieks of the victims, while carts traversed the streets filled with booty or laden with mutilated bodies, which were cast into the Seine. Henry of Navarre and the Prince of Condé alone were saved from the hecatomb. The window whence the signal was given is still pointed out in the Louvre—then the residence of the Sovereign—facing the Church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois. As we have said, Paris took some time to recover from the effects of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, and despite the balls and fêtes given by Catherine de Medicis to obliterate the memory of that terrible day it was not until Henry IV.—"brave Henry of Navarre"—came to the throne that the capital once more began to manifest any further steps towards any noteworthy improvements. The reign of Henry III. had done little to reassure the disturbed minds of his subjects, while the turbulent times which followed his death, the ensuing civil war, and the siege of Paris by Henry IV. in 1594, during which the inhabitants suffered the utmost misery and want, thirteen thousand persons perishing from the hardships, almost achieved the ruin of the French capital. "At the close of the siege," says a contemporary writer, "few houses remained entire and uninjured, the grass grew in the streets, while the faubourgs were utterly destroyed." Paris, however, has always shown herself marvellously recuperative, and no sooner had Henry IV. abjured his Protestant faith in the church of St. Denis, and had firmly established himself on the throne, than Paris began once more to grow apace, and the King became a Royal Haussmann, lending every effort to erase the evidence of past misfortunes. He enlarged the Louvre, and built the gallery which connects that Palace with the Tuileries, finished the Hotel de Ville, founded the Savonnérie manufactory of tapestry, and built the Pont Neuf, whereon stands his statue at the present day. In fact, under his rule Paris was transformed into what at that time was a handsome city—"that Paris," writes M. Poirson, "which before his accession was only composed of wretched buildings, which lacked air and space, and possessed no single quarter or square which the Parisians could show without blushing."

PARIS UNDER THE LOUISES

WE now come to a period when Paris really became the literary and scientific capital of France—a period when the splendour and refinement of the French Court had a powerful influence in forming the artistic tastes of subsequent generations, and whose relics are still highly treasured by all lovers of art. Nor does literature owe this epoch any less a debt, for it was under Louis XIII. that the Imprimérie Royale was created, and the Académie Française founded—that renowned "Forty" into whose ranks it is still the dream of the French littérateur to enter before his career is closed. The zoological collection in the Jardin des Plantes was also begun, the city was bountifully embellished with handsome buildings, bridges, quays, and monuments, Marie de Medicis planted the Cours de la Reine, now the Champs Elysées, and built the Luxembourg, Anne of Austria constructed the Val de Grace, while Richelieu commenced the Palais Royal; once more the enceinte was extended, new and handsome quarters sprang up, while many old districts were completely metamorphosed. Louis XIV. also, after the civil wars of the Fronde which embittered his minority (Paris raised some formidable barricades in 1648), and notwithstanding all his lavish expenditure at Versailles, in no way neglected the embellishments of the capital, the ramparts were transformed into handsome boulevards, the stern-looking gates into handsome triumphal arches, of which the Porte St. Martin and the Porte St. Denis are still prominent features of modern Paris; the Place Vendôme was formed, Le Nôtre laid out the Tuileries Gardens, the great building of the Invalides was begun and finished in eight years, whilst various theatres, amongst others that of Molière, began to spring up and flourish. Moreover, as we have said, these were the halcyon days of literature and art, as the names of Corneille, Racine, Molière, La Fontaine, Boileau, Bossuet, Fénélon, and such artists has Poussin, Le Sueur, Jouveult, and Lebrun will amply testify, while Academies for architecture and science were founded under Royal patronage. And yet all the luxurious splendour of the Court and its Monarch was preparing the way for terrible days of revolution and riotous anarchy. It is true that some little attention was paid to the amelioration of the humbler classes, insomuch that the streets began to be lighted, and a regular police organised, but great misery still existed in the poorer quarters, while at that time Paris counted amongst her population of half-a-million some 40,000 acknowledged thieves and beggars, without reckoning innumerable chevaliers d'industrie who merited no better name. Although also, as we have said, new quarters were built and the old ones improved, these latter were mainly in the richer part of the town, and "old" Paris remained much as it had always been—a town of wretched, gloomy, and ill-smelling streets, such as Gustave Doré depicts in one of our illustrations. The orgies and reckless conduct of the courtiers and nobles also, when contrasted with the poverty of the humbler Parisians, went far to bring about that bitter feeling against the upper classes which later on found vent in the popular excesses of the Revolution.

Indeed, when one reads of the reckless spendthrift luxury of the Court, where hundreds of useless sinecure posts provided nobles with enormous incomes, while the sick in the Hôtel Dieu and the soldiers in the barracks had to sleep three in a bed, of armies officered by young nobles utterly ignorant of military science, of Parliaments banished to the provinces for resisting the King's wish, and of the glorious selfishness of that King who, warned that money could not always be borrowed, replied, "It will last our time—et après nous le Déluge," we can only wonder that the Revolution was delayed so long as it actually was. It is also curious to note the prejudice which in "society" existed against the comparatively honest and useful pursuit of trading. Few persons cared to confess themselves traders, but disguised themselves under the denomination "financiers," who, from their usefulness to the King, the nobles, and the State, were regarded with considerable respect. Sometimes, however, these "financiers" brought their clients more harm than good; for instance, the Scotch adventurer, Law, who undertook to regenerate the failing finances of the nation, and by his wild Mississippi scheme, and his Royal Bank, created a speculative mania equal to our own South Sea Bubble, besides nearly ruining the country by an unlimited issue of worthless paper notes.

Nor was the Revolutionary feeling of the Parisians lessened by the well-known antipathy of Louis XV. for Paris. He would frequently prefer to make a long circuit, in order to avoid passing through the streets. Nevertheless, the King added considerably to the embellishments of his capital, and such buildings as the École Militaire, the Mint, the Halle aux Blés, the Palais Bourbon (where in old Imperial days the Corps Législatif were wont to sit), the Madeleine, and Church of St. Germain were begun, the lighting was still further improved, names were inscribed at the corners of the streets, while the King also also attempted to instil an artistic taste in the mind of his people by throwing open the collection of the Louvre for the first time. The names of Voltaire, Pascal, Jean Jacques Rousseau, Buffon, and Montesquieu show that this reign was as prolific in littérateurs as that of Louis XIV.; while the building of three theatres proved that the popular taste for the drama was on the increase. Under the reign of Louis XVI. the monumental additions to Paris were still further continued, while the walls of the city were yet again put farther back at a cost of a million sterling, a bill against which the Parisians, now growing rebellious, loudly remonstrated, whence originated the famous line,

> Le mur murant Paris rend Paris murmurant.

THE REVOLUTION OF 1789

WITH the accession of Louis XVI., however, the history of Paris becomes more social and political than monumental. The people of Paris, driven almost to madness by the extravagance of Louis XV., oppressed by innumerable social restrictions, and overweighted with taxes, of which the proceeds went to pay for the pleasures of a profligate Court, were ripe for revolt; and although Louis XVI. at first tried to economise, he was finally compelled to issue edicts for fresh taxes, which edicts the Parliament of Paris roundly refused to sanction. For this the Parliament was first banished and then dissolved, but matters were in no way mended. The States-General were then assembled, with an increased number of Deputies—the Third Estate being included—but all to no avail. The Third Estate constituted itself the National Assembly, and in less than a month, on July 14, the Revolution had begun with the destruction of the Bastille. Of the terrible years which followed, our space will allow us to treat but briefly. Suffice it to say that, after various attempts at compromise, the King was attacked in his Palace at Versailles, and brought to the Tuileries, in 1793 he was confined in the Temple, brought to trial before the National Convention, condemned to death, and executed in the Place de Louis Quinze, which had been renamed the Place de la Revolution. The King had been allowed a last interview with his unfortunate Queen and children—prisoners like himself; and bore his fate with true regal fortitude. When the carriage arrived at the scaffold, the King said, Nous voici donc arrivés. He pulled off his coat, unbuttoned the neck of his shirt, ascended the scaffold with steadiness, and surveyed for a few moments the immense multitude; then approaching the edge, he cried, "Frenchmen! I die innocent. I pardon all my enemies, and I wish that France may——" At this moment the drums beat, the executioners seized hold of the King and placed him underneath the knife of the guillotine, his confessor cried, "Enfant de St. Louis, montez au ciel," the fatal knife descended, and the executioner held up the King's head to the gaze of the crowd beneath. Of the aspect of Paris during this period we can say little beyond that "the Centre of Civilisation" presented to Europe a succession of horrible scenes, of which no parallel has ever been known before or since. The whole populace appeared to have been transformed into a combination of childish and yet bloodthirsty madmen. The worshipped hero of one day became the dreaded tyrant of the next, and on the third was executed amidst howls of execration from his former followers. Marat, Danton, and Robespierre successively rose, flourished, and decayed, neighbour denounced neighbour as a traitor to the Constitution, and the denouncer in his turn was declared faithless by a third patriot burning with a senseless eagerness for gore. The women, wholly unsexed, showed themselves even more bloodthirsty than the men, and danced and howled in procession before the carts containing the unfortunate "traitors," on their way to the daily levée the two Sansons held on the guillotine. The worship of the Deity was abolished, and replaced by festivals in honour of the Goddess of Reason, while the streets teemed with every species of riot and misrule. Truly Paris, which Victor Hugo aptly describes as the vast pendulum of Civilisation ever oscillating between Thermopylæ and Gomorrah, had then reached the uttermost point of that iniquitous City of the Plain.

THE EMPIRE AND THE RESTORATION

As may be imagined, from an architectural point of view little change was wrought in Paris during the Revolution, the only building of any note which was finished being the Pantheon; and it was not until the victories of Napoleon Bonaparte secured his election as First Consul that Paris began in any way to recover her right mind, and even then long years elapsed before society could regain its equanimity after the terrible convulsions which it had passed through during the Reign of Terror. When, however, Napoleon I. became Emperor, in the intervals between his campaigns he devoted himself to embellishing Paris in honour of his various battles and victories. Foremost amongst these triumphal monuments were the Arc de Triomphe, at the top of the avenue of the Champs Elysées (which was also finished during the Empire), and the Vendôme Column, while the Bourse and the Church of the Madeleine were among the various edifices which were completed at the Emperor's order. Various new quarters were also built, while markets were organised, and numerous bridges—the Pont d'Austerlitz, the Pont d'Jena—which joins the Trocadéro to the Champ de Mars, togther with many of the fountains, which form one of the greatest charms of Paris, were also built under the Imperial rule. During the Restoration the monumental additions to the city were mainly religious and commercial, the former comprising the Church of St. Vincent-de-Paul, and the Expiatory Chapels commemorating the memories of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, and the latter the immense Entrepôt des vins and various markets; while it was during the reign of Louis XVIII. that Paris was first lit with gas. Louis Philippe, the Citizen King, however, greatly contributed towards making Paris the Paris which we know now. He completed the various works begun under the Emperor, and by his predecessors, such as the Madeleine, the Arc de Triomphe, opened out new streets and boulevards, and by demolishing the intervening buildings formed the Place de Carrousel, between the Louvre and the Tuileries, doubled the size of the Hotel de Ville, laid out the Place de la Concorde in the old square of Louis XV., raised the Obelisk of Luxor on the very place where so many victims had perished by the guillotine, and erected the Column of July on the site of the Bastille. Neither were military nor commercial works neglected. Paris was refortified at a cost of 6,000,000*l*., while Railway Stations now began to make their appearance; the Terminus of the Strasbourg Railway exciting general admiration at the time of its erection. In fact, with this epoch, and, above all, with the junction of the Louvre and the Tuileries, and the enlargement of the streets of the Cité, ended, with but few exceptions, all of what might be called "Old Paris."

PARIS UNDER NAPOLEON III.

It is curious to look down a column of dates relating to the history of Paris, and see how frequently the word "Revolution" occurs. Louis XVI.—Revolution; Louis XVIII., Charles X. —Revolution; Louis Philippe—Revolution. It might be almost said that Revolutions had become almost endemic in Paris, and yet the Parisians were never so happy or prosperous as when a strong hand kept them in order. Take away the strong hand and they became as a parcel of children clamouring for the first new thing that took their fancy, and ending by becoming thoroughly dissatisfied with King Log and openly wishing for King Stork to make his appearance once more. The Republic of 1848 attempted to teach the Parisians sobriety and austerity, but these virtues were far too Spartan-like for the Parisian taste. They had their panem in plenty, but they hankered after their circenses, and when Napoleon III. mounted the throne by that terrible ladder of massacre in December, 1851, the Parisians quickly forgot the crime in all the brilliant paraphernalia and show of the Second Empire, with its courtly festivities and its popular highdays and holidays. Certainly, as far as embellishments go, Paris owes the Emperor a deep debt of gratitude. In a very short time he spent some twelve millions sterling on civic improvements. The most extensive works were proposed and undertaken, the old quarters were ruthlessly cleared away, and old Rabelaisian streets and alleys were replaced by wide avenues bordered with handsome shops and mansions. In all this Napoleon III. was ably seconded by Baron Haussmann, the Prefect of the Seine, who while inflicting upon Paris a tremendous debt succeeded in making the city by far the handsomest capital in the world. In 1855, following the example of our own sovereign, Napoleon III. organised the first Paris International Exhibition, which was visited by the Queen and Prince Albert—the first time an English monarch had visited Paris since 1422, when the entry partook of the character of a triumphal entry instead of a friendly visit. In 1867 a second Exhibition was held, the Czar of Russia, the Emperor of Austria, and the Kings of Prussia, Belgium, Greece, and Sweden being the sovereign guests of the occasion. Then came the beginning of the end, the Parisians with their accustomed fickleness began to tire of the circenses, and to complain of the luxury and extravagance of the Empire. In January, 1870, Baron Haussmann, after showing a Budget for the City of Paris of more than 9,000,000*l*., was compelled to resign, and in a very few months afterwards his Imperial master, overwhelmed beyond all recovery at Sedan, gave up his sword to the very sovereign whom four years before he had entertained with so much brilliancy in the Tuileries.

THE REPUBLIC OF THE FOURTH OF SEPTEMBER

Once again there came Revolution and a Republic, but this time a Revolution without the spilling of a drop of blood, and a Republic which hitherto, morally speaking, has been sans reproche. Paris hailed the proclamation of her emancipation from Imperial rule with all due enthusiasm, but King William and his victorious army were at the gates, and the defence of hearth and home became every Parisian's first care. The "pendulum of civilisation" had swung back to Thermopylæ, and for five months Paris sustained one of the most remarkable sieges of modern times, terminating with a terrible bombardment. On the 18th September, 1870, the last train left Paris, and on the next day the city was completely invested, being amply protected, however, from all immediate advance of the enemy by the sixteen surrounding forts and the neighbouring redoubts. The actual army of defence numbered 50,000 regulars, 100,000 Gardes Mobiles, and an innumerable herd of ill-drilled, badly-disciplined National Guards. On the 16th October, M. Gambetta left Paris in a balloon in order to organise the government of the provinces, and this was the beginning of that balloon service by which during the siege Paris communicated with the outer world —no fewer than fifty-seven in all being sent off. The aeronauts carried pigeons with them, which bore back to Paris despatches photographed down to microscopically small missives, which were enlarged on their arrival by means of a magic-lantern. The readers of The Graphic will doubtless remember the sketches by balloon post which enabled this journal to illustrate the chief events of Besieged Paris. In the mean time the iron circle was being drawn tighter and tighter round the city, and, notwithstanding some gallant sorties, the besieged troops were unable to make the slightest impression on the surrounding army. Moreover dissension reigned within, and on the 31st of October the Hotel de Ville was invaded by a turbulent crowd, who loudly demanded the deposition of the Government of the National Defence and the constitution of the Commune. However in a few hours the would-be rioters calmed down again—at least, for a time. On November 30th, and again on December 21, General Ducrot made an attempt to effect a sortie, but failed, and by the close of that month great want began to prevail universally in Paris, and no fewer than 12,885 deaths occurred during the month. On the 5th of January arrived M. Bismarck's "Psychological Moment," the bombardment of the city commenced, and the shells which hitherto had fallen outside the walls began to rain in the Luxembourg Gardens and the Jardin des Plantes. Then ensued the fatal battle of Buzenval—the last effort of the Parisians to repulse the invader, which cost them 3,000 men, the resignation of General Trochu, the assumption of the Governorship by General Vinoy, and finally on January 28th —the armistice and the capitulation. The Parisians had held out bravely for a hundred and twenty-five days, bearing uncomplainingly the hardships of one of the severest winters on record, and of semi-famine—being at the last rationed on only half a pound of bread but little better than sawdust, for which they had to wait their turn for hours—perhaps for the whole of the night. Horseflesh was a luxury only reserved for the rich, cats and dogs found a ready sale, the ratcatchers of the sewers drove a thriving trade, while even the animals in the Zoological Gardens were ultimately sold for food—elephant's trunk fetching 45 fr., camel's flesh 15 fr., and kangaroo 12 fr. the pound. Thus, on Jan. 28th, the Defence Government having only ten days' provisions left for two million souls, capitulated, and a few weeks later the Germans tethered their horses in triumph to the trees of the Champs Elysées. Paris stood even this ordeal well, and although on the entry of the hated "Prussian" an outbreak of fury had been expected, no untoward event occurred, and the Teutons, satisfied with their two days' occupation, retired as peaceably as they had entered. Not that all the troubles of Paris were yet over, as the humbler classes of Paris, demoralised by the siege and their enforced idleness as National Guards with free rations and a few sous a day, and led by the extreme Red faction, which had so nearly overthrown the Government of National Defence on October 31, seized a number of batteries of artillery on the Buttes Chaumont, refused to hand them over to the troops, shot Generals Lecomte and Clement Thomas, and proclaimed the Government of the Commune. Once more Paris had to sustain a siege, this time from an army of her own countrymen, which only ended after two months' stubborn resistance, the Communists in their despair setting fire to the Tuileries, the Hotel de Ville, and numerous other public buildings, whose blackened ruins for years afterwards bore grim witness to their ruthless excesses. For a time the populace seemed to have had a relapse into their old fury of 1793, women and children paraded the streets with bottles of petroleum firing the houses as they passed, while barricades were raised and vigorously defended upon the entry of the Versailles Army. Two hundred and thirty-eight buildings, including thirty-one public edifices, were destroyed by the Communists, whose reign of seventy-three days is calculated by a Paris writer to have cost the city over 34,000,000*l*.

THE PARIS OF TO-DAY

We have only touched thus lightly on the later history o Paris, as the events of the Franco-Prussian War are doubtless still fresh in the minds of our readers, while they have already been fully chronicled and illustrated in these pages; and we will now pass on to the Paris of the present day, which in less than seven years has almost completely healed the wounds which the double disaster of a foreign and a subsequent civil war had inflicted upon her. Nearly the whole of the ruins have been cleared away, and other and handsomer buildings have arisen in their place. The Vendôme Column is again erect, the Palais de Justice has been restored, the Hotel de Ville is now being rapidly rebuilt, and the ruins of the Tuileries alone remain to testify to the madness which seized the Parisians in 1871. Nor has the Republican Government confined itself merely to restoring the injured monuments of Paris—it has taken in hand the improvements which Napoleon III. had begun. The New Opera House, which during the siege had been used as a vast storehouse for flour, was completed and inaugurated in 1875; while the long-projected Avenue de l'Opera, leading from the Opera House to the Place du Palais Royal, was opened at the beginning of this year, and, as a contrast to our wilderness-bound Northumberland Avenue, is already lined with handsome buildings, and moreover brilliantly illuminated with the electric light. Indeed, there is little Republican austerity about the Paris of to-day, the Parisians seem to have regained all their light-heartedness, and neither on the stage nor in literature can the productions be pronounced any less frivolous or, for that matter, any more moral than ten years since. Certainly Niniche, the now popular play in Paris, cannot be said to be an improvement on the Vie Parisienne, neither is Zola's Assommoir any more fit for drawing-room reading than the notorious Mdlle. Giraud. Neither in the shops can any difference be noticed, except, indeed, that, Exhibition prices apart, things are dearer, food especially, the restaurants having increased their tariff, many at the rate of 25 per cent., while the prices of the bare necessaries of life have risen considerably. And yet when you come to talk to people, to pierce through that outward gloss of levity which seems to pervade all things Parisian, you find that there is no longer the self-confident bumptiousness which used to characterise the old Parisian. He no longer talks of the Napoleonic glories, of the Grande Armée, of the Italian Campaign, or of the victories in Africa; he no longer speaks disparagingly of the Teutonic pickelhaube, or laughs at his zundnadelgewehr; he has been taught a severe lesson, and has profited accordingly; he speaks proudly of the way his country has recuperated itself, but modestly of his army, and admits that there is much yet to be done before France can venture to measure swords with any powerful adversary with good prospects of success. And then comes out the old bit of leaven—the innate longing for the revanche—the half-hidden yet deep-rooted determination that, one day or other, Germany shall be forced to restore Alsace-Lorraine, and once more acknowledge the supremacy, in military matters at least, of the Gallic over the Teutonic race. Moreover, despite the gaudy wares in the boulevard shops, he has become yet more frugal in his habits, the taxes are heavier—and then there is the interest on the debt to pay. This thrift, which is inherent in the French nation, is the real reason of the marvellous recuperative power of France. In times of prosperity the humbler classes rarely fail to put by something for a rainy day, and whenever a Government loan is issued—the bonds being purposely issued at a low price (4*l*.)—workmen and employers alike come forward with their savings with a double feeling of satisfaction, namely, that they are doing a good turn to themselves and patriotically by the State. This was particularly the case after the recent war, when, in June, 1871, a loan of 80,000,000*l*. was twice over subscribed for in France alone, while, when the second loan of 120,000,000*l*. was announced in July, 1872, long queues of men and women waited all night outside the mairies, in order to be in time for the opportunity to invest their money at 6½ per cent. There is one thing, however, that still weighs heavily on the Parisian mind—the disgrace inflicted upon the capital by the removal of the Parliament and seat of Government to Versailles. The Parisian loves his city to an extent of which the migratory Londoner can have no conception. "Ou voulez vous que j'aille?" asked a lady of the writer just before the gates of Paris were closed. "I have never been farther from Paris than Versailles, and I should be utterly miserable." The lady in question bravely sustained all the terrors of the siege, even to boiling down the bean counters of some years old, with which her children were wont to play: and yet, curiously enough, a middle-class Parisian likes his little pied de terre outside the walls, in some suburban quarter, whither he can retreat—a little villa of some three or four rooms, with a few square yards of garden, embellished with a bright tinsel ball in the centre, and, if possible, situated near the river. Here in summer, from Saturday night until Monday morning he spends his weekly holiday, enjoying, in wide straw hat and loose brown holland coat, complete freedom from the thraldom of city life, and heartily enjoying all the al fresco amusements of la campagne.

ROUND THE CLOCK IN PARIS

Paris is certainly an earlier riser than London, though perhaps, as the life is more of an out-of-door nature, the fact is more apparent than real. Be this as it may, however, Paris is very early astir, and as the visitor drives in, grim, tumbled, and dirty from a night's journey, he feels his discomfort all the more keenly from the contrast of the trim, clean look of the people he passes, although they may only be the white-capped market girls, or the ever-energetic waiter of a café (when do these waiters sleep?) setting his tables for the morning coffee of his first customers. Indeed, a matutinal walk through the streets will well repay the trouble, but it should not be confined to the great boulevards, nor to those caravanserai quarters in which the stranger usually fixes his abode. Let him go into the larger side streets, drop into a crêmerie, and take a delicious bowl of rice milk, or into one of the humble cafés, and watch the habitués as they drop in for their café au lait and petit pain before beginning the day's labours, Jacques, the cabinet-maker, who lives in a lofty storey in the Rue Brûletout, or Alphonse, the porter, who takes his stand at the corner of a thriving mercantile boulevard, and who is equally willing to carry your parcels, black your boots, or clean your windows; then our early riser should betake himself to the market, and watch the voluble Dames de la Halle arrange their wares—true Mères Angots, many of them fully capable of doing staunch battle with the closest-fisted of housewives—and be it understood that the Paris housewife is one in deed as well as in name, for an hour later she will come, with her white-capped bonne close behind with a basket, and carefully inspect and appraise Mère Angot's goods at the lowest marketable value. An economic soul, the Parisian housewife, one who knows how to make the best of dinners out of the scantiest of materials, and one whose thrift and inherent talent for good cooking went far to lessen the terrible hardships of the siege. Who else could have made such palatable dishes as entrecôte de cheval au Trochu, filet d'âne au Badinguet, or ragoût de chat à la Garde Nationale? But to return to our markets and its denizens, they are not all Mères Angots, there are plenty of "daughters" too, picturesquely-clad wenches, short of petticoat, with the sturdiest of ancles, and clad with stockings of the brightest of hues, and owning voices which remind one of that refrain of Désaugiers which Oxenford translates—

I see Javotte,
Who cries "Carotte,"
And sells a lot
  Of parsnips cheap.

Her voice so shrill
The air can fill,
And drown it will
  The chimney sweep.

The streets now begin to grow more and more animated, strings of clerks, both male and female—for woman's labour is in no way despised across the Channel—begin to stream towards the more commercial quarters, brisk little victorias begin to drive about, the shops are open, and soon the whole city is awake and abroad. Then spruce nursemaids bring their clean pinafored little charges out for their morning's airing in the Palais Royal or the Champs Elysées, where they sit and work and gossip with the neighbouring bonnes and nourrices, while little Jean and Marie romp around them, making chairs into horses for the nonce, or mayhap taking early lessons in gambling by venturing their only sou on the needle that spins for gingerbread or nuts. The Tuileries and Champs Elysées are at their prettiest on a fine summer morning with whole armies of the rising generation popping in and out the trees, surrounding the coco man with his tinkling bell and the fearfully and wonderfully made red velvet and bright tin cistern on his back, thronging the roundabouts which are flying round to the popular tune of the day, imbibing a taste for things theatrical by watching the marionettes or the dancing poodle, or gazing at that well-known eccentric ornithologist who rarely passes a day without feeding the birds of the Tuileries, which love him right well, and never fail to flock round at his call. In a very short time, however, the nurses glance up at the sun, and gathering up their work and their charges, hurry home to their mid-day meal, for it is the hour of déjeûner, and cafés and restaurants are resonant with the clatter of plates and of knives, and the hoarse screams of the busy garçons loudly yelling a succession of orders to the chefs.

Not that any difference is noticeable in the main streets or the boulevards, but if perchance you go into any office on a matter of business you will probably find the principal and half the staff absent, and on inquiry learn that they are at déjeûner—almost as inexorable a meal as the Roman prandium. After lunch fashionable Paris begins to wake up, the Boulevards and Passages are thronged with fair promenaders and their attendant cavaliers, the shops are filled, and the human stream flows down the Rue de la Paix towards the Tuileries, while a little later a line of carriages and equestrians pours up the Champs Elysées to the Bois de Boulogne—eminently the afternoon rendezvous of the fashionable world—even as our own Ladies' Mile and Rotten Row. The vehicles, however, are frequently of a more eccentric and heterogeneous nature than are seen in Hyde Park or Kensington Gardens, ranging from the humble voiture de place at a couple of francs an hour to the four-in-hand of the Marquis de Trois Etoiles, who likes to drive an English team with jaunty British grooms behind him, or the pretty Comtesse de Polinsky, who prides herself upon the magnificent stepping jet-black ponies which she has just received from Moscow. It is curious to notice how English words, more especially those relating to horseflesh, have become adopted into the French language, Le Turf, mon groom, mon drag are almost Gallicised, while when a boulevard dandy names his cane he invariably terms it his stick, while he styles his overcoat un coachman or un waterproof. Moreover English and Russian visitors abound, in vehicles distinctly national, while Austrian and German and other members of the Corps Diplomatique are rarely absent from the afternoon drives. Returning to Paris we find a large majority of the male portion of the community yet again at their respective cafés, sharpening their appetites by a glass of Vermouth or absinthe. Not that the cafés can ever have been called empty throughout the day, as those ever useful establishments supply every possible want. Do you want to read a newspaper, to cool yourself under the shade of a refreshing awning, to write a letter, or chat with a friend?—there are the little tables and comfortable chairs spread invitingly before you, and for a few sous you can spend five minutes or an afternoon without ever being reminded that you are not at home. Frequently men transact the majority of their business over their afternoon demi-tasse, while many are the leading articles which have been written on those little marble tables of the Café de Madrid. Then comes the most important hour of Paris, the dinner hour, when, as a French poet writes,—

Now the motley throng,
As it rolls along,
With its torrent strong,
Seems to ebb away.

Business-time has past,
Dinner comes at last,
Cloths are spreading fast—
Night succeeds to day.

Here woodcock fine
I can divine,
On fowl some dine
And turkey, too;

While here a lot
Of cabbage hot
All in the pot
With beef they stew.

After dinner comes once again the inevitable demi-tasse at the the café, and then the boulevards become more thickly peopled than ever, all classes turning out for their evening stroll, from the humble ouvrier who, together with his wife or bonne amie, walks up and down, looking at the grand folk enjoying their post-prandial coffee, to the gandin or crevé, who indulges in his curaçoa or chartreuse before adjourning to the theatre. The main streets of Paris certainly present a very animated appearance after dark, with the well-lighted shops and the ceaseless tide of people. As the evening advances, however, the stream lessens until the closing of the theatres, when there is a temporary reanimation; yellow, red, and blue-lamped voitures fly down the streets to their various quarters—for you are requested when driving home to take the vehicle bearing the particular coloured light that belongs to your district—while many prefer a quiet walk home after the intolerable heat which is the great drawback to a French theatre—perhaps taking a last bock by the way, or mayhap a cosy little supper in the cabinet of the ubiquitous café. Then at last a temporary lull comes over even the busy boulevards, the cafés put up their shutters, the yawning garçons take in their tables, and for a season Paris is left to the gardiens de la paix and—the rag-pickers.

THE THEATRES OF PARIS

BEFORE, however, we leave the daily routine of Paris life we should say a few words about that amusement above all amusements, the theatre. The Parisians are now pre-eminently the theatre-going race of Europe, and a "first representation" of a new piece by Sardou, Dumas, or even Offenbach, Hervé, or Lecocq engages public attention for weeks previously, while on the eventful evening seats are not to be purchased under princely prices, and frequently neither for money nor love. Such a first representation, indeed, is sure to be crowded to suffocation, and the audience of a first night presents a curious medley of the Monde and the demi-monde, of littérateurs, anxious to see, and of wealthy citizens anxious to be seen—in fact of all Paris that aspires to any ton. Not, however, that the stage has always attracted the attention and respect that it does now, for although the Parisians were always passionately addicted to sight-seeing, even from the time of the ancient Jongleurs of the Middle Ages, the performers themselves were looked upon as of the lowest possible caste, and readers of Voltaire will remember his bitterness at the refusal of Christian burial to Adrienne Lecouvreur simply because she belonged to the tabooed race of stage players. As usual, his indignation found vent in verse.—

What will ye say, ye races yet unborn,
Who learn the cruel wrong these arts forlorn
Endure from those who rob the dead of peace!
A grave they her deny with scorn.
Her to whom altars had been raised in Greece,
Flattered, adored, while she on earth remained,
I saw obsequious crowds her glance await.
She dies—and so the idol is profaned!
She charmed the world—a sin to expiate.

To those who would obtain an insight into the life of players in the Middle Ages we would recommend a perusal of Théophile Gautier's admirable novel Le Capitaine Fracasse, which brings vividly before the reader the vicissitudes of the followers of Thespis in those times. To go back yet further, Lacroix tells us that the jugglers, the progenitors of the actors, were held in universal opprobrium, owing to their vices and licentiousness, insomuch that in the 12th century St. Bernard declared in one of his sermons that "A man fond of jugglery will soon enough possess a wife whose name is Poverty. If it happens that the tricks of jugglers are forced upon your notice, endeavour to avoid them, and think of other things. The tricks of jugglers never please God." In the days of St. Louis, also, the jugglers wandered about with their trained animals nearly starved; they were half-naked, without coats or shoes, and always without money. Nevertheless, they formed themselves into a Corporation in a street of Paris called after them the Rue des Jongleurs, and even founded the Church and Hospital of St. Julian. The first actual stage plays, however, were not given until 1398, and were, like all mediæval dramas, based upon Scriptural subjects. Under Charles IV. a troupe was permitted to occupy the Hospital of the Trinité at St. Denis, where they and their successors were allowed to remain until 1539, when they shifted to more convenient quarters. Other troupes then began quickly to spring up, but the original company held its own, and, moreover, had its privileges confirmed by the Paris Parliament, which, however, prohibited for the future all representations of "the mysteries of the Passion of Our Saviour and other sacred mysteries." It was not, however, until the end of the sixteenth century that any really noteworthy progress was made in the drama. In 1588 the successors of the "Confrères de la Passion" became the "Comédiens Ordinaires of Louis XIII.," and a few years later Corneille produced his Horace, his Corinne, and his Polyeucte. Then really began the theatrical era; in 1637 Cardinal Richelieu built the Palais Royal Theatre, and in 1658 appeared the company of the incomparable Molière. In 1671 the Opera was founded, and under the reign of Louis XIV. the stage flourished, and women were first permitted to perform in public. Under Louis XV. the popularity of the theatre increased enormously, while in 1791 the Constituent Assembly went so far as to declare that any citizen was at liberty to build a public theatre and represent pieces of every kind. Almost immediately forty new houses sprung into existence, though these theatres lasted but a short time, as a Decree some fifteen years later reduced the number to eight—the eight which at the present moment form the chief theatres of Paris—to wit, the Opera, Opéra Comique, the Théâtre Français, the Variétés, the Vaudeville, the Gaîté, the Odéon, and the Ambigu Comique. This number, however, has gradually increased, and at present Paris numbers some thirty theatres, besides various Café Concerts and minor entertainments. First and foremost amongst all the theatres is the Théâtre Français, that perfect school of acting which dates from the amalgamation in 1680, under Louis XIV., of the comedians of the Hotel de Bourgogne (the old Confrères de la Passion), the Comedians of the Marais, and those of Molière's historical troupe. The newly formed company was at once subventioned with a yearly grant of 600*l.*, and, after staying for a short time in the Rue Mazarine, the troupe built a house in the Rue des Fossés-St. Germain-des-Prés, where it performed for eighty-two years, bringing out all the most famous comedies and dramas of that age, including those of Regnard, of Darcourt, of Baron, &c., and all the plays of Voltaire. It was in this theatre, indeed, that for the first time the audience inaugurated the now invariable custom of calling for a successful author. The Théâtre Français speedily became the first theatre in Europe, and in 1770, finding its quarters somewhat confined, again, after a short sojourn in the Tuileries, where Voltaire came, at the age of eighty-three, shortly before his death, to be present at his play Irene, changed to a new theatre on the site of the present Odéon, and here Beaumarchais' Mariage de Figaro was brought out, and Talma and Madame Contat made their first appearance. During the Revolution the company became disorganised by internal dissensions, and notwithstanding that they yielded to the exigencies of the times, and changed the name of the house to the "Théâtre de la Nation" and "Théâtre de l'Egalité," the members were thrown into prison, whence they were released the following year, and subsequently reconstituted by Napoleon, when First Consul, into a society of "French Comedy." Thus reorganised, the Society took possession of their present house in the Rue Richelieu, where they have since remained. During the Empire, the Society, having become the favourite company of Napoleon I., followed him not only to Fontainebleau and St. Cloud, but even to Erfurth and Dresden. So great was the interest the Emperor took in the company, that even when at Moscow he found time to sign a decree revoking in a great measure the privileges of the Society—a decree which was quashed at the Restoration. Under Louis Philippe, however, the state of the Society's finances were so bad that they applied for permission to dissolve to M. Thiers, who, however, refused their application, and, shortly after, the talent of the great Rachel speedily restored the theatre to the popular favour which it has never to this day lost. The Society is now subventioned, and, in addition to a theatre free of rent, receives a yearly sum of nearly 10,000*l.*, and possesses the privilege of being able to take any actor or actress it pleases from any Parisian theatre on giving a year's notice.

Next in national importance to the Théâtre Français comes the Grand Opera, which, as we have said, has lately found a new home in a magnificent building begun by Napoleon III., and finished in 1875. The first time any performance really worthy of the name of Opera was performed in France was in 1581, when a semi-choral, semi-dancing piece, entitled Le Ballet Comique de la Royne, was played on the marriage of the Duc de Joyeuse. In 1671, however, a veritable Opera House was founded by the Abbé Perrin in the Rue Mazarine, and it was under the management of the conductor, Lulli, that the establishment received the name of "Royal Academy of Music"—a designation, with the Republican substitution of "National" for "Royal," which the Grand Opera now bears. Lulli subsequently changed his quarters to the Rue Vaugirard, and thence to the Palais Royal, where, amongst other works, Jean Jacques Rousseau's much-discussed Devin du Village was brought out, and where in 1763 the first Opera balls were given. There it was that that well-known dancer, Vestris, flourished, who is once said to have remarked: "There are three great men in Europe—the King of Prussia, Voltaire, and myself." In 1770, the old house having been burned down, a new theatre was built, and here several of the masterpieces of Gluck were produced. After a second fire and various changes to the present Porte St. Martin and a house in the Rue Richelieu, where Cherubini's works were produced, and where it may be remembered the Duc de Berry was assassinated in 1820, the Opera took refuge in the present home of the Opera Comique, and subsequently in the theatre in the Rue le Pelletier, where it remained until burnt out in 1873. There were produced the most famous works of Rossini, Meyerbeer, Auber, Donizetti, and Halévy, and there were held the famous masked balls, at which all Paris used to go mad during the earlier times of the Second Empire. The new Opera House, which is one of the handsomest edifices of Paris, and of which we give several illustrations, was nearly fourteen years building, being commenced in 1861 and finished in 1875, and has cost upwards of 1,400,000*l.* It was designed and erected by M. Charles Garnier, who, in 1860, then a young man of thirty years of age, carried off the palm from 171 competitors. M. Garnier actually began work on the day following his appointment, but, owing to the immense labour involved in the clearing away the existing houses and draining the site, it was not until 1862 that the first stone was laid. In 1867 the façade was uncovered, but in 1870 came the war, and M. Garnier's magnificent edifice was turned into a huge storehouse and granary. M. Garnier, however, anxiously watched over his charge, swathed the incomparable pillars in sand-bags, and during the Commune succeeded in preventing the building from being rased by the Communists. As it was, the building suffered to the extent of 12,000*l.* The plan of the Opera House is somewhat different from any other that has been constructed. It is divided into three distinct parts—firstly, the grand entrances, staircases, crush-rooms or foyers, which are capped with a low flat roof; secondly, the auditorium, with a round dome of sonorous copper; and thirdly, the stage, which for scenic effect needs a much higher covering than any other portion of the building, and accordingly is roofed with a lofty gable structure. The space of ground covered is more than three times that occupied by the St. Petersburg and Munich Opera Houses, hitherto the largest theatres in the world. Some idea of the exterior of the building may be gathered from our illustration of the principal entrance, which faces the Avenue de l'Opera; but we may mention the sixteen Corinthian columns, monoliths of red marble from the Jura, the balconies of red marble from Sweden, the bronze groups of Harmony and Poetry which surmount each end, and M. Millet's famous group of Apollo flanked by Two Muses and elevating a golden lyre, the god appearing to give his benediction urbi et orbi over the whole structure. The pavilion of the Opera is the entrance for the "Chief of the State," originally erected for Napoleon III.; while to come to the interior, it is not until the staircase is reached that the exceeding beauty of M. Garnier's work is at once seen. This entrance hall is exceedingly grandiose; it forms an exact square, and reaches the height of the façade, is decorated with the most magnificent mosaics, groups in bronze, columns in yellow marble, and colossal Caryatides, and is ceilinged with exquisite mosaics and allegorical paintings. The foyer, that resort of all French audiences between the acts, is a saloon which runs the length of the façade, and is magnificently decorated. Brobdingnag columns, picked out with different coloured gold, monster mirrors, and gorgeous painted ceilings, form but a tithe of its ornamental features. The auditorium itself appears somewhat small when compared with its surroundings, but it holds no fewer than 2,156 persons, or 385 more than the old Opera House. Like the Théâtre Français, the Opera receives a yearly subvention from the State, amounting to 32,000*l.*

Of the other theatres space precludes our giving any lengthened details, but we may mention the Opéra Comique, the old Théâtre de la Foire, which receives a subvention of 14,000*l.* and which dates from 1837; the Odéon or Second Théâtre Français which receives a subvention of 2,400*l.*, and which mainly produces pieces of a spectacular dramatic nature; and the Théâtre Lyrique, which is subventioned to the extent of 8,000*l.* This ends the list of the subventioned theatres, and next in order comes the Théâtre Italien, which traces its permanent origin to a company of Italian singers installed in the Odéon by Napoleon I. in order to teach the Parisians the beauties of Italian music. They now occupy the house called the Salle Ventadour. The Gymnase Théâtre, which is now one of the most fashionable houses of Paris, of which Scribe made the fortune, and which is the favourite home of the comedies of Sardou and the younger Dumas, only dates from 1820; while the Vaudeville, a house of a somewhat similar nature, was first founded in 1792 for the performance—as its name implies—of small pieces, but was handsomely rebuilt in 1861, and is now decidedly the prettiest house in Paris. Few Englishmen ever go to Paris without visiting the Théâtre des Variétés, the home of such musical extravagances of rollicking fun but doubtful morality as Fleur du Thé, La Vie Parisienne, or Niniche. The Palais Royal is another house where the censor is in no way strict, and where screaming farces in three or four acts are not only tolerated but—interpreted, be it said, by first-rate actors—thoroughly appreciated; as to wit, Tricoche et Cacolet, Le Procès Veauradieux ("The Great Divorce Case"), and Les Dominos Roses ("The Pink Dominos"). The Théâtre of the Porte St. Martin was at one time the house par excellence where the humbler classes of theatre-goers revelled in spectacular melodramas. Burnt down during the Commune, two theatres sprung upon the site, a new Porte St. Martin and the Théâtre de la Renaissance, of which we give an illustration, and which is devoted to opera bouffe, La Marjolaine being hitherto its greatest success. The great house for spectacular opera bouffe, however, is the Gaîté, which is capable of holding nearly 2,000 persons, while other but smaller shrines of the devotees to this modern form of extravaganza are the Folies Dramatiques, and the Bouffes where respectively Madame Angot and the much-talked-of Timbale d'Argent first saw the light. The Ambigu Comique is a large theatre mainly devoted to the heavier kinds of drama, but the largest of all the theatres is the Châtelet (see illustration), which, like the Gaîeté, is devoted to féeries and spectacular dramas, and can hold 3,000 spectators. The adjoining Théâtre Historique is built on the site of the old Théâtre Lyrique, which was burnt down during the Commune, The other theatres call for little mention, but we must not forget the great circus of the Champs Elysées, which is one of the sights of Paris, and which can seat 6,000 spectators. Nor must we omit the various open-air Café Concerts in the Champs Elysées, where the popular songs of the day are rendered on summer evenings, and which have supplied some of the cleverest divas of opera bouffe.

THE CHURCHES OF PARIS

ABOUT 250 A.D. the Parisians beheaded St. Denis on Montmartre for venturing to attempt to convert them to Christianity, but the seed he had sown bore fruit, and in 365 a Cathedral Church was erected on the extreme eastern part of the island of the Cité on the site of the Temple of Jupiter. When, however, Clovis made Paris the capital of his kingdom, the Cathedral came to be considered too insignificant for so important a see, and in 555 his successor, Childebert I., built on the northern side of the island a magnificent edifice dedicated to Saint Étienne, which long shared the title of Cathedral with the original church, Ste. Marie or Notre Dame. The latter, however, was never actually superseded; it was at the high altar of Notre Dame that Fredegonda, the wife of Chilperic, claimed and obtained refuge after murdering her husband, and in 1160 Maurice de Sully, the then Archbishop of Paris, determined to unite the two cathedrals into one, and accordingly in 1163 the first stone was laid by Pope Alexander III., then a refugee in France. It was not until 1235 that the Cathedral was completed, after which, for nearly five centuries, the building remained unchanged. In 1699, however, Louis XIII., in execution of a vow, began a series of alterations and additions, which lasted until 1787, since when "Restoration" had greatly changed the original aspect of the Cathedral—many say for the worse. In 1793 the Church suffered greatly from the excesses of the Revolution, the statues being removed, and the Cathedral was transformed into a Temple of Reason, while in 1801, it being feared that the spire was endangering the stability of the edifice, it was removed. In 1843 Montalembert warmly urged that the Cathedral should be properly and completely restored, and M. Viollet le Duc, one of the few architects of the present day who thoroughly understand and appreciate the art of the Middle Ages, was entrusted with the work, which was well and characteristically accomplished in 1864, and on the 31st of May of that year the dedication of Notre Dame, which in the Middle Ages had never been formally performed, was celebrated by the late Archbishop Darboy. Of our illustrations the first portrays the façade, with its Door of Judgment and the two towers so well described in Victor Hugo's inimitable story of the "Hunchback," the rear view depicts the exterior of the grand old edifice as seen from the river, while that of the Porte Rouge represents a doorway under the window of the Choir Chapel, over which is sculptured the Crowning of the Virgin, while around are figured scenes from the life of Saint Marcel. The new steeple was erected in 1859-60 by Viollet Le Duc, and is a characteristic reproduction of the Mediæval style. A dry architectural description of this—certainly one of the first ecclesiastical monuments of France—would be wearisome, but we may say that the interior fully justifies the expectations aroused by the external architecture, and is throughout perfectly harmonious with its surroundings. What a flow of memories also are excited while contemplating the dimly-lighted nave of the Cathedral of France—memories ranging from the old Merovingian Kings, through dark ages of oppression and superstition, of Royal coronations and Princely marriages, to the days when Paris guillotined her King, abolished her Deity, and consecrated her cathedral to the Goddess of Reason, only in a very few years to crown an Emperor with all the gorgeous trappings and paraphernalia of the Roman Catholic Church. Once more the scene changes, and it is again a King who is being anointed by the soft hand of the Archbishop; and but the lapse of a few years, and it is once more an Imperial coronation ceremony—that of Napoleon III. Still the wheel goes round, and, lastly, we have yet another ceremony, this time in honour of no King nor Emperor, but a simple, heartfelt, commemoration of the death of one of the greatest citizens whom France has ever known, one who, despite the weight of his threescore and ten years, thought little of going round the Courts of Europe, begging help for his country in distress, and one who, unanimously chosen the leader in the hour of her greater need, in a few years freed his country from the enemy's grasp, evolved order out of financial chaos, put an end to civil discord which threatened to engulf France in greater evils than the horrors of foreign invasion, and restored her to a honoured place among the nations of Europe—Adolphe Thiers.

Notre Dame apart, there are sixty-eight central churches in Paris, but of these our space will only permit of the mention of a few to which the illustrations refer. First in order we have Ste. Geneviève, the church of the patron saint of Paris, which, however, is quite a modern building, Louis XV. having laid the first stone in 1764 on the site of an old abbey church of the same name. The church, however, built by Soufflot was hardly completed before the outbreak of the Revolution, when the Constituent Assembly re-named it the Panthéon, and decided that thenceforward it should be devoted to the preservation to posterity of the remembrance of Great Citizens, and inscribed the following legend on the façade, "Aux Grands Hommes, La Patrie Reconnaissante." In 1822 Louis XVIII. restored the building to the clergy, but under the Government of July the Panthéon was declared to be a Temple of Fame until the advent of Napoleon III., by whom it was once more devoted to the Christian faith. Certainly, whether Temple of Fame or Church, Panthéon or Ste. Geneviève, the building is one of the most handsome monuments with which the eighteenth century endowed Paris. Embellished also as it is with statues and bas-reliefs, ranging from groups of such citizens as Mirabeau, Voltaire, and Jean Jacques Rousseau, whose remains were deposited in the vaults beneath, to sculptures of Ste. Geneviève and King Attila, of St. Denis and St. Rémy, the Panthéon, for so it is usually termed, presents a curious phase in the political history of the past century. The interior presents to our mind a somewhat cold, albeit majestic, appearance. Let us pass from the Panthéon to the Invalides, which to the popular mind is a far greater Temple of Fame, for does not it enshrine within its gilded dome the remains of that great Imperial hero, Napoleon I.? The Invalides—the Paris "Chelsea Hospital"—which was founded in 1671 by Louis XIV. for the relief of old soldiers, is, properly speaking, the range of buildings in which the pensioners are lodged, and the Church adjoining the Dome, which contains the Emperor's tomb, is entitled St. Louis.

The Dome, however, is separate from the Church, and only serves as a monster canopy to the red granite sarcophagus wherein reposes all that remains of Napoleon I., whose last wishes have thus been fulfilled. "I wish," said the Emperor, "that my ashes should lie on the banks of the Seine, in the midst of the French people whom I have so loved." Around the Emperor's tomb twelve colossal statues—emblems of twelve of his chief victories—keep guard, while between these silent sentries hang some fifty flags—trophies of Austerlitz.

No greater contrast can be imagined than between these two monster samples of modern architecture and the exquisite delicate tracery of the Sainte Chapelle—the most charming of all the sacred edifices of Paris. This so-called "Chapel" owes its origin to St. Louis, who, having received from Constantinople a piece of the true Cross, placed the precious relic temporarily in the Chapel of St. Nicholas, which stood on the present site of the Sainte Chapelle. St. Louis, however, determined to erect a shrine worthy of so priceless a treasure, and thence arose the present Church, which was only three years in building, and was consecrated on the 25th of April, 1248. Viollet le Duc, in speaking of this magnificent piece of architecture, writes: "It can hardly be conceived how this work, so astonishing in the multiplicity and the variety of its details, the purity of its execution, and the beauty of its materials, could have been accomplished in so short a time." The steeple, however, was not erected until the time of Charles VIII., and, being burnt in 1630, it was replaced by Louis XIII., again destroyed during the Revolution, and once more repaired under Louis XVIII. by indefatigable M. Viollet le Duc. During the bombardment of Paris by the Prussians, as also during the reign of the Commune, although the adjoining Palais of Justice was destroyed, the Sainte Chapelle escaped without injury. Another relic of olden Paris is St. Étienne du Mont, which dates back to 1517, and the reign of Francis I., when the present church was begun on the site of Clovis' Abbey of Ste. Geneviève, although it was not definitely consecrated until more than a century afterwards—1626. This church in its earlier days was regarded with especial reverence, as it contained the remains of Ste. Geneviève, whose sarcophagus was re-discovered in the crypt in 1801. In later days, however, the church has become celebrated from a terrible crime, the assassination of Archbishop Sibour on the 3rd of January, 1856, by the priest Verger. The interior of this church is one of the handsomest in Paris, being chiefly remarkable for a singular rood screen which separates the choir from the nave and winds round the pillars on either side. The screen is highly sculptured, and is justly regarded as one of the ecclesiastical curiosities of Paris. Saint Eustache, of which we also give an illustration, is a contemporary of St. Étienne, the present church having been begun in 1532 and finished in 1642. Of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, one of the oldest churches in Paris, as the present building dates back to the 12th century, and in earlier days had been a school founded by Charlemagne, a terrible memorial will always preserve its place in history, for it was from this church, which faces the Palace of the Louvre, that the signal tolled for the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. Nor is the church any the less interesting from an architectural than from a historical point of view. The church of the Val de Grace was erected by Anne of Austria as a thanksgiving offering for the birth of Louis XIV., and presents few noteworthy features, save its dome, which is one of the many imitations of the dome of St. Peter's, which became so fashionable in architecture during the seventeenth century, and the tomb of unfortunate Maria Henrietta, the Queen of Charles I. Of St. Bernard there is little to say, save that it is one of the most modern churches in Paris, having only been consecrated in 1861, while the Trinité, which is built after the Renaissance style at a cost of 120,000*l*., is yet more modern, dating from 1867. The Russian Church, also, depicted in our illustration, situated in the Rue Croix du Roule, calls for no remark beyond that it is considered a fair specimen of Byzantine-Muscovite architecture. Our illustration of Tour St. Jacques is all that remains of the Church of St. Jacques La Boucherie, which was built before the twelfth century. The Tower, which is one of the finest relics of olden Paris, and which has recently been restored, was at the beginning of this century used for the manufacture of shot. It stands at one end of the Rue de Rivoli, a strange contrast to all the busy hum of modern civilisation beneath. The Chapel of the Cluny Museum, wherein are stored priceless relics of Ancient and Mediæval Paris, belonged to the old Abbaie de Cluny, which towards the middle of the fifteenth century was built on the site of the old classical Palais dez Thermes. The interior is a masterpiece of delicate tracery.

THE QUAYS AND BRIDGES

THE Quays of Paris are amongst the most picturesque features of the city. Shaded by trees, they form a pleasant promenade from the Bois de Boulogne to that of Vincennes, while, in addition to a busy thoroughfare, they form a favourite lounging place for the humbler class of idlers, in fact, of the "lower ten" of Paris, who love to watch the tiny bateaux-mouches as they fly past up and down the river, or hang on the parapet to gaze at more energetic souls patiently angling for gudgeons (the goujons de la Seine form a famous friture), or the old women washing and clipping sad-looking poodles, which, so great is the military spirit of the nation, are invariably endowed with the fiercest of moustaches. Here also are long lines of book-stalls, at which even the busier spirits of the throng occasionally halt and inspect the piles of musty volumes, while below in the river are the comfortable swimming baths, where, on a hot day, for a few sous, you can obtain a refreshing dip, a cup of coffee, and an unceasing fund of amusement. Of the bridges, which number twenty-seven, we illustrate the Pont au Change, where in 1141 the money-changers and goldsmiths were wont to vend their wares, and where on fine Sundays the birdsellers held high market, a privilege conceded to them on condition of their freeing two hundred dozen of birds whenever the King and Queen made a solemn entry into the capital over the bridge. The present structure only dates from 1858. Of the Pont Neuf, with its statue of Henri IV., we have already spoken, while the Pont aux Arts is chiefly remarkable for the fine view it affords of the Tuileries and Louvre.

PALACES AND MUSEUMS

NOTRE DAME apart, the Louvre is the most ancient existing monument of primitive Paris. We have above traced its career from its foundation as a fortress by Philippe Augustus down to its supplanting as a Royal Palace by the Tuileries. Although Louis XV. had opened part of the Louvre to the public, it was not until the Revolution that all the works of art which were scattered abroad throughout the various Royal palaces were concentrated into one collection. At present the Louvre contains eleven different collections of artistic, historical, and antiquarian treasures, foremost of which are the incomparable galleries of paintings and of sculpture, to the careful study of which there is little doubt that the Parisians owe much of the proverbial good taste displayed in the various artistic manufactures for which they are renowned. Indeed, one of the most characteristic features of the Louvre is the number of students, men and women, youths and grey-bearded veterans, who, mounted on scaffoldings, or merely standing before a low easel, spend whole years of their lives in copying the countless masterpieces of the collection. Zealous Sabbatarians, also, might learn a profitable lesson from the aspect of the Louvre on Sunday, where they would see hundreds of the humbler classes heartily enjoying the various works of art, and moreover frequently showing themselves capable of appreciating their beauties in a manner which would surprise many an English connoisseur. Indeed, there is little doubt that the great superiority as far as artistic taste goes, which the Parisian workman possesses over his London brother, is owing to the facilities which the State places at his disposal for studying art in every form, from antique furniture in the Cluny Museum to Raphael's "Madonnas" in the Louvre. Even in walking through these galleries his eye becomes unconsciously educated as to what is or is not good taste. The illustrations we publish are the "Mirror of Marie de Medicis," which was sent as a present by the Venetian Republic to Henri IV.'s Queen, the façade of the Louvre, seen from the pretty garden courtyard, round which run the Galleries, the old Library Pavilion, the Rohan Pavilion, and the Richelieu Pavilion, which last was burnt down during the Commune, but has since been restored.

The Palace of the Tuileries, which was first begun by Catherine de Medicis in 1564, and which subsequently formed the Paris residence of the French Sovereigns, was, like the Louvre, greatly embellished by Napoleon III., who rebuilt the Pavilion de Flore represented in our illustration, which curiously enough was one of the few portions of the Imperial Palace which escaped destruction during the Commune.

What pleasant memories the mere mention of the Palais Royal arouses in the mind—infantile memories of a happy playground, with a sparkling, splashing fountain, which engulphed the tiny craft which had been set to cross the basin—older memories of wonder at the sparkling diamonds in the shops (we did not know what en imitation or or double meant then), and yet more recent memories of cosy little dinners, while listening to the band, and of the subsequent glorias at the Café de la Rotonde, served by the ever rapid "Boum." Historic memories also crowd one's mind, as we sip our coffee, of Cardinal Richelieu, for whom the Palace was originally built, of Anne of Austria, who lived there with Louis XIV., then a boy, of our unfortunate Queen Maria Henrietta, who there spent the dreary days of her exile, of the debts of Philippe Egalité, which compelled him to surround the garden with the present buildings and shops, of Camille Desmoulins who, mounted on a chair, urged the crowd to revolution, and adopted as his badge a green leaf from one of the trees, and of that very Café de la Rotonde, subsequently a favourite resort of all the bucks of the Revolution. Later on it was in the Palais Royal that the Duke of Orleans offered the crown to Louis Philippe, while, under the Empire, the Palace became the official residence of Prince Jérome Napoleon. The Palace suffered somewhat at the hands of the Communists, but has now been completely restored.

The Luxembourg Palace, which is now devoted to an exhibition of paintings and statuary of the modern school, which have been bought by the State at the yearly exhibitions of the Salon, was originally built for Marie de Medicis, somewhat after the style of the Pitti Palace at Florence, though the building, it is needless to say, has been since considerably added to and altered. During the Revolution the Convention, overburdened with Royal Palaces, turned the Luxembourg into a prison, while subsequently the Directory made it the seat of Government. Before the 18th Brumaire also it was the residence of Napoleon I., while under Napoleon III. it was transformed into a Senate House. One of its chief charms, however, is its exceedingly pretty garden, which is to the south of Paris what the Tuileries are to the more fashionable north.

OUR REMAINING ILLUSTRATIONS

THE Place de la Concorde, now the handsomest square in Paris, was during the Revolution the scene of the fearful butcheries which, by the aid of Dr. Guillotin's fatal invention, the two Sansons were wont to perform each morning during the Reign of Terror. Previous to the Revolution it was known as the Place de Louis XV., an equestrian statue of whom had been erected by the Provost of Paris, and which subsequently formed a favourite spot, where lampoons against the King might be deposited. One of the most famous read

> Grotesque Monument, infame piédestal:
> Les vertus sont à pied, le vice est à cheval.

while another put forth

> Il est ici comme à Versailles
> Il est sans cœur et sans entrailles.

The Place de la Concorde, however, no longer bears the mark of political conflict if we except the funereal wreaths at the foot of the statue of Strasbourg, one of the eight figures representing the great towns of France, which surround the Place. In the centre is the Obelisk of Luxor, the sister to our Cleopatra's Needle, and which was brought over from Egypt, and erected in 1836. At the entrance to the Champs Elysées are the famous "Horses of Marly," the two equestrian groups by Coustou, which were erected by the National Convention. From the Champs Elysées to the Arc de Triomphe is an easy step, and few people require to be told that this monument was built by Napoleon I. to perpetuate the glories of his campaign. Of our remaining illustrations a few lines will suffice to say that in the Portes St. Martin and St. Denis are also triumphal arches, which were erected by the people of Paris in 1672 and and 1674 respectively, to commemorate the victories of Louis XIV., that the two "Halls of Lost Footsteps," as the French characteristically term the Waiting Halls of the Courts of Law, represent the old vestibule of the Palais de Justice, and the new Hall, which has only recently been constructed, while the Salle de la Cour d'Assises is a new Court of Sessions which was completed in 1875. Indeed, the Palais de Justice suffered severely at the hands of the Commune, and has been almost rebuilt. Opposite the Palais de Justice is the Tribunal de Commerce, which is depicted in two of our illustrations, a new building, which was only built in 1864, when it was inaugurated by Napoleon III. The Prison of Mazas, which is one of the five prisons of Paris, was the temporary place of confinement of a large number of the Deputies of the National Assembly who were arrested by the orders of Napoleon III. on the eve of the Coup d'Etat. Amongst them was M. Thiers, and, in "The History of a Crime," M. Victor Hugo graphically describes the prison and the manner in which the Representatives of the nation were treated. The Gaillon Fountain is a sample of the various fountains which embellish Paris, but is of recent date, having been built in 1828 from the design of Visconti. The National Record Office, which was only founded in 1794 by Camus, the Keeper of the Archives of the Constituent Assembly, is a combination of the old mansions of Clisson, of Roche-Guyon, and of Laval—the gate illustrated belonging to the first-named, and being one of the few architectural relics of the fourteenth century in Paris. The Conservatory of Arts and Sciences, in the Rue St. Martin, occupies the buildings of an old abbey, whose monks were dispossessed in 1790, the building being transformed into an arsenal for the army. In 1794, however, the Convention decided to unite the three collections of machinery which then existed in various parts of the city and place them in the building, which was subsequently formed into a free scientific school, where, at the present moment, gratuitous courses of the various sciences ranging from Geometry to Chemistry, and from Agriculture to Political Economy, are publicly delivered. The special School of Design, in the Rue de l'École de Medecine, is one of several schools where Art is taught at the expense of the State, but owes its origin not to the Revolution, but to Louis XV., who founded it at the request of five of the Corporations of the capital. The teaching of this school is of the highest class, and a large majority of the most talented Parisian carvers and designers have received their Art education there.

CONCLUSION

No article on Paris, however brief, would be complete without some passing allusion to Underground Paris, that marvellous labyrinth of catacombs, long, tortuous galleries of old quarries, which extend on the south side of the river, from the Jardin des Plantes to the Vaugirard. In 1780 a Lieutenant-General of Police suddenly conceived the idea of utilising these galleries by transporting thither the contents of the Cimetière des Innocents. This was afterwards done, and the galleries, blessed and consecrated with great pomp, were thenceforward named the Catacombs. Our illustration will give some idea of the appearance of the Catacombs, which, unlike those of Rome, were never used for the actual interment of the dead. Our other illustration of subterranean Paris depicts a section of this part of the city with the catacombs beneath and the gas, sewer, and water service above. The sewers of Paris call for especial notice, as the main drain is large enough not only to allow people to walk on a path by the side of the stream, but also to permit of the passage of a boat constructed for this purpose. Three other illustrations finally demand our notice: firstly, the Race Course at Longchamps, where all Paris, which during the Second Empire became great votaries of Le Sport (only last month we met a young Parisian urchin, aged fourteen, who knew the name of every French and English winner for the past ten years), turns out in great force on certain Sundays in the year, and where the principal races are annually contested. To pass to the other end of Paris we illustrate the Castle of Vincennes as it appeared in the seventeenth century, when Louis XIV. transferred the old Royal hunting palace into a veritable fortress—as it now stands. The illustration of the Artesian Well at Passy depicts the jet of water coming to the surface on the 4th of September, 1867, when, after twelve years' work, the Paris Municipality were rewarded with the same success that attended their efforts at Grenelle. Finally, we have Boileau's old house and the temple reared to the memory of Molière, on the site of the house in which he lived at Auteuil. The so-called "temple" is a brick rotunda, with a Doric peristyle, surmounted with four columns. A bas-relief represents Thalia letting fall her mask, while beneath is the inscription, "Here was Molière's House." There took place that famous supper when, together with Boileau, La Fontaine, and a few other boon companions, Molière and his guests, who had extended their libations beyond the bounds of prudence, decided there and then to drown themselves in the river, upon the idea that the greatest happiness is never to have been born, while the next is to die with as little delay as possible. On their way to the river, however, Molière suggested that so doughty a deed should not be performed in the dark, but that it merited the blaze of noonday sun. "He is right," cried his companions; one of whom, Chapelle, added, "Well, as we are not going to drown ourselves until to-morrow, let us go back and finish the wine!"

SCIENTIFIC NOTES

Some very satisfactory balloon experiments have lately been carried out at Woolwich by Captain Templar. The object has been to ascertain whether, with such apparatus as can conveniently be carried by an army on the march, it is possible to produce the conditions necessary for a balloon ascent. The gas used is hydrogen, both on account of its lifting power, which is nine times that of ordinary coal gas, and also because it can be readily produced by portable apparatus. The method adopted is that used some years ago in producing gas for the trial of the lime light on Westminster Bridge. A tube containing iron borings is placed in a furnace and made red hot, and steam is projected through the tube. The vapour of course consists of the two constituents of water, namely oxygen and hydrogen. The red-hot iron borings arrest the oxygen, while the hydrogen passes through the pipe to inflate the balloon. Thus with a bushel of coals, a portable fire-place, and a few iron borings, hydrogen can be produced. This seems a rough and ready mode of obtaining the gas, and, in the absence of any apparatus for drying the product, the watery vapour with which it is charged must greatly affect its buoyancy. It has, however, proved capable of raising a man attached to a small balloon to the height of 700 feet, an elevation quite great enough for all practical purposes in the field. The balloon employed was made of lawn, and had a capacity of 10,000 cubic feet. Its concluding performance was to break from its moorings, and travel to Oxford on its own account. Captain Templar hopes to compress the gas into iron bottles, so as to avoid the inconvenience of making gas for each ascent. Many gases can now be bought in this compressed form, notably the nitrous oxide, or laughing gas, which is now so universally used as an anæsthetic by dentists.

The Live Stock Journal gives an interesting account of a very curious competition which has just concluded at Hemel Hempstead. It consisted in a contest for supremacy between several egg-hatching machines. The eggs were bespoken from the different farmhouses round about, and were all laid on one particular date. They were afterwards intermixed before being distributed to the incubators, in order that the chances of success might be equalised. Each machine held about fifty eggs, and the process of hatching commenced on the 5th ult., and terminated on the 26th. The incubator invented by Mr. Christy carried off the prize of 25*l.* by hatching thirty-four out of a possible forty-five, the remaining five eggs proving to be non-fertile ones. The other machines were far behind, two of them failing to produce a single chick. The result is encouraging, as it points to a new source of food supply. But all poultry fanciers know that the task of rearing chickens without a natural mother is the real difficulty to be overcome. In another competition it might be advisable to give a prize for the largest family of orphan fledglings which survived to the age of spring chickenhood.

The late sad colliery accident has once more turned attention to the causes of these lamentable occurrences. The recklessness of the miner himself in tampering with his safety lamp has often enough been given as the probable reason of the catastrophe, but, for obvious reasons, the delinquent is never detected. Another cause, in the explosive nature of finely-divided coal-dust when mixed in certain proportions with atmospheric air, has lately received serious attention as being very possibly the hidden means whereby so many lives are annually sacrificed. Explosions of the same nature, in American flour mills, have been traced to the flour itself, rendering the air which it impregnates in a finely divided state as dangerous as a mixture of air and gas. In short the union of particles of carbon with atmospheric air furnish the conditions necessary for the existence of an explosive demon, which only requires the application of a flame to set it loose. If we enclose some lycopodium (a fine powder composed of the spores of club moss) in a paper tube, and gently urge it by the breath through the flame of a candle, we can test for ourselves the reality of dust explosions. Finely powdered resin will exhibit precisely the same phenomenon. The flame obtained is so great that the latter plan is adopted at theatres to imitate the sudden flash of lightning.

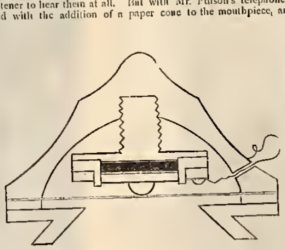
Now that electric lighting is receiving so much attention we may surely hope that it may be applied to coal mines as a preventive of these terrible accidents. It is not generally known that the light is in no way dependent upon the oxygen of the atmosphere—in point of fact, it can be burnt with increased advantage in a vacuum. Some years ago the proposal was made that it should be thus used enclosed in thick glass globes, which were to be hermetically sealed, but, as far as we can learn, it has never been tried. Possibly this is owing to the want of a suitable arrangement of the carbon points, but surely this difficulty could be overcome. At any rate, the first colliery proprietors who institute inquiries into the subject will deserve most honourable mention.

The case of Electricity v. Gas still continues to excite great interest, and to elicit many wonderful statements on either side. The report that the terrible Mr. Edison has solved the problem of making one machine feed if necessary ten thousand different lights has lowered the value of gas shares by about twelve per cent. At the time of the introduction of the Jablochkoff candle a similar panic arose—but the shares on that occasion only dropped eight per cent. The present increase in the depreciation is no doubt due to the remarkable promises which accompany the announcement of the new discovery. The entire lower part of New York is to be lighted by one machine. The wires are to be laid along the streets like the present gas pipes, which will, of course, be discarded, but fittings, such as chandeliers and brackets, can be retained for the new light. We may as well quote, from the New York Sun, part of the programme which is attributed to this irrepressible and sanguine inventor:—"The same wire that brings light to you will also bring power and heat. With the power you can run an elevator, a sewing-machine, or any other mechanical contrivance which requires a motor, and by means of the heat you may cook your food. To utilise the heat it will only be necessary to have the ovens or stoves properly arranged for its reception. This can be done at trifling cost. I have computed the relative cost of the light, power, and heat generated by the electricity transmitted to be but a fraction of the cost where obtained in the ordinary way. By a battery or steam-power it is forty-six times cheaper, and by water power probably ninety-five per cent. cheaper."

The light from the carbons has often been compared to the light of the moon, and after reading this account of Mr. Edison's doings we are more than ever convinced that there is a good deal of moonshine about it. Unless he has discovered some substitute for the carbon points, and several new qualities of electricity, the account we quote from is simply that of an impossibility. That Mr. Edison has made some new and perhaps valuable discovery there is no reason to doubt, but until details are before us we must receive all statements with extreme caution. It will, perhaps, help us not to be too precipitate in esponsing the claims of either side to remember that there are three separate interests at work. First there are the electricians, next the gas shareholders, and last, but not least, the dealers in those shares.

The light has now been adopted for interior illumination by Messrs. Wells, of Shoreditch, and by the London Stereoscopic Company in Regent Street, so that we soon may hope to have some reliable data to go upon as to its advantages and disadvantages. Messrs. Pullar, the well-known dyers, of Perth, have also introduced it into their workshops. Its great superiority over all other lights where colours are concerned may be gauged when it is remembered that the light is actually whiter than that of the sun itself.

Mr. Edison's inventions formed the subject of a lecture given by Professor Barrett at the Midland Institute a fortnight ago. Among other instruments the Carbon Telephone was tested with the most surprising results. In the ordinary Bell Telephone the sounds heard are so very weak that it really requires great attention and absolute silence in the neighbourhood of the listener to hear them at all. But with Mr. Edison's telephone, and with the addition of a paper cone to the mouthpiece, an audience of 1,500 people were able to hear on the above occasion such sudden exclamations as "Bravo!" "Holloa!" &c., with the greatest ease. There is no doubt that, if telephony is to play an important part in the future of telegraphy, the carbon form will be one of the first to claim attention. We append a diagram which will give a rough idea of its interior arrangements.



A button of carbon is enclosed within an ebonite ring, one side of it being connected by a screw with the metallic frame of the instrument, and the other side being covered with a layer of platinum foil. Over this foil is a plate of glass to which is attached a round knob of metal. This knob slightly touches the iron plate which closes the mouthpiece of the telephone. The variations of pressure conveyed to the carbon button are converted into undulating currents of electricity, and speech is reproduced as in other systems of telephony.

It will be seen that the arrangement of the carbon is very similar to that exhibited in the microtasmeter of the same inventor which was figured in these pages two months ago. The latter instrument was in point of fact the offspring of the former.

PROFESSIONAL PELICANS

There are agents which combine the most antipathetic acids; and opinions which unite the most dissimilar types. Thus a Madonna and a Malaprop, the Ugolinos and the Lears, would probably agree on the one point that of all delights those which paternity yields are the most largely burdened by duties, the most frequently tempered by patent unpleasantness. The baby kisses are balsam for many wounds; but the boy's bills are bitter reminders that one is growing older, and possibly not richer. Girlish endearments are delicately pleasant to most men; but days come when girls get engaged to paupers or to prigs, sometimes to a combination of both, and delight in the possession of daughters is changed to a sorrow and a humiliation. Our interest in our offspring wanes inevitably as the children begin to walk alone, and undisguisedly dissent from our views of politics, and literature, and morals. Only in exceptional cases and classes are the joys of of paternity perpetual. Let your child paint pictures, write books, play parts, sing, or dance, or, indeed, do anything that makes the inherited name public property for the nonce or for ever, and you may count upon long years of paternal enjoyment, an age of mingled self-sacrifice and self-satisfaction. Painter, and player, and poet, are proverbially children in their dealings with the world; how much more child-like must they not be in their dealings with a proud father and fostering mother? And if one was proud of the cherub who recited La Fontaine's fables with a tolerable accent at dessert, what fine parental exultation must seize one when the cherub has blossomed into a demi-god with three pages to himself in "Men of the Time," and his noble head turned half-a-dozen ways in the windows of the London Stereoscopic Company? To worship, and scold, and coddle that demi-god itself constitutes professional pelicanism, and that is a habit of mind and body as happy as middle-aged manhood or womanhood can pretend to anywhere.

Of course the professional pelican must endure certain pains and penalties in the preparation of his or her young for the world's arena. In heraldry, when the bird is drawn in the act of feeding its progeny with its blood, it is prettily called a "Pelican in her piety." In real life the pelican is very often indeed in her piety. She must give, and give bountifully, in care and coin of the realm. Later on, when success is achieved, she may be described as a pelican in her pride. Then the type is one no sociologist should omit from his collection. It is easily recognisable. The mothers of artists, comedians, authors, and the rest are marked indelibly, unmistakeably in features not seldom, as well as in character. Who requires more than a glance to analyse the Cornelia of the studio—the good woman who prizes her child's crude and jejune sketches, even as the dealers prize his present masterpieces? In those inevitable and inevitably bad and big studies for "Socrates Drinking the Hemlock," and "Boadicea Haranguing her Army," planned by the ambition of eighteen, she sees potent promise of the achievement of thirty-eight. No stroke of his pencil is to her worthless, and she will hoard up his blotting paper rather than that one should be lost. She will have pored over Vasari, and Reynolds, and Ruskin, and Charles Blanc in order to get weapons wherewith to defend her painter's school against all comers. She will live in suburbs her soul abhors because they are favoured by a certain light, and, above all, by a certain set; and she will endure the tobacco and conversational narrowness of that set, when secretly her spirit pines for nothing loftier or lovelier than Gower Street and an occasional rubber with the curate. Her face has acquired the peculiar contracted expression of the professional model. She has sat as Marie de Medici, Madame Roland, Queen Anne, and Elizabeth Fry. She is learned in the art of draping, and mixing colours; and, despite her crass, æsthetic ignorance, by dint of long and rapt contemplation of the hero's canvases, she has acquired a certain critical knack that enables her to point out which foreshortening is the least sublime, and which light the least cruelly unfavourable to the masterpiece.

Literature, it is obvious, must be somewhat less compatible with professional pelicanism. The scribe, as a rule, requires little active aid, and home criticism generally offends a man who dwells mentally among the critics of all time. Still one can make much of one's young even when one's young are familiar with Carlyle, Sainte-Beuve, and Macaulay, and chiefly want to "be let alone" to do their work. There are mothers who will "hold the pens" like Dora, while the transcendent genius throws off his "Stanzas to Illuminata," or his "Views on the Policy of Equivalents." There are pelicans who will copy for him, attempt researches at the British Museum; and will sedulously "faire de l'intérêt" for him wherever they may go—advertise him socially by all means in their power. They will openly denounce the paper where his poetry has been insufficiently appreciated as a venal and vile chronicle of the gutter. The critic who has said sweet things in favour of his prose she will follow and favour from the beginning to the end of his career, and let him gather together those chips of an author, which Mr. Wendell Holmes says make a critic, and she will be the first to buy the volume and the last to fall asleep over it.

But it is in a theatrical sphere that the professional pelican is most assiduous "in her piety," most curious in the characteristics she presents to the world. The Mère d'actrice is a figure that no latter French moralist has forgotten to sketch, from Roqueplan to Balzac, to Gavarni, that Balzac of the brush. With us and in our own days no doubt she does not appear with the traditional reticule and goloshes (are reticules and goloshes to be found out of pleiocene layers?); nor, let us hope, is she the moral latitudinarian she was in Gavarni's plates, and the Scènes de la Vie Parisienne. But some features she has in common with her prototypes. In rigorous cultivation of every outward advantage which her daughter may possess the Cockney pelican is as persistent and as conspicuous as her Parisian sister. The pelican will affront all the draughts of those modern Caves of Æolus, the wings, for hours rather than forego the duty of tendering the powder puff,—and, perhaps, another harmless little instrument or two—which is to mitigate the effect of glaring gaslights and undue activity. Such pelicans are not, may be, the most respectable of their kind, but they are assuredly the kindliest, and the most comforting. There is always an impression pervading the minds of theatrical mothers that the gifted young creatures in gauze and cotton who sometimes bear their name are little more or better than automata with a taste for Guardsmen. The mechanism must be kept well lubricated, and the detrimentals must be kept well away. In pursuance of such pure aims the pelican of the side-scenes passes a not unpleasant life, and secures, if not the happiness, at any rate the material comfort and social respectability of her charge. Patience itself in dealing with the perfervid fancies, the angry whims, and conceit that traverse the heated brain of the histrion; she is also vigilance itself in making sure that she shall be professionally at her best, and morally—well, not nearly as bad as she might easily be. If she will not tolerate the profitless presence of compromising cavaliers, at least she will invariably see that the cab is punctual and the supper hot. And it is to be hoped that there are many young pelicans playing parts who are sensible enough to prefer hot suppers to little flirtations. Of the two, the latter often cause the worst nightmares.

LEEDS AND LEEDS

Bradford-on-Avon has this in common with its Yorkshire namesake—that both are cloth towns. Bradford the Less has even set up a shoddy mill; its streets ring with the sound of true North-country clogs; it does its best to pollute its river after the fashion of a big mill town. But Leeds in Kent in nothing but the name is in the least like the capital of the West Riding. A sleepy little village, with old unrestored church rich in monuments, and the scanty ruins of a priory, once the grandest in Mid-Kent, it is within half a mile of as fine a castle as you can find in the whole county, a castle begun by the Crèvecœurs just after the Conquest, and largely added to by that great castle builder, Henry VIII., who (they tell us) "perceived the advantages of its strategic position, commanding several of the great Kentish roads."

Londoners mustn't forget the home counties now that the railways take them every season further and further afield. And, of all the easy trips from Saturday to Monday, we know none more interesting than to drop down to Maidstone and walk through Mote Park, which was truly a gemote or gathering place when George III. and his wife went about reviewing Volunteers and cheering people up against the fear of invasion. Thence to Otham, where are paper-mills; old farmhouses (one has been in the same family for four hundred years); memories of Bishop Horne, who here wrote his book on the Psalms; a partly Norman church with monuments (as there always are in every little Kentish church), to the astonishment of the West countryman accustomed to look for them only in large and important churches; and above all Gore Court, a typical old English house with splendid entrance hall.

From Otham it is a short two miles to Leeds village, where one can't help feeling that an unrestored church here and there is a blessing in these days when architects have it all their own way, and when the church building of the last two centuries seems doomed to extinction. "Carpenter's Gothic," the so-called

Gothic of forty years ago, is atrocious; but the quaint additions of the Stuart and Georgian times deserve preserving in a few cases just to show us how not to build. There is a garret-window in the roof of Leeds Church just like the garret-window of an old red-brick warehouse in Spitalfields. How men could build it who had before them the exquisite First Pointed window just east of the porch, it is hard to understand; but they did build it, and if it and all like it are done away with we shall run the chance of forgetting what manner of men our fathers were in regard to their appreciation of Church architecture. The worst of it is, too, that restoration generally means doing away with the old monuments, or at least banishing them to the basement of the tower. This is hardly fair. Many of the "confectionery" alabasters of Elizabeth and James I. are no doubt horribly "out of keeping" with a mediæval church; so are the heathenish busts, and Faiths, and geniuses with torches upside down, of a century or so later. But yet the history of a parish is written in its monuments. The huge pile blocking up a chancel window and throwing its shadow over the Communion table represents a state of things in which Squire Broadacres, J.P., was virtually king and emperor in the whole neighbourhood. It was feudalism without the mitigation of mediæval times. The Reformation had destroyed the counterpoise, such as it was, afforded by the Church; the war against Charles I. had got rid of those king's prerogatives which were so often invoked by small folks against the oppressive great. Broadacres had it all his own way; with his full-bottomed wig and his air of ineffable self-complacency he looks the very embodiment of a landlord's right to do what he likes with his own; and if only his descendants could have lived within their income, and not gone in for contested elections, there is no knowing how long he might have held his own against "progress." It is well that here and there his monument should be preserved in situ, not relegated to a back corner amid the mops and besoms, but filling space, the visible presentment of a power that made itself felt, as it was when he was gathered to his fathers.

But Leeds Castle is the thing to see at Leeds. The park is beautiful, finer perhaps than Knowle; such huge sweet chestnuts (a feature of Kentish parks), big elms and oaks of course, and a group of eleven ash-trees, notable even in this well-wooded district. Then there is "the romantic grove through which the Len tumbles"—these are Horace Walpole's words; and the lake made by damming up this stream—which lake is a really big piece of water, on three islands in which the Castle stands. It must have been a strong place in the old time. On one island is the barbican (in ruins), on another the gatehouse and chapel, on the third the main part of the building; and each could be cut off and separately defended by drawbridge and portcullis. Now, with the gay flower-beds on the island's edge, and the grand trees round the bridge, and the big Tudor windows, it is a pleasant mixture—such as one meets oftener in Kent than elsewhere—of the feudal castle and the "Tudor" dwelling-house.

It has a long history. The Crèvecœurs handed it to the De Leybornes, and they, seeing Edward I. was mightily jealous of his lesser nobles owning castles, made the best of things by giving it to the Crown. In Edward II.'s time its castellan, Colepepper, went over to the Lancastrians, and after a stout resistance was taken and hanged before the chief gate by the Earl of Pembroke. Richard II. was often there, his last visit being when he was a sorrowful prisoner, given (as Shakespeare says) to "sit upon the ground and tell sad stories of the fate of kings." Archbishop Chichely there held his court in 1440 to try the Duchess of Gloucester for witchcraft. Sir E. Filmer, the stout royalist, who wrote about the "right of kings divine," and not only so, but fought and stood sieges as well, was imprisoned there. Plenty of stir and bustle this quiet lovely park and these calm grey walls have seen. But even if it had no history it would be well worth visiting. Try it your next holiday; and from what has here been said you may rest satisfied that the trial won't disappoint you. H. S. F.

"CYPRUS," by R. Hamilton Lang (Macmillan and Co.).—A residence of over nine years in Cyprus, as manager of the Imperial Ottoman Bank Agency at Larnaca—a post where to endless opportunities of becoming acquainted with the ins and outs of Turkish administration were added from time to time the work of acting Vice-Consul (pending official vacancies) for the British Government, and the private amusements of antiquarian research and of farming on a small scale as lessee of an estate at Pyla—entitles Mr. Lang to speak of our new acquisition with an authority not to be conceded to the chronicler of a few weeks' or a few months' visit. Thus to his general testimony to the fertility—when there came neither droughts nor locusts—of the soil; and the comparative healthiness—when due precautions are taken against fever, dysentery, and sunstroke—of the climate we must necessarily assign great weight. On the whole, however, even in Mr. Lang's pages, the interest inspired by Cyprus, apart from its somewhat doubtful advantages as a military outpost, is chiefly of the antiquarian sort. A forgotten corner of the Turkish Empire, with a quiet little population, governed from afar by the Vali of the Archipelago, with a little army not meant to serve abroad, and little coast-towns without any harbours, Cyprus had long ceased to count for very much in the world's history. For the period of its real greatness we must go back to times that are positively prehistoric, to days when Sidon spoke of Tyre as an upstart city, to the era of the inscriptions which are neither Greek nor Phœnician but older possibly than either, of the combats by sea and land with the monarchs of Assyria. A decaying island even under the Romans, decaying still more beneath the Byzantine sovereigns, exchanging with torpid indifference the rule of the Lusignans for the dominion of Venice, the dominion of Venice for the sovereignty of the Porte, it had rather dwindled by continuous decline than been brought low by great convulsions. Of Mr. Lang's instructive volume the first half is devoted to the history of the island, the second to its present prospects and capabilities. That its natives will become a happy people under our rule, if only we do not strive to force them too quickly into Western ways; that its mineral resources will, at the least, repay a thorough investigation; and that foreign capital may find profitable employment, either in farming enterprises of its own or in advances to the native cultivator, are points on which Mr. Lang entertains no doubt. Better sanitary arrangements, too, must diminish the risk to health, even for those who have neither means nor patience to adopt the precautions which secured our author from anything like serious sickness. On the whole, therefore, it seems probable that Cyprus, if not the acquisition it was thought at first, may prove in the end a not unprofitable dependency. Meanwhile we can heartily commend Mr. Lang's most interesting volume, with its admirable maps both general and special, no less to those who contemplate business connections with the island than to the general student of Cypriote antiquities, history, and topography.

A graceful and warm-hearted preface by the survivor of "the Author-Couple" well ushers in the bright little volume—reprints in part from the Gentleman's Magazine—entitled "Recollections of Writers" (S. Low and Co.), by Charles and Mary Cowden Clarke. Friends of Keats, Hazlitt, Leigh Hunt, the Lambs, &c., in youth, of Jerrold and Charles Dickens in middle life, the accomplished pair, of whom the authoress of the "Concordance to Shakespeare" alone survives to preface and to edit this last volume, embraced within the circle of their memories the entire dynasty of poets, essayists, and novelists, whose genius, essentially London-nursed, is linked in a thousand associations with the green lanes and by-ways of our London suburbs. There are few names, in truth, at any rate in the literature of the first half of our century, but cross us somewhere in the pleasant chapters of "General Recollections," which form the opening portion of the volume; albeit even these must yield in depth of interest to the separate memoirs of individual friends—Keats, Charles and Mary Lamb, Leigh Hunt, Jerrold, and Dickens—for which it will more especially be treasured. Of these, but most, perhaps, of all of the delightful recollections and and characteristic letters of Leigh Hunt and of the chapter on the poet Keats—the schoolfellow in old Enfield days, the intimate through life, of Charles Cowden Clarke—it would be difficult to speak too warmly. But in the whole volume you can hardly find a page that will not yield something to repay the search either in its own intrinsic merit or as connected with some honoured name.

"Pleasant Ways in Science (Chatto and Windus), by the indefatigable Mr. R. A. Proctor, lead us by turns from strange phenomena in the stellar regions to curious mysteries of our own little world—from contemplation of star-mist and drift to puzzling inquiries as to the existence of the sea-serpent or the possible chances of arriving at the Pole. Of their entertaining character it is unnecessary to speak. What youthful reader will ever tire for instance, of reading, how the sun blazed up for a minute or two in 1859 to the intense discomfort of electricians upon earth, of wondering why he did so then, and when he is likely to do so next, and what would have been the consequences to the human race if such sudden increase of light had been less limited in its area or longer in duration, or of speculating on the chances for and against the survival of a stray pair of Enaliosauri out of the secondary era to breed sea-serpents in the Pacific depths? Their utility to the unlearned reader is perhaps less obvious. But after all there is no reason why such delightful speculations should be the monopoly of those who tread the rugged pathway of the severest science.

The favourable reception accorded by the public to his last season's book on "Irish Hunting History" has induced, we are told, Mr. O'Connor Morris to publish under the title of "Hibernia Venatica" (Chapman and Hall), a fresh instalment of letters to the Field anent hunting and huntsmen in the sister kingdom, but chiefly in the spreading "grasseries" of Meath and Kildare, the (for hunting purposes) unrivalled valleys of the Liffey and the Boyne. Praise of such a volume from a non-riding critic for whom even the many photographs of the fair huntresses of Erin in their hunting-habits have slender charm and in whose ears is curiously ringing Macaulay's pet story of Guicciardini and the prisoner, would be probably injudicious and certainly insincere. From hunting readers the undeniably spirited descriptions of cross-country rides will no doubt secure for it a hearty welcome.

A new edition—pocket in point of size, but in respect of matter both revised and enlarged—of "The Cruise of H.M.S. Challenger," by W. J. Spry, R.N., a work which seems by a sort of survival of the fittest to have established itself as the most popular account of that famous voyage, may be commended to the young people who can forgive a rather small type for the convenience of a book that can be held easily in the hand.

A little pamphlet—also pocket-size—"Cabul: the Ameer, the Country, and the People," by Phil. Robinson (S. Low and Co.), will tell its readers all they care to know of the mountain tribes, the races of Afghanistan, and the lines of advance from the Russian provinces to the North-west of India. The accompanying map, though small and almost destitute of shading, is in other respects unusually good and clear.

Ardent Conservatives who have sometimes writhed over Mr. Punch's caricatures of their leader may take fair revenge in the rival cartoons of Judy, entitled "The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone from Judy's Point of View" (Judy Office, Fleet Street). Although somewhat more of slashing broadsword blows than delicate rapier thrusts, the caricatures are always vigorous, and not unfrequently extremely happy. A few indeed, e.g., "Over Their Toes," or Mr. Gladstone as a nursemaid wheeling the Ballot Bill in a perambulator over Lord Derby's feet, "The Careless Nursemaid," or the baby colonies going over the side while Lord Granville flirts with Mr. Gladstone on the cliff, fall not far short of the point and delicacy of Tenniel.

No one, we think, will feel any regret that the "prize ring" is practically now a thing of the past, after reading "Pendragon's" "Modern Boxing" (E. J. Francis and Co.).—"The noble art of self-defence" is a healthy exercise in itself, and is a legitimate branch of athletics; but the author's particulars of "famous fights," and descriptions of the savage ruffianism which apparently were inseparable from them, only make one rejoice the more that they have been put down. "Pendragon's" reminiscences are interesting as affording pictures of a bygone state of things, but they are pictures whose tones are garish, and whose subjects are painful and unpleasant in the extreme.

While providing solid historical and religious matter, the Christian Knowledge Society also supplies stories with good morals, suited to girls and boys of varied ages. Two volumes are specially addressed to candidates for confirmation, and through both runs the same maxim, forgiveness of injuries. Sober in teaching and unaffected in tone, "The Royal Banner," by Austin Clare, well describes the efforts of some rough fishing lads after the better life, and intermingles stirring episodes of the dangers of the sea; while "Harry Preston," by the author of "Ellen Mansel," though hardly so interesting, equally illustrates the overcoming of evil by good. A funereal hue pervades "Percy Trevor's Training," by the author of "Motherless Maggie," by reason of three death-beds and several illnesses; but there is something very attractive in the tiny schoolboy whose gentle influence develops his cold selfish tutor into a noble, warm-hearted man. Little Jack's death is pathetically told, and Miss Singer, with her Count Fosco-like collection of birds is decidedly amusing.—Young ladies inclined to neglect home duties for Church work may profit by Annette Lyster's "North Wind and Sunshine," whose enthusiastic heroine—like Mrs. Jellyby with the African Missions—is all zeal for the welfare of the poor outside her home, and utterly regardless of the comfort and happiness of her family circle.—Boys have their turn in "Cringlewood Court," by F. Scarlett Potter, a lively record of Christmas holidays in the country, where three London lads revel in field sports, their minds being duly improved every evening by a studious uncle, who reads them accounts of the wonders of the world.—Mr. W. H. G. Kingston also has two new sea stories ready, and very spirited are the adventures of "Ned Garth," a middy on board a British slave-chaser, who is caught himself by the Arabs, and escapes through many perils.—Malayan pirates are the enemies of "The Mate of the Lily" during a cruise in the East Indies, and the Lily's crew have many an exciting fight with armed prahus. Adventure, too, is the keynote of "Real Stories from Many Lands," in which Lady Verney, following Mr. Goschen's suggestion that children need change of air intellectually as well as physically, furnishes some entertaining abstracts of heroic deeds and strange events afar off.—Old-fashioned are the times and prim is the story of "Kitty Bligh's Birthday," by A. H. Engelbach, provided as it is with a vulgar, wicked squire, a beneficent uncle, and a self-sacrificing niece.—The same somewhat antiquated tone prevails in "As Good as Gold," by F. Harrison, which, contrary to all tradition, makes Tommy good and Harry naughty.—The sad effects of disobedience are traced in "A Bonfire," by "M. D.;" and a mild edition of the same fault is illustrated by "Hereward Dayrell," a mediocre collection of childish tales by Eadgyth.—"The Little Dwarf's Mirror" is a pretty and fanciful Teutonic creation adapted by "A. L. G.;" and lastly come some excellent "Bible Stories," by "M. A. B.," nicely illustrated, and written chiefly in monosyllables, all longer words being divided, while the stories are formed into a consecutive narrative.

The heroine of "My Mother's Diamonds," by M. J. Greer (Griffith and Farran), seems hardly as charming as the authoress wishes her to appear. Wilful and self-reliant Ellie fails utterly to manage a household and her unruly brothers and sisters, and proves a very disagreeable damsel till she marries an amiable curate. The story is very readable, however, and has the necessary flavour of excitement provided by a family mystery.—"Queen Dora," by Kathleen Knox (same publishers), is much more pleasant. Dora is original enough in her style of bringing up, but is not priggish in her goodness, and puts her artistic education to practical use by designing window curtains when her family comes down in the world.

The simple unexciting tales of the "Bluebell Series," brought out by Messrs. Marcus Ward, are wholesome light reading for girls. In "A Simple Maiden," Leslie Keith, running in well-known grooves, satisfactorily contrasts a loving, practical girl with a beautiful shallow coquette amidst a romantic background of Rhenish school life; but more insight of character and sense of humour are shown in "Clare," by Lizzie Aldridge. Clare herself, notwithstanding her deep feelings, is a trifle foolish, and Mrs. Garland too palpably suggests Mrs. Malaprop; but the story is well carried out.—Sir Walter Scott's familiar fictions continue to appear in a new garb in Messrs. Ward's "Illustrated Waverley Novels," which now include "The Antiquary" and "Quentin Durward." The clear type, suitable engravings, and general get-up of the volumes render them fit for any library shelves, and their cheap form places them within reach of limited purses.

French peasant life in the Pyrenees, with its dangers from flood and wolf, its secret smuggling, and the penalties of the imperative custom forcing each bridegroom to give his bride a gold locket and chain, is charmingly illustrated by Frances Martin's "Michelle" (Hurst and Blackett). The authoress has a rare faculty of description, presenting each scene distinct to the reader, while she has chosen an original subject, and worked it out with pathos. The accompanying story of Little Jack is as powerful, but depressingly gloomy.

Again the sufferings of the Israelites in Egypt form a Scriptural novel. "Ephraim and Helah," by E. Hodder (Hodder and Stoughton), unites the human attraction of two sets of lovers with the Biblical interest of the Exodus; and, although unadorned by the learned descriptions of Professor Ebers or the Rev. G. H. Ingraham in similar Egyptian subjects, Mr. Hodder's story is well told in plain and unaffected language.

Tragedies on sea and shore have recently been so painfully real, that their semblance in fiction is hardly welcome. Thus when M. Jules Verne draws a sadly life-like picture of the miseries of shipwrecked sufferers in "The Survivors of the Chancellor" (Sampson Low), depicting his characters as driven from their ship by fire and water, enduring tortures of thirst and starvation, and even reduced to cannibalism, we can only wish the author to return to those delightfully impossible tales of the miraculous in which he stands unrivalled. Miss Frewer's translation is well executed. It is cheering to turn to the humorous holiday scenes in the Adirondack Mountains of Mr. Charles Dudley Warner's "In a Wilderness" (Sampson Low, Rose Library). Mr. Warner sees a comic side to everything, and a true love of Nature peeps through all his fun. There is plenty of wit, too, in "A Rollicking Tour in the Land of the Gael" (A. Gardner), by Tag, Rag, and Bobtail, whose Irish adventures we remember some time since. Enriched with drawings suggestive of the "Book of Nonsense," the Tour shows the jovial trio as merry as ever.

Butterfly collectors of the past summer anxious to preserve and arrange their treasures will find plenty of information in "Collecting Butterflies and Moths" (The Bazaar), reprinted from Mr. M. Brown's "Practical Taxidermy." The virtues of cold water are warmly set forth in "Testimony to the Efficacy of Hydropathy in Cases of Disease," by R. Metcalfe (Tweedie), to which is appended Lord Lytton's "Confessions of a Water Patient."—Transatlantic prose and verse are strong in Vol. III. of "The Daisy" (Dickinson and Lobb), a sensible magazine, including serial stories, miscellaneous articles, and good advice.—We have received No. V. of "Tales from Blackwood" (Blackwood), containing "Who Painted the Great Murillo," and the "Military Adventure in the Pyrenees;" and the "Reports for 1877 of the Charity Organisation Society" (Central Office).

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY has obtained a medal at the Paris Exhibition. The award is understood to be made for the excellence, cheapness, and beneficial tendency of the Society's publications.

A PROPHET, as a rule, has little honour in his own country, but India, and Bengal in particular, appears to be an exception to the rule, as there is great rejoicing over the native youths who return from Europe with an English education. For instance, the East (a native paper of Dacca) gives the following description of a young Bengali barrister who had lately returned from England:—"Baboo Anund Mohun Bose is an object of love and admiration to every Bengalee. He is a jewel in the veriest sense of the word. His simple, sweet nature, winning manners, affability, and want of even a small modicum of affectation, which is so common to those who have been to England, and taken everybody by surprise. Possessed of a bright countenance and intelligent look, his presence is delightful and charming to all. He has practically shown by his own example that pride, vanity, and other blemishes of character do not necessarily belong to high intellectual attainments and sound education."

VINCENNES IN THE 17TH CENTURY

"The Monks of Thelema: an Invention," by Walter Besant and James Rice, authors of "Ready-Money Mortiboy," &c. (3 vols.: Chatto and Windus).—This "invention," as the authors style their very clever work, is not properly to be considered a novel, but an extravaganza, a jeu d'esprit where whim and fancy have freest play, and in which we have no right to ask if a situation is probable so long as it is striking or amusing. Alan Dunlop, the hero, a young man eminently well born, and the owner of many broad acres, besides the magnificent old mansion of Weyland Court, has fallen, during his career at Oxford, under the influence of "the Great Movement of the Nineteenth Century," that is to say, "the project for advancing humanity by digging ditches and making roads." He conceives that he has a mission to reconstruct society by showing by personal example on the small scale of his own estates how culture—"what his friends called 'the Higher Culture'"—may coexist with the necessities of the roughest daily toil. So he establishes a co-operative farm under the management of a bailiff, and, clad in the orthodox smock-frock, takes his place among the tillers of the soil, abandoning Weyland Court for a two-roomed cottage, and trying to subsist on the eighteen or twenty shillings a week he can earn as a field-labourer. Meanwhile he makes over the Court to a community of young ladies and gentlemen, whose one *un*monastic rule is the saying of Rabelais, "Fay ce que vouldras," and who lead together the pleasantest life attainable, due regard being continually paid to all the proprieties and to "gentlehood." The doings of the community of Thelema have, however, but a slender connection with Alan Dunlop's experiment in social reform, which, of course turns out a most disastrous failure. He is cheated and plundered on the grand scale on all sides, and first and foremost by his rascally bailiff; the labourers resent his presence amongst them as an intrusion, and give him as wide a berth as possible; and his eloquent tracts on the advantages of the institutions he has provided for their benefit—a Co-operative store, a Good Liquor Bar, a Public Bath and Laundry, &c.—fail to impress their stolid minds, fast bound to the chain of custom. At last Alan, determined not to be beaten, conceives the desperate resolve of bridging over the gulf between himself and his people by taking a wife out of their ranks, and is only saved from carrying out this insane project by a little conspiracy among his friends at the Court, which leaves the girl married to the real man of her choice, the young gamekeeper, and Alan free to be happy with the Abbess Miranda, the lady with whom he discovers he has been, without knowing it, in love all his life. The history of Alan's perplexities, trials, and troubles in his self-chosen career of carter, thatcher, and the rest of it is, at the first, exquisitely entertaining, so entertaining, indeed, that it seems almost ungrateful to say aught but good of a book which we have read with so much delight. We must, however, remark that the charm of an extravaganza of this kind lying wholly in its surprises, the subject is dwelt on at undue length. Much the same criticism is applicable also to the proceedings of the community of the Abbey. A marked feature in the book is its satire on the pretensions and affectations of the rather priggish school among us who profess to be disciples of "the Higher Thought" and "the Higher Culture" in art and philosophy. Of this school we have a brilliant specimen in Mr. Paul Rondelet, Fellow of Lothian College, Oxford, who is certainly a most amusing sketch, though the caricature is a little too broad and exaggerated. Satire of this "Neo-Paganism" seems a favourite theme with novelists just at present, as Messrs. Besant and Rice here are but following in the steps of Mr. Mallock, Mr. M'Carthy, and the anonymous author of "John-a-Dreams." But no matter what criticism it may be open to, "The Monks of Thelema" will be memorable among the books of the year for its ingenuity and the bright sallies of fun and gaiety we meet with in pages, and cannot fail to be appreciated by readers who come to its flights of fancy in a sympathetic mood.

"Poganuc People: Their Loves and Lives," by Harriet Beecher Stowe (Sampson Low, Marston and Co).—Those whose idea of Mrs. Beecher Stowe as a novelist is based upon recollections, probably somewhat dim and indistinct, of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" will be likely to get quite a new impression of her powers from this really delightful volume. It is a picture of life such as it was sixty years ago in a mountain village in Connecticut, which may stand as a type of New England villages in those days on which the author manifestly looks back with some regret, "when its people were of our own blood and race, and the pauper population of Europe had not as yet been landed upon our shores." The "humours" of the various strata of Poganuc society, the conflicts between the established Congregationalism and the Episcopalianism which was just beginning to raise its head in New England against heavy odds, the religious revival, and the celebration of the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence in days when men could still remember the great struggle, are brought before us with much truth to nature and animation, and no little humour; while the descriptions of the oncoming of the late New England spring, and the glories of the brief New England summer, are exceedingly pretty. The characters, too, take hold of us as the author meant that they should. Dolly Cushing, the dreamy little enthusiast, so very a child for all her quick and solemn fancies, makes a charming child-heroine; whilst from Hiel Jones and Nabby Higgins we have abundance of genuine Yankee humour. Mrs. Stowe is evidently at home in such scenes as she here depicts, and we can only hope she may give us some more of them. That she could write powerfully the world knew from "Uncle Tom's Cabin," but the sobriety and simplicity of taste, and high artistic finish of execution which we find in "Poganuc People" are gifts with which, we confess, we did not credit her.

"Corrafin," by the author of "Marley Castle" (2 vols.: Tinsley).—In the specimens of Irish wit or Irish blundering, and the broadly comic situations which abound in these pages, we are reminded not a little of the earlier novels of Lever, though, of course, what we have here is but a pale reflection of the exuberant drollery and geniality which constitute the attraction of "Charles O'Malley" and its companions. For the love story, which forms the backbone of the tale, we do not greatly care. It is full of strange complications and misunderstandings; and we are left at the last in doubt whether the hero, who is united to the lady of his love on what desponding bystanders regard as his deathbed, will recover to be happy with her or not, though from a parting word let fall by the author there is room for the sympathetic reader to hope for the best. The book can hardly be deemed a success, but there is, perhaps, good enough in it to make a kindly critic hesitate to pronounce it a total failure. There can be no doubt, however, that the episode of the elopement of the young wife with the brother-officer and intimate friend of her husband is one that on all grounds had much better have been omitted.

We have received "Frozen Hearts, a Romance," by G. Webb Appleton (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley), a tale of a highly sensational and melodramatic character, not altogether without merit of its kind, though the kind is one for which we have little admiration; also "Irene's Dower," by Charles Deslys, translated by Mrs. George Henry (Remington and Co.), and "The Baron of Eppenfeld; or, The Poor Clare, a Mediæval Romance," by J. J. Hayden (Samuel Tinsley).

HUBERT HERKOMER

Like many other artists who have greatly distinguished themselves in England, Mr. Herkomer is not English by extraction, or even by birth. He was born at the village of Waal, in Bavaria, on the 26th of May, 1849. Both his parents were employed, though without much worldly success, in the practice of art; his father was, and still is, a wood-carver of singular taste and skill. When their child was two years old they emigrated to America, and four years later, in the same vain search of fortune, to England, where they settled in Southampton in 1857. The early development of the artist was much retarded by ill-health and limited means. In his father's workshop he picked up the rudiments of his education, and with them the intense desire to be a painter. At the age of thirteen he entered the art-school at Southampton, and won a bronze medal before he was fourteen. In 1865 the elder Mr. Herkomer received a commission to carve a series of life-size figures after Peter Visscher, and for this purpose he migrated with his son to Munich. They arrived in that city just one week before the Vorbereitungsschule, or preparatory art-school, closed; but within that time Hubert Herkomer had contrived to draw a head of Demosthenes which won the hearty praise of Professor Echter, and that distinguished man did much to further the boy's studies. At Munich he attended a life-school for the first time, and was making great progress, when the fear of losing his English citizenship forced the father to return to London before the winter was out. In March, 1866, Mr. Herkomer entered the schools at South Kensington, and after working through the term of five months was obliged to return to Southampton. His energy, however, was indomitable; he went round the town, and succeeded in firing so many young men of his own standing that a life-school was started in Southampton. Among his associates was Mr. E. J. Gregory, since so distinguished as a powerful draughtsman. At Christmas the young painters opened a modest little exhibition of their works, and Mr. Herkomer had the pleasure of selling his first picture. In 1867 he went back to South Kensington, but little distinct progress could be recorded. The next year the young artist, having recovered his strength, determined on an original experiment. He lodged himself free of rent on some straw in a ruined house in the village of Hythe, on the other side of Southampton Water, and managed to live there for a considerable time on the very minimum of means. He rose at 3 A.M. each morning, and painted two pictures by which he made his London début in the Dudley of 1869. The result of this success was that he came up to town to try his fortune, suffering greatly from inexperience and poverty, but already winning friends by his manifest genius. Of these friends one of the earliest and kindliest was Mr. Edward Dalziel. In Sussex, in the autumn of 1869, he painted a large water-colour drawing, entitled "Hoeing," which was sent in to the Dudley of the next spring, and to the young artist's infinite surprise and delight, hung not merely on the line, but in the place of honour. It was about this time that Mr. Herkomer became connected with The Graphic, in working for which paper he gained, so he considers, the greatest and the most valuable part of his art-education. The volumes of The Graphic from 1869 to 1873 will be found to contain many of Mr. Herkomer's most spirited and most serious compositions. He was now raised above the painful anxiety that had so long worn him, and he continued to advance very rapidly in power and originality. His drawings on wood for The Graphic attracted very much attention, and he received commissions to execute many of these designs in water-colour. In 1870 he went to Trèport, in Normandy, and there painted "Reading War News," which had so much success in the following year. It was as early, too, as 1870 that there appeared in The Graphic the first rough draft of the composition of the "Chelsea Pensioners," a subject that at first pleased no one but the manager of the paper, who commissioned the artist to paint him a water-colour drawing of it. In 1871 Mr. Herkomer, in conjunction with his old friend, Mr. Gregory, was invited to join the Institute of Water Colours. The same year he spent six months painting in the Bavarian Alps. From this time forward Mr. Herkomer's career has been a series of successes. In 1873 his first Academy picture, "After the Toil of the Day," enjoyed a great reputation, though too closely painted, perhaps, in discipleship of Walker. In 1874 the Institute contained a number of works, particularly the charming study called "Im Wald," which proclaimed more decidedly the painter's essential originality. In 1875 came the almost unparalleled success of the "Pensioners." It is said that when this work was brought before the Committee of the Royal Academy, weary as they were with a long day spent in judging mediocrities, they could not refrain from clapping their hands in genuine admiration. Some of them, Mr. Richmond and Mr. Leighton in particular, wrote to congratulate the artist before the day was over, and when the public was admitted to the galleries, every class of society unanimously confirmed the technical judgment of the artists. In 1876 Mr. Herkomer exhibited the melancholy Bavarian picture called "At Death's Door." It 1877 he painted a masterly portrait of Herr Wagner, and another Bavarian subject, the "Bittgang." It is not possible in so short a notice as this to enumerate nearly all the works of so fertile a painter. He was represented, as every one knows, in the Academy of this year by a singularly striking and beautiful rendering of no less commonplace a subject than old women drinking tea in the workhouse. He has filled this unpromising theme with the tenderest pathos and humour.

It would not be just to give the details of Mr. Herkomer's career without mentioning that beneath the brilliant success which is all that the world sees, he has had, even of late, to struggle against such burdens and disabilities as few men have the courage to withstand at all. Every step he has taken upward in his art has been the reward of concentrated energy and determined resistance. In 1876 he accidentally discovered that he was possessed of extraordinary mesmeric powers, and he is of opinion that this discovery will be, and has been, of considerable service to him in painting. It may be mentioned, moreover, that among his many accomplishments he includes that of music, both as composer and executant. Mr. Herkomer is a member of the Liverpool Society of Painters in Water Colours, of the Brussels Institute of Water Colours, and of the Royal Society of Water Colour Painters in the Hague. He has just received the greatest distinction that Europe can give to an artist—one of the Grand Medals of Honour of the Universal Exhibition at Paris.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.

STREET STRANGERS

Whether they have made their fortunes, as some beggars are said to do, or whether they have departed to happier hunting grounds it is impossible to say, but certainly one misses a great many familiar objects from London streets—pitiable objects many of them, but for the most part such as excited annoyance more than pity. I allude to the social highwaymen and women who used to be patrollers or haunters of certain districts which they made their own, some with a sorry pretence of earning a living by minstrelsy or mart, others being beggars pure and simple. The Vagrant Acts, however, swept away many of these, or drove them to fresh branches of the craft, for, in spite of the changes that have been made, there are doubtless as many preyers upon the charitable as ever there were, stringent rules having merely driven them to more ingenious ways of appealing for coin. Among those I miss is the very big-featured man whose loss of legs seemed to be so much capital, and who passed his life in the Blackfriars and Walworth roads, helping himself along with a stick and short crutch, making pauses here and there, and then supporting himself with what, to my youthful imagination, seemed to be a wooden letter T, which he used as a kind of perch, what time he practised a mournful imitation of the gobbling of a turkey upon a clarionet that might have been in the wars where its master lost his legs, so bound and rebound was it with hempen thread and wax. I miss, too, that joyous band of five blind men, who used to walk in a row along the kerb, scraping away on stringed instruments, from the little fiddle to the biggest bass, the varieties of the latter being supported on a wooden leg, upon which, as they were moved, they seemed to stump along like some of old Tom Hood's comic monsters, leering out of the crooked slits on either side of the strings, and emitting dreadful grunts. Those five blind fiddlers played some kind of tune, no doubt, in parts for harmony, but what the tune was no one I ever knew found out, and they rasped away at the rate of half a mile an hour, while the consumption of rosin was awful to behold.

There was a dreadful man, too, whom in childhood I looked upon as a kind of demon, so fearful were his ways and works. I can remember running away, and hiding with my fingers in my ears, when at intervals he came into our street, for so painful were the sounds he produced to me, that, like some dogs when a piano is played, I could have howled aloud, and only the fear of ridicule kept me silent. That man's appearance was, for some reason or another of the most vague nature, associated by me with eternal punishment. The trephining of a schoolfellow's head with a silver plate and "Foxe's Book of Martyrs" had something to do with it, but what I do not know. All I know is that this man produced nerve-torturing sounds that made me cry, and that he wore a tin cap like the top of a Chinese pagoda, all bells, which he jangled by no means sweetly, while by means of his elbow he beat a drum hung on his back, clanged two cymbals together with his knees, blew with his lips Pan's pipes stuck within his breast, played the violin in normal fashion, and somehow jingled a triangle with his toes. It was all "no canny" to me, and now I bethink myself I fancy I connected him with the French artist Callot's imps in "St. Anthony's Temptation." At all events, he made my young life as miserable as did the waits who woke me at melancholy hours in the winter nights, whom the streets echoed solemnly as I lay quaking in my bed.

The old organs are gone, too, those doleful grinders with a top which raised up after the faded green baize, and revealed a scene of enchantment in the shape of a long saloon in miniature, with a looking-glass back, in front of which wondrous little wooden figures waltzed round and round while a group of musicians played. The music was not nice, and sometimes the figures irreverently danced to the Old Hundredth Psalm, or "Adeste Fideles," but they are all gone, and their jaunty successors, too, the jingling, wiry, portable pianos, save one whose top is open, and whose music faint, while rude boys go behind, and drop in stones, which the owner empties out by reversing his instrument in the most perfunctory manner, just as a trombonist draws his tubes apart to get rid of the water collected from his breath.

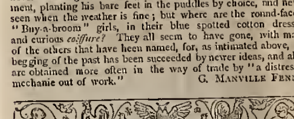
Talking of trombones suggests the ophicleide, not by any means a pleasing solo instrument; but there used to be a tall, gaunt, solemn man, who blew great guns out of a tarnished tube like the funnel of a small traction engine. I have neither seen nor heard him of late; neither have I heard that peculiarly-constituted band, composed of a trombone, harp, and big drum. It was a strange combination; the players all had red noses and played outside public-house doors. My idea always was that they were the relics of three separate bands—brass, quadrille, and orchestral—and that being the sole survivors, they had gravitated together and bound themselves by an oath never more to part. I have not seen them lately, but the last time we met the harp was looking like that of the past; its strings were few and the minstrel lazy and languid; but his brothers were vigorous in the extreme, the trombone player cutting and slashing away to the imminent danger of the public, and in some of the higher flights threatening mischief to a street lamp, while the drummer beat his vellum viciously, and as if he had a spite against the whole world; in fact, it was practically a duet between trombone and drum, and the effect was not pleasing in the extreme.

I miss in Oxford Street, too, the very clean, meek woman, in a white apron, with the three very clean, meek children, whose noses never wanted wiping in the bitterest winters. That woman never begged: she, so to speak, only meeked the carriage people, who beckoned her to the doors and awarded pence in papers as a premium to her cleanly ways. I have an idea that that woman retired on a competency; certainly she did not starve. More obtrusive were her friends the flower girls who appealed so loudly at the carriage doors to the "dear lady," and "keyind lady," till some coin or other was given, when, in place of thanks, the cunning pleaders brought out a dirty pawn-ticket, and appealed for more, so as to release some article of attire.

There used to be a sailor at a corner near the Edgware Road, who had the shortest stumps and shortest wooden legs I ever saw. He used to sweep a crossing there, and unconsciously give lessons to the young in the art of walking on stilts. For on watching him you became aware of the fact that when on two pieces of wood, whose base would be about an inch and a half across, it is impossible to stand still without a third support, supplied in this case by his stump of a broom. It must be another Hindoo gentleman that one sees now vending packets of scents. Probably he has succeeded to the business, with good-will and stock-in-trade. This one cannot smile as the one who carried on the business thirty years ago. He had a smile—a wonderful smile. Not a tremendous, carnivorous nigger grin, all teeth, but a gentle, rice-eating, appealing smile of lips and opalescent eyes—a smile that said quite plainly, "This is a cold and cheerless land, Mem Sahib; pity the poor Hindoo!" He always handed over his packet of patchouli with a shiver, and finished with a salaam, while his noble mien seemed to indicate the rajah robbed of his lands. His zenana, too, was often close by in the shape of a wonderfully ugly Englishwoman, with one eye and a corrugated face, who brought the rajah's dinner in a basin tied up in blue-dyed cotton, with a pattern all in check, like a Malayan sárong.

Thanks to police arrangements, those two exquisitely clean British workmen in white jackets are not now seen, with dwindled arms bound up tightly, till they resembled mummy skeleton limbs; nor the disgusting mock sailor who for several years suffered from the burns caused by the rain of blazing tar in a ship on fire at sea. This wretch used to parade the streets, and in a dismal recitative, as he turned his head in all directions upwards, as if on the look-out for drops of blazing tar, but really for dropping coppers, relate the horrors of the fire while he removed the rags from the loathsome sores. It was a profitable trade, for in the poorer districts the coppers came in, with an intermittent shower. The man who had the fits in the street, and used to drop down so suddenly, disappeared; but actually within the last two or three months the trick has been revived in North London by a man and a woman, the writer having been a witness of the seizures. The woman had a companion, both in the shabbiest and most sordid of rags, and the sufferer suddenly staggered, fell, and became rigid, with teeth clenched, and a foam, wonderfully suggestive of soap, appeared upon her lips. The companion wept, held up the head of the sufferer, and told the tale of their woes to the commiserating crowd, who, with the charitable instinct that makes one sigh and say "Poor creature," sympathised with small coin, till the approach of a policeman, or the proposal to carry the fillee to a doctor's, caused her gradually to come to. It was a mournful sight, associated as it was with squalor and misery; but after seeing the poor creature's sufferings in different places two or three days running, one grew callous, and admired the healing powers of Policeman X. The man had his fits alone, in retired roads of semi-detached villas, into which he was helped, and brandied and wined, going off afterwards humble and thankful to have another fit. But it was too risky a plan to carry on for long with the dread of wholesome diet and exercise at Clerkenwell for cure.

There is a tune called "Ararat" in the old hymn-books, and there are words generally sung to it beginning "Not all the blood of beasts." Years back a man with a woman and five small children used to make day hideous with that hymn. The party would range themselves across a narrow street, and slowly traverse it, turning themselves to right and left in search of charity. The man then began by giving out a line of the hymn, scraping the tune vilely upon an old fiddle, the line was sung at the highest pitch of every voice, voices worn shrill and powerful by usage, and so on through the whole hymn. The effect was maddening. Those children never grew any bigger for years. Perhaps they are grown up now, for I have not seen the harmonious band, nor yet the doleful-looking countryman who used to whistle a tune in a minor key in Red Lion Street on a Saturday night. Always the same doleful tune, not unmelodious, but melancholy in the extreme. Certainly the process was conducive to melancholy, but it brought in coin. The old ballad singers are scarce, too—those sweet duettists of the kerb. The respectable indigent family, who must have spent a good deal in pomatum and soap, and who all looked in such good condition as they stood there silent, father, mother, and five children—one in arms—downcast and awaiting alms which papa suggested by putting his cap before him on the kerb, with a big penny in it for a nest-egg—never more nor less: where are they? Our old friend the young man, with torn trousers and three-quarters of a shirt, is still to be seen hugging himself on very wet days, shivering and never soliciting alms as he goes delicately over the muddy pavement, planting his bare feet in the puddles by choice, and never seen when the weather is fine; but where are the round-faced, "Buy-a-broom" girls, in their blue spotted cotton dresses, and curious coiffure? They all seem to have gone, with many of the others that have been named, for, as intimated above, the begging of the past has been succeeded by newer ideas, and alms are obtained more often in the way of trade by "a distressed mechanic out of work." G. MANVILLE FENN



THE WEATHER AND AUTUMN CULTIVATION.—We cannot call to mind an October that has been more seasonable for all farming operations than the one that is now drawing to a close. There have been one or two severe gales. These were only partial in their effects; but the characteristics of the month were genialness and dryness, affording cultivators every chance of raising their late potato crops, and pitting them in good condition, and to scarify and plough their stubbles under the most favourable circumstances. It has not by any means been like that dismal October of Poe's in the "misty mid region of Weir." The leaves have not been yet quite withered and sear, after his fashion; October has not as yet conveyed any miserable feelings to agriculturists. Their view is that they have never started upon another harvest year with better prospects than those which the present month affords them. A large amount of ground has already been prepared, and in early localities a considerable amount seeded with wheat. Potatoes are lifting well, and freer from disease than was expected; there has been no check to the grass, which still grows luxuriantly, affording a good bite for sheep and cattle; and the roots promise to tide stock-feeders comfortably over the winter months.

BRITISH DAIRY FARMERS' ASSOCIATION.——The third annual show of this society, held at the Agricultural Hall last week and the week before, must be pronounced a success in every way—in the extent and quality of the exhibits of stock and dairy produce, in the prompt payment of the prizes to those who had won them, and in the more than fair attendance of visitors. The Stilton cheese manufactured by Mr. Nuttall, of Leicester, and set up in Cleopatra-Needle form in the centre of the hall, was not only attractive as a piece of ingenious architecture, but as indicative of how much more might be done in the way of cheese-making in this country than there is. It is not given, of course, to every one to be a Mr. Nuttall; but there is little doubt that our farmers generally might make more out of dairy produce, with proper attention to stock, than they can out of wheat, which last week was selling at under 40*s.* per quarter—a price that cannot well pay. Against foreigners we cannot compete in wheat. On the Continent labour is cheap and land rich; in America, if labour be dear, the soil is so fertile that it only requires to be tickled with a hoe to laugh into harvest; and, as freights are coming down in price, we may expect to see the imports of cereals increase rather than diminish. The soil and climate of the United Kingdom are admirably adapted for stock, and we have got the best raw material in the world to go upon for the manufacture of beef and mutton and the production of butter and cheese. It is to be hoped that the late Dairy Show will have acted somewhat after the fashion of a finger-post to show British farmers the road it would be right for them to pursue. Not that they should foolishly abandon the old track all at once; but they should gradually glide into the new, feeling their way as they go along without effecting violent changes in their system of cultivation.

GOOD ADVICE ON FARMING.——Mr. Mechi, in a letter to the agricultural papers, gives very good advice to farmers coming from lightish lands to such heavy clays as are encountered in Essex. He says:—"A farmer used to a friable, dry soil, workable at almost any time, feels perplexed and annoyed on our stiff clays, where horses and steam ploughs cannot go on the wet land for many days. . . . I once ploughed part of a field when wet for oats; frost did not come, so the furrow slices dried as hard as cast iron, and were too obdurate even for my Crosskill, so as rain did not come in time, we could not sow our oats until too late to get a crop. Strangers could hardly realise such a condition of soil, and should therefore consult local practice." This is very judicious advice on the part of Mr. Mechi. We have seen many a good farmer coming from light lands ruined in the course of a few years through despising local practices, and obstinately sticking to his own notions, which he found out in the bitter end "were too clever by half."

MISCELLANEOUS.——A memorial is to be erected to the late Mr. T. C. Booth, the eminent agriculturist, whose portrait recently appeared in The Graphic. It is not yet decided what character the testimonial will assume, but the general opinion seems to be in favour of a "Booth Scholarship," open to any school or college, to be invested in trustees for the benefit of children of the family of Booth, to be enjoyed first by the eldest son of the late Mr. T. C. Booth as long as required, then by the other sons in succession, afterwards by the nephews in seniority, and to return again to Mr. Booth's grandsons in succession. The Prince of Wales heads the list of subscriptions, which are limited to 5*l.* 5*s.*, and Mr. Jacob Wilson Woodhorn, Morpeth, is Secretary.—The entries for the Smithfield Club Cattle Show, which opens in the Agricultural Hall on the 9th December, and where prizes to the amount of 3,000*l.* will be awarded, close on the 1st of November. It may be mentioned in connection with the Show that Mr. James Gibbs and Co., Mark Lane, offer a hundred guinea prize for the best beast in the show, and 50*l.* for the best pen of three sheep.—The celebrated herd of polled Angus belonging to Mr. M'Combie, of Tillyfour, who may be said to have carried all before him at exhibitions of this breed of cattle for twenty years and more, have been sold. The sale, considering the dull times, was a good one. Twelve of the fashionable Pride family made an average of 63*l.* 14*s.* each, and forty-four animals an average of 43*l.* 11*l.*—The Mercers' Company has given one hundred guineas towards the prizes to be awarded at the Royal Agricultural Society's Show next year in London.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF QUARRELLING

GREGORY: Do you quarrel, Sir?
ABRAHAM: Quarrel, Sir! No, Sir.
GREGORY: If you do, Sir, I am for you. I serve as good a man as you!
ABRAHAM: No better.

—Romeo and Juliet.

IF a man is ever to make a respectable appearance in a wrangle he must, like a poet or a fisherman, be in a manner born with a quarrelsome disposition. The most hot-tempered person we know began life consistently in his cradle by falling out. Elia has proved that a sulky temper is anything but a misfortune to its owner; similarly a quarrelsome fellow has an easy life of it, as friends and family defer to him. But this may run into an extreme, and then it is at times difficult for him to find an opening for the exercise of his gift. It does not necessarily follow that a quarrelsome man is also a good hater. As a rule he is not, and then he can even lay claim to being virtuous; he can forgive and forget in a magnanimous manner when in reality he is unable to remember what originated his quarrel. But the man who possesses the finest genius for quarrelling is undoubtedly the good hater. Such an one has an immense advantage over the ordinary short-tempered fellow of common life, and existence will be much sweetened to him, as he can cherish a quarrel to an indefinite period, and signally prove the falsity of the commonplaces about forgiving as the weeks pass on, or when Christmas comes, or his adversary softens, and the like. A good hater who is fond of quarrelling is also an advantage to his friends and family. He will probably content himself with eight or ten interminable enmities, whereas he would otherwise be perpetually falling out with his acquaintances, like a man who should throw lighted matches about among barrels of gunpowder. Amongst imperfect civilisations quarrels are inherited, sons and brothers and clansmen must espouse the father's contention, and a healthy quarrel of this kind full of vitality is positively useful in drawing together families and dependents. The nearest approach to them at present is when husband or wife has to take up the other's quarrel, to blow up the flames of resentment in cool blood and proceed to overt acts of letter-writing or retaliation for some real or fancied offence which possesses no interest to the victim dragged into the altercation. A husband and wife in India went up-country to visit another couple living in tents (as the husband was a magistrate), some thirty miles from the nearest station. The men were devoted friends, and spent their time very pleasantly in hunting. The ladies were equally attached, and remained behind, satisfactorily tearing to pieces every male and female reputation of their acquaintance. One evening, just before the rains broke out, the men returned, weary and hungry, to dinner, and were met by their respective wives asseverating that they would not continue another hour in each other's society. Horses and servants must be ordered at once, said the guest, she must immediately leave "that woman." Finally they retired, the one to sulk, the other to pack up. Meanwhile the husbands, who did not want to quarrel,—wanted nothing in short but peace and dinner,—walked up and down the tent in meditation. Down came the storm. Tenders of reconciliation must be made to the ladies, but they were obdurate, and things began to look serious. Thirty miles through the jungle in such weather and at night and dinnerless was no joke. At length, when the equipages were actually at the door, the absurdity of the situation struck the principals. They immediately kissed, and have been firm friends ever since. All shook hands, the horses were countermanded, and the most pleasant of evenings passed. The good hater shakes his head at this impotent termination of a very promising quarrel, but it is possible to spite one's self too far.

A man with a bad memory cuts a poor figure in quarrelling. His feelings of pity and forgiveness then lie too close to the surface. If he is ever to uphold another's feud he must be prompted by some one of finer genius for wrangling, a wife, a maiden sister, or the like. Even then there is a fear lest the difference should smoulder or die out through the indifference of the ally. Your true swashbuckler is only too glad to accept every quarrel on its own merits without seeking for reasons why he need uphold it. It is with him "a very pretty quarrel as it stands. We should only spoil it by trying to explain it." But forgetfulness of what the slight was which originally led to the quarrel is not so unfortunate a defect in the wrangling disposition as unwillingness to nurse an injury until an opportunity arises for it to be resented. It is the temper which broods over its own injuries that constitutes a more accomplished quarreller than the hot-tempered, fiery nature which flashes out, but may be soon appeased. The difference between them is that between the sudden April shower and the persistent November deluge. Byron was true to human nature when he spoke of

The patient search and vigil long
Of him who treasures up a wrong.

The wrath of Achilles sulking in his tent was more destructive to the Greeks than the sudden rage of Ajax. An exchange of angry letters lends itself to the heroic view of a quarrel more suitably than words or deeds. A reproach, a malediction, or a blow are soon over, but the penny post can prolong a quarrel and keep up a healthy irritation between two angry correspondents for many a day. The necessary forms of civility are observed for weeks, it may be, while sarcasm, rejoinder, and comment do their worst. When each party has accumulated a goodly pile of his adversary's missives, then, and not till then, need defiance proceed to threats, angry language, and lastly, exasperated silence. This form of quarrel—the epistolary one—it is noticed, possesses immense vitality, and a glance at the past correspondence will always resuscitate it when it languishes. The first condition of an interminable quarrel, young beginners should notice, is a smart interchange of angry letters.

Amongst the many different kinds of quarrels, those of literary men and of rival journals are the most vehement. The former, indeed, are going out of fashion at present, but survive in the quarrel between Lord Chesterfield and Johnson, and notably in a case nearer our own day in the anger of Macaulay for "that varlet" Croker. Every one will call to mind instances of newspapers and journals which are at daggers drawn with some particular adversary, and of others, the free-lances of literature, which impartially attack all their contemporaries. Often these newspaper rivalries centre round some literary man's feud with his brethren, and then not unfrequently libel and law are the results. Lovers' quarrels are proverbially harmless, are necessary for the pair to find out each other's weak points, and always result in a renewal, even an enhancing, of love, as the Laureate tells us in a song spoilt by its recent alterations—

Blessings on the falling out
  That all the more endears,
When we fall out with those we love,
  And kiss again with tears.

Quarrels between husband and wife are what the Greeks would have called quarrels which are no quarrels. They lose what forms a great element of interest in altercations, as they must sooner or later be made up again. The model husband takes care not to push differences to an extremity, tides over troubles, and is serenely equable in disputation, remembering that it always takes two people to make a quarrel.

For some of the most inveterate of quarrels the moralist must resort to the country. There in multitudes of retired parishes he will find numbers of squires, big farmers, and the like who have not been to Church for twenty, thirty, or it may be fifty years, this being a common rustic mode of spiting the parson. Some miserable quarrel about Easter Offerings or a tithe pig first set the combatants at variance, and then the aggrieved rustic flies to what he considers the most telling weapon, staying at home on Sundays. When this Indian-like sitting at the parson's door to urge him into submission, as it were, has once commenced, all the overtures that the luckless clergyman makes are only viewed as so many indications of his being in the wrong. The mind of the average parishioner can never conceive such a thing as an honest wish to let bye-gones be bye-gones. Tenders of reconciliation are deemed treacherous advances, and the spiritual embargo is kept up with more spirit than ever. Pews and gravestones are also fertile subjects of quarrel in the turnip districts. Somewhere down in Beds, we believe, may be seen a monstrous monument erected opposite the vicar's front door, because he would not admit some unsuitable gravestone into the churchyard, while whole families to our certain knowledge have disestablished themselves owing to the rector's refusing them the pews they wished,—he, poor man, having no word in the matter, the wardens being solely responsible for the allotment of seats. Family quarrels are another lasting source of enmity. They have a tendency, like the Maelstrom, to suck every outlying member of the family into them, and to assume larger proportions daily under the influence of party feelings and prejudice. The quiet nephew or serene son-in-law is inevitably dragged into the disturbance, however little he may care for the original cause of rupture, and good-tempered cousins and ordinarily charitable daughters-in-law turn furies for the nonce, wreathing their coils of brown hair with snakes, shaking torches and summoning their sisters to alliance, like Tisiphone herself. Hence come numberless disappointments when wills are read, life-long coolness between people who would at heart like each other's society, and much wrapping up of conscientious high-minded souls in their own togas, as they stalk forth upheld in poverty by pride and resentment. Indeed the saddest effect of most quarrels consists in the misery and unhappiness which they so often bring to innocent disputants who have unwillingly been brought into the mystic circle of repulsion. Death composes many altercations, but seldom perhaps a family quarrel.

The dispassionate observer is struck with amazement when he thus sees extremes meeting, the polished manners of the Victorian age reviving the Ishmaelite state of living which precedes settled institutions. Similarly, the good-tempered man who cannot nurse a slight for years, cannot remember an injury, and whose first impulse is to shake hands even with his greatest enemy, wonders what demon possesses his friends when he finds them all quarrelling around him. A healthy quarrel, however, makes some amends to society by affording a trustworthy test of character, both with reference to those who give way to those hot tempers fit only for "lions and bears," as Dr. Watts informs us, and those who withstand them. The natural termination of a quarrel used to be a duel. That is now out of fashion, and in its place coolness, "cutting," and total estrangement, it may be for a life-time, result. We are not sure that society or morality has gained by the change. It is certainly unpleasant to have your best friend brought home mortally wounded by a shot through the lungs, but to lose half-a-dozen relatives for life, because of some family difference pushed to an extreme, is perhaps a worse calamity. As Parliament has appointed Bank Holidays, it were much to be wished that, in the spirit of the ancient Truce of God, it would order every quarrel to be compounded on the Quarter Days, enjoin all wranglers to shake hands and forget their grievances at these times, or, if they wished next day to renew them, would compel them to take out a five-shilling licence for doing so.

THE FAILURE OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW BANK

Topics of the Week

Russian Intentions.——It is impossible to deny that the prospect in the East has for some time been becoming steadily darker. The Russian troops, instead of preparing to evacuate Turkey, are apparently settling down for a long occupation of their present quarters, and it is clearly the aim of Russia, if she can, to tear the Treaty of Berlin in pieces, and to substitute for it the Treaty of San Stefano. As regards Afghanistan, her newspapers—which do not say anything very serious without permission—are speaking out with bold and cynical frankness. They admit that Russia has made trouble for us there for the express purpose of tying our hands in Europe, and proclaim that we must not be allowed to seize Afghanistan because then India would be safe and Russia robbed of the fruits of her victories in Central Asia. In these circumstances the English people can hardly help asking with some anxiety, whether or not they are about to be plunged, against their will, into a war with Russia. For our own part, we are inclined to think that this is not her immediate purpose. A war, even with Turkey, would at present strain her resources; to fight England would be, as the Czar must well know, to run the risk of disaster, which might lead to bankruptcy and revolution. On the other hand, it would be foolish to act as if this were quite certain. The very difficulties in which the Russian Government finds itself at home may impel it to seek an outlet for national passion in a great foreign enterprise; or it may suppose itself to be so near the splendid prize for which it has contended that it is willing to play a perilous game in the hope of success. If this is not its intention, it is exhibiting an audacity which has hardly a parallel in modern history. In any case there can be little dispute as to the duty of the English Ministry. The Treaty of Berlin has only just been signed, and whether it is a wise or a foolish Treaty, our honour and our interests now compel us to see that its provisions are executed. If we allowed it to be set aside, we should justly forfeit our place in Europe; and, in the opinion of the great majority of Englishmen, we should trifle with what are perhaps the greatest responsibilities ever imposed upon a people. Sir Stafford Northcote warned Turkey the other day that she must fulfil the Treaty; but Russia, not Turkey, is the Power that needs to be warned. Turkey has done her part as well as could have been expected of her; Russia is acting as if Europe had never intervened, and as if we had no right to criticise her policy. A strong remonstrance would force her to reveal her designs, and perhaps to display some respect for the first principles of international law; whereas, if we kept silent, she may go so far on her present path as to make a peaceful retreat impossible. The Government is in a very trying position, and its sole chance of triumph is to insist decisively on the carrying out of the settlement to which Russia herself has solemnly given her adhesion.

Landlords, Farmers, and Labourers.——There are some subjects over which the journalist, however able or eloquent he may be, exercises very little influence. All the compositions of antiquity, lost or existing, probably did not equal in bulk the comments of the Press on the recent Lancashire Strike. Yet for any effect they had in settling the dispute they might just as well have never been written. The struggle came to an end, as wars usually do, through the exhaustion of the weaker party. But though the people actually engaged in a money-dispute will rarely listen to the advice of a third party, the public at large may benefit by his homilies, and probably these copious newspaper discussions taught many persons more than they ever knew before as to the merits or demerits of a strike. Early in the year the farmers and their labourers stood in the position of disinterested third parties towards the Lancashire combatants, now they seem likely in some districts to occupy the part of principals. We wonder whether they learnt any lessons worth learning from the millowners and operatives of the North. Now that the farm-labourers have shown that they are no longer isolated atoms, but can present (as in 1874) a firm and united front, their employers are probably unwilling to provoke a general strike, otherwise (if for the moment we leave the landlord out of sight) their arguments point strongly in favour of some eduction of wages. Up to this year they have had a series of disastrous seasons, they cannot hold their own against foreign corn, and even foreign meat is becoming a serious rival. But, as the labourer spends the bulk of his income in the very things which the farmer grows, the low prices which pinch his master benefit him. With a cheap foreign loaf, the farmer argues, and with cheap American cheese and bacon, the labourer can well afford a shilling or two cut off his wages. But the question remains whether more permanent relief cannot be afforded in another direction. Landlords are not likely to reduce rents, so long as they can get solvent tenants for their farms, and this they are pretty sure to do in a crowded wealthy country where so many people are ready to farm for amusement rather than for profit. But landlords would in the long run increase their own rent-rolls, and would certainly put more spirit into their tenants, if they gave long leases, and allowed far more liberty than they now do in the management of the land for which rent is paid. At present the tenant is too often at the mercy of the landlord's baibff, and so he farms in a hand-to-mouth fashion, never realising the sweet sensation of independence.

The Ruined Shareholders.——We are heartily glad that it is proposed to raise a national subscription on behalf of the unfortunate shareholders of the City of Glasgow Bank. It would be easy to marshal a long list of arguments against such a proposal in ordinary cases of commercial disaster. Nothing would be more unwise than to convey the impression that people who choose to speculate for wealth have a chance of being saved from ruin by pitying onlookers. But there was nothing like speculation on the part of those who are now about to be reduced to poverty. They invested their money in bank shares because it was supposed that bank shares were absolutely safe; and they seemed to be even more than usually secure in the present case because of the reputation of the directors for religion and virtue. To the young and vigorous the blow is not overwhelming; but unfortunately there are among these shareholders a great many helpless women, who, if they are not aided, must at once pass from comparative affluence to menial employment or to the workhouse. Widows and elderly maiden ladies appear, for some reason or other, to have had a preference for the City of Glasgow Bank; and it was also in high favour with clergymen, and with old men who had retired from business. Had there been the least warning of the crash, these sufferers would have excited less sympathy; but there was nothing to indicate danger. The dividends did not rise above the average, and without "second sight" the public could hardly have suspected that a gigantic fraud was being committed by grave and philanthropic Free Kirk elders. If ever there was a case for the free outflow of generous sympathies, this is one; and we have very little doubt that the community will respond liberally to any appeal which may be addressed to it. Even in England we should expect that a good deal will be done; but the Scotch themselves must, of course, be the chief contributors. The claim upon them is very strong, for they have not only to soften an appalling calamity, but to remove what is almost a stain upon the national honour.

King Alfonso.——If the Socialists as a body throughout Europe are in any degree responsible—we do not allege that they are—for the recent attempts at regicide in Germany and in Spain, they could not have hit on a surer device for bringing their doctrines into disrepute. In one case the assassin aimed at a greybeard who, whatever may be his faults from a Socialist point of view, was an indefatigable worker in his country's service; in the other case the assassin aimed at an amiable youth who has done no one any harm, and who is still mourning for the loss of a much-loved wife. These successive blows must have caused a sense of dismay in every Royal House in Europe, for it was not so much the man that was struck at as the King impersonated in the man, and therefore every monarch and his heirs as well are rendered more or less uneasy. Those who have felt it know that the fear of assassination is one of the most wearing of all terrors. In the case of crowned heads and their relatives, who are compelled to be much in public, it engenders a constant feeling of suspicion. Every strange face is scrutinised, guards are doubled, policemen in citizen garb are hired to mingle with the crowd, spies are listened to. Hitherto, owing to the greater self-restraint of the population, Continental kings have been able to mingle among their subjects in an easy, unceremonious manner, untroubled by the staring and pushing which are too prevalent in England; but for the future, until the dread of assassination grows faint from non-repetition, they will be more inclined, like George the Fourth in his declining years to hide themselves from public view.

The Liberals and the Government.—— Sir William Harcourt made an interesting and clever speech on Tuesday, but it had one great defect; it was from beginning to end altogether negative. Everything the Government have done in connection with the Eastern Question has been, he maintained, wrong; they have simply plunged from one blunder into another. And occasionally he must be admitted to have proved his case, for it would be amazing if, in so vast and complicated a controversy as that which has been going on for three years, serious mistakes had not been committed on all sides. After all, however, at the present stage, when the question of peace or war is still unsettled, the country cares very little for mere criticisms of the past; what it wants is guidance for the future, and for the immediate future And it has very good reason to expect that men in Sir William Harcourt's position will lay down the broad lines of a positive policy. For, of course, the Liberal leaders do not criticise the Government for the mere love of criticising; they desire to lower it in the public esteem and to take its place. What would they do if the Tories were turned out? Would they reverse all that has been done, or would they simply give effect to the principles on which Lord Beaconsfield has hitherto acted? Their silence indicates that they have really no answer to these questions. In that case, their clear duty is to refrain from hampering the Government; for that they do hamper it by bitter tirades is beyond question. Englishmen, of course, are unmoved by speeches delivered at this late date. They have finally made up their minds on the whole subject, and are not now likely to hear anything that can shake their general convictions. But the case is otherwise on the Continent, and especially in Russia. The utterances of public men are one of the chief means by which the Russians find out our intentions; and when they learn that politicians like Sir William Harcourt fiercely assail the Government, they very naturally assume that we are too divided in our councils to act with firmness. It was a mistake as to our real purpose that led to the war with Turkey, as a similar mistake had, years before, led to the Crimean War; and, if we are not careful, Russia will again act under the influence of a complete delusion. When the Liberals have a strong Eastern policy, they will be entitled, and bound, to speak out; but in their present wavering temper their own interests and the interests of the nation require that they should keep as much as possible in the background.

School Board Fees.——Some years ago it was found that, in spite of the efforts of various voluntary educational organisations, there were a vast number of children whose parents either could not or would not send them to school. An immense fuss was made at that time about the "religious difficulty," and it was supposed that thousands of British parents would gladly send their children to school, but were debarred by conscientious objections respecting the religious teaching prevailing in the only establishments which were accessible. Well, Parliament ordained the creation of School Boards, and the London School Board (the only one with which we have at present to deal), after a brief period of apparent torpor, displayed wonderful activity, and built numerous schools in various parts of the town. The authorised teaching in these schools, as everybody knows, is purely secular, the expense of supporting them is defrayed by the rate-payers, and the fees were fixed at a very low figure, so that the very poorest might come in. Up to the present time some of the experiences of the new educational system are not altogether encouraging. The so-called "religious difficulty" is proved to be a myth. There are still people who do not send their children to school, but neither formerly nor now were they or are they actuated by any such conscientious scruples. The real truth is that they either could not or would not pay the fees demanded, or else they wanted the services of their children at home. Even now, with low fees and compulsion, the children of this class are with difficulty got to school. But the worst of it is that the better paid artisans, who formerly contentedly provided money for the fees of the voluntary denominational schools, now send their children to the Board Schools on account of the lower fees exacted there (thus getting part of their children's teaching paid for out of the rates). These well-to-do children fill up the Board Schools, the result being that there is not room in them for the street Arabs, while the parents of the latter (who are not too willing that they should go to school at all) are naturally not inclined to resort to the half-empty voluntary schools where they would have to pay higher fees than the Board tariff requires. We see only two ways out of the difficulty: either the Board fees must be raised, or the voluntary schools must be subsidised on condition of their lowering their scale of payment.

Foreign Decorations.——The mass of the British public have very little sympathy with the outcry of the English exhibitors at Paris against the rule which prevents them from receiving foreign decorations. There are solid reasons why the Government should not go out of its way to procure for them this particular form of advertisement. Every one acquainted with Continental life knows how eagerly toys of this kind are sought after Officials of all ranks scheme and labour to obtain them, English and American officials alone, at foreign Courts, stand outside the ignoble strife; and the result is that they assume an independence of bearing which is of much advantage to their respective Governments. When they have occasion to be more than usually active their motives are not so liable to misconstruction as those of their colleagues of other countries, and they are removed from the influence of a kind of bribery which is all the more dangerous for being indirect and delicate. It would be surprising if any English Government sacrificed these obvious benefits in order to flatter the vanity of a few ambitious manufacturers. Another argument of some force is that if facilities were given to English citizens for obtaining foreign orders our own decorations would soon lose any value that attaches to them. The British tradesman, seeing a new chance of puffing himself and his wares, would soon be known at every Court in the world as a candidate for honours; and, as he is on occasion capable of lavish expenditure, there is no reason to doubt that the authorities of a good many countries would be found gladly to respond to his wishes. When orders were thus degraded, who would care to obtain even those which are sparingly granted at home? On the whole, Englishmen had better content themselves with such chances of distinction as have hitherto been open to them. It is true that not many ordinary folks can hope to secure even the least exalted English decoration; but, after all, life may be tolerable without the right of attaching a bit of ribbon to one's coat. And there is a certain dignity in the present arrangement which ought to appeal to the pride of a people usually supposed to be the proudest in the world.

Health in Town and Country.——Sanitary matters always come to the front when the Social Science Congress meets, and among these there cannot be a subject of more importance—remembering that nowadays the bulk of the population lives in large towns—than the question whether it is possible to render existence in great cities as healthy as it is in rural districts. Much has undoubtedly been effected in this direction; London, for example, though six or seven times as large, has a far lower death-rate than prevailed in the reign of Charles the Second. But can we, short of building a score or more of Hygeiopolises—a conception at present belonging rather to the regions of Utopia than to those of practical life—can we hope to make our towns much healthier than they now are? A great deal, certainly, may be done by the enforcement of strict sanitary rules, by the clearing away of dilapidated habitations, and by the official inspection (which we have often recommended) of all houses let out in apartments; but are there not causes which render town life unhealthy which are beyond all municipal control? Among these may be reckoned the sedentary employment of the bulk of the population, and the dissipations, the late hours, and the excitements which are inseparable from vast aggregations of human beings. Will it ever be possible to breed in great cities tall, well-developed muscular men and women? How many such are there in London at present, the genuine London-bred children of genuine London-bred parents? Very few, it is to be feared; and hence we conclude that but for the country districts the bone and stamina of England would soon be non-existent.

Funeral Tents.——Many a cold, often severe, and sometimes fatal, is caught by attending a funeral. The principal mourners are generally already below par in point of health, worn with anxiety or with close attendance in a sick room, it is therefore little wonder that they should catch a chill after standing on damp grass, and often exposed bareheaded to the rain. We venture to suggest that, at all events during the winter months, a tent, of sufficient capacity to cover the average number of mourners, and furnished with a carpet of tarpaulin or some such waterproof material, should be erected over the grave, so as to afford shelter to the clergyman and his congregation during the concluding portion of the ceremony. A few minutes would suffice to set up and remove the tent, as there is always a sufficient staff of grave-diggers present whose services would be available for this purpose. We commend the idea to the notice of Cemetery Companies, and we feel pretty sure that, if feasible, it would be highly appreciated by the public. It is now comparatively rare for ladies to be present at funerals, for the simple reason that their attendance involves grave risk to health; but they would often pay this last tribute of respect to the deceased, if they could feel certain that they would be protected from the inclemency of the weather while standing by the open grave.

THE GLASGOW BANK FAILURE

The directors, manager, and secretary of the City of Glasgow Bank have all been committed for trial without bail. To secure this desirable end an additional charge of embezzlement or theft was entered against them, which, unlike the rest, deprives them of the right to claim liberation on bail, though of course it will still be in the option of the judge to grant it to them if he thinks fit. The police have a warrant for the arrest of Mr. James Nichol Fleming, but have not yet managed to lay hands upon him, although it is thought that instead of going to Spain, as was rumoured, he is hiding in London. Another ex-director is said to have taken flight, and the whereabouts of several other persons not on the Board, but supposed to be concerned in the frauds, is not known. The prisoners are all in good health, but are stated to suffer much mental anxiety. A first call of 500*l.* per 100*l.* share has been made upon the shareholders, so that even should no further calls be made, people having only one fifth of their property in the Bank will be absolutely ruined. The distress is so widespread and so complete that it beggars description. One of the Scotch newspapers tells of a widow lady with a family, whose handsome inheritance was all either in shares or on deposit in the bank, and who, when the smash came, was left with just fifteen pence in her pocket. Many suggestions have been made for the amelioration of the suffering. One is the formation of a Salvage Company to buy up the assets for slow realisation, and another the formation of a Relief Fund for the benefit of the poorer depositors. Our sketches require little explanation. No. 1 is a portrait of Mr. Salmon, one of the directors; No. 2, that of Mr. Stronach, the manager of the Bank; No. 3, that of Mr. Potter, another director; whilst the remaining sketch shows the interior of the Central Police Court, Glasgow, on the occasion of the second examination before Mr. Stipendiary Gemmel, when on the application of Mr. McPhee, the Procurator-Fiscal, all the prisoners were remitted to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

THE BRITISH FLEET IN THE EAST

Although the British fleet has quitted the immediate vicinity Constantinople, the vessels have by no means left the Sea of Marmora, and still remain within an easy sail of the Golden Horn. Artaki Bay is situated on the south-eastern shore of the Marmora, is sheltered by a broad projecting peninsula, and affords tolerably good holding ground and partial shelter against all winds, except those between south-west and north-west. The anchorage is at the head of a gulf of no great length, and with a wide open mouth, ready for the reception of the heavy seas sent rolling in by the westerly gales which, during the winter months, alternate with strong north-easterly winds along the shore. This gulf, or rather bay, is formed by the Artaki promontory, a triangular-shaped piece of land, once an island, but which is now joined to the mainland by a narrow neck of sandy ground. Two villages are situated on this peninsula, one on the westward, off which the fleet lies, being called Artaki, and the other bearing the name of Peramo. The peninsula was once renowned for the partridge shooting it afforded, but, owing to indiscriminate slaughter the birds at present have now become few and far between.—We are indebted for the sketch from which our illustration is taken to a naval officer, who writes, "The bay is most picturesque and almost land-locked, being bounded by mountains and high hills, brilliant with varied tints and green foliage."

CYPRUS IN EVELYN'S TIME

Our engraving is taken from a drawing by the famous John Evelyn in 1672, and represents the town of Larnaka as it appeared after a century of Turkish rule, which, in little over a hundred years, had reduced the population of Cyprus from 711,000 in 1571 to 40,000. As we have previously fully described this town and its surroundings we need do no more than point out the quaint phraseology and curious mixture of English and French which John Evelyn employs in the titular description of the sketch, such as "Greece's Church," "La Musque," The original sketch is in the possession of the Evelyn family, our engraving being reproduced from a tracing by Captain Malton, and bears the inscription "Cyprus. Salines and L'Arnica as they appear att sea—bearing N. N. W."

THE AFGHAN CAMPAIGN

PREPARATIONS—A SHOT AT THE "AMEER"

The news that Shere Ali, the Ameer of Afghanistan, had refused to allow our mission to Cabul to proceed, was, as everyone expected, the signal for a force to be ordered to proceed to that place. Here are some officers, brushing up their revolver shooting, in hopes of having to put it into execution against Afghans of a more substantial nature than the one who is now manfully and with unmoved countenance sustaining their fire.

REMINISCENCES OF THE MALTA EXPEDITION

The subject of this sketch is the return of a Ghoorkha warrior to his native land. True, he has no wounds to show, no medals decorate his sturdy breast, no spoils has he of the defeated enemy. Still if fortune had given him the chance, there is no doubt that the possession of all these would have been his. He is surrounded once more by the natives of his own land. He explains, with much satisfaction to himself and his hearers, the new rifle with which he is armed. A Parsee examines the "kookerie," thinking with horror what execution it would effect on his stout person if engaged in hand to hand conflict with its owner. The Bombay policeman stands aloof smiling complacently on a scene which he from his military position patronises with some condescension.

ATHLETICS IN A BOMBAY NATIVE INFANTRY REGIMENT

Here is depicted the weekly athletic meeting of the regiment. On the right are the European officers. Their necks are surrounded with garlands of flowers, which is the native custom on all occasions of fête or display. One officer has just arrived, and a group of native officers are adorning him in this way. In the foreground are the wrestlers and other athletes, slight, active men, as a rule, with good muscular development. The other two sides of the square are formed by spectators. In the centre two Punjaub wrestlers are going through the gestures which natives always indulge in preparatory to closing with each other.

LANDING ICE IN BOMBAY

One of the large ships, with a cargo of ice, of which two or three annually arrive in Bombay, has just come in, and her cargo is as rapidly as possible being removed, first in native boats to the bunder or landing-place, and thence in bullock garis to the cooler regions of the ice-house. The sight of the large white blocks as they are carried up the steps by the coolies, who seem except in name in no way to partake of the nature of their burdens, is in itself refreshing to the eyes of the onlookers, who gaze with eager eyes over the wall above, while the Indian sun overhead glares down with angry heat, as if annoyed at the intrusion of such Arctic products into his tropical domain.

On one or two occasions the non-arrival of an ice ship has been the cause of an ice famine, and the discomfort of that is hard to be imagined by any one who is unacquainted with Bombay, its heat, and the thirst for cooling beverages caused thereby.

SKETCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA

MOUNTED INFANTRY

The territory in which hostile operations are being carried on extends over a vast space, and locomotion is very different to what it was in the Franco-German war, where the campaigning ground was covered with a network of railways and excellent roads. Travelling is less easy amid the rugged hills and tangled bush of South Africa, and as foot-soldiers were not able to move with the required celerity, detachments of infantry were mounted for the occasion. Our sketch depicts a mounted detachment of the 88th, and shows the manner of the men's equipment. The soldiers wore brown corduroys instead of their uniform black trousers, and looked none the worse for the change.

CAPTURED KRAAL IN THE PERI BUSH

This drawing forcibly shows the density of the forest in some parts of South Africa—as, for example, in the Peri Bush. The trees are tall and grow close together, as in the woods of North America, and, what with this and the dense undergrowth of smaller shrubs, a native encampment is scarcely visible till one is actually upon it. Hence the difficulty of dislodging the hostile Kaffirs from their fastnesses. In this illustration the kraal has been captured, traces of the previous struggle being visible in the broken horn and in the corpse of the native stretched under the flimsy cover of his habitation.

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE IN THE HOLY LAND, X.

THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE

The present Garden of Gethsemane is in the shape of an irregular quadrangle, the circuit of which is about seventy paces. It is now enclosed by a hedge, as the pilgrims used to injure the olive-trees which it contains. These seven venerable olive-trees, with trunks burst from age and shored up with stones, are said to date from the time of Christ. Some of them are of great age and size; but as there is no mention of old olive-trees here before the sixteenth century, and as Titus and Hadrian cut down all the trees round Jerusalem (the Crusaders found the whole region absolutely destitute of wood), these trees cannot be coeval with the time of Christ, though they may be remote descendants of those which then grew here. The olive oil yielded by the trees of the garden is sold at a high price, and the rosaries made from the olive-stones are in great request. Inside the wall there is a passage, shut off from the garden, with fourteen oratories. The Tomb of the Virgin is visible in one of our engravings. Here, according to the legend, she was interred by the Apostles, and here she lay till her "Assumption."—These two engravings are from photographs by Mr. Frank Mason Good.

THE ROCK OF ANDROMEDA AT JAFFA

Whenever there is a slight sea on at Jaffa there is considerable danger in getting from the shore to the packet-boats in the roads. The basin which forms the harbour, in which only small craft can find refuge, is guarded from the rougher sea by monster rocks, against which the waters break furiously all day. The boat we engaged to carry us from the town to the packet in the roads was large and strongly built, and manned by a crew of stalwart Arabs and Syrians, who strained every muscle to pull through the narrow channel between these rocks at the mouth of the harbour, to one of which an ancient myth chains the fair Andromeda. She must indeed have suffered much from her bath till Perseus came. It was with some anxiety that many of our passengers looked towards those black rugged rocks as our strong crew, who stood up to their oars, pulled us safely through into the lumpy water outside.

This is not the only source of anxiety, especially to lady passengers, on embarking on board the packet at Jaffa, for when arriving near the Austrian Lloyd, or Messageries steamers, the shore-boats bump and jostle one another terribly, and it is with difficulty that we succeed in gaining the deck-ladder of the packet, for one has to wait the opportunity when the sea drives our shore-boat level with the first stair. Then the passenger gives a frantic jump, and almost realises the sensation of standing alone in space, so suddenly does the small boat drop from under. Very few passengers have much appetite for the excellent dinner the Messageries cook prepares that evening, and there is a general affection for the solitude of the cabins for many hours after leaving Jaffa and the Rock of Andromeda.

A TRIP TO THE SJŒGERDELS FOS IN THE HARDANGER FJORD, NORWAY

The Hardanger Fjord is one of the largest and most beautiful fjords on the west coast of Norway, and being only twenty-four hours' distance from Bergen, is a favourite trip for tourists, more especially since the Sjœgerdels Fos, or, as the falls are sometimes called, the Kingedals Fos, were first made popular by Mr. W. Matthieu Williams in "Through Norway with a Knapsack." "It is a very beautiful waterfall," he writes, "about 600 or 800 feet high; the stream just grazes the rock nearly all the way, spreading into a snowy sheet, and throwing out a vast amount of spray. It is something like the Monge fos; not so high, but the quantity of water is much greater, and is the most beautiful fall I have seen in Norway, but not the grandest. There is no difficulty in approaching it." Two of our illustrations represent the aspect of the falls viewed respectively from a distance and from a point close at hand; and, regarding the others, our artist writes:—"The costumes I depict are those habitually worn by the natives. Little or no food is to be procured from the small 'gaards,' or farms, which are found on the hills round the fjord. Consequently milk, which happily can be obtained, is in great request, and we did ample duty to it, although, coming from the goat and not from the cow, it might have tasted better. But as hunger is the best sauce, so thirst should make the best vintage. This fjord is accessible from Bergen in twenty-four hours; from Christiansund in two days. A trip made to the Hardanger Fjord will well repay the small expense it costs. This fjord is the scene of more than one of the well-known Tidemand and Gude's pictures."

MILITARY SKETCHES AT UPNOR

We have here some of the humorous incidents of life in a military encampment. The troops under instruction are divided into two sections, one of which represents the "enemy," and any one attempting to cross the lines is regarded as either a spy or the bearer of a secret message, and taken before the officer on duty, who subjects him to a searching cross-examination, besides making a minute inspection of his uniform, in the hope of finding some important despatch concealed in his boots, the padding of his tunic, or the lining of his pickelhaube. The whole affair is conducted with something more than mock gravity, for the documents taken from the "Intercepted Envoy" may reveal the strategetic intentions of the "enemy," and thus lead to his defeat. Next we have an unfortunate warrior, while his comrades are in full retreat has fallen into a "trou de loup," a sectional view of which is also given in order that the uninitiated may properly appreciate the charming contrivance. Imagine the indignation of a colonel or major, middle-aged and corpulent, and somewhat irascible in temper, caught in one of these wolf-traps, and having to surrender ignominiously, perhaps to a beardless youth fresh from Sandhurst. In our next sketch is shown a piece of gentle playfulness on the part of a newly-fledged officer. Let us hope that he discovered his mistake in time to make good escape before the colonel, so rudely awakened from his blissful dream of victory or promotion, had time to sally forth and get a glimpse of his features. If not, we fear to think what punishment the court-martial would award for such an outrage upon one's superior officer. Our sixth subject shows some of the difficulties with which a conscientious officer sometimes has to contend when, in the confusion and excitement consequent upon a sudden alarm, he receives contradictory orders from the various staff officers. As he cannot well "advance," "retire," and "move to the right" all at the same time, he stands stock still, mops his perspiring brow, and mentally curses his ill-luck. Our last sketch fitly illustrates the stern sense of duty, not to say obstinacy, of the British soldier. The sentinel has been ordered to let no one go by without the pass-word, which, as he emphatically observes, is not "Humpire." He means to do his duty, although the consequences may be that the umpire may be incapacitated from performing his function, and the defeated army be awarded the palm of victory, or perhaps no verdict at all be given as to the result of the day's manœuvring and fighting.

THE SIX DAYS' PEDESTRIAN CONTEST

The arrangements made by Sir John Astley for this race were certainly more satisfactory than those under which the last competition took place. On that occasion O'Leary had the immense advantage of a separate track, and his tent accommodation was infinitely superior to that of his rivals; but in the present struggle no one is favoured any way. All use the same track, and each has a snug little tent to which he retires when he leaves the track for rest or refreshment. The track, which is composed of fine soft tan, is ten feet wide, and exactly one seventh of a mile in length. The chief prize, guaranteed by Sir J. Astley, consists of 500*l.* in money and a challenge belt, worth 100*l.*, for the man who gets over the longest distance. The belt, however, will only become the absolute property of the winner after he has successfully held it against all comers for a period of eighteen months, the matches to be contested in London. As in the last race, when O'Leary carried off the prize, the competitors are to "make the best of their way," either by walking or running, each resting as often and as long as he thinks proper. The start took place on Monday morning (just after the stroke of midnight), Sir J. Astley making a short speech to the men, wishing them good speed, and expressing a hope that all would compete fairly. There were twenty-three competitors, but these have been gradually weeded out, Holmes being the first to retire, which he did at 10 A.M. on Tuesday, after completing 70 miles only. Hayward put in 119 miles before giving up, and Vaughan, who looked to the last all over like winning, had done 200 miles at 4 A.M. on Wednesday, when he finally left the course in consequence of his ankle giving way. On Thursday, at 12.30, the foremost six walkists were in the following order—Corkey, 333 miles; Brown, 327; Crossland, 299; Weston, 296; Rowell, 296; and Hibbert, 291. The struggle goes on continuously day and night in the presence of judges and reporters, but the Hall is only open to the public from 6 A.M. to 12 P.M. The attendance on Monday was something like 10,000, and the still larger numbers which have attended on subsequent days is a proof that the public interest in such exhibitions has certainly not decreased. On Wednesday an attempt was made to light the Hall by electricity, but the power used was not sufficient, and for once the electric light was beaten by gas. We have already expressed our doubts as to the utility of these long endurance contests, and need not here repeat them.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——Many political speeches have been delivered during the week and, as a matter of course, those of the Liberal Party have mainly consisted of attacks, more or less violent, upon the foreign policy of the Government. Sir W. V. Harcourt, at Scarborough, on Tuesday, characterised the Home Secretary as a commercial traveller anxious to pass off the damaged wares of the firm to which he belonged, and said that there was only one member of the Government who had the wisdom to hold his tongue, and that was the sagacious politician at its head. No one knew better than Lord Beaconsfield that when they were in a desperate scrape the best thing to do was to keep quiet. He ridiculed the idea of Cyprus being employed as a strategetic centre, and said that it had only been acquired to cover an impending defeat at Berlin.—On the same day, at Birmingham, Messrs. Chamberlain and Muntz, the borough members, proposed and seconded a resolution, which was adopted, declaring that the unconstitutional extravagance and reckless policy of the Government, with regard alike to foreign and Indian affairs, was calculated to imperil the interests and to impair the honour of the nation, and that by a dissolution of Parliament an appeal should be made to the country to decide for itself the grave issue of peace and war, and of constitutional as opposed to personal rule.—At Huddersfield, Mr. Leatham, addressing his constituents, said that the Government policy was one of tights and spangles, differing only from the tights and spangles of other mountebanks in this, that while their's were proverbially cheap, those of Lord Beaconsfield were abominably expensive.—Mr. Farley Leith, M.P. for Aberdeen, has also addressed his constituents. He regards the Berlin Treaty as a hollow truce unlikely to render peace durable, denounces the Government for its extravagance in a time of such depression, and thinks that war with Afghanistan, which he looks upon as inevitable, will cost 25,000,000*l.*—Lord Carlingford, speaking at the Radstock Working Men's Institute, expressed doubt as to the wisdom of acquiring the Fiji Islands, the Transvaal, and Cyprus, and said that the Minister who should venture to annex Afghanistan to the Crown of England would deserve to be cashiered.—Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, M.P., is somewhat milder in his opposition. Speaking, at Deal, on Monday, he said that although he believed that the Government were wrong in their Eastern policy, he abstained from an adverse vote on the calling out of the Reserve forces and on the Vote of Credit, believing that in the crisis it was patriotic to show an united front to the world. He condemned the Imperial policy of the Government, but abstained from expressing an opinion on the Afghan Question until all the facts were before them. If the country had been insulted he would support the Government, but nothing should induce him to uphold injustice and oppression. Mr. Sidebottom, M.P., speaking at Stalybridge on the same day, reviewed the legislation of the past session, and said it would be a folly to attribute the depression of trade to the conduct or action of the Government. He defended the conduct of the Government in the Eastern Question, and said it was better to spend six or eight millions in keeping out of a Russian war than to spend a hundred millions as in 1855.—Mr. Butt, M.P., has written a letter formally disowning any sympathy with the "party of independent opposition and indiscriminate obstruction," which he regards as immoral. He declares he would not hold his seat on the condition that he should adopt it. The Peterborough election has resulted in the return of Mr. Fitzwilliam, the Moderate Liberal candidate, who polled more than the combined scores of his two opponents, Mr. Lawrence (Conservative) and Mr. Raper (Advanced Liberal). Mr. Potter retired from the contest before the polling commenced.—The Earl of Dufferin has been warmly welcomed in Ireland on his return from Canada. On Monday he landed a Londonderry, and was presented with congratulatory address, and on Tuesday reached Belfast, where a similar greeting awaited him.

The Social Science Congress.——The proceedings in the various sections which have met daily during the week have been so multifarious that we have only space for a bare enumeration of the subjects discussed. On Friday the business opened with an address by the Hon. G. Brodrick, on "Education," and papers were read on "The Simplification of the Evidence of Title," "The Expediency of Increasing the Number of Universities in England," "The Kindergarten System," "The Causes of the Depressed Condition of Industrial Enterprise," "Music," and "Dramatic Reform, and the desirability of obtaining a theatre not wholly controlled by prevailing popular taste." On Saturday Mr. Michael, Q.C., reviewed the progress of preventative and curative medicine, and sanitary science. He maintained that we were stronger and healthier than our forefathers, and that if State medicine could be recognised as well as State religion, we should reach a higher condition of physical and mental vigour. An animated discussion took place on a paper read by Mr. Rathbone in the Art Department on "The Moral and Æsthetical Aspects of Undraped Figures." On Monday Mr. Miller, Q.C., the president of the Jurisprudence Department, in his address said that the time had not yet come for a successful attempt at a general codification of the law, but he believed that in future there should be a standing Parliamentary Committee, responsible for the language of all Acts of Parliament, and that the legislation for the three kingdoms should be identical. In the Health Section, Lord Norton read a paper on the Utilisation of Town Sewage. All the other sections met, and in the evening Lord Norton presided at a general meeting.—On Tuesday the most interesting item was an address by Mr. Gambier Parry, president of the Art Department, on "The Relation of Fine Art to Social Science." He contended that a very close relationship exists between prose and poetry, romance and reality, and art and the driest subjects of social science; and referred to the establishment of art schools and the number of visitors to the exhibitions as a proof that the English people of the lower orders were beginning to appreciate very earnestly the finest works of art within their reach.—On Wednesday the labours of the Congress was brought to a close by an address in the Ladies' College by Mr. G. W. Hastings, president of the Council, and a general meeting was subsequently held under the presidency of Lord Norton. No place has been fixed for next year's meeting.

London Mortality increased last week, and 1,445 deaths were registered against 1,369 during the previous seven days, being an increase of 76, and at the rate of 21·1 per 1,000. There were 4 deaths from small-pox, 18 from measles (an increase of 8), 46 from scarlet fever (being 56 below the average), 12 from diphtheria (exceeding the average by 3), 33 from whooping-cough, 30 from different forms of fever, and 30 from diarrhœa (a decline of 6). Deaths from diseases of the respiratory organs numbered 347 (an increase of 21, exceeding the average by 46), 225 of which resulted from bronchitis, and ninety from pneumonia. There were 2,500 births registered against 2,558 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 50·3 deg., or 2·1 deg. above the average. The duration of registered sunshine was 15·6 hours, the sun being 71·1 hours above the horizon.

Miscellaneous Items.——The electric light continues to attract a great deal of attention. The Government are making experiments with it in the workshops of Woolwich Arsenal, there is talk of giving it a trial at Cockspur Street or Trafalgar Square, as well as on the Thames Embankment, Waterloo Bridge, Holborn Viaduct, and outside the Mansion House; and during the week it has been used at various places in the country, in most instances with complete success, though one utter failure is recorded, the cause being a continuous downpour of rain.—The Board of Trade inquiry into the loss of the Princess Alice is not yet concluded, but Captain Harrison and the two engineers of the Bywell Castle have been acquitted, although the latter are censured for leaving their engines. The first mate of the Princess Alice, against whom five charges of neglect were urged, has had his certificate restored to him, but the Court did so with reluctance, as they considered the charges proved, although his conduct could not be said to have contributed to the collision. There are still fourteen unidentified parcels of clothing and property in the hands of the police.—The inquiry into the Pontypridd railway accident has resulted in a verdict of manslaughter against the signalman Roberts, who will be tried at the next assizes. The jury recommended that Colonel Yolland's suggestions for the establishment of outdoor signals should be immediately carried out, and expressed a hope that the Company would still keep Roberts in their employ in consideration of his long and faithful service.—The inquest on the victims of the disaster at the Colosseum Music Hall, Liverpool, throws no direct blame upon any one connected with the place, but the jury recommended that such places should be under the control of the local authorities, and that the services of a policeman should be granted whenever asked for by the proprietors.—The other day the Home Secretary received the honorary degree of Doctor-of-Laws in the Senate House of his University (Cambridge). The Public Orator delivered a Latin speech in his praise, and the Undergraduates in the gallery behaved in their usual mirthful fashion. They circulated a humorous cartoon, referring to Mr. Cross's advocacy of the Vivisection Bill, and lowered a flag which bore an inscription relative to Mr. Cross's former position in the Trinity Boat Club. This memento of his aquatic triumphs Mr. Cross pocketed amid tumultuous cheering.—The depression of trade is beginning to be felt in the agricultural districts, and a wages struggle is impending between the farmers and farm labourers of Kent and Suffolk.—On Thursday last week there was an unprecedented hurricane at Deal. It lasted only a few minutes, but in that time many houses were unroofed, windows destroyed, trees were uprooted, and a boat which lay high and dry upon the beach was blown bodily out into the sea.—The cold weather has come upon us rather suddenly. On Tuesday the wind was very keen in London, and on Wednesday morning a light fall of snow occurred. In Scotland and the north of England heavy snowstorms have been experienced.—On Monday a passenger steamer bound for Calcutta was stranded off Shanklin, Isle of Wight, near the place where the Eurydice foundered. Luckily the sea was calm, and she was got off by two steam tugs without injury. —We hear that the Shipwrights' Company have asked the National Lifeboat Institution to allow one of its lifeboats to form a part of the forthcoming Lord Mayor's procession. Do these gentlemen reflect that if their request is granted the services of the boat may possibly be needed to save life at the very moment that it is being gaped at by a London crowd?—The 60th Rifles have removed to Colchester, and "Spring-heel Jack," whose vagaries have for some time past annoyed the sentinels at Aldershot, has apparently gone with them. Already he has visited several lonely sentries in the Abbey field, all of whom he has frightened, and two so seriously, that they are now under treatment in the garrison hospital, it being feared that the mind of one is completely unhinged. It is stated that the sentries are to be doubled; and it is certainly time that some effort should be made to catch and punish this foolish, not to say criminal, fellow.

THEATRES

Mr. Chatterton has found it necessary to vary his programme, from which fact it may perhaps be inferred that The Winter's Tale produced at Drury Lane so recently with liberal accessories has failed to interest spectators to the extent which was expected. On the other hand, unabated faith in the attractions of Shakespeare is exhibited in the revival of Macbeth, which is now played with The Winter's Tale on alternate nights. There is little in the performance to call for comment. Mr. Dillon's impersonation of the guilty usurper is not remarkable for subtlety or power to cast the complex elements of the character in one complete and consistent mould; but it has all the robust qualities which are so dear to audiences in the popular parts of the house. Mrs. Vezin's performance of Lady Macbeth possesses on the other hand something too much of refinement. The cruel and inflexible temptress is not so much suggested as the sensitive and ambitious lady. Her sleep-walking scene, however, was a touching and impressive performance. Mr. Ryder, as Banquo, declaimed his lines with his customary elocutionary art; and Mr. Cowper raged in the part of Macduff to a degree which was greatly applauded from the back rows of the gallery. The songs and choral music attributed to Matthew Locke were performed on the occasion by an increased orchestra and a numerous chorus.

The revivals of old English comedies are about to be resumed at the Aquarium Theatre. Afternoon performances, commencing on Monday next, will be given of Foote's comedy, The Liar (an adaptation of Le Menteur of Corneille). Mr. W. Farren, Miss Litton, Mr. J. S. Clarke, Mr. Collette, Mr. Edgar, and Miss Vandenhoff have been engaged for the series.

Olympic Theatre.——Miss Marion Terry and Mr. Henry Neville will sustain the leading rôles in the new play, A Republican Marriage, to be produced at the Matinée on the 9th of November.

SPORTING

The Turf.——The Houghton Meeting at Newmarket closed somewhat tamely, and rough weather made it very uncomfortable for those who remained for the concluding days. On the Friday the most interesting race was for the Jockey Club Cup, weight for age over the Cesarewitch course, in which Silvio's victory over Insulaire, Hampton, and Verneuil entitles Lord Falmouth to consider that he has the best horse of the day in the Derby winner of 1877. On the Saturday Mr. Gretton's Cambridgeshire luck still stuck to him, as he carried off the Consolation Free Handicap (though he required no consoling) with Singleton and the Houghton Handicap with Red Hazard. With the Winding-Up Handicap won by Lord Falmouth's Hydromel closed the last of the series of the Seven Newmarket Meetings, and the "little Cambridgeshire town" will not be seriously disturbed again till the Craven comes round again, unless the project of a two days' Steeplechase Meeting over Captain Machell's course is carried out.—But the flat racing season does not now close with the Houghton Meeting, as it did in the orthodox days of a former generation of Turfmen, and thoroughbreds will for the most part be kept hard at work at the "back-end" meetings, as they are called, till the end of November. The present week has seen three meetings, all well attended, carried on simultaneously at Brighton, Lincoln, and Worcester, to say nothing of the gathering at Streatham and Halifax. Brighton received the most patronage, and, indeed, if none but visitors to and dwellers in Brighton attended the sport, the racecourse would be well thronged. The racing was of no special interest, but good fields contested most of the events, Herzegovina beating thirteen others for the Nursery Handicap on the first day, and Placida, though heavily weighted, making short work of Conductor and Phœbe for the Autumn Cup. Conductor, however, on the second day in some measure recompensed her owner, Lord Anglesey, by winning the Stewards' Cup, his lordship also taking the Autumn Handicap with Grey Friar. Sunnybrae, who beat ten others for the Juvenile Handicap, made the day a pretty good one for the patrons of Tom Brown's stable, which scored three events. At Lincoln Lord Zetland's Ellangowan followed up her Newmarket success by winning the Chaplin Stakes, for which Mr. Chaplin's Devotee was strongly backed, for no better reason probably than because the Blankney colours are always popular in Lincolnshire, and in the Gantby Nursery the Aske spots were again carried first past the winning-post by Valsense. Umbria had not much difficulty in securing the Autumn Handicap; but if absurd nomenclature could disqualify a winner from receiving the stakes, Captain D. Lane's Winslow's Soothing Syrup should not have those attached to the Blankney Nursery.—The acceptances for the Liverpool Cup are few compared with the large entry, and already Master Kildare, who ran third in the St. Leger, and performed fairly in both the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire, is made a hot favourite for it.

Football.——At Kennington Oval, in the Association Challenge Cup contest, the Glasgow Rangers have given the once invincible Clapham Rovers a very decided beating in the shape of five goals to one.—Even to enumerate the many first-class games played since our last would fill a column; it must suffice, therefore, to say that Barnes and the Camels have played a drawn game; Westminster School has beaten the Household Brigade by six goals to "love;" the Hertfordshire Rangers have defeated Upton Park much in the same style; the Flamingoes have gone down before the Harlequins; the Clapham Rovers have suffered another repulse at the hands of the Royal Military Academy; the Cooper's Hill Engineers have been a little too much for Richmond; the Gipsies ditto for the Marlborough Nomads; Reading has vanquished the Remnants; the Eton boys have beaten the Gitanos; and the Old Etonians Cambridge University. From the list of fixtures already published, it is evident that the football season will be the busiest on record, and in all directions matches are being played on grounds illuminated with the electric light.

Cricket.——The Australian Eleven on their homeward road have given Twenty-two of California a taste of their quality by beating them in one innings with 135 runs to spare. They sailed from San Francisco for Australia on the 28th inst.—Another well-known cricketer, Alfred Clarke, son of the once famous slow bowler, William Clarke, has soon followed Walter Mynn, having died last week at the comparatively early age of forty-seven.

Bicycling.——In this, as in many other athletic pastimes, "the fastest time on record" is being constantly eclipsed. In a five-mile race, at Cambridge, the Hon. Keith Falconer has beaten Keen, the professional, in the marvellous time of 15 min. 14 sec., the time of his last mile being 2 min. 53 sec. and a fraction.—Again, at Lillie Bridge, the race for the Fifty Miles' Amateur Championship was won by A. E. Derkinderin in 3 hours 9 min. 31 sec., the fastest time on record being made by him from the twenty-sixth mile, viz., 1 hour 9 min. 56 sec.—A medical contemporary, rather late in the day indeed, has uttered a warning to bicycle riders, by assuring them that the vibration of the machine has a strong tendency to injure the spinal column; and in the place of the present popular locomotive the tricycle is recommended.

Angling.——Another great roach-fishing contest has come off near the Rye House, on the Lea. There were no less than sixty-two competitors; but during the first hour only two sizeable fish were taken. The final result showed Mr. Moss Benjamin the winner of the Cup, and a lady, Mrs. Da Costa, the taker of the second prize; but the former only scaled 10¼ oz. of fish and the latter 7½oz. This is, indeed, "fishing extraordinary."

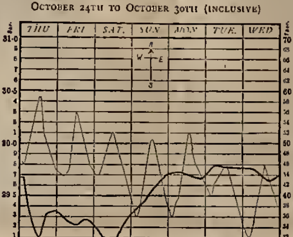
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

October 24th to October 30th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——The week has been one of very unsettled changeable weather. During the first few days southerly to westerly gales prevailed in most places, blowing with greatest violence on our south-western and south-eastern coasts; but on Saturday, the 26th instant, the wind went round to north-west all over the country, with a rapidly rising barometer, and dry, cool weather. During Sunday night, the 27th instant, and the early hours of Monday, the 28th instant, a depression came towards our northern coasts from the north-westward, and strong north-westerly gales, with snow, hail, and cold rain, soon spread over the country, the southern counties alone escaping. Thunderstorms have prevailed in different parts of the country every day since Sunday, the 27th instant, solar halos and mock suns have been seen, and aurora have been reported in the extreme north. The weather on Wednesday, the 30th instant, remained very cold, and snow, followed by rain, fell in London. During the week the barometer was highest (29·80 inches) on Tuesday, the 29th instant; lowest (29·03 inches) on Saturday, the 26th instant; range, 0·77 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (59°) on Thursday, the 24th instant; lowest (32°) on Wednesday, the 30th instant; range, 27°. Frosts on the grass have been frequent and sharp. Rainfall: The total fall has been 0·58 inches, on four days; greatest fall in one day, 0·30 inches, on Saturday, the 26th instant.

A Statue is to be erected to Lord Beaconsfield at Hong Kong.

The Private View of the Winter Exhibition at the New Belgian Gallery, New Bond Street, takes place to-day (Saturday) and Monday.

The Captive Balloon in the Court of the Tuileries, which has been one of the greatest attractions of Paris this season to foreign visitors, has been sold to Mr. Walter Gooch, of the Princess's Theatre, and will shortly be exhibited in London.

MM. Erckmann-Chatrian have written the libretto of an opera, La Taverne des Trabans, for the Paris Lyrique. M. Henri Maréchal furnishes the music. M. Gounod is also busy with his new opera, Maître Pierre, founded on the story of Abelard and Heloise.

The Liverpool Autumn Art Exhibition has proved very successful this year. Up to the end of the first fortnight in October, 27,527 persons had visited the Exhibition against 25,937 at the same period of last year, while 171 pictures had been sold, realising a sum of 3,028*l.*

A New Style of Earring is to be worn by Transatlantic fashionables this winter. It consists of a sort of net of finely spun gold, which will fit over the ear something like an ear-muff. The net is made after the fashion of a spider's web, and resting upon it is a fly in iridescent enamel.

Rome, ever addicted to illuminations—witness the lighting-up of the Coliseum by red fire or the far-famed illumination of St. Peter's—has been greatly attracted by the electric light, and intends to utilise it for some of the principal streets and piazzas when King Humbert and his Queen make their next entry into the Italian capital.

The "Howard Medal" of next year is to be awarded by the Statistical Society, in November, 1879, to the best essay on "The improvements that have taken place in the education of children and young persons during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries." 20*l.* will also be presented to the successful writer. The essays are to be sent in before June 30th, 1879.

Professor Nordenskiöld has succeeded in the first part of his attempt to sail round Siberia to China and Japan. He has doubled Cape Cheljuskin, which has hitherto proved an insurmountable obstacle to Arctic travellers, and when last heard of was well on his way towards Behring Straits, hoping to make the passage without being obliged to winter in the Arctic regions.

Palissy, the Potter, is to be commemorated by a statue to be erected near the Bois de Boulogne, at the expense of the Municipality of Paris. Palissy lived in the Rue Taranne during his residence in the French capital, but the reason for the present site for the statue being chosen is that he is supposed to have worked at the decorations of the Château de Madrid, constructed in the vicinity by Francis I.

A New Park for Paddington and Kilburn is being contemplated, and a Memorial is to be presented to the Board of Works, petitioning the Board to secure and enclose for this purpose the open space of ground lying between the Portsdown, Shirland, and Kilburn Park Roads, and Sutherland Gardens, this ground forming part of the Paddington Estate. The north-west portion of Paddington and the adjoining district have a population of 100,000, chiefly belonging to the working-classes, to whom such a recreation-ground would be an immense boon, as Hyde Park or Regent's Park are too far off to be in any great degree available for the children.

The Body of St. Xavier, the Apostle of India, which reposes undecayed in a glass fronted coffin in the Cathedral of Goa, will shortly become subjected to one of the periodical exhumations which take place as often as the King of Portugal and the Pope may judge necessary. "The present occasion," says the Indian Statesman, "it is thought will be one of the greatest gatherings that has ever occurred, as notifications have already been received of the intended presence of almost all the Roman Catholic Bishops in India, as well as several from Europe, who will take advantage of the Suez Canal, available for the first time for the Pilgrimage."

A Political Clock to suit all shades of opinions has been invented by an ingenious Parisian clockmaker, specially intended for such easy-going Prefects as may wish, like the good old Vicar of Bray, to keep office under all changes of Government. The clock is surmounted by a draped female figure, which at present represents the Republic, and wears a moveable Phrygian cap. Should the Prefect abjure Radical for Moderate opinions he can take off the cap and replace it by a laurel wreath, while if the Republic be out of favour the figure can well typify France, while the pike held in her hand can be supplanted by a tiny flag and may be surmounted according to taste by a Bonapartist eagle, the Gallic cock, or a Legitimist fleur-de-lys. These "accessories" are all sold with the clock.

Even the Electric Light has been Eclipsed in Convenience, if we are to believe the Liverpool Post, which states that "The authorities of the Trinity House have been making experiments with a new gas which has been brought under their notice as being not only cheaper than ordinary gas, but far more effective. This new gas is capable of so much concentration, that a quantity contained in a small buoy has kept a light burning for twenty-eight days with sufficient brilliancy to show the position of the buoy from passing ships. The inventor declares that a buoy of ordinary size would contain sufficient gas to keep a good light burning for nine months, so that all our buoys might show lights at night if gas were supplied them twice in a year and a half. We shall probably hear more of this, as the claims of the inventor are now being submitted to practical tests."

On the Advent of the Prize Fêtes, Mr. John Leighton, F.S.A., one of the English jurors, gave a banquet to his colleagues, artists, men of letters, and members of the Press. The dinner was given in the Alhambra Court, by the electric light, at the Hotel Continental. Mr. Leighton occupied the chair, with M. Jules Simon as Vice-President. As ex-Minister he replied for France, and toasted the Queen and Prince. M. Meissonnier responded for the Beaux Arts and the Congress, M. Edmond About for the Men of Letters, Sir Sidney Waterlow and Sir F. Truscott for the Past and Present of London, Sir C. Reed and the Baron de Watteville for Public Instruction, Messrs. Barbedienne, bronzes, Goupil prints, and Deck Faience—all grand couronnés—replied for the Recompences. Most of the great printers and publishers were present. The banquet was of the most recherché character, covers being laid for forty.

Dr. Johnson at Uttoxeter in 1759.——The story of Dr. Johnson's penance is well known. In 1759 he stood bareheaded in the rain all one market day in expiation of an act of disobedience committed many years before. His father, the Lichfield bookseller, was in the habit of attending the market at Uttoxeter on Wednesdays to sell books at a stall. One day, the father, being ill, asked the son to go for him. The son refused, but the refusal weighed on his conscience, and hence the scene which has now become historical, and which is shown in bas-relief at the base of the Doctor's statue in Lichfield. A copy of this (by Mr. P. Spruglia, of Birmingham) has recently been inserted by the Vicar of Uttoxeter (Rev. H. Abud), aided by public subscriptions, in the conduit of the market-place, near which the act of expiation took place.

The Benefits of Rest and Sea-air to Exhausted and Over-worked Londoners can well be estimated by those who can afford an annual holiday, and their deep importance to those in poorer circumstances is well attested by the success of London and Brighton Convalescent Home, which has lately been removed back from Dover to Brighton, where it was first inaugurated eleven years since, and now stands facing the sea, with a large garden in the rear. During the eight years spent in Dover the Home received 7,232 inmates, 1,722 being sent free of expense, and of these 6,000 have returned home with renewed health and spirit. The home has been established for sick and reduced gentlewomen, governesses, shop, needle, and Bible women, Sunday-school teachers, and mission workers, who are received, by recommendation of a subscriber, on a weekly payment of 8*s.* in advance, including everything but laundry expenses. Necessitous widows and orphans under twenty also can be maintained free for a fortnight by each subscriber, while children under six are taken for 6*s.* weekly. Persons over seventy, those mentally affected, or recovering from contagious illnesses, are unacceptable. The inmates are received on Saturdays, and by a payment of 5*s.* obtain a third-class return ticket. Candidates are to apply to the lady superintendent, Mrs. Marshman, at 2, Redcliffe Square, South Kensington, any week-day before twelve. Subscriptions will be thankfully received at the same address, or by the matron, Miss Bowes, at the Home, Crescent House, Marine Parade, Brighton.

"PRINCE Bismarck's Letters to his Wife, his Sister, and Others" (Chapman and Hall), translated by Fitzh. Maxse, like the Moltke Letters published a short time back, are interesting more as pictures of the man than for any light they are permitted to throw upon dark places of Continental policy. Not that to the close student of German history, and especially of that earlier period in the great Chancellor's career when the "Bund" was a very fussy and a very troublesome entity, a veritable "noose about Prussia's neck" which "hostile hands were only waiting for an opportunity to tighten," they will not often supply matter for reflection, or that there are not passages here and there which, read by the light of later events, seem curiously suggestive; as when we find the future assailant of Count Arnim himself admitting, amidst the worries of the St. Petersburg mission, that "Prussian Ambassadors go mad or die," the future demi-god of the National Liberal Party dilating ever so long ago on the very moderate concessions which would satisfy the Liberals, yet ensure a national representation which should be essentially Conservative. As a rule, however, these letters—of which very many were written in the full conviction that they would be read in transitu by other eyes than those of the person to whom they were addressed, and of which none, we may be sure, would have been suffered to appear had they contained anything really indiscreet—grow simpler, briefer, less allusive as we come nearer recent times. Very numerous as well as very full of political comment in the periods of the Frankfort and the St. Petersburg missions, they have nothing to send home from Biarritz or Gastein but bright, sharply-outlined sketches of scenery and of society, from the battlefields of Bohemia but an episode or two of Konig-gratz, from the war of 1870 a single missive, intercepted on its way by Franc-tireurs, describing the interview after the battle with the vanquished of Sedan. It is as the reflection of a strongly marked and, in all relations towards friends and neighbours, a genial and a kindly individuality that they must principally be valued; and from this point of view the healthy, almost animal, exuberance of life and vigour—qualities in which Prince Bismarck may compare with English statesmen of the olden time—the equally English delight in the simple pleasures of a country life, the Moltke-like power of transferring to paper with a few precise touches the scenes through which the writer moves, will always render them sufficiently attractive, without troubling us to dive beneath the surface for secrets they do not really contain.

"Half-hours of Blind Man's Holiday," by W. W. Fenn (2 vols.: S. Low and Co.), will attract by its opening chapter a sympathy which further perusal will in no way lessen. For this opening chapter is a true story of loss of sight—partial at first, soon total—in mid-career of a prosperous landscape painter's life, and of the revival, after the first shock was spent, of the power to work and the power to enjoy—the artistic impulse finding occupation, denied to it with brush or pencil, with the pen; the dark void around filling gradually up with memories from the time of light and vision, by converse of wife and friends, by keener perceptions of the multitudinous varieties of sounds and scents. This chapter of a genuine experience would alone suffice to give currency to the book; but the book in itself is thoroughly readable—a collection of stories, reprints from various journals and magazines, all fragrant of the sea-board and the down and other haunts that artists love, which reminds us somewhat of Wilkie Collins's "After Dark," and which, if not quite on a level with that well-known work, is at all events a medley to which seekers after amusement may confidently turn for an hour or two's healthy and pleasurable reading.

Devotees of the fashionable science of folk-lore will find a volume to their mind in Mr. Thistleton Dyer's "English Folk-lore" (Hardwicke and Bogue), a charming recueil of practices and beliefs connected, in the fancy of simple country folk, with plants and birds and animals, with days and months, or with important events like births or marriages. Those only, indeed, who know the genuine peasantry au fond or scrupulously gather up the occasional notices of quaint survivals of primitive beliefs which appear from time to time in country newspapers, can fully conceive what a world of legend is lingering still in our very midst, or what curious fragments of traditionary lore still find interpreters in the "herb-doctor" and "the wise woman," and are reverently talked of in village ale-houses o' nights. If somewhat, it is to be feared, prosaic as a whole, and destitute of the wilder elements of romance which attach to the folk-lore of the mountain and the steppe, these English legends are still highly interesting, and Mr. Dyer's volume well deserves respect as a collection at once curious in itself and rich in illustrations of our older literature.

Vol. VI., and last, of the Messrs. Cassell's most excellent "Old and New London," by Edward Walford (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), completes the survey of the metropolis and its environs by the description of the southern suburbs from Blackheath and Greenwich in the east to Hammersmith and Chiswick in the west. Of the merits of the ample volumes so well commenced by the late Walter Thornbury, so carefully brought to a conclusion by Mr. Walford, we have often had occasion to speak before. Multifarious and inexhaustible as is the city of which they treat, they take among modern books about London a place apart—the place of a perfect treasure-house of information of dipping into which one can no more tire than can the true lover of "London town" grow weary of the infinite variety of her streets and alleys.

It is the special merit of Professor A. C. Ramsay's "Physical Geology and Geography of Great Britain" (E. Stanford) that it is not only a useful manual for the student but a picturesque and interesting volume for that poor general reader who, as a rule, is apt to become weary of dry lists (however scientifically perfect) of fossils and of strata. In the present edition these distinctive advantages have been still further enhanced by an enlargement of the chapters containing the account of British formations, from the earliest Laurentian to the latest Pliocene, with special reference to the physical aspect of the country at each successive geological epoch, and by the addition of some new illustrations as pretty as they are interesting. The volume as it stands is certainly the best introduction to the geology of these islands that we possess.

It is "many and many a year ago" since we followed that most beautiful of Irish roads, the road which leads from Inchigeelagh, by way of Glengarriff, to Kenmare, and "Eccles's" cosy inn at Glengarriff has blossomed since then, we are given to understand, into a big hotel with a table d'hôte, a picture-gallery, and projects of becoming a winter sanatorium, and now makes its pretensions known in two ornate pamphlets, "Notes on Glengarriff and Killarney," and "Glengarriff as a Health Resort and Sanatorium" (R. J. Bush). Of all this we can say nothing. Such schemes must, in truth, be distasteful to those who have drunk of the solitude which was the real charm of all that lies between Gougane Barra and the "Lep," and who must now hear of "health-resorts" and proposed railway lines. But to the truthfulness of the pamphlets so far as their praises of the scenery go we rejoice to add our humble testimony.

Publishers of annuals during the last year or two have evinced a remarkable desire to take things by the forelock; hence periodicals for 1879 are flourishing when there are yet two months of the present year to run. The Messrs. Dalziel, by no means behindhand in this respect, have just published the eleventh issue of "Hood's Comic Annual," a collection of quaint and humorous stories, illustrations, and poems by well-known authors and artists, which will help to make wintry evenings less dull than they are often apt to be, and to raise an honest laugh—a thing, by the way, which is becoming rare. Messrs. Dalziel Brothers, who have for some years been responsible for the art portion, have now taken the whole management of this annual into their charge.

Those who have admired Mr. Pettie's picture of Rob Roy, which represents the outlaw seated at a table with his legs comfortably crossed, and a glass of "mountain dew" in his hand, will be pleased to learn that an admirable etching of the work by Leon Richeton has just been published by Messrs. Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday. It is really as fine an example of the modern school of etching as we have seen.

FASHIONS

NOTHING looks more deplorable on a gloomy winter's morning than to see the female members of a family assembled round the early breakfast table in faded, shabby dresses of a thin texture, over which are worn shawls and wraps, a sorry impression for the husband and brothers to carry away with them to their places of business. As breakfast by gaslight or grey dawn is the usual routine at this season in well-regulated families, more especially in the suburbs, we cannot do better than to speak on the subject of dresses useful and comfortable. Take, for example, the wife and daughters of a professional man, each of whom adds her share to the family treasury. "Mother must not wear a short dress, it makes her look so undignified," is the general verdict, so her morning wrapper must be made after one or other of the following styles:—Dark grey striped flannel or serge, Louis XV. shape, with a wide plastron of dark blue, myrtle green, or claret colour velveteen or cashmere, deep collar and cuffs to match. A black or dark-coloured alpaca, quilted all over, and buttoned from the throat to the hem; when extra warmth is required a quilted and wadded cape to match may be worn. A pretty mode for making a morning cap is: for the front two upright quillings, one of clear muslin edged with lace, the other of ribbon to match the costume; at the back a small loose muslin crown, across which a muslin scarf, about five inches wide, fastened under the chin with a ribbon bow; the ends must be conveniently short. A variety of green plaids trimmed with black velvet make very economical morning dresses, and wash or clean again and again. The daughter with artistic taste may indulge it by donning a Japanese dressing-gown, for which there is quite a rage in Paris, where, as a rule, it is made of very costly material, but can be imitated in various cheap woollen fabrics. Young people should not indulge in wadded breakfast dresses, but content themselves with checked, striped, or plain flannel, trimmed sparingly with inexpensive lace, and a few simple bows down the front, the Rob Roy and even the Stewart plaid, although too gay for the promenade, look bright and cheerful on a dark morning. The walking costumes for stormy, rough weather are very convenient and appropriate; for them tailors almost supersede dressmakers, hence young girls are often replicas of their brothers. Two of our leading West End houses have brought out some stylish costumes, not only very becoming, but also durable; for example, one which is called The Guards,' is made Princess shape, and richly braided, back and front, an exact copy of the Guards' uniform. As yet they are not made in scarlet, but rifle green, dark blue, or brown. It is de rigueur to wear hats of the same material as the costume or of plain felt; "the Beefeater," "the Jockey," and "the Walnut" are still the favourite shapes. Some of the costumes of light stone shades—which always look cold, however thick they may be—are very trying to any but the most slender, we might say attenuated, figures; for example, a heavily kilted skirt, with a folded scarf round it, a long waistcoat, over it a bodice, double-breasted, and made like a man's dress-coat, trimmed with leather buttons, jockey cap to match. Such attire is painful to contemplate when worn by a stout personage. The latest shape in Ulsters is made almost to fit the figure, and has from one to five capes, according to the wearer's fancy. For country wear a very ingenious arrangement has been introduced, namely, a cape, which, for ordinary occasions, is quite flat, but, by means of a string in the hem can be converted into a hood; to make this hood really fit comfortably it requires a skilful and practised hand to cut out and fix it.

There is quite a stir in the fashionable world as to the proposed revival of "paniers." We are eagerly questioned on this subject by those of our readers who do not care to be conspicuous beforehand, or the reverse, in the fashion of the day. We cannot do better than quote the remarks of our contemporary the Revue de la Mode, a thoroughly trustworthy authority, on this important change. After remarking upon the clumsy "panier" of the Louis XV. and XVI. period, the editress says:—

"Two sorts of paniers will be worn, to form puffs on the hips; the one of crinoline will be arranged by the dressmaker in the skirt, the other will be made of fine steel, and worn separate from the skirt." So long as the panier is kept within bounds it will be a boon to those figures which, the reverse of slender, have suffered from the tight-fitting skirts, whilst, on the contrary, those (a large minority) to whom the robe collante is becoming will make a desperate effort to keep it in, hence, for a time, we shall have two distinct styles—so much the better for variety sake—until they coalesce; when full pleats and gathers will again make their appearance.

For outdoor usage mantles will be more worn than jackets this winter; the former are made tight-fitting at the back, with wide or simulated sleeves, and loose in the front; the latter are long and straight all round. Where velvet or velveteen and cashmere costumes are worn the mantle or jacket must match, trimmed with dark fur or rich gimp and fringe, light and white furs are tabooed except for weddings or other dress occasions.—As to the shapes of bonnets and hats, they are more than ever worn à volonté, either very large or extremely small, with low square or high pointed crown, felt, black, white, or neutral tint beaver or velvet are the usual foundations for bonnets and hats trimmed with satin, feathers, and dead gold, ornamented with insects ad libitum, reptiles are quite démodé. It is the fashion in aristocratic circles to adopt some special insect, and wear its image in precious gems or good imitations; for example, the common house fly is exactly imitated from Nature, and worn as earrings and cravat pin. Foremost amongst the most stylish materials for dress occasions is "Peluche Antique," so rich and elegant in itself, it requires but little trimming; old point or Brussels lace sparingly put on is all that is needed. As a trimming plush will be much used this winter for evening toilette; it is too perishable for outdoor wear, as a few drops of rain will injure, if not utterly spoil, it. Watered silk is again in favour, and forms an admirable background for the art embroidery, now so much used sometimes in wide rich scarves heavily embroidered in multi colours, at others lightly outlined in gold thread. Evening toilettes are made in the most fantastical style, with jackets rounded off in the front to show a waistcoat, and finished off at the back with a small basque. A remarkably elegant costume for a dinner and reception was recently made thus:—Train skirt of Bordeaux coloured velvet, the front breadth covered with gold thread embroidery; white satin waistcoat embroidered in coloured flowers, cascade of old point lace, ruffles to match, cut-away velvet jacket to correspond with skirt; diamond and ruby butterflies which trembled at every movement of the wearer. Another toilette was most effective. It was made with a square train and bodice of white velvet and satin striped, edged with a narrow band of feather trimming; petticoat of watered moiré, the pattern outlined in silver thread. The bodice was square, back and front, elbow sleeves, the gloves and shoes were embroidered in silver.

Amongst the minor extravagances of the toilette, buttons now take a prominent place; they are made in cut steel, in gold, silver, and even set with precious stones, painted in Cupids or flowers on porcelain, or in designs to order; amateur china painters may employ their time, and exercise their ingenuity in designing and executing buttons small and great. It is solemnly decreed in Parisian circles that boots are only to be worn by veritable pedestrians; shoes and spun silk stockings are to be adopted for visiting and the promenade. Sensible English girls will surely continue to wear well-cut thick-soled boots, to keep out the cold and damp in winter weather.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE, OLD AND NEW

WE read that Mrs. Bateman, late of the Lyceum, has taken this house—certainly the oldest theatre in London—which, renewing its youth and made gay and beautiful, will give a delight and entertainment to "merrie" Islington, and to playgoers in general. At present it has a grave and quaint air, quite in keeping with the old fashion of the place; it stands in a quiet nook or corner of its own—retired—and somehow recalls the quaint rurality of the old Richmond Theatre. We should cherish these ancient temples. The present house is over one hundred years old, and carries its age well. There is an old view of the place, as it appeared about seventy years ago, which is highly picturesque—a pile of building, with a substantial dwelling attached, and a light arcade running along the side. This, again, is sheltered by a row of fine poplars—a dozen or so in number—under whose shelter is a pretty walk by the New River. A theatre, surrounded by trees and with water beside it has certainly claims to the picturesque. Now the river has been covered in and the trees felled.

Nor is it without its traditions—always a wholesome thing for a theatre—fine, old, and fruity. As we stand looking at its old walls, they come thickly on us. Here it was that the veteran Phelps, five-and-twenty or thirty years ago now, taught the Islingtonians what good classical acting was; giving them plenty of Shakespeare and Ingomar, the Barbarian. Beyond him we see the figure of the American Roscius, Howard Payne, and that curious shape of nautical entertainment, when, the stage being removed, the friendly New River was admitted, and sea-fights and cascades excited general wonder. There was a tank below, ninety feet long by five deep; the stage was drawn away by machinery, and miniature vessels of war entered, and the Siege of Gibraltar or the Battle of Trafalgar took place. Over the stage was another tank for the cascades which, when lit up by Bengal lights, produced the most dazzling effects. Before these shows were the Grimaldi's—three generations, grandsire, sire, and son—the Great Joseph, being the Grimaldi. Bologna, too,—friend of wild Lord Barrymore—the ghost of his pantomime laugh hovers to a certainty about the wings. Here, too, came Belzoni, the famous traveller, whose name will always be associated with that queer museum of Sir John Soane's in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and who made his bow as the Patagonian Sampson. It would seem strange to see Stanley come out as the Scythian Hercules. Moody, the Dibdins, Reeve, and other good names are associated with the management; and also one of the Arnolds—a family so long associated with the Lyceum.

It will hardly be supposed what large sums of money have been laid out on this temple of the drama. The present house was erected in 1765, at a cost of some 4,000*l.*, and only eight years later the whole was, in builders' phrase, "gutted," the interior being taken down and remodelled, and the roof raised. It was later sold for the large sum of 12,000*l.*, and so lately as 1825, 3,000*l.* was laid out upon it. And now the late lessee of the Lyceum is investing a large sum in the old building, when we are sure that, in the quaint words of "our own reporter," a hundred years ago, the theatre "will acquire a degree of beauty in the neatness of its shape and the simplicity of its ornaments." Over the stage at the beginning of the century was to be read the appropriate words, "Mirth, admit me of thy crew," a good old custom when all prosceniums bore some such motto, as "Veluti in Speculum," or "All the world's a stage." We would be inclined to restore this.

It would be pleasant also to revive the old decorations—the pink lining to the boxes (the Royal loge being on the left), the lobby papered in sienna, "the ceiling representing an azure as seen through a circular opening, with flying Cupids or genii bearing festoons of flowers." This was the grand flamboyant style, now gone out, to be seen in the old French Opera House. Now we have heavy masses of gilding and ponderous stucco. The new saloon was very tasteful, with its painted compartments of lattice work and flowers, relieved by an open sky.

It will be, however, a surprise to the theatrical reader to learn that so late as the beginning of the century what were called "drop-boards" were used instead of playbills, a kind of label being let down, with the name of the play inscribed—a custom unlikely, however, to be adopted by the new lessee. But a more singular theatrical custom was carried out at Sadler's Wells by the Spiers and Pond of that day, and which, though scarcely acceptable to the lessee, would naturally be welcomed by the playgoer, viz., the custom of entitling each holder of a box ticket of 3*s.* to a pint of right port or good punch. The modest saloon under such conditions would scarcely afford accommodation

Another custom, also discontinued, and not to be revived, was that of throwing silver and halfpence on the stage in token approbation. It is more convenient and desirable as a test of approval to pay the money at the door. There was an old open well on the ground, a spa of great repute, which was recommended by the faculty. This spa is now covered up, and, we believe, lies somewhere in front of the theatre, about the middle of the open space.

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

IT must be, to say the least of it, extremely doubtful whether Mr. Joaquim Miller will increase such reputation as he has gained by the most recently published effusions of his muse. The subjects chosen for illustration have some of them a decidedly morbid tendency, and may be said to be disagreeable; that, however, is a matter of taste, and there may be readers who can enjoy such themes as form the basis of "The Ideal and the Real," or "A Dove of St. Mark, or can sympathise with the weird improbabilities of "Out of the West," or "Land of the Shoshonee." More general objections are that there is a laboured air about the rhythm as a whole, and that it is at times very clumsy, whilst what can be said for the ear of a writer who makes "dawn" rhyme to "swan," and "Barbara to "pray"? Also a tendency to bathos is disclosed in places, for instance, in such a couplet as—

And does Sir Francis now not fear?
His foeman draws uncommon near!

the situation being intended for a deeply tragic one; and there is a painful suggestion of Mr. W. S. Gilbert's ballads in parts of "Land of the Shoshonee," such as the opening, or the following passage:—

How lone he was, how patient she,
Upon that lonesome sandy sea!
It were a sad, unpleasant sight
To follow them through all the night, &c.

Still the verses have such merit as is derived from a keen eye for Nature, and a certain amount of descriptive power; the fire in the Californian forest is one of the best instances. The author may hereafter give us something more worthy of remembrance than "Songs of Far-away Lands," by Joaquim Miller (Longmans), which is the title of the present volume. Uniformly with it we receive, from the same publishers, a new and revised edition of his "Songs of the Sierras," the two original volumes being compressed into one.

Several new editions of old-established favourites present themselves from different quarters. The principal are the last two volumes of Messrs. Frederick Warne and Co.'s handsome series of the "Chandos Poets," dedicated respectively to the "Works of George Herbert," and the "Poetical Works of Reginald Heber, D.D." The former contains also the author's letters and prose writings, especially "Jacula Prudentum," and the quaintly-charming "Country Parson;" the latter, as well as "Palestine" and the familiar Hymns, has much that will be new and acceptable to most readers,—but what has become of "Bluebeard?" The illustrations in both volumes are good. Then from Messrs. Crosby Lockwood and Co. comes a twentieth edition of an established favourite, "Select Poetry for Children: with Brief Explanatory Notes," arranged for the use of schools and families, by Joseph Payne. It would hardly be possible to improve on this collection, which is too generally known to need further praise; though we must remark that if alterations are needed in an author's original work before it can be given to children, it would be better to omit some pieces.

"A Vision of Sumeru, and other Poems," by Shoshee Chunder Dutt (Calcutta: Thacker, Spink, and Co.), is rather a literary curiosity, as being the work of a cultivated Hindu gentleman; but its poetical merits are not of a very high order. The fugitive pieces are about the best, amongst which will be found renderings of Lamartine and Jean Paul Richter; the "Lays of Ancient Greece" are not striking, and perhaps no one but a native of the country can fully sympathise with the historical ballads. The principal piece is an allegory of the introduction of Christianity into India; but the mythology is rather puzzling, and the style reminds one of nothing so much as the burlesque of Southey in "Rejected Addresses."

"Carmina Regia, and other Songs of the Heart," by the Rev. Edwin Charles Wrenford (Hodder and Stoughton), is a well-intentioned collection of original sacred verse, dedicated by permission to Her Majesty. It has not much to recommend it from a poetical point of view, and is, in places, highly suggestive of Dr. Watts, whilst the versions of the Psalms will hardly supplant Zachary Boyd, to say nothing of the Marquis of Lorne's later rendering.

"Nelson:" a play in four acts and a tableau, by Emilia Aylmer Blake (Chapman and Hall), probably aims rather at the stage than the closet, and might be fairly effective, with certain audiences, if well mounted. It deals, as may be supposed, with the principal incidents of the naval hero's life, ending with his death at Trafalgar; but there is little or no attempt at delineation of character, or at poetic excellence.

To Spanish readers may be recommended a little volume of elegies to the memory of the beloved and lamented Queen of Spain, under the title of "Corona Fúnebre, dedicada á la Buena Memoria de S. M. la Reina Doña Maria de las Mercedes." The Spanish tongue, so noble and musical, lends itself well to such poetry; it could hardly have failed to be good, even had the inspiration been less! It is published by Messrs. Oliver, of Madrid and Barcelona.

SMOKING AND SNUFFING

"Le plus sot animal, à mon avis, c'est l'homme."—BOILEAU.

THE quantities of unmanufactured tobacco imported into the United Kingdom, during the years 1876 and 1877, were 77,000,000 lbs. and 74,000,000 lbs. respectively, in round numbers. This tobacco came from the following countries—the greatest portion from the United States, the remainder from Holland and its colony Java, Turkey, China, Japan, Manilla, &c. When it arrives in this country it is "warehoused" in certain Customs' bonding establishments at seaports, or removed to some inland bonding towns. At any of these tobacco warehouses the manufacturer can pay the duty, which is about 3*s.* 6*d.* per pound on unmanufactured tobacco. The manufacturer having (we shall suppose) paid the duty on the various bales he requires for his purpose, orders them to be carted to his factory, where he has to deal with another Govemment Department, namely, the Inland Revenue, or Excise. The manufacturer has to pay a license duty to this Department of 5*l.* 5*s.* for every 20,000lbs. weight of tobacco weighed for manufacture; and in order to estimate the proper quantity, this Department makes use of the receipts given by the Customs' authorities.

We shall now suppose that the duties are paid. The process of manufacturing the tobacco will substantially be as follows:—The bales will be opened at the factory, and the various kinds of tobacco will be mixed and watered, which is done in two ways, either by adding cold water on the leaves overnight, or more promptly by placing the tobacco over a stove, from which, through apertures, steam ascends and saturates the material. This important process of mixing we may, in passing state, occupies some time in execution; and is rendered necessary because some kinds of tobacco would not be bulky enough by themselves for the purpose of manufacturing. In addition, the maker has to endeavour constantly to impart a certain peculiar flavour which his goods are noted for, and this flavour can only be maintained by constant attention on his part to the mixing process. Indeed, if we wished to recommend the reader—unskilled in the trade—to ruin himself, we could not point out a surer method than by his becoming tobacco maker.

Then follows the process of pressing the tobacco, which is first prepared in lots and then put under a press, from which the tobacco is taken to a cutting-machine, worked by steam power, which cuts stems and all. After this the tobacco is passed over a copper stove heated by fire underneath. This stoving process requires also much attention, as if the tobacco were left too long it would burn, which would be a great loss to the manufacturer, as his sole profit consists in paying attention to the watering and mixing. After the lot has been stoved, it is cooled by a fan (worked by steam power), which is able to cool it in a very short time. The tobacco will then be ready to be weighed and packed, these processes of course varying according to the importance of the factory. In some places the well-known fancy packets of tobacco, labelled with curious names, such as "Royal," &c., will be made up, and so forth. A tobacco manufacturer could no more produce these various mixtures except for the varieties of leaf than a woollen manufacturer could produce different specimens of cloth without different varieties of wool.

In large establishments the makers employ travellers, whose districts will sometimes be very wide. It will thus often happen that a dingy-looking factory will be the centre of an extensive trade, the owners being very wealthy people. The sale of the tobacco may be interfered with very inconveniently by the Budget. It was so this year. There had been a good deal of speculation before the Budget was laid before the House, and heavy sums had been paid as duty; but no sooner was the result known (viz., that 4*d.* per pound would be added to the existing duty), than that the trade was entirely revolutionised. Old customers who had dealt with firms for years suddenly gave up dealing with them for the sake of a trifling extra charge per pound. It was not so in all cases. Some manufacturers, after a time, sold their tobacco at the same price as it had been for years; but in doing so they had necessarily to add more water, and produce an inferior article. Most makers say that the charge of 4*d.* per pound was not enough. Had it been 6*d.* or 8*d.* it would have been in their opinion better both for the national exchequer and for themselves;—but of course better still if some other article had been taxed.

Cigars are made from fine tobacco-leaf; but the leaf is not stoved, water only being added to it. The leaf, after being prepared, is taken to the room where the cigars are made, women generally being employed. They sit before a table, and, by a process rather difficult to describe, with the aid of gum they roll the leaves very skilfully with their hands, and, after cutting the 'smoking-ends' off with a knife, they produce cigars which are ready to be tied—a process that requires care. These ties are purchased from London cheaper than from anywhere else. The cigars are then ready to be placed into boxes, well known to us all. These boxes are made generally in London by manufacturers of fancy goods, and we are told some portion of the process is done by poor children in their homes. The cigars are then ready for the market, but of course not for smoking, as they require to be kept some time in a dry place.

Snuff is made from the "smalls," that is, the refuse portion of tobacco remaining after the operations described above have taken place. These smalls are dealt with in three ways:—They are collected together, packed and forwarded to a snuff factory, the snuff-maker allowing a considerable price for them; nevertheless, though these "smalls" are refuse, they supply him with the materials for making snuff more cheaply than he could procure in any other way. These "smalls" are dried in the snuff manufacturer's premises on a fire-stove, then ground to a powder, and mixed with leavening ingredients, and afterwards a portion of it is scented. The snuff will then be ready for the market. The second method of disposal is as follows:—The tobacco manufacturer, availing himself of a recent order, grinds the "smalls" at his own factory, and deposits them at a Customs' establishment appointed for the purpose. A sample of the snuff is then sent to London, and on receipt of the certificate the Customs authorities pay the manufacturer the drawback under certain conditions, of course; such drawback being equal to the original duty paid on the tobacco. The third way is to grind the "smalls" for exportation and drawback, and to send them to ports where, as snuff, they are allowed to be shipped.

The reader has now been able to verify Boileau's humiliating remark, that "the most foolish animal is man"—for man alone, as we have seen, among all other animals has the proud distinction—whether he take a pinch from a golden snuff-box in a sumptuous room, or from a tinned case in an underground hovel, of voluntarily sniffing up his nose that which was the sweepings of a factory floor; and also of considering it a mark of gentility to whiff smoke into his mouth from the pinched end of some nicotine leaves, rolled up by gummy fingers.

This sketch deals only with a district exclusive of London, as the London trade is dissimilar in some respects.

New Novels

"STRANGE WATERS," by R. E. Francillon (3 vols.: Bentley).—Mr. Francillon is always original in his novels, and has never shown himself so after a more marked fashion than in this, which—at least as regards those parts in it which are really its essence—we think must be held to contain the finest work he has yet given us. The secret of its success lies in the fact that the author here, as he says, takes his readers on a voyage "in somewhat strange and unfamiliar waters of life," and it is precisely in such waters that he swims with greatest ease, power, and freedom. For those who will read the book as it should be read, it has but three characters, each one of whom has been fashioned into what he or she is directly or indirectly by Art and its influences, and thus dwells in a world which is not that of ordinary human beings. We have the fanatical devotee of Art in Andrew Gordon or John March, the man to whom pure music is the one thing in the world to live for and think of, who has given twenty-five years of his life to the composition of a great work "which should be the embodiment of all Art thenceforth and for ever," and before its completion is smitten with total deafness, so that he may not hope to hear with his outward ears the triumph of this true child of his soul; the spoiled child of Art and its scorner in the wife he has put away from him, the great singer, Mademoiselle Clari, who has rejected the Art-worship to which her husband would have devoted her, and employed the glorious voice he has trained to win diamonds and the applause of fools; and the docile slave of art in Celia March, brought up by the father, in whose eyes she is a voice and little else, to fill the rôle of the mother of whose existence she is ignorant, and submissively accepting the mission imposed upon her, though with no enthusiasm for it, and with much inward shrinking from the burden. To bring out into full relief these three personages, so exceptional and remote from common experience by nature or circumstances or both—who are yet in some sort bound together, in that they all have their roots in that "score" which is one day to come into being as "Cleopatra; Tragedia Lirica in Cinque Atti"—is, one may say, the author's sole object here; and, of course, such an object leads him into "strange waters," and on ground outside the range of ordinary sympathies. But it is, as we have said, in dealing with such a theme as this that Mr. Francillon seems most at home and at his best. It is in representing "the common life of all men" that he seems to show least power and originality, perhaps because he does not feel enough genuine interest in it for his imagination to grasp and realise it. Within our limits it is impossible to dwell upon the novel at the length to which its deserts and our inclination would lead us; we will confine ourselves to saying that the concluding chapters, which tell the story of the production of "Cleopatra," when, at last, "the Score becomes Sound," and the one woman in the world who can sing Andrew Gordon's music comes forward to take up "the burden of the battle of Art" which had proved too heavy for poor Celia's over-taxed heart and energies, are, beyond question, very great work indeed. No doubt the leading incident may be pronounced improbable to the verge of impossibility, and so according to established rules and customs it is; but no one with imagination enough to be fit to read such a story as this will feel such criticism to be of the slightest importance. For the rest, the book is written in a style vigorous and pointed throughout, and rising in the last scenes to real eloquence and beauty of diction, whilst it contains evidence in abundance that it proceeds from one who is a thinker at least as much as a teller of stories. Judged from the right point of view, "Strange Waters" must be held a work of high distinction; and for the power and pathos of its finale it would not be easy—setting on one side George Eliot and Mr. G. Meredith—to find a match in recent novels.

"Rare Pale Margaret" (Sampson Low, Marston, and Co).—We cannot see much reason for introducing Margaret Hilton, the heroine here, best known among her intimates as "July," under the style and title of "rare pale Margaret," for she certainly has nothing in common with the listless, dreamy, meditative damsel who forms the subject of one of Mr. Tennyson's exquisite word-pictures. But the title is not of much consequence, and the story, though not one of special mark, is clever, interesting, and well told. Margaret's love troubles have this element of originality in them, that one of her suitors, to whom she is bound by habit and use from the days of childhood, though the notion of falling in love with him had never entered her head, is a deaf mute, but all the same a young man of great gifts and high culture, and a true moral hero. The best scenes in the tale are the earliest, when Margaret is still in bondage to governesses, and "July" to every one in her world, except her mother. She and her brothers and Jack Comyn, the Vicar's son—who ultimately develops into another lover—make a very lively group, and especially amusing is that one of the Hilton boys who, by reason of its being his destiny to join his uncle in Queensland when he reaches the age of eighteen, is known among his family as "the Outcast." The mother, Mrs. Hilton, too, is a very well-drawn and natural personage. Altogether the book is above the average, and decidedly pleasant reading.

"Dangerfield," by H. Baden Pritchard, author of "Tramps in the Tyrol," &c. (3 vols.: Tinsley).—This story is readable enough, though its "hero," if we are so to call the adventurer, Captain Dangerfield, is a stagey and conventional villain, whom we see through at once, and do not care for. The theatrical experiences of Tom Heatherley, who, though a gentleman by birth, becomes through stress of fortune stage carpenter at the "Comus," form much the best part of the book. They are related with a good deal of vivacity, and, at any rate, seem natural and life-like.

THE BLUEBELL

WHERE ferns in green luxuriance grow
In pine-shade cool,
Where grasses wave, and wild-flowers blow
Beside the pool,
Whose freshness gives the wood its name,
Content I grew,
Without a thought of wealth or fame,
Till plucked for you.

One August day in harvest time
A maiden young
Beheld me drooping in my prime,
My head down hung:
She gathered me with dainty care,
And as we came
From shade into the outer air
I heard your name!

She bade me haste to greet her love,
To bear him dreams
Of green below, dark trees above,
And rain in streams;
Of two that wandered there alone
And plighted troth:
She uttered oft the name of one,
But never both.

She bade me lay upon your mind
A thought of bliss;
She laid on me a burden kind,
A tender kiss.
I give you both again,—so press
Your lips on me.
I think no Talk-fountain. Yes!
And so does she!

—SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL MEMBERS

THE PERSONNEL OF THE SHEFFIELD CHURCH CONGRESS

The Archbishop of York, the President of the recent Sheffield Church Congress, is a dignitary who owes his distinguished position as the Northern Primate neither to high birth nor to influential friends, but exclusively to that rarest of all combinations—high intellectual gifts in alliance with strong common sense and uncommon tact. The personal appearance of Archbishop Thomson is much in his favour. His figure is noble, imposing, and well-built, his features have a pleasant expression, and his manner is winning, and singularly free from all affectation. His voice is not remarkable for strength, but it is clear, earnest, and commanding in its every tone. He is not by any means an orator of the highest class, such as his right reverend brother of Peterborough, or the late Bishop Wilberforce, but his style is vigorous, incisive, and polished, and the matter of his discourse never heavy, though full of arguments of weight, relieved as it always is by the brilliant play of a vivid and vigorous imagination. The Archbishop of York is not only one of the Presidents of the Church of England Temperance Society, but, from the conviction that his own example would be more efficacious than precept, he became a teetotaller.

The Bishops of St. David's and Rochester were formerly chaplains of the Archbishop of York, and it is said they owe their elevation to the Episcopal Bench to the influence of the Northern Primate, which is known to be powerful even with a Conservative Government, though Dr. Thomson is himself a Liberal in politics, and owed his own promotion to Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone. Dr. Thorold, the Bishop of Rochester, as Vicar of St. Pancras, earned the reputation of a hard-working parish priest, and of an earnest and eloquent preacher. He is one of the very few Bishops who never won a single Classical or Divinity honour at his University (Oxford), and his elevation, as he said to a friend, surprised no one more than himself. The Bishop of Ripon's (Dr. Bickersteth) fame lies in his preaching rather than in his learning, and the story goes, which we give for what it is worth, that Lord Palmerston, in offering the vacant Bishopric of Ripon, addressed inadvertently the letter of nomination to the "Reverend Robert Bickersteth," for whom it was not intended, but who did not say "Nolo episcopari," though the nomination was meant for a near kinsman of the same name. However this may be, there can be no manner of doubt that Dr. Bickersteth has proved himself an able and zealous overseer of the Church in the Diocese of Ripon.

The services of the Bishop of Manchester, Dr. Fraser, to the cause of Education deserved the highest recognition, which they received by his appointment to a mitre. For many years Dr. Fraser was Inspector of Schools, then Assistant-Commissioner in the Inquiry into Popular Education, and in this capacity he visited the United States to report on the education of that country. Though not altogether a handsome man, Bishop Fraser has a genial and pleasant face, with culture written in large characters in every lineament, and he has an easy and remarkably attractive manner. Clear and musical as a bell is his voice, sweet when he is pathetic, thrilling when he is solemn, and strongly incisive when he is sarcastic. Not long ago Dr. Fraser espoused the cause of the agricultural labourers against the tyranny of the farmers; this may have been a mistake of judgment, but it was certainly quite in keeping with the well-known honesty and independent character of the Bishop, and his keen sense of horror at what he believes to be injustice and wrong done to any fellow creature. This hard-working and self-denying prelate, who refuses himself the luxury of a wife and a palace, occasionally from the same sense of duty deals out the severest of animadversions against croquet-playing curates, and curates who marry without means.

The Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Harvey Goodwin, won the highest mathematical honours of his University, as Smith's Prizeman and Second Wrangler, and wears on his intellectual and handsome features the happy, contented look that is said to mark the men who have attained to the dignity of a mitre. Dr. Rowley Hill, Bishop of Sodor and Man, was the immediate predecessor of Canon Blakeney, the present Vicar of Sheffield. Both Bishops are known as eloquent preachers, as well as most pronounced representatives of the Evangelical School. In the same category we may place Canon Ryle, an Oxford first-classman, whose earnestness, zeal, and ability are fully acknowledged by every section of the Church, and beyond it, though scarcely sufficiently recognised by those who appoint to the highest offices in the Church. It is only due to Canon Ryle to state that it was owing to his exertions mainly that the Evangelical party took any practical interest in the Congress.

The Bishop of Capetown, Dr. Jones, was a distinguished protégé of the late Bishop Wilberforce, to whom he owed his promotion, and was the pupil of Dr. Hessey, the learned and scholarly Archdeacon of Middlesex, the late successful master of Merchant Taylors' School. Canon Basil Wilberforce, a son of the late Bishop of Winchester, has of late years championed the Temperance cause with an eloquence only a little less forcible than that of his gifted father and grandfather, the emancipator of the negro slave. In Archdeacon Emery and Archdeacon Hessey, the Sheffield Congress had the Church's two ablest writers on the organisation of Church Congresses and Conferences.

The Evangelical nobility of Sheffield and its neighbourhood were well represented in the Earl of Wharncliffe. The Broad Church party had moderate, safe, and able advocates in Rev. T. Llewelyn Davies and Rev. F. Pigou. Nor was the Ritualistic party lacking in able and zealous representatives in the persons of the Chairman of the English Church Union, Mr. Wood, and of the Rev. Berdmore Compton, Vicar of St. Margaret's, London, and Rev. J. Oakley. The Dean of Lichfield and the Dean of Ripon were par excellence the representatives, the former of the moderate High Church party, and the latter of the moderate Low Church party. The Bishops of Niagara and Iowa owed their visit to the Congress to the Pan-Anglican Conference, and were received in a manner worthy of the Transatlantic fame which they carried with them. Mr. F. T. Mappin, who is the Mayor of Sheffield, is, as they say in Sheffield, "a sharp blade," and much of the success of the recent Church Congress was owing to his valuable local aid, in which he was admirably assisted by Mr. Bernard Wake, Mr. Arthur Thomas, and Mr. William Smith, all local celebrities, and earnest and liberal-minded Churchmen.

With the single exception of the Croydon Congress of 1877, no Church Congress can boast of so large a representation, in its speakers and readers, of the learning and literature of the country. Almost every department of literature, sacred and secular, was represented, and well represented by men who are leaving their mark, though more or less distinctly, on the intellectual character of the age. The Archbishop of York, the President of the Congress, has given the world abundant proof of his singularly subtle and powerful intellectual force in his "Outlines of the Laws of Thought" and in his "Aids to Faith" and in his masterly contribution to "The Speaker's Commentary." Professor Stanley Leathes is a distinguished member of the Old Testament Revision Company, is also a prominent member of the Christian Evidence Society, and was the Boyle Lecturer a few years ago. Rev. W. Sanday and the Rev. Brownlow Maitland are also members of the Christian Evidence Society, and in this trio we find three of the very ablest writers of the present century against the scepticism of the age. Professor Leathes and Mr. Sanday have both written on the authenticity of the Gospel of St. John, against the attacks of the Neologian school of critics, and the Rev. Brownlow Maitland has written a most convincing and exhaustive refutation of Atheism and Agnosticism from a scientific standpoint, a work published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge as "An Essay on the Grounds of Belief in God." The present Bishop of St. David's (Dr. Basil Jones), like his great predecessor on the episcopal throne, Dr. Connop Thirlwall, the most learned prelate of a most learned age and country, is a man of varied culture and diversified talents. He has borne a high name as a writer in classical literature, in history, and in divinity, the very three provinces, by a singular coincidence, in which Bishop Thirlwall won his world-wide fame. The Rev. George Rawlinson is the Camden Professor of Ancient History, Oxford, and is best known to classical scholars by his facile princeps edition and translation of Herodotus, and to the public in general by his masterly lecture on the "Alleged Historical Difficulties of the Old and New Testaments, and the Light Thrown upon them by Modern Discoveries." Canon Tristram is well known as a distinguished naturalist, and a traveller in the Holy Land, who has written extensively on the Natural History and Physical History of Palestine, and contributed largely to the periodical literature of the day.

The Dean of Chester is best known as a writer for his "Life and Epistles of St. Paul," which has become the standard work on the subject; but it is not so well known that the Dean, as well as Canon Tristram, the Bishop of St. David's, and Dr. Thornton, have been contributors to the Quarterly Review. In Canon Walsham How we recognise the best representative of the devotional literature of our time. The Canon's "Plain Words" and "Practical Sermons" have wielded an incalculable power for spiritual good amongst all thoughtful minds in the National Church, and beyond it. The Rev. E. H. Bickersteth has long won his laurels as a sacred poet. At Cambridge, where he took high honours, he won the Seatonian Verse Prize, and his Christian Epic, "Yesterday, To-day, and For Ever," has gone through many editions, and is a poem of singular power and beauty, though some of it might be rewritten with improvement. The Very Reverend the Dean of Manchester (B. M. Cowie), the Rev. Samuel Earnshaw, Rector of Blomfield, Sheffield, were both Senior Wranglers. The Dean's best and most popular work is his "Scripture Difficulties." The Rev. Samuel Earnshaw is the gifted writer of the two best treatises known on Statics and Dynamics. Dr. Robinson Thornton, Vice-President of the Victoria Institute, and formerly Warden of Trinity College, Glenalmond, is known as an elegant classical scholar, and the author of the life of the famous Russian Prelate Nikon and the "Logic of Scepticism."

In connection with periodical literature, which was very fully represented, we find Mr. Beresford Hope, M.P., the proprietor of the Saturday Review, and an occasional contributor to the Church Quarterly; the Rev. Charles Bullock was for fourteen years the Rector of St. Nicholas, Worcester, an incumbency which he resigned in 1874 in order to devote himself entirely to literature. He is the editor of Hand and Heart, The Day of Days, Our Own Fireside, and other weekly and monthly serials of the purest and most profitable literature for the young; the Rev. Harry Jones was the editor of the late People's Magazine, published by the Christian Knowledge Society; the Rev. W. Boyd Carpenter is a regular contributor to the Quiver and other religious serials of a high character; the Rev. Ernest Fitzroy, a literate, the late editor of John Bull, is a representative of the London Conservative Daily Press; the Rev. G. W. Weldon is the reputed editor of the Rock, and the Rev. Dr. Lee is the editor of the National Church. The Hon. C. L. Wood, the Chairman of the English Church Union, is said to be a contributor to the columns of the Church Times, and Miss Whately, the author of the paper on "Women's Work in the Church," is the daughter of Archbishop Whately, and a regular contributor to religious periodical literature. Rev. J. W. Gedge is a Diocesan Inspector of Schools, and a well-known contributor to the Quiver and the Sunday School Magazine. The Rev. Canon Blakeney, Vicar of Sheffield, is a brother of Dr. Blakeney, Vicar of Bridlington, was for seventeen years Vicar of St. Paul's, Sheffield, and was transferred to his present benefice about a year ago, when Dr. Rowland Hill, the late Vicar, was appointed to the Bishopric of Sodor and Man. He is a man of great earnestness and large-hearted sympathy, and is possessed of great organising talent, and it is to his efforts that much of the success of the late Congress is due.—Our portraits are from photographs as follows:—The Mayor of Sheffield, by the Van der Weyde Light Company, 182, Regent Street; the Bishop of Carlisle, Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.; Mr. Wake, W. Bradnee, Torquay; Mr. Smith, Lewis, Isle of Man; Mr. Thomas, S. Eastham, Lord Street, Southport; Canon Blakeney, J. J. and S. Johnson, Glossop Road, Sheffield; and the remainder are by Samuel A. Walker, 330, Regent Street, W.

Note.——The undermentioned gentlemen, although alluded to in the foregoing article, are not included in our group of portraits:—Bishop of Capetown, Earl of Wharncliffe, Rev. B. Compton, Rev. J. Oakley, Rev. W. Sanday, Rev. Dr. Thornton, Rev. S. Earnshaw, Rev. H. Jones, Rev. E. Fitzroy, Rev. G. W. Weldon, and Rev. Dr. Lee.

AMAZONS ANCIENT AND MODERN

A Mexican court-martial has lately condemned to twenty years' imprisonment a young lady named Casiana Hernandez, who had been caught with arms in her hands conducting a guerilla warfare on behalf of the insurgents. The fair culprit was described as hardly thirty years old, strongly built and possessed of marvellous courage, which has obtained for her great distinction in various combats and the grade of lieutenant. She had been fighting for months in male attire, and had gained the complete confidence, as well as the command, of the troop entrusted to her. Surprised at last by a successful raid, she fell one night into the hands of the foe, was conducted in chains to Mexico, and at length ended her martial career in a similar though somewhat less tragic style to most of her predecessors in the art of war.

The list of those predecessors furnished by history contains, it is true, a mention of some brilliant successes as well as of the disastrous fate to which they led; and it is rather surprising, considering the fame which such heroines have achieved, that their example has not more often been followed. The idea of female warriors, however unknown to the Asiatic nations, appears in the earliest legends of all the Aryan race. The Greeks produce it in its most picturesque as well as definite form in the person of the famous Amazons sculptured on a thousand frescoes and bas-reliefs. From the time when under Penthesilea they fought at the siege of Troy, to that when their queen came out to meet, and, as she hoped, wed Alexander the Great, the Amazons were stedfastly believed to inhabit the parts of Asia around Trebizond; and the little Greek children still shuddered at accounts of their invasions in the heart of Hellenic territory. To the Romans the poetic type of Amazon was exhibited by Virgil in the person of Camilla. Chaste and fearless, swift and strong, the child of the forest flits for a while across the scene, appearing in the foremost ranks amongst the defenders of Italy, and falling after a brief career of glory by the hand of the Trojan invader. Of all the vividly drawn characters in the Æneid none is more charmingly sketched than the luckless Camilla. Armed with her bright javelins and sturdy battle-axe, and mounted on a steed as fiery as herself, she maintains for a short time the Latian hopes and courage; and her fall, mourned by the Queen of the Gods, dismays the hearts of the patriots. Only a short gleam of desperate bravery, the result of her example, animates the matrons of Italy, who crowd to the walls burning with shame and ire, longing to lay down their lives in defence of the fatherland. It is all in vain; and the death of Camilla is only the prelude to the ruin of the Latian cause. From the pages of Virgil it is a short step only to those of Livy, where on the doomed walls of Carthage are to be seen the lady-warriors of Africa. Every one has seen them in his mind's eye, those dark-eyed Furies, at once an example and a shame to their more effeminate brothers, breathing hatred and defiance from turret and house-roof, stringing the very bows with their long tresses, and hurling every weapon that rage could devise on the heads of the Roman foe.

More modern times have had their Amazons—figures as familiar to the eye as any that history presents. The Maid of Orleans shines forth like a bright star across the darkest page of the French annals, comparable in her shortlived glory, no less than in her fate, to the happiest inventions of the Greek and Latin poets. But it is in India, the land of the third great Aryan family, that the lady warriors, perhaps, played the most important part. Prince Soltikoff has described in graphic style the female guards of the Princes of the Deccan. Armed with musket and bayonet, they wear a uniform of scarlet cloth, trimmed and corded with white braid, a green trouser, and a scarlet shako, surmounted by a green plume. While employed, as they are in time of peace, in the interior of the palace, they wear no boots at all, but in war put on a low Eastern shoe, pointed and turned up at the toe. The long hair which is allowed to fall over their shoulders at once reveals their sex, but there is nothing in their courage or bearing which gives any such indication; and the honours of the regiment are to be found recorded in the annals of the fiercest wars in the peninsula. The King of Siam has a body-guard also composed of female warriors. It includes 400 girls chosen from amongst the strongest and most handsome of all the ladies in the land. At the age of thirteen they enter the service, and remain in it till twenty-five, when they pass into the reserve. From this time they leave the presence of the King himself, but are retained on duty at the other royal palaces, where they act as instructors and trainers of other and younger recruits. The weapon used by these pretty soldiers is the lance, which they are said to manage with great skill; and their light costume made them a grand attraction on the stage in Paris, where they were represented not long ago in a popular drama.

Africa also has had its Amazons, and even has them still. Some of the most formidable troops of the present King of Dahomey are the 4,000 women soldiers whose valour has been already tried in many a sanguinary field-day, and upon whom our own soldiers are said to look with no little awe in view of a possible conflict. The King is a shrewd observer of character, and may possibly have been made aware by painful experience furens quid femina possit. At any rate, he is known to have organised with great care this singular brigade, training up each member of it in a spirit of undying ferocity, and rigorously excluding them from any possible communication with men.

At the time of the Revolution it was not to be for one moment supposed that France would be without her Amazons. In the general crash of all established prejudices that of the inferiority of women was bound to fall with the rest, and accordingly there was soon enrolled amongst the motley forces of the revolutionists a battalion of fortes femmes. They were commanded by the famous Théroigne de Méricourt, and were to be found in the forefront of many of those rough encounters which abounded in the early days of the Paris insurrection. During the late war, in one of the abortive attempts to establish the Commune, a battalion of citoyennes was seen one day marching into the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville. Their ardour was admirable; their attitude and drill somewhat less exemplary. But what they chiefly wanted was a convenient supply of arms; and this want of munitions of war led to their untimely dissolution. An agent of police who had seen the corps defiling into the square, not without some irreverent laughter on the part of the multitude, managed to persuade their leaders that he was authorised to provide them with rifles. Under this false pretence he inveigled them into a house hard by, where, locking a strong door upon them, he left them to their own reflections, until they became so hungry as to be forced to disband voluntarily and set forth in quest of food.

A more successful career in arms was that of the widow Breton, who served first as private soldier and then as non-commissioned officer in the armies of the Republic and the Empire. This woman, whose maiden name was Angélique Duchemin, was presented with a certificate from the Minister of War testifying that she had served for many months as fusilier corporal in the 42nd regiment of infantry, had been wounded three times in the service of France, and had behaved in the ranks "with honour, bravery, and intelligence." She died many years afterwards in the Hôtel des Invalides. A more touching story was related by the Marshal Massena to Madame d'Abrantes, who has recorded it in her memoirs. The Marshal during the Battle of Bissingen observed a young soldier, apparently quite a boy, belonging to the light artillery, defending himself with exceeding bravery against a number of the enemy's soldiers, who had killed his horse. He sent a detachment to rescue him, but was too late to save his life. It was found that the body was that of a young woman, named Louise Bellet, who had enlisted in order to be with the object of her affections. She had completely outdone the exploit of the lady celebrated in the old sea song, who > followed after

> Under the name of Robert Carr,
> And her lily-white hands were smeared all over
> With the nasty pitch and tar.

The heroine of that veracious tale detected her supposed true-love in the act of flirting with a strange lady, and after having "called for a sword and pistol, which did come at her command," and having slain the faithless seaman, was "very much applauded" by the captain, and promoted to be first lieutenant of a gallant ship of war. Poor Louise Bellet, whose true-love was a captain of artillery, had not the mortification of finding out his infidelity; but had seen him killed in the battle, and was bent on the vain task of avenging him, when cut down before the Marshal could extricate her from the fray.

THE WILDS OF KERRY

III.

Adherence to old customs is usually considered to be an Irish characteristic, but it is in the back settlements of the West that this devotion to the past is most prominently shown. There is an ancient Irish measure, called a "bandle," about three-quarters of a yard in length; and when the country people bring in their home made frieze to sell at the Dingle fairs, they always prefer selling it by the bandle to selling it by the yard. Measuring by the bandle is prohibited; but it bears the stamp of antiquity, and to some minds there is a delicious soupçon of pleasure in braving the law, so the country folks hide their bandles till the danger of detection is over, then they produce them again, and obstinately "gang their ain gait." It is no wonder that smuggling used to be such a favourite amusement in these parts; people now living remember having seen sixty horses laden with smuggled tobacco pass up from the sea. A town without a butcher's shop sounds like an anomaly; yet Dingle, though it once boasted three castles, and used to return two members to the Irish Parliament, does not possess such a thing. Whenever a sheep is killed, the joints are hung up outside the walls of a not over-clean cabin, to announce to the public that for that day meat can be had. A quarter of mutton is sold for four and sixpence. In winter fourpence halfpenny or fivepence a pound is charged, while in summer it is rather dearer. Beef is scarcely ever to be procured, but there is always a glut of chickens and ducks. Two chickens were actually bought for fourpence, though the usual price for a good-sized one is ninepence. In spite of these cheap prices, the principal food of the poorer classes is coarse salt fish, generally hake. Every cabin has two or three hake hanging near the fire, and carts full of it are sold at the fairs. Dilisk, a species of sea-weed, found in plenty at the Blasket Islands, is esteemed a delicacy, and is greedily devoured by all who go "to town," for so Dingle is dignified by the Western folk. Everybody "in town" sells something, every small sash-window has a collection of dingy goods of the most promiscuous description. In one of these windows, not three feet square, the following articles were exposed for sale:—A scythe, a large dish, some bowls, a loaf of bread, a pair of tongs, a kettle, some bottles of castor oil, and a glass of "bulls'-eyes," not forgetting some "illigant tay from Cork!" Sugar-sticks are much run upon, and are of genuine home manufacture; but literature is at a very low ebb; even penny song-books are at a discount, and no other books can be bought. A large number of stone bottles, apparently ink-jars, would seem to indicate that if the people do not read they must write; but on a closer inspection these jars are found to contain "annatto"—a mixture for colouring butter, much in demand. A pack of harriers is quartered about amongst various cabins; dozens of these dogs prowl hungrily in the streets, while pigs of a pinkish white colour roam hither and thither at "their own sweet will." From long intercourse with their masters, occupying the same sleeping room, and being the enfants gâtés of the household, they have acquired an amazing familiarity and freedom. Some needy Irish parents once disposed of a child for thirty shillings; but a well-fed pig is worth more, and these 'cute porkers seem to have got an inkling of their own importance, and act accordingly. Whoever expects to acquire a stock of smart repartees and guide-book anecdotes in the far West will be sorely disappointed, for hardly a word of English is spoken among the lower classes. Irish is poured forth with amazing volubility, play of feature, and variety of gesture; but the moment English is heard, all the brightness and animation fade away, and the restraint of a foreign tongue at once appears. "I have no English" is a frequent expression. There seems to be a dread of making mistakes, and a certainty of doing so. Irish at the fairs, in the cabins, on the roads—nothing else is heard; and, should anybody lose his way in the mountains, it is ten to one that he can make himself understood. A traveller in this predicament vainly put the question, "Where am I to go?" The well-meaning master of a road-side cabin, after consulting with his better half, came to the conclusion that a light for a pipe must be the thing desired, and speedily brought out a burning sod of turf! No one who wanders about the Barony of Corkaguiny can think that Irish is an extinct language. The farm people, as they sit over their fires—which are always made on the earthen floors—have their Irish songs and their long Irish stories of Fion-mac-Cumhail, the Battle of Ventry, and the Valley of Slaughter. These narrations, which sound as if they were all "glaghs," and "gauns," and "cunnocks," are listened to with profound attention, and are continued from evening to evening like the tales of the Princess Scheherazade.

The scenery of the remote west—wild, grand, and sea-girt—is enough to awaken song and story in the most prosaic. The drive from Smerwick to Dunmore Head is something indescribable; there is hardly a sign of life, the silence is intense; chains of mountains, some crowned with rocks, others stretching away in the purple distance, are on one side, while on the other the deep blue Atlantic sweeps in solitary majesty as far as the eyes can reach. When we climb up to the Ogham stone of Eric or Erk, on the top of Dunmore Head, or scramble down to the Ram's Cove below, we have the certainty that we are as far west as it is possible to go. Nothing but a world of water is between us and America. Towards the right the Blasket Islands look like fairy mountains rising from the sea. The word "Blasket" is derived from the Irish blaose, the scale of a fish—hence, scaled off from the land. The people who live in these islands are isolated indeed. One old woman who came to the mainland for the first time in her life fell on her knees and thanked God that the world was so large. Boats seldom go across, especially in winter. The Sound of the Blaskets is considered dangerous. It was here that one of the ships of the Spanish Armada, Our Lady of the Rosary, was wrecked in September, 1588. In Smith's "History of Kerry" the account is given at length; and we are told how the Prince of Ascule and five hundred other persons, of whom one hundred were gentlemen, met an untimely fate among these rugged rocks. Trees, to use an Irishism, are "conspicuous from their absence" wherever we turn, but fuchsias of the rarest kinds flourish in the open air all the year round, arums grow like weeds, and reach an immense height, while ferns are found in great variety. A wild peculiar sound, which seems as if it came from the very depth of desolation, is sometimes heard along these lonely shores. A funeral is passing to some mountain burying-ground, and though actual "keening," in the sense of a funeral song, is a tradition of the past, yet the numerous women who walk after the coffin, draped in their shawls, always raise this dreary mournful wail, which is on one note, long-sustained and ear-haunting. It has some resemblance to the moan of a seagull. The sound is only heard on one other occasion—when there is an American flitting, and friends have met to see the last of Breda, Mhaire, or Shawn, who are setting off to court fortune in a more propitious land. Then comes this "great and exceeding bitter cry" from those who are left behind. America is always the land of promise; it seems so near in the West, and people who have never been to Dublin have been to New York. "You are looking out for a situation?" was said to two stout girls at a farmhouse. "No, no; we are going to America next year." So it always is. Every young person is going, or means to go, to this second homeland. The funeral customs in the West are peculiar. Three candles are burnt before a child, signifying the Trinity, twelve before a grown person, signifying the twelve Apostles, and when the master of a house dies the hearth is swept up that night, and the tongs and a few sods of turf put by the fire, so that, should he reappear, everything would be found ready for him. What with providing whisky and tobacco, wakes are rather expensive, but hospitality is a virtue which, though not always practised among the upper classes, is sure to be found among the bare-legged inhabitants of the mountains. They are always ready to bring out cups of milk, and never expect a reward. They do not resemble a certain monarch, Neidhe O'Mulconry, head of the *in*hospitality of Ireland, who solemnly swore that he would never give bread and butter together to his guests.

WINTER EXHIBITIONS

The opening note of the Winter Exhibitions has sounded. Messrs. Wallis's, Maclean's, and Tooth's Galleries have all opened this week, the first with a collection combining foreign and English pictures, foreign predominating in number and interest, Mr. Maclean's Gallery with water-colour drawings, Tooth's with a selection from works of our own and foreign schools—that of our own the most numerous.

All the other contents of Messrs. Wallis's room, though it contains a number of very clever small pictures by distinguished members of the French, Dutch, and Bavarian schools, shrink into comparative insignificance by the side of H. De Neuville's last great battle picture of the surrender of the remnant of the French defenders of Le Bourget, a village in the outskirts of Paris, finally carried by a division of the Prussian Guard after a desperate resistance on October 30, 1870. The catalogue thus describes the incident in an extract from General Ducrot's Défense de Paris:—"Le Bourget, shattered by shell, and attacked by a whole division of the Prussian Guard, had again fallen into the enemy's hands. All seemed over, save in the village church, where eight French officers and twenty men (belonging to the Dépôts de la Garde, Mobiles, and Francs-tireurs de la Presse) still resisted. They defended themselves to the last extremity, and it was only by shooting them through the windows and bringing up the artillery to storm their improvised citadel, that the remnant of this brave band could be forced to surrender." We are looking upon the façade of the village church and a house separated from it by a narrow alley. The plaster is dented by balls and bullets, the door shattered by the fire of the field pieces, which, with their muzzles blackened by powder, are being withdrawn from their positions in the blazing village street immediately in front of the church. From the church door, which has been barricaded within with heaped-up prie-Dieus, two of the French defenders are bearing out in a chair their gallant captain (Grivez) mortally wounded. The Prussian soldiers who line the church steps, still uncertain whether the desperate resistance may not be crowned by a more desperate rush, stand, some with rifles clubbed, some with finger on trigger of the nädelgewehr, and their officers sword in hand, ready for whatever the military need of the moment may dictate. In the foreground lie heaps of gathered arms which have been taken from the dead or surrendered by the survivors, but most of the rifles shattered before surrender. Standing disarmed among the Prussians are two French officers—one the commandant of the Guard, who has headed the defence of the village, bleeding from a wound in his head, the other an unwounded captain of Mobiles, and some French soldiers, wounded and prisoners. The houses in the village street are blazing, and the artillerymen find it hard to drive their teams through the smoke and flame. The picture has the same grim and ghastly reality which has given so distinct a stamp to the pictures of De Neuville, Detaille, and the other French battle painters who have studied the horrors of warfare on the field. The faces of the German soldiers are not pleasant to look upon. There may be a little of natural French antipathy in this, and no doubt the proportion of low, and even brutal, types may fairly be said to be exaggerated. Never, probably, was there an army which contained a larger leaven of gentle and educated men than the German force that invaded France in 1870.

At least it cannot be said that De Neuville's Teutonic heads and faces are not characteristic. The heads of the four French soldiers who are visible are not much, if at all, higher in type than the German. Faces, French or German, are not improved by the fever of bloodshed and the fire of battle.

Even the backs in this picture are so instinct with character, that we put faces to them involuntarily. There is a back view of a man on a ladder, close to the church door, leaning forward in intense curiosity, and another of a stalwart officer, sword in hand, in the foreground, which are perfectly marvellous for truth and force.

Nothing, indeed, can exceed the truthfulness and variety of conception and the individuality of these faces, or the naturalness as well as pictorial effectiveness of the grouping and attitudes of the living and the dead all through the picture.

How far such horror comes within the true field of art may, for the many, be matter of question. But if war is to be painted, better, I should say, that it should be painted in its horrible and hideous truth, as we see it in this picture and the others by the same master.

There is about De Neuville's manner of handling and execution a coarseness, if I may use the word, which is perfectly calculated, and a harshness which seem to adapt it especially to subjects of blood and battle. To appreciate the effect of the painting, it must be looked at from a certain distance, at which its roughness disappears, and it becomes life-like.

It is difficult to pause on the other pictures in the Gallery after this; but there are, as usual, a great many interesting cabinet pictures by the clever Bavarian masters, whom Mr. Wallis has made household names among us, to whom new names are yearly being added to, as, in this Exhibition, W. Rauber's, attached to two very spirited horse pictures of "A Reconnoitring Party" (7) and "A Horse Fair," in which dexterous use is made of some of the well-worn receipts of the Wouvermanns school, for the grouping of the white or mottled grey horse with the brown or bay. The small pictures by Breling, of the same class of subjects, scouting parties, road-side groups and gossips of soldiers and camp-followers, spies brought in prisoners by troopers, and so forth, are as brilliant in colour, and as effective and neatly touched in heads and costumes as ever. Then there is great merit in the many little bits of Bavarian character, such groups as A. Spring's "Gamblers," and "Grace Before Meat;" or Walten's "Dead Canary;" answering in Teutonic Art very much to the work of the Ecouen school (here represented by some pretty little examples by Duverger, Aufray, and Seignac), in the French, Kauffmann's "Blind Fiddler," or "Winter Pastime," Lacerenz's "Unwelcome Ordeal," or Kotschenreiter's "Expectation and Disappointment," a legatee approaching the door of the "Land-gerecht" with his papers, and coming away from it after a payment of fees which has all but swallowed up his poor little legacy. But all these, with the Bavarian landscapes of Wimmer, Lier, Windmaier, Heinisch, and Noerr, or K. Heffner's thin but effective bits of grey marsh land and river scenery, fall into the category of "slight" work, however clever.

Dutch painting has more solidity, though here there is only one example of Israels—a figure at a church-door of no peculiar interest—and Sadée's "A Gossip on the Seashore," rather more than normally dull in colour. Two subjects by Anker, the Swiss painter, a boy who has fallen asleep over his blotted copy-book, and a shrewd-looking old money-changer counting up his coin, have the care and fidelity to Nature that always mark his work.

Among the English pictures the most noticeable are Mr. Burgess's "Church Catechism," a knot of pretty señoritas, under the eye of their governess, being examined by a bland old priest, who questions his fair flock as if he loved them, while a stout attendant brings his cup of chocolate. Mr. Burgess has been happy in his girl models—ripe, melting brunettes, some of them at least perfectly prepared to put priest or layman through another guess sort of catechism; and the smooth smiling old priest, with his expressive fingers pressed point to point, his unctuous smile, and his deferential bend, is a characteristic type capitally put on canvas. After Mr. Burgess's picture, Mr. Elmore's Algerine water-colour claims notice as a well-posed, well-painted, picturesque figure which aims at nothing more, and is perhaps treated on too large a scale for its intrinsic interest. Miss Clara Montalba's two studies of Venetian shipping, dark masses of picturesque craft, between an expanse of grey sky above, and an expanse of grey lagoon below, are a repetition on a larger scale—and none the better, perhaps, for the increase of dimensions—of many of her Venetian studies of shipping already exhibited. They are fitter subjects for studies than for pictures, for which they have neither the intrinsic interest nor the charm of finish, or exquisiteness of workmanship. Miss Hilda Montalba's "Returning from the Rialto," two Venetian girls in a common gondola, rowed by a "bel giovane," has a pretty effect of figures against the water and background sky and buildings, but sadly wants better drawing in the principal figure. The most important English figure pictures after Burgess's Spanish group is Mr. Saville Lumley's "Challenger and Challenged," two Cavaliers "Coming to the point," in a tapestry-hung chamber.

A forest landscape, with wood-cutters, by J. L. Linnell, is a beautiful work of the painter's best time, of some twenty years ago. Gérôme's "Dancing Girl," her charms enhanced by the half-concealment of her green gauze veil, and Meissonier's little study of a standard-bearer, are lent by the Duke of Wellington to the exhibition. E. Allan Schmidt's "Artist in His Studio," and Jimenez's "Expert at Pen-Making" are two examples of elaborately finished minute work which merit the close examination which such work challenges. Jimenez's little picture has the superiority in interest of physiognomy, and in execution is free from a certain tendency to what painters call "tightness," which detracts from the result of Mr. Schmidt's extraordinarily careful execution.

The largest and most important contemporary landscapes (putting aside Mr. Linnell and Creswick's tree-bordered streamlet, with figures by Bottomley ("Crossing the Ford,") are Mr. Leader's "On the Malvern Hills" and "On a Devonshire River." They are good average examples of the painter, but I confess to preferring his studies, of which here are more than forty on exhibition on the first floor of Mr. Wallis's Gallery, to his pictures. The charm of the painter's skill and spirit in these studies at first hand, made on sea and on shore, from Switzerland, Wales, and England, North, South, East, and West, is enhanced by that freshness of effect which the elaboration of the studio is apt to efface without always supplying an equivalent.

I must reserve Messrs. M'Lean's and Tooth's Galleries for next week's notice.

The Glories of Napoleon I.'s Reign were once inscribed on the soles of a pair of boots by a Bonapartist shoemaker, who wrote the history in different sized nails, and a Hungarian [illegible], whose son is fighting in Bosnia, has presented a somewhat similar pair to Marshal Philippovich. On the heel of one boot "Bosnia" is clearly marked out by nails, and on the other heel figures "Magyarorszag."

A clever Swindle was recently executed by a Brahmin in Calcutta. The Brahmin had been in the habit of exchanging rupees for sovereigns on behalf of a broker, who reaped considerable profit by the transaction. One day the broker gave the Brahmin 100,000 rupees, and the latter went to the Bank and exchanged them for sovereigns. Returning to the broker with a number of neatly sealed packets, he stated that he was called away suddenly, and wished the broker to give him a receipt. He opened one or two of the packets to show the sovereigns, when the broker stopped him, saying he knew what they contained, and gave the receipt. The Brahmin departed, and nothing was heard of him afterwards. The broker opened the remainder of the packets, and found they contained bran new pice neatly rolled together.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The clouds in the East seem to be gathering thickly once again, the latest phase of the crisis being another Bulgarian rising, this time in Eastern Roumelia and Macedonia, where the insurgents have already burnt down several villages, and have massacred several companies of regular troops. The insurgents are said to number 12,000, to be well armed, and to be commanded by Russian officers, and the movement at the present time is considered to be exceedingly serious, as it is rapidly extending, and, of course, receives sympathy and assistance from Bulgaria proper, where, indeed, the movement has undoubtedly been originated. The Porte naturally accuses the Russians of having prompted the insurrection, more especially as Eastern Roumelia is termed Southern Bulgaria by Prince Dondoukoff, and, indeed, is known by this name in St. Petersburg. Prince Labanoff, the Russian Ambassador, however, denies that the Russians have taken any part in the rising, which he declares only consists of a few acts of brigandage, perpetrated by Bulgarian and Turkish deserters. The Porte, however, thinks otherwise, and is preparing to despatch powerful reinforcements to the scene of action, and there is very little doubt, to use the words of the Austrian official organ, that the main object of the rising is to realise the idea of a Bulgaria reaching to the Ægean Sea, as traced by the Treaty of San Stefano. This object can scarcely be anything otherwise than agreeable to Russians, and it is a curious fact that Prince Dondoukoff's official journal, the Bulgarian Maritza, has published strong letters invoking protection for the inhabitants of Eastern Roumelia, and an inflammatory ode inciting the Macedonians to revolt. In the mean time, the Eastern Roumelian Commission are pursuing their work of financial reorganisation, and Prince Dondoukoff has left General Stolypin in charge of the province, assuring the authorities before leaving not to fear for the future, as "time and circumstances may make many changes in your situation, for the historical current of things is often more powerful than all human combinations." The Russo-Turkish definitive Treaty is still unconcluded, and the Russian troops are retracing their steps—a fact which has caused the Porte to address an energetic note of remonstrance to St. Petersburg. Instead, indeed, of the Russians moving their forces north of the Balkans formidable reinforcements continue to arrive both round Adrianople and in Eastern Roumelia. As to the throne of Bulgaria, it is said that should General Ignatieff decline to accept the offer Prince Dondoukoff, the present Governor, will probably be elected, more especially as he so openly advocates the union of Eastern Roumelia with Bulgaria. The British Vice-Consul at Bourgas has been attacked by Russian officers while investigating a quarrel between some British and Russian subjects. On the news reaching Constantinople H.M.S. Rapid and Antelope were despatched thither with an English flag officer.

The British scheme of reforms has been definitively accepted by the Sultan, and Lord Salisbury has wired to Sir Henry Layard expressing his satisfaction, notwithstanding that, if we are to believe certain statements, the reforms have been considerably modified by the Porte. The chief points of the reforms are the appointment of a local gendarmerie, the nomination of governors-general for five years, subject to the consent of England, and the abolition of tax-farming. There is little news from the capital, except that the depreciation of the paper money continues, so that a gold lira of 100 piastres now sells for for 347 piastres caimé. The English and French Ambassadors have recommended the formation of a commission of foreign bankers and merchants to consider the question. The fortification works are still being actively pushed on, and Baker Pasha has agreed to complete them within two months.

AUSTRIA is rapidly withdrawing her superfluous troops from Bosnia and Herzegovina, and demobilising them, but the Commander-in-Chief, who, in all probability, will be succeeded by the Prince of Wurtemburg, remains in the provinces until the work of redistribution and demobilisation is completed. ROUMANIA is busily making preparations to occupy the Dobrudscha, but it is said that another complication has arisen, as the Russians, notwithstanding that they have obtained possession of Bessarabia, decline to hand over the Dobrudscha to the Roumanians until the latter have concluded a convention, permitting a passage through Roumania at all times and all seasons to Russian troops. The Russians are accordingly refortifying several important strategical points, and are putting the Danubian fortresses into a state of defence.

From CYPRUS there is better news than usual, Sir Garnet Wolseley reporting that all the sick are now doing well, and that the climate is "extremely pleasant" at the present time. The First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary of State for War reached Larnaca on Wednesday.

FRANCE.——The crowning festivities of the Exhibition having come to an end, the Exhibition is ceasing to monopolise public attention, and political affairs are resuming their usual sway. On Sunday the elections in 17,000 Communes of the delegates who are to choose the seventy-five senators took place, though with what result it is impossible to say, beyond that the Republicans expect to have realised a considerable majority. On Monday the Chambers at Versailles opened for the autumn Session, the only event in the Senate being an eulogy on the late Bishop Dupanloup from the President, the Duc d'Audiffret Pasquier; while, in the Chamber, M. Cuneo d'Ornano attempted to revive his proposal for the repeal of M. Dufaure's Press Law of 1875, but failed. At present so much quiet prevails in political circles that there appears little for the Deputies to quarrel about, although the discussion of the Budget will probably give rise to some characteristic "scenes" and incidents. There was a curious return presented on Monday to the Chamber of the various people under vows in France, who number in all 200,000, exclusive of the 45,000 ecclesiastics in the pay of the State. Of these 200,000, however, only 30,000 are men, and of these the greater part are engaged in education. On Tuesday a Cabinet Council was held, at which a number of Prefectoral changes were decided upon.

In Paris exhibitors are beginning to think of packing up and going home, although the attendance seems larger than ever, as no fewer than 209,900 visitors were registered at the Exhibition on Sunday. The Prince of Wales still remains the favourite of the hour, and on Tuesday went to the Français to see Octave Feuillet's's well-known play, The Sphinx, which was performed at his especial request, and in which Mdlle. Croizette played with all the realistic ghastliness for which she is so renowned in that rôle, and both she and Mdlle. Sara Bernhardt were as enthusiastically applauded as when the play was produced six years ago. There is considerable dissatisfaction among English exhibitors at not being allowed to accept the decorations of the Legion of Honour which the French Government are willing to bestow on them—all the more so as foreign exhibitors are allowed by their respective Governments freely to accept and wear them. Neither are the French nor the foreign exhibitors particularly pleased with their awards. The good faith of the jurors is widely impeached, and they are accused of awarding medals to people who have never exhibited, and in one case a gold medal has been given to a man who has exhibited a number of bottles of a well-known champagne firm, while the firm in question has only received a bronze medal. Many medals have been refused, and notices to that effect placed on the exhibits. The lottery fever is raging as fiercely as ever among the foreigners and Parisians, and the National Lottery Committee have now decided that the issue shall be extended to 400,000*l*. There is little other news from Paris, save that M. de Marcère has opened a new mairie in Paris with a speech, in which he warned his hearers "that there was a false and a true Republic, but that the only one he recognised was based on liberty for all," that M. Gambetta is now forty, and eligible for the Senate, that a grand funeral service for the repose of Bishop Dupanloup's soul has been held in Notre Dame, and that the trial of the members of the Socialistic Congress has resulted in the condemnation of the prisoners to short terms of imprisonment. The deaths are reported of M. Gaspard Lacroix, the landscape painter and friend of Corot, and of M. Georges Cavalié, popularly known in Paris as Pipe en Bois, a once celebrated Radical, who took part in the Government of Defence under M. Gambetta, but subsequently became involved in the Commune, under which he served as Minister for Public Works. For this he was banished, but on account of his ill health was permitted to return to Paris a few weeks ago.

The Eastern Question continues to be actively discussed by the various papers, most of which side with England, though hardly sharing the optimist opinions of Sir Stafford Northcote. The Débats accuses Russia of desiring to resuscitate the Treaty of San Stefano, and laughs at the Russian stories of the massacres of Christians, seeing that 20,000 well-armed Christian Bulgarians have invaded Macedonia and burned down numerous villages, while the Constitutionnel expects great things from the British reforms in Asia Minor.

SPAIN.——An attempt to assassinate King Alphonso was made at the close of last week in Madrid. As the King was driving through the Calle Mayor, a man in a blouse fired a pistol at the King, but fortunately missed his aim. The would-be assassin, who was at once arrested, is a young man of twenty-three, named Juan Oliver Moncasi, a native of Tarragona, and a cooper by trade. He states that he is a member of the International Society, and admits that the crime was premeditated. The utmost sympathy has been universally expressed with the King, and a grand Te Deum of thanksgiving was sung in the Church of Santa Maria, all the Ministers and civil and military dignitaries being present. The assassin is now being tried, and it has been ascertained that he has no accomplices. He will probably be condemned to death, but it is thought that the King will commute his sentence to that of imprisonment for life.

ITALY.——Signor Cairoli has succeeded in forming a Ministry, Admiral Brin accepting the Marine portfolio, and Signor Pessina that of Agriculture. A movement favourable to the Cabinet is being set on foot among the Deputies, and it is expected that the Ministry will command a Parliamentary majority. On Monday there was a popular demonstration, headed by Menotti Garibaldi, before the Villa Gloria, in order to commemorate the aniversary of the engagement in 1867 between the Pontifical Zouaves and a detachment of ninety Garibaldians under Henry Cairoli, the Premier's brother. On the same day the leader of the Opposition, Signor Minghetti, was entertained by his constituents at a banquet, at which he severely criticised the financial policy of the Ministry, and declared that instead of a surplus of sixty millions there would be a deficit of ten millions. He also advocated an extension of the suffrage to all citizens who could read and write; but, referring to Eastern politics, declared that "Italy had no direct interests in the Oriental problem, and must not, by assuming them, impair her proper influence." Considerable discussion has been excited by an article in the Fanfulla, stating that a Western alliance of England, France, and Italy was in contemplation. The other journals deny the truth of this, and express considerable doubts as to whether such an alliance would be to the interests of Italy.

The negotiations between the Vatican and Germany appear to be making little progress, although the Pope has instructed the Catholic clergy in Germany not to oppose the new Anti-Socialist Law. The Pope is said to have been much affected at the news of Cardinal Cullen's death, and it is expected that he will appoint another Cardinal as his successor. The vacancy is reported to have been offered to Cardinal Howard, who has refused it.

INDIA AND AFGHANISTAN.—Lord Lytton has determined to make one more effort for the preservation of peace, and has despatched Nawab Gholam Khan once again to Cabul, with a note plainly setting before the Ameer the consequences of his refusal to place us upon the same footing with the Russians, and clearly giving him the choice of peace or war. What the exact terms of the Ameer's letter are, however, are not yet publicly known, but all accounts agree in stating that it is most disagreeably worded, and freely express the Ameer's willingness to fight. Meanwhile the preparations are being pushed forward as energetically as ever, and the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Frederick Haines will shortly proceed to Peshawur. The strength of the expeditionary force is now stated to be 34,000 men, of whom a third are European, and who will be divided as follows:—the Quettah army will be 12,000 strong, with sixty guns and a strong siege train, the Peshawur Valley army 16,000 strong, with sixty-six guns, and the Kuram Valley force 6,000 strong, with twenty-four guns. The councils of war are all naturally kept secret, and it is not believed that any winter campaign will be undertaken except under direct orders from England, although it is thought likely that a proclamation specifying fully the reasons which have influenced the Government in declaring war will shortly be issued. According to The Times correspondent, a resolute determination exists in India "that however great the call may be upon the resources of the Indian Empire, no Afghan ruler shall ever again be permitted to imperil the safety of that Empire by carrying on intrigues for its destruction with a powerful and hardly concealed enemy." The Punjaub feudatory Princes are all spontaneously proffering their assistance, the Rajahs of Puttiala, Jheend, Narbah, Kapoorthella, and Faredkote have placed their troops at the disposal of the Government, the Nawab of Bawulpore has not only offered his troops, but the whole resources of his State, while the little Begum of Bhopal has also offered the use of her army. Of the Ameer himself we hear but little, except that his army is calculated at some 50,000 infantry, 12,500 cavalry, and 200 guns, while his gun factories are converting Enfield rifles into breech-loaders.

In the mean time Russia has now boldly thrown off the mask, and the St. Petersburg papers warmly urge that direct assistance should be afforded to the Ameer, and echo the words of the St. Petersburg Gazette, recommending that Russia should aid Shere Ali with money, arms, and officers to fortify the passes on which the position of Russia depends, and those of the Vyedomosti, which declares that England, once possessed of Afghanistan, would be impregnable, and Russia would then not only have to abandon all hope of ever driving the English out of India, but might actually find her eastern flank threatened by those who are her worst enemies in the West. A Russian-Afghan dictionary is being officially published in St. Petersburg. General Lamakine has once more undertaken an expedition from the eastern shore of the Caspian in the direction of Merv and Herat, which it is now expected that Russia will occupy. The Murghab Basin, in which Merv is situated, is exceedingly fertile, and could easily be made the basis of a large army. There is a good open road from Merv to Herat by the Heri Rud Valley, 225 miles long. There is now no attempt to conceal that General Stolieteff's mission was despatched to Cabul to embarrass the English. A small staff of the mission still remain at the Ameer's capital, including Colonel Rasgonoff, Councillor Malevinski, Secretary Benderski, Ensign Nazaroff, and Seman Beg.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In the UNITED STATES Secretary Evarts has addressed a note to the British Government respecting the grievance of the American fishermen who were driven away by the Newfoundlanders in contravention of the Treaty of Washington, but in accordance with certain private rules which the Newfoundlanders had thought proper to make.—There has been a terrific storm in the States of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. In Philadelphia nearly 400 buildings were unroofed, while numerous vessels were wrecked and foundered in Chesapeake Bay. The yellow fever epidemic in the south shows signs of coming to an end, few new cases occur, and the Memphis Board of Health has announced that the refugees may safely return. Relief associations are ceasing their operations. The Australian cricketers have sailed for home from San Francisco.—In EGYPT the Princes and Princesses of the Khedive's family have completed, according to the Mahomedan law, the act of ceding their landed property to the State.—In GERMANY the Government has been busy closing the Socialist societies, and has prohibited the appearance of several new journals.—AUSTRIA is once more in the midst of a Ministerial crisis, Baron de Pretis having abandoned his attempt to form a new Cabinet, while in HUNGARY political matters become more and more intricate and involved every day. —From DAHOMEY we hear that the King is once again becoming troublesome, that he has imprisoned several European merchants at Whydah, and has captured the Portuguese commander and soldiers, and forced them to parade before him. The treaty concluded last year is daily violated, while he has also recommenced his grand "custom," at which over 500 human beings have been sacrificed within a month.

THE COURT

THE Queen continues at Balmoral with the Princess Beatrice, and has been taking her usual walks and drives, while the Princess frequently goes out riding. Her Majesty has driven to the Linn of Quoich, and has entertained the Marquis and Marchioness of Huntly on a short visit. On Saturday Principal Tulloch arrived at Balmoral, and with Sir Michael Hicks-Beach joined the Queen and Princess Beatrice at dinner in the evening. Next morning, Divine Service was performed at the Castle before Her Majesty, the Princess Beatrice, and the Royal Household, Principal Tulloch officiating. On Monday the Queen and Princess Beatrice drove by Lochnagar Distillery on Deeside through very stormy weather, and in the evening Sir Michael Hicks-Beach dined with Her Majesty.—The Queen intends to erect a statue to the late Sir Thomas Biddulph in recognition of his services, and the monument will be placed west of Balmoral Castle, near the Dee, on the former site of a fog house.

The Prince and Princess of Wales remain in Paris, where they have been attending the festivities connected with the Exhibition, and have gone the round of the theatres. Thus, at the end of last week they were present at a ball given by M. Waddington, the Foreign Minister, where the Princess's diamonds excited general admiration, and the Prince also went to the Porte St. Martin and the Nouveautés Theatres to see the Tour du Monde and Coco. On Sunday afternoon the Prince and Princess and the Crown Prince and Princess of Denmark went up in the captive balloon, and in the evening they dined with Marshal MacMahon at the Elysée, the banquet being given in honour of the various Royal visitors to Paris. Next day the Prince and Princess of Wales went to the Trocadéro, and the Prince transacted Exhibition business at the office of the British Commission, and in the evening they accompanied the Danish Prince and Princess to the Théâtre Français, where the Sphinx had been revived for the Prince of Wales' especial benefit, as he had never been in Paris when the piece was played. Between the acts the Prince visited the green-room and presented M. Febvre, who takes the part of a Scotch lord, with his gold-headed cane. During the week the Prince and Princess will go down to Mouchy, and drive from thence to the country seat of the Princesse de Sagan. —The Prince has subscribed 500*l*. to the fund for the erection of Truro Cathedral.

The Duke of Edinburgh spent three days at Marseilles last week awaiting his vessel, and directly the Black Prince arrived he embarked and started for Gibraltar. The Black Prince has been found deficient in speed to accompany the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne to Canada, so the Sarmatian will have no convoy. The Marquis and Marchioness start on the 14th inst.—Preparations for the Duke of Connaught's wedding have already begun at Windsor Castle, and several of the principal state rooms are being redecorated in readiness. The Duke went to the Gaiety Theatre last week and to the Haymarket on Monday night.—Prince Leopold and the Duke of Cumberland visited the Comte de Chambord at Buckheim last week.

Duke Charles of Schleswig-Holstein Sondenburg-Glücksburg, eldest brother of the King of Denmark and uncle to the Princess of Wales, has died at Schleswig after a long illness. The Duke, who was 66 years of age leaves a widow but no children.—According to the Paris Défense, the Princess Thyra of Denmark and the Duke of Cumberland first met three years ago at Rome and contracted a mutual attachment. The Duke subsequently visited Copenhagen, but political reasons prevented the conclusion of the marriage, and the project lay dormant until the recent visit of the Danish Royal Family to England. All political difficulties have now been removed, however, and a Berlin correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette states that the Prussian Government is willing to surrender up the so-called "Guelph Fund" if the Duke will withdraw his recent manifesto, by which he put a decided stop to all attempts at mediation.

CHURCH NEWS

THE CHURCH OF IRELAND.——At the opening of the Meath Diocesan Synod last week, the Bishop in his inaugural address said that it was customary on such occasions to say something of the position of the Church at large. There was, however, nothing sensational to relate. The Church was doing its work quietly, efficiently, and harmoniously. There had been some excitement in the past, but now that most of the burning questions had been settled, calm had followed, and the only complaint that was open to any of their excitable brethren was that Church affairs had grown insufferably dull. This dulness, however, was one with which he was sure that they were all willing to acquiesce, for the Church was manifesting tokens of life and of increasing vitality. He knew that strange rumours did occasionally reach them of their own doings, but he was glad to say that their English brethren were taking a more reasonable view of their proceedings. If he wanted proof of this he had only to refer to the friendly manner in which the nine Irish Bishops had been received at the Lambeth Conference in London. But these remarks only applied to the general tendency, for there were some persons who still held strange notions of what the Church of Ireland was doing. Only a few days ago he read that the Church of Ireland was honeycombed with Plymouth Brethren, but, so far as his experience went, he did not see such tendencies to be at work in his diocese. Within the last few months he had heard of several persons drawing back to the Church who had temporarily slackened in their loyalty, and he did not believe there was half so much Plymouth Brethrenism in Ireland as in some parts of England.

VARIOUS.——The Bishop of St. Alban's, commencing the Primary Visitation of his diocese on Tuesday at his cathedral church, spoke at great length of the advantages of the cathedral system, and the best steps for establishing it temporarily and permanently at St. Alban's. He strongly condemned the "Reformed Episcopal Church," whose Bishops, he said, were destitute of authority. He disapproved alike of laxity on the one side and excessive ceremonialism on the other, expressing, however, his opinion that punitive legislation was not the remedy for existing dissensions.—On Friday last week a general conference on Foreign Missions was held in Exeter Hall, under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury. One of the speakers, quoting Mr. Keith Johnson's recently collected statistics, said that the total population of the earth was 1,424,046,600, out of which 1,033,505,000 were non-Christians, leaving the total of Christians 390,541,600. Of these latter 79,958,000 belonged to the Greek Church, and 190,315,000 were Roman Catholics. The remainder were Protestants and amounted to 115.218,000. These figures showed that the missions had done well, but he thought that they ought to have done better. Mission work had during the last twenty years been very active, 1858 having been a great year, especially in India after the Mutiny. In China, in Japan, in Africa, and even in Afghanistan, missions had been established, and numerous converts had been made.—The peal of twelve bells recently presented to St. Paul's Cathedral by the Corporation, Lady Burdett Coutts, and the various City Companies, were to be rung for the first time yesterday (Friday, All Saints' Day), immediately after the afternoon service. The total weight of the bells is over 271 cwt.—Apropos of the articles on "Purchase in the Church," which are now appearing in the Echo, a correspondent of the Manchester Examiner and Times calls attention to a curious auction which recently took place in London, when "one-half of one-third" of the living of Llanwinio, Carmarthenshire, was offered for sale. The living is only worth 83*l.* a year, so that "one-half of one-third" would be but 13*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* The writer remarks that "it seems a whimsical thing to sell so minute a portion of the Church of England."—It seems that if Mr. Robertson had, in defiance of public opinion, determined to produce the Passion Play at the Aquarium, he would have been in some measure punished by becoming the victim of a hoax. On Friday last the Burgomaster of Oberammergau telegraphed that the announcement was "humbug," and has since written more fully, but not more strongly, to the effect that none of the villagers who took part in the representation there, have any knowledge of Mr. Robertson's agent, or any intention of leaving their native valley to appear in a foreign theatre in that or any other play.—On Tuesday, the memorial-stones of the Shoreditch Baptist Tabernacle, of which the Rev. W. Cuff is to be the pastor, were laid, one by Mr. S. Morley, M.P., and the other by Mr. J. Harvey. Mr. Morley, in addressing the spectators, said that although he was connected with another denomination (the Congregationalists), he felt that the work had a strong claim to sympathy outside the Baptist body, and he united in it with pleasure, because he felt that the people were to be won through Christian men appealing to them on the ground of their common Christian teaching, and not through their giving prominence to non-essentials; and he wished the day were nearer when that principle was likely to be carried out by Christians of different denominations in the villages and the smaller towns, and when they all would stand shoulder to shoulder against the common enemy. It was a deplorable thing, but there were hundreds of evangelical clergymen of the Established Church who were endorsing a lie by continuing in it. Through his connection with the City he was brought in contact with the heads of commercial houses who conversed about cases of fraud and dishonesty there, and he had heard the very position of clergymen quoted—he did not say as justifying, but at least as encouraging, such things. These honoured men, for they were honoured men, were willing to continue to receive money belonging to the Church, or, what was the same thing, of the country, under false pretences. Several other gentlemen, amongst whom was Mr. Spurgeon, also addressed the meeting.—Cardinal Cullen, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, died somewhat suddenly on Thursday, last week, at Dublin. He was in his 76th year, and was a native of Dublin; but went to Rome at a very early age, and lived there for more than 30 years, being for some time rector of the Irish College. In 1852 Pio Nono appointed him Primate of Ireland and Archbishop of Dublin, and in 1866 he was made a Cardinal, being the first Irish Bishop advanced to that dignity since the Reformation. He was an uncompromising Ultramontane, and a great favourite at Rome; but his popularity in Ireland was in some degree affected by his opposition to Fenianism, Freemasonry, and secret societies generally. On Sunday the body was removed in procession to Marlborough Street Church, where it lay in state, and was visited by great numbers of persons, and on Tuesday the funeral ceremony was performed in the Cathedral. The final interment, however, is to take place at Clonliffe Chapel, near Dublin.

MUSIC

CHORAL SOCIETIES.——Our great societies for the performance of sacred choral music already announce their yearly advent. The Sacred Harmonic, with Sir Michael Costa as conductor, a post he has held since since 1848, begins its forty-seventh season three weeks hence at Exeter Hall, with Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and Rossini's Stabat Mater—two fine works as much opposed to each other as the teaching of Luther to that of the Romish Church. Their association in the same programme, however, has long been made familiar to us; and, whatever may be individual opinion, it can hardly be denied that the contemplation of two men so gifted earnestly giving expression through their art to religious aspirations which, while differently interpreted, lead towards one and the same direction, is both edifying and instructive. It is not, we believe, the intention of the Sacred Harmonic Society to produce any special novelty during their forthcoming series of performances. The experiment, tried not long since, of making Rossini's grand opera Moïse (the French version) pass for an oratorio is to be repeated. For this every true appreciator of Rossini's genius must feel more or less regret, seeing that, notwithstanding the subject, no more emphatically operatic music than that of Mosè in Egitto (the original title of the work when produced at Naples, in 1818) ever proceeded from the pen of its prolific composer. Moreover, certain modifications and curtailments for the presentation of the work in the conditions prescribed at Exeter Hall are necessary; and these, it must be admitted, are by no means improvements. We should greatly prefer hearing Moïse under the unintelligibly manufactured title of Zora, with the whole of the music as given at the Royal Italian Opera in 1850, or thereabouts. By the way, are we never to hear the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria at Exeter Hall? The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Barnby, begins its accustomed series of performances next week with Mendelssohn's Elijah—an oratorio doubtless selected because the thirty-first anniversary of its composer's death (Nov. 4, 1847) is just at hand. Thus the amateurs of sacred choral music must content themselves for the present with repetitions of long-acknowledged masterpieces; and, as times go, they are not greatly to be pitied.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——The "off season" seems to be going on prosperously enough. At ordinary representations the house is well attended, with Carmen it is crammed. Poor Georges Bizet probably did not foresee how popular he would become in England. Though the performance is not up to the summer season mark, it has merits that arrest attention and command applause. The conductor, Signor Licalsi, an excellent musician, is thoroughly familiar with his work, and presides over an orchestra both numerous and efficient, with Mr. Weist Hill as leading violin. Two important changes in the cast, if not improvements, give Carmen in some degree a new physiognomy. Instead of Miss Minnie Hauk we have now Madame Trebelli in the part of the gipsy heroine, and, in lieu of Signor Del Puente, Signor Mendioroz in that of the bull-fighter, Escamillo. It is satisfactory to see and hear once more the sympathetic Mdlle. Valleria as the loving and faithful peasant, Michaela, who tries to save her former lover, Don José, from the wiles of Carmen, just as, in the famous opera of Meyerbeer, that other peasant, Alice, with more success, endeavours to save her foster-brother, Robert, from the wiles of Bertram. It is also pleasant to recognise again the clever Madame Bauermeister as one of the confidential gipsy-friends of the ill-starred Carmen; her companion, in the absence of Mdlle. Robiati, being represented by Miss Purdy. Madame Trebelli's dramatic impersonation of Carmen differs materially from that of Miss Minnie Hauk. Where the latter is all nature and spontaneity, the former is somewhat strained and artificial. Miss Hauk, however, is a consummate actress, which can scarcely be said of Madame Trebelli, who is too apt to exaggerate every point and every situation out of which she imagines an "effect" can be got. Thus, while she attempts as much again as her predecessor, she really does not accomplish half as much. That a vocalist so accomplished would do full justice to the music will be readily understood; but even here Madame Trebelli, through superfluous effort, occasionally deprives the quaint and beautiful melodies of no little of their native charm and delightful simplicity of character. Her performance generally, however, is an able one, and, after her own conceptions, fairly brought out. Signor Runcio, who followed Signor Campanini in the part of Don José, retains it still, acting and singing with the same earnest intention. Signor Mendioroz, as Escamillo, makes us chiefly look back with regret to Signor Del Puente, his precursor. The orchestral accompaniments in which this opera is so rich are for the most part well played, although Signor Licalsi has an unfortunate habit of dragging the time. The chorus leaves much to desire. In the part of Agatha, in Weber's well-known Der Freischütz, Madame Pappenheim has firmly established her position as a dramatic singer of unquestionable distinction, fitted to undertake any character in the repertory of serious opera. Her Leonora, in Fidelio, had already won her golden opinions; her Agatha is admirable throughout, and the unanimous applause she received was legitimately earned by her forcible and truly poetic delivery of the great scena in the second act. A more animated and in all respects prepossessing impersonation of the lively Annetta than Madame Bauermeister's has seldom, if ever, been witnessed on the boards of any theatre. The singing and acting of this clever and intelligent lady are perfect, and she makes as pleasant a contrast to Agatha as Brenda does to Minna in Sir Walter Scott's famous novel. The other characters allotted to Herr Behrens (Caspar), Signor Gillandi (Rodolph), Signor Bel Campo (Killian), &c., call for no special remark. Although the performance as a whole is not remarkable, the enchanting music of Weber pleases as usual—despite the pantomimic Zamiel, who would have made Beethoven laugh more than ever. No novelty is as yet announced.

WAIFS.——On the first night of Mr. Mapleson's operatic undertaking at the New York "Academy," there was an unfortunate contretemps. The opera was to have been La Sonnambula, for the début before an American public of the much-talked-of Madame Etelka Gerster; but that lady being suddenly "indisposed," La Traviata was substituted, with Miss Minnie Hauk as Violetta. Why Miss Hauk did not replace Madame Gerster as Amina, the part in which, some years ago, at Her Majesty's Theatre, she first made an impression upon the London public, it is difficult to explain.—After a very successful fortnight at Birmingham, Mr. Carl Rosa is now, with his English Opera Company, in Manchester. The first opera given was Sir Julius Benedict's always fresh and charming Lily of Killarney, which, as usual, met with the warmest possible reception. The performance is generally praised by the Manchester press; but particular mention is made, as it is easy to understand, of Miss Gaylord's Eily O'Connor, and Mr. Charles Lyall's Myles-na-Coppaleen, both, as London amateurs well know, impersonations hardly to be over estimated.—At Weimar a grand festival concert is preparing to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the birth of the once famous pianist and composer, Jean Nepomek Hummel.—On the 20th of October, Madame Clara Schumann, wife of the eminent composer, celebrated the 50th anniversary of her first appearance in public.—Herr Joseph Joachim has recommenced his universally admired Quartet Concerts, at the Berlin Sing-Academie.—Mr. Arthur Chappell begins the 21st season of his popular (truly "popular") Concerts on Monday night.—The concerts to-day at the Crystal Palace will consist, for reasons needless to explain, of music exclusively by Mendelssohn. Among other things, the programme announces an early (unpublished) symphony in F minor.

LEGAL

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Some account of the proceedings against the directors of the City of Glasgow Bank will be found in "Our Illustrations" column.—Stafford, the bank clerk, who absconded from Liverpool, and whose capture and first examination we spoke of last week, has been committed for trial.—Marshall, the fast-living assistant-secretary of the Curates' Augmentation Fund, has been sentenced to penal servitude for seven years. We are glad to see that some effort is to be made to effect a reform in the administration of the Society.—A serious charge of conspiracy to defraud has been brought against a solicitor, named Evans, and Mr. J. Baum, until lately the manager of the Alhambra Theatre and lessee of Cremorne Gardens, whose affairs are now in process of liquidation. Amongst other things it is alleged that they issued a forged bill of exchange for 500*l.*—Mr. F. Higgins, the hon. secretary for the Marylebone Constitutional Union, made a curious complaint to the police the other day. He said that recently he had several times found his letter-box full of fireworks and lucifer matches, placed there, he believed, with the intention of causing a fire or an explosion. The motive he conjectured to be political animosity, he having been instrumental in getting a large number of Liberal claims struck off the register.—A Swiss jeweller named Block, and his wife, have just been given up under the Extradition Act for alleged fraudulent bankruptcy and forgery committed in their own country. They had established themselves in a beer shop in Clerkenwell, where more than a thousand silver and gold watches, and other property, were discovered. The male prisoner, when arrested by a police inspector, offered to give him all the money he had about him (150*l.*), and a gold watch if he allowed him to escape.—A man named Couch has been committed for trial for having obtained 400*l.* by falsely pretending that he was heir to a large property to which, as it was subsequently discovered, he had no title whatever.—Sir Henry Horatio Wraxall and a man named Crawley have been sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment for fraudulently obtaining goods and money by means of a fictitious Company called the South African Trading Company. It was stated that since 1867, when Wraxall came into his title, he had been constantly connected with sham companies. He was also connected with the Scotch Plate Glass Company, the Tradesmen's Bank, the Merchant Joint-Stock Bank, and other concerns, all of which were swindles, and was one of the original directors of the company with which Walters, Murray, and Kurr were connected.—At Swansea, a little girl aged thirteen has been committed for trial for stealing 39*l.* from a tradesman's shop at Brynhyfryd about a month ago. She appears to have hidden the money in a hedge, and to have taken some of her school-mates partially into her confidence, telling them that it had been left to her by an uncle, who before he died had said that she must not tell her mother about it.—The Bishop of Sodor and Man is one of those Christians (only too rare in these days) who try to obey the Divine injunctions respecting the treatment of one's enemies. The navvy who some time ago, apparently from pure wantonness, threw a huge stone at Mrs. Hill, and when pursued by the Bishop, threatened to stab him, was on Tuesday tried and convicted. His lordship, however, not only interceded for him, and got his punishment lightened to the nominal one of three days' imprisonment, but actually left a sovereign with the gaoler to be given to him when he was discharged.—At the Central Criminal Court two notorious horsestealers were on Monday convicted and sentenced to ten and fifteen years' penal servitude respectively.—The Blackheath burglar, who wounded one of the policemen who captured him, has been committed for trial on both charges.—In the Clerkenwell County Court, Mr. Bennett, jun., the treasurer of a bicycle club, has been ordered to pay 50*l.* damages and costs to a bricklayer whom he rode over on Muswell Hill in July last. Bennett, who admits that his machine "ran away with him," is the person who some time ago was fined for furious riding, but who has appealed from the conviction, on the ground that a bicycle is not a "carriage" within the meaning of the Highway Act.—At Chester, a brutal fellow was sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude for wounding his wife (who was living apart from him), whom he had kicked and jumped upon, and beaten with a poker, because she interfered to protect their infant child which the prisoner, in a fit of rage, had snatched up by the legs, and was about to dash against the wall. The judge, in passing sentence, said that the jury had taken a merciful view of the case in returning a verdict of "guilty of wounding" only, for, had they given one of "wounding with intent to murder," he should have sentenced the prisoner to penal servitude for life. At the same assizes on Monday, a man named Parker was charged with the murder of his wife, a very violent and drunken woman. It was shown that on the day of her death she had struck her husband, who took up a gun and threatened to shoot her, and that a struggle ensued, during which the weapon went off and she was mortally wounded. The man had subsequently attempted to shoot himself, and the defence was that the gun went off accidentally. A verdict of "not guilty" was returned, whereupon the people in the court, which was crowded, cheered for several minutes, completely drowning the voices of the officials. The judge ordered all the doors to be closed, and, after quiet had been restored, rebuked the crowd in very severe terms for an act which he said was one of the grossest indecency. He said if courts of justice were to be made arenas for applause where verdicts were popular, they might as easily be made arenas for hisses where verdicts were unpopular, and juries, instead of being subject to no improper influences, would be liable to a sort of mob despotism. Introduction of feeling into courts of law was likely to end in its introduction into justice.—The Spanish sailor Garcia has been convicted of the murder of the Welsh family, near Newport, and sentenced to death. MILITARY SKETCHES—INCIDENTS OF CAMP LIFE AT UPNOR

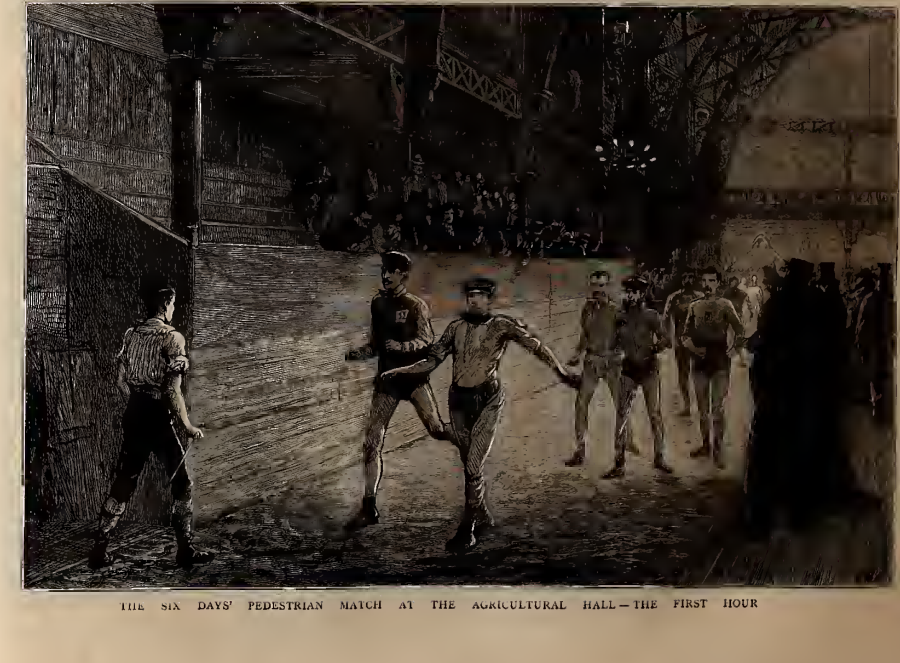
INDIAN SKETCHES—LANDING ICE AT BOMBAY



THE SIX DAYS' PEDESTRIAN MATCH AT THE AGRICULTURAL HALL—THE FIRST HOUR declares that he knows nothing of the crime; and his counsel tried to persuade the jury that the boots, &c., found in his possession might have been stolen by him from the cottage after the murders had been committed by some other person, who decamped on hearing him approach.

THE JURY SYSTEM.——Lord Coleridge has taken a very decided step towards bringing about a reform of the constitution of juries. In charging the grand jury at the opening of the Devon and Cornwall Assizes at Exeter on Saturday, he said that the manner in which the jury law had hitherto been worked had had the effect of excluding the most important element, and the highest educational cultivation, from the ordinary and every-day working of the common-jury system. Although gentlemen of education were sometimes compelled to serve in trumpery cases they were not called upon in criminal cases where life and death hung in the balance. Lord Justice Bramwell and himself had spoken again and again in condemnation of the practice, which was a direct breach and evasion of the law, and they were now determined that the law should be enforced. He had therefore given notice to the sheriffs with whom he should come immediately into contact this winter assize, that he should inquire into the composition of the jury panel, an that—although it was a rough and perhaps a hard mode of enforcing th law, he should treat as a contempt, after warning, any sending of a jur list that was not made up in accordance with the law of the land. H protested against its lying in the power of under-sheriffs to alter, evad and repeal it in favour of the rich and against the poor. Laxity wa always bad, but discriminating laxity was peculiarly offensive, and wa sure sooner or later to be turned to grave, because well-founded, ill- feeling, and to undesired, because really just, discontent.

Cr. 8vo., Cloth, 4s.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett. "While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing-room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves; he gives us songs of parting—graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' straining under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman

CRESCENT HOUSE CONVALESCENT HOME.
SECOND SPECIAL APPEAL
For Funds to pay off the debt of £1,500, consequent on the purchase of the Home and Grounds of the Brighton Convalescent Home, Crescent House, Marine Parade, Brighton.

PRESIDENT.
The Rt. Hon. THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, K.G.
TRUSTEES.
Lt.-General SIR GEORGE LAWRENCE, K.C.S.I.
Rev. R. W. FORREST, D.D. T. A. DENNY, Esq.
LADY SUPERINTENDANT.
Mrs. MARSHMAN, 2, Redcliffe Square, S.W.
HON. TREASURER.
J. H. FORDHAM, Esq., 9, Phillimore Gardens.

The purchase of this freehold property, together with valuable land in the rear, has been effected at a cost of £4,500, of which the sum of £3,000 has been raised by donations.

The Trustees and Committee, whilst thanking the Contributors for their generous response to the first appeal on behalf of this fund, venture to solicit further donations to meet the balance of £1,500, which, in the mean time, has been borrowed.

It is impossible to over estimate the benefit of a seaside Home with such easy access for the suffering poor of our great Metropolis, where they may, after sickness, be braced and strengthened to resume their daily toil.

The Institution has been working successfully for the last 8½ years, originally at Dover, now at Brighton. During this time 7,436 Invalids have been received, of whom 95 per cent. have returned to work restored to health.

It embraces a wide sphere of usefulness, one wing being reserved for reduced gentlewomen, another for working-men's wives and children, while the main body of the building is appropriated to mission-women, needlewomen, shop-women, and others.

The house is admirably adapted for its purpose, affording accommodation for 100 Inmates, commanding a sea view in front, and a garden in the rear. The plot of land which has been purchased for £400, above referred to, preserves this garden for the use of the Invalids. There are at present 103 in the Home, and more than 120 names are entered awaiting admission.

Contributions for the purchase will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the Honorary Treasurer, J. H. FORDHAM, Esq., Mrs. MARSHMAN, Lady Superintendant, Mrs. BRAITHWAITE, Hookfield Grove, Epsom, or the London Joint Stock Bank, Pall Mall.

The list of the Subscribers to this Fund shows that the sum of £3,256 17s. 7d. has been already contributed, amongst which the following are a few selected from the list:—

Topics of the Week

England and France.——The assurances of goodwill expressed in the despatches of Lord Salisbury and M. Waddington, which have been published this week, are so far satisfactory; but France is probably not quite so friendly to us as the words of her Foreign Minister would imply. There can be no doubt that the Anglo-Turkish Convention was received with extreme disfavour by the French. For some reason or other they felt their honour wounded by our possession of Cyprus, and for a time they gave sufficiently vehement expression to their dissatisfaction. The Republican papers have, indeed, ceased their attacks; but that is not because they have changed their opinions, but because the reactionary parties made use of their complaints to injure the Republic. M. Gambetta disliked to hear the Imperialists declare that an Empire would not have allowed France to be so humbled; hence the sudden cessation of the jibes in which he and his friends for some time freely indulged. It is much to be regretted that there should be any misunderstanding, secret or expressed, between the two Powers; for France is unquestionably our natural ally in the East. If the Russians were to gain Constantinople she would suffer hardly less than ourselves, since they would ultimately dominate the Mediterranean, and make it necessary for all the Mediterranean nations to be in a continual state of readiness for war. As to the influence of France in the East, that would of course pass altogether into the hands of Russia. We are not without hope that these despatches will do something to allay the jealousies which have been aroused. They ought to convince our neighbours that, as our allies were indifferent to the progress of Russia in Asia, we were obliged to protect our own interests, and that we might have done it in a manner much more offensive to French susceptibilities. We hardly venture to hope, however, that anything will now induce France to come forward and assert her true place in Europe. If she did so, the result would be most happy. Russia could hardly afford to disregard the united representations of France and England; and with her aid we could also exercise a far more powerful and beneficent influence on Turkey than is now possible. But the French are too much occupied in watching Prince Bismarck to give serious attention to Prince Gortchakoff. Germany is so afraid of France that she backs Russia against her will; France, on the other hand, is so afraid of Germany that she allows the Russians to do very much what they like. Scarcely any state of things could be more fortunate for Russia, or more unfortunate for England.

Trade Depression.——It is the instinct of Commerce to be progressive, and therefore any decline from the highest point of industrial activity hitherto attained is sure to be signalised by a chorus of complaints. The existing condition of business is universally declared to be a condition of inactivity and stagnation, but this very inactivity and stagnation would have been regarded as a marvellously roaring trade thirty years ago, even if a deduction were made proportionate to the subsequent increase of population. If people managed to live then —and that they did manage it is proved by our existence now—we can manage to live also; and it will be a wholesome thing for most of us if a pinch of adversity compels us to revert to the thriftier habits of former generations. And if, owing to the industrial advance of foreign nations, potently aided by our domestic labour-disputes, we fail to regain the commercial supremacy we once enjoyed, England may be quite as happy, indeed perhaps a happier country, though less wealthy than she has been. As for the causes of the existing depression, some are so obvious that they need not be repeated here, but one or two of them have received less attention than they deserve. For example, the method of conducting the foreign and colonial trade of the country has gradually undergone a complete revolution. Every elderly commercial man is aware that the typical merchant of his youth was a very different being from the typical merchant of the present epoch. The old-fashioned merchant was a man of large capital, who had his head-quarters in London or some other British port, and his accredited agents (frequently his own partners) at the foreign settlements in whose produce he dealt. These agents were men of long experience. they knew exactly what to buy, how to buy it, and what export orders to give in return. Under this system money was not turned over very rapidly, but there were fair margins for profits, and, unless some unforeseen disaster occurred, the merchant gradually accumulated a goodly fortune. What is the modern system? The modern system is no system at all. Anybody, everybody, is a merchant who has a little money, or no money and some credit. The seaports of China and India swarm with these adventurers. They make a shipment, they sell the bill drawn against it, and make another shipment, repeating the process till a very petty amount of original capital or credit is made to cover a considerable amount of transactions. These ingenious gentlemen are like pyramids standing on their apexes,—a very little suffices to topple them over; and as, owing to their competition, the native markets, after freight and other expenses are added, scarcely ever show a margin of profit on the home quotations, they very often do topple over. The same process is repeated on this side of the water. The old-fashioned broker was content with his commission; the modern broker must be a man of considerable capital or credit, for he who can make the most liberal advances to the impecunious merchants gets the most business, though he often, when markets are falling, burns his fingers in the process. In this manner we may have the phenomenon of an immense amount of exports and imports, and yet with very little accruing profit. If the present depression tends to stop this gambling method of doing business, and to put our foreign trade back into its old-fashioned grooves, it will have acted as a wholesome tonic to the nerves of an overwrought mercantile community.

The Ultimatum.——It is difficult to understand the objections of Lord Lytton and his Council to the despatch of an ultimatum to Shere Ali. There is, indeed, little hope that he will submit; but his acquiescence in our terms is not absolutely impossible, and it would be unjustifiable to launch into war before exhausting every means of maintaining peace. A delay of two or three weeks can hardly do us serious harm. Suspicions may here and there arise that we are afraid of advancing upon the enemy; but they will soon be dissipated when the time for vigorous action arrives. Meanwhile, preparations are of course being energetically pushed forward, and every day makes it more certain that the blow, if it must be struck, will be struck decisively. Should our conditions be rejected, the Government will be able to act with the consciousness that it is supported by the nation. It must be admitted that the arguments of so distinguished an authority as Lord Lawrence produced at first considerable impression. Politicians who had not closely studied the question of our frontier policy were staggered by some of the facts he adduced, and by his emphatic tone. Since then the Russians have kindly come to the help of the Government. They have spoken out with such cynical frankness as to their ultimate intentions, and their statements on this subject have been so fully corroborated by their action in Turkey, that the current of opinion has set more and more in the direction of a resolute policy. We are not sure that the country is satisfied of the wisdom of the course pursued by Lord Lytton. If, as is now asserted, the Ameer's hostility was made absolutely unmistakeable in the time of Sir Lewis Pelly's mission, it is strange that Sir Neville Chamberlain's mission should have been despatched without some assurance that it would be received. It is still more strange that, if it was to be despatched, an army was not ready for action in the event of its being rejected. But whatever may be our view of this matter, what we have now to deal with is the fact that Shere Ali is our enemy and the friend of Russia, and that if we do not take adequate precautions Russia will soon have against us a weapon strong enough to paralyse our influence in Europe. In these circumstances the nation is afraid rather of divided counsels in the Cabinet than of bold measures. That Lord Beaconsfield himself is in favour of strong action there can be no doubt; but he may have colleagues who hamper him more seriously than Opposition critics are generally willing to admit.

Intemperance.——Sir Wilfrid Lawson ought to heed the advice tendered to him by two such experienced politicians and staunch friends of temperance as Mr. Bright and Lord Aberdare. Both of these gentlemen regard the Permissive Bill as impracticable, and its advocacy, therefore, as a hindrance rather than a stimulus to the cause of temperance. We are by no means inclined to think that the magistrates who are at present empowered to grant licenses are, with regard to what may be termed their "Brewster" functions, models of wisdom, they too often study the interests of the publican rather than those of the public, and they take little trouble to make the tavern-keeper a licensed victualler in deed as well as in name, although, as we have often before maintained, a small amount of magisterial firmness in this respect would render the coffee public-houses, of which Lord Aberdare highly approves, unnecessary, for the simple reason that every public-house would supply a variety of non-alcoholic as well as of alcoholic refreshments. We observe, by the way, that Mr. Allsopp, of all men in the world, gravely recommends the publicans to sell tea and coffee to their customers,—not in packets, as a gage of defiance to the detested grocers, but in a fluid state for the delectation of non-alcohol customers. Such advice from a gentleman bearing a name so savouring of malt seems at first sight as strange as if the Pope were to solicit subscriptions for enlarging Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, but probably Mr. Allsopp is wise in his generation, he foresees the coming storm, and feels that the tea and coffee may effect for the publicans that which "extenuating circumstances" often effect for prisoners in France. As far as we are aware, Mr. Bright suggests no alternative to the Permissive Bill, but Lord Aberdare would like to see a trial of the Gothenburg system. The Gothenburg system would have at least one advantage,—it would lessen the present enormous number of drink shops. It would be far better to have a few large establishments, furnished with every requisite for public refreshment, and with spacious sitting accommodation, than a host of places on the present plan, the landlord's aim in which is that every man should swallow his liquor as soon as possible so as to make way for a fresh customer.

A New Church.——A great many people probably never heard of the "Reformed Episcopal Church" until Dr. Claughton called attention to it by questioning the validity of the consecration of its Bishops. We are all, however, pretty certain to hear a good deal of it hereafter. Its Bishops are not likely to be remarkable for modesty, and its ordinary members may be expected to let their lights shine with all the fierce intensity that marks the light of converts. The body had its origin in America, and has started operations in this country on the ground that the Church of England has become too Ritualistic. We shall not enter into the question whether the consecration of the Bishops is valid; however it may be decided, it is to be hoped that only a very small number of Churchmen will associate themselves with the enterprise. Surely of all commodities that which we least need is a new Church. It is a long time since England was characterised as a country "with fifty religions and one sauce." The latter part of this reproach is no longer applicable; flying visits to Paris, and the South Kensington School of Cookery, have taught John Bull that destiny has not absolutely doomed mankind to a single sauce. But if we have increased our sauces we have certainly not diminished our religions. The vast multitude of sects is, we are aware, looked upon by some patriotic Britons as a sign of superior intellectual energy; but impartial onlookers rather take them as a proof that we make a great deal too much of trifles, and are too ready to sacrifice immense advantages to gratify a mistaken sense of independence. Our sects certainly do not foster charity, and we have not observed that they tend to discourage self-conceit. The "Reformed Episcopal Church" will, therefore, we trust, be above all things remarkable for the brevity of its career. At the same time the fact that it exists ought to suggest some wholesome reflections to the Ritualist clergymen who are at present so very active. They may be within their legal right in most, if not in all, their peculiar practices; but they must know that they are offending large numbers of persons who are sincerely attached to the Church of England. They can hardly claim to be acting in a Christian spirit when they wound susceptibilities as tender as their own for no other purpose than to gratify personal whims.

Peripatetic Painters.——Mr. Herkomer made a bold proposition the other day at the Liverpool Art Club. He recommended that a Painters' Festival should be held annually in Liverpool, that the leading painters should be invited, and that Art students should be summoned from all parts of the country to give them the opportunity of seeing the great painters at work from living models. "They would learn," he said, "more in ten days than in half a life time devoted to the usual dreary labours." The proposition was received with applause, but we scarcely think that in its present form it will result in any practical application. We are reminded of the enchanter's boast, "I can call spirits from the vasty deep," and of Hotspur's reply, "But will they come if you call?" It would be a very nice thing to get Mr. Millais, and Mr. Alma-Tadema, and Mr. Hook, and Mr. Cope, and Mr. Marks, and various other artistic celebrities, to come and sketch at Liverpool with a crowd of art students round them, but can they fairly be expected to accept the invitation? Other towns would be certain to follow suit. Manchester and Birmingham, Sheffield and Leeds, would surely want equal privileges with Liverpool. The result would be that the R.A.'s and the A.'s would find themselves as peripatetic as one of those popular comedians who advertises in the Era. "North of England, September; New York, October; San Francisco, November; Melbourne, Adelaide, and Sydney to follow." And it may be suspected that they would scarcely like to pursue their art under such perpetually public conditions. Before long, every town in the kingdom would successively claim their services; and then the two extremes would meet, the Royal Academician and the woe-begone artist who paints mackerel-by-moonlight scenes on the pavement in front of Mornington Crescent. Each would execute his works of art before the public gaze; each might adopt as his motto, "We paint—'tis in a crowd." At the same time we think the idea which lies at the bottom of Mr.

Herkomer's proposal most praiseworthy, but it will need more careful working out before it is likely to meet with practical recognition.

Domestic Slavery.——The grievances of some of the young ladies who condescend to act as domestic servants are, as a rule, of an imaginary nature. They are, indeed, exceptionally fortunate persons, and lord it over their employers with the assurance that comes of conscious strength. There is, however, a large class of servants of whom this cannot be said, and in whom it is desirable that the public, and especially ladies, should begin to take some interest. We allude to the servants of lodging and boarding-houses. A letter appeared in The Times this week, setting forth the work which a particular girl in one of these establishments has to undertake. We cannot go through the list of duties; but it is truly formidable. The unfortunate girl never goes to bed till past midnight, sometimes till between two and three; yet she has to be up at six, and she begins her labours every morning "by filling seven baths, for each of which she carries two cans of water from the basement to the bed-room floors of a four-storied house." After this every minute of the day has its own occupation; and it may be supposed, since the poor child is only seventeen, that such fatigues do not tend to improve "her health and spirits." If this picture is not overdrawn—and we believe it is not—the writer of the letter is quite justified in questioning whether we have yet succeeded in emancipating all our slaves. He proposes that people who go into lodgings should make it a rule "to inquire in what way the work of the house is performed," and should "avoid houses in which there are not sufficient servants." This is good advice, and we hope it will be followed; but in the meantime the human monsters who employ these overworked girls have an immense advantage over them. They secure servants who have not before had "places," and, if their victims rebel, threaten to refuse them the "character" which would enable them to improve their circumstances. Cannot benevolent ladies set to work and invent some method of helping a class who so urgently need their aid?

Centenarianism.——It is rather amusing to note how poor Mr. Thoms, though confessedly weary of the fray, rushes into it once more when some grossly absurd case of alleged centenarianism is reported, or more annoying still, perhaps, as far as he is personally concerned, when somebody asserts that "according to Mr. Thoms, nobody has ever lived to be a hundred." If the dispersion of error and the promulgation of truth be laudable, Mr. Thoms undoubtedly deserves well of his countrymen. Before his advent nobody, as far as we are aware, had put forth the idea that it is by no means an easy matter to ascertain the age of a very aged person. Their length of years deprives them of contemporary living witnesses, for the men and women of their generation have all "gone over to the majority," and so we have only documentary evidence to fall back upon. But till Mr. Thoms arose, no one realised this. A very aged man or woman declared they were so many years old, and their hearers implicitly believed them. The Gentleman's Magazine was one of the most accurate and trustworthy of the serial publications of the eighteenth century, and yet, if we examine its obituary records, we find numerous instances of longevity, which, tested by Mr. Thoms' sensible canon, are plainly utterly incredible. People have now learnt that very old folks are not to be trusted in their statements of age. Between thirty and seventy few people are inclined to overstate their years, but after they have passed fourscore, they feel proud of having lived so long, and begin to exaggerate. We once knew a most exemplary, pious old lady, in other respects in full possession of her senses, but when she had passed her eightieth birthday she suddenly added twenty years to the tale, and proclaimed herself a hundred. She died soon after, and all the neighbourhood fully believed that she was a centenarian. Nor, we may add, did the production of an attested copy of her baptismal register shake their faith, for, as they observed, "Who should know her age so well as the old lady herself?"

"Rome's Recruits."——Under this title, the Whitehall Review has reprinted from its weekly issues in pamphlet form an alphabetical list of the principal persons who have seceded to the Roman Church during the last twenty or thirty years. The list is interesting—to many persons painfully interesting; but we agree with Mr. Gladstone that it would have been an additional advantage if some further particulars had been given, especially the approximate date at which each "reversion" occurred. We see no objection as some do, either from the Roman Catholic or the Protestant point of view, to the publication of such a list. If to some readers it acts as an encouragement, to others it may serve as a warning. The "converts" themselves have evidently no unwillingness that their names should thus be chronicled, for the catalogue has been chiefly furnished by members of the Roman Catholic Church. The names in all number about 1,400, no small sum considering that they almost exclusively belong to the liberally-educated classes, and that numerous seceders of an obscurer rank remain unchronicled. The list of these names shows one thing plainly, namely, that Ultra High Church theories do in many cases lead men and women inevitably to Rome. It is one of the most interesting questions of the day to ascertain how far this is true of Ritualism generally. There can be no doubt that the more earnest adherents of the Church of England among the young incline to Ritualism rather than to Evangelicalism, and that, as on the Continent, so in a lesser degree here, the modern tendency is either towards scepticism, or towards some High Church form of belief. Will Ritualism, a generation hence, be able to stand alone, or will it yield to the magnetic attraction of Rome? We ask, but do not venture to answer the question.

Our Illustrations

AFGHANISTAN

A GROUP OF CABULESE

Our first illustration depicts a group of the inhabitants of Cabul, from which a fair idea may be formed of the type of inhabitants of the Ameer's dominions. As a rule, both men and women are tall, handsome, and fair complexioned, with good figures, and muscular, and Mr. Phil. Robinson, in his little work on Cabul, describes the Cabulese as being passionately addicted to all exercises which call for athletic limbs, sound lungs, and tough sinews. As horsemen they will compare with any races in India, or with ourselves; while as marksmen, whether with the rifle, spear, or stone, they are remarkably proficient. As for the women, notwithstanding their natural good looks, they strive to enhance their charms by all the artifices of cosmetics, dyes, and picturesque dress. The hair is worn in long plaits, and is often adorned with tassels, and rough but effective ornaments of metal and glass. Like all Eastern nations, the Cabulese are devoted to story-telling, while chess is equally one of their chief amusements. Although staunch Mahomedans, they are somewhat over-addicted to the pleasures of the bottle, while their treachery is proverbial; and your host of to-day, who spares no pains to make you happy and comfortable, will have no scruple in putting a bullet in your back to-morrow, when you have left his house, provided your purse should prove a sufficient temptation.—Our engraving is from a photograph by Messrs. Bourne and Shepherd, of Calcutta and Simla.

AFRIDIS FROM THE KHYBER PASS

The Afridis are the various tribes which inhabit the hills about the Khyber Pass, and, though nominally the subjects of the Ameer of Cabul, are practically independent, their allegiance being secured by a subsidy, while such sums as 13,000*l*. or even 100,000*l*. are said to have been extorted from their Suzerain in olden days, when he wished to secure a safe passage through the Pass. When, however, the Punjab fell into our hands these exactions were naturally disregarded, and even in Dost Mahomed's time the subsidy did not exceed 2,000*l*. Consequently the loyalty of the Afridis to the Ameer is not thought to be beyond a price, and it is considered likely that they may ultimately join the British forces, more particularly as many of these hardy mountaineers have served for a time as policemen, or even soldiers, under the Indian Government, while the Sipah tribe has already offered its allegiance. Otherwise they will prove very dangerous foes in the narrow defiles of the Khyber Pass, more especially as the European training of many of them will enable them to practice more than the mere disorganised tactics of undisciplined mountaineers. The Afridis, like the Cabulese, are tall and handsome, and are usually provided with a perfect arsenal of strangely-formed knives and pistols in their belts. They are exceedingly brave and eminently treacherous, so that while perfectly open to a bribe, they can by no means be depended upon to fulfil the compact for which they are paid. The total number of Afridis capable of bearing arms, counting all the various tribes, fall little short of 25,000. Our engraving is from a photograph by Messrs. Bourne and Shepherd.

THE KHYBER PASS AND OTHER SKETCHES

Our view of the Khyber Pass is taken from the military parade ground at Murree, a sanatorium for troops, situated on a hill between the river Indus and the Jhelum. As may be seen by reference to the sketch, the mountains through which the Pass penetrates belong as outliers to the system of the Sufaid Koh, but are specially known as the Khyber Hills. Their highest point, the Tartara peak, on the northern side of the Pass, at the point where it debouches on the Peshawur plain, has an elevation of nearly 7,000 feet above the sea-level. The whole range rises up in a series of almost isolated rocky mountains, completely bare of timber, and quite as forbidding in aspect as their wild Afghan inhabitants could desire. Three other passes besides the Khyber lead through these hills to Cabul and Jellalabad; but as they are not practicable for cannon, their military importance is much less than that of the historical route. Nevertheless, remarks a writer in the Daily News, from whose article we have freely borrowed in the above, they might be useful for turning the fortress of Ali Musjid in case an attack upon the Ameer's capital should become necessary. As the crow flies, the mouth of the Khyber Pass is about seven miles from the cantonment of Peshawur and the neutral line is three miles from the cantonments. The road to Cabul crosses the level plain and enters at once the Pass, which is thirty miles long; it then debouches on to the Jellalabad plain, through which the Cabul river runs. Leaving the Jellalabad plain, the road, before reaching Cabul, passes through the Jugdulluck Pass, where the frightful slaughter of camp followers and soldiers took place in the retreat from Cabul in 1842. The actual gorge only begins at the Kadau Lakes, a little west of the old fort of Jumrood, the ascent following the course of a streamlet, and the pathway here winds for some ten miles to the fortress of Ali Musjid, the road lying under massive crags of rock, and the width of the defile averaging some twenty-five feet. Of the important part this defile has played in Afghan history up to the rebuff of Major Cavagnari, last month, we have already fully spoken in previous articles; but we may mention that it was a little to the Sukkur, the town which has been prominently brought into notice as the rendezvous for the southern army under the command of General Stewart, and which is the point of crossing for the Bolan Pass, is a decayed town of Sind, on the right bank of the Indus, opposite Roree on the left bank, the island fortress of Bukkur lying between them. It is situated, on a point where a low limestone range slopes down to the river bank, clothed in the neighbourhood of the town with luxuriant groves of date palms. These groves, combined with the ruined but picturesque town of Sukkur, the river, the huge fortress of Bukkur, and the town of Roree, situated on the bold precipice opposite, form a very grand landscape. In 1839 a British cantonment was made at Sukkur, which became converted from a scene of desolation and wretchedness to one of activity and prosperity. There are still numerous towers and minarets standing in Sukkur, one of which is a hundred feet high. With a view to the promotion and encouragement of trade, the British Government, in 1851, resolved to establish commercial fairs in Sind.—Our engraving is from a sketch looking down the river. The house on the point is the Frontier Force Club House.

The fortress of Bukkur above-mentioned, and which forms the subject of another of our illustrations is situated on an island, and is noteworthy from the fact that in the beginning of 1839 the Engineers of the Bengal Army, marching to Afghanistan, threw there a bridge of boats over the Indus, and on this the army, with its baggage and battery train, passed over on its way to the Ameer's country. The island is an oval limestone rock, some 800 yards long, 300 wide, and 80 feet high. Almost the whole of it is covered by the fortress which, in 1839, was temporarily ceded by the Ameer of Kheypoor to the British, and on the subsequent annexation of Sind became a part of the British dominions. The town of Roree is also situated on a rocky eminence, and presents a picturesque appearance when viewed from Sukkur on the river. It contains a large number of mosques, of which the largest was built by a lieutenant of the Emperor Akhbar, while close by is a shrine, wherein is preserved a hair in amber in a gold case set with rubies and emeralds, and enclosed in another of wood, enriched with silver. This hair is supposed to have once formed part of Mahomet's beard; and a number of guardians are maintained for the safety of this precious relic at the public expense.

Of Jacobabad we need say little, save that it is a town almost on the frontier of Beloochistan, and at present is the headquarters of the Sind Frontier Hill Force. Our remaining views are taken in the territory of the Bugties, a powerful tribe of Beloochistan, whose chief, Shamzan Khan, following the example of his Suzerain, the Khan of Khelat, has heartily espoused our side, and has even come down to Loti to pay his respects to General Biddulph, and offer his services. The titles of the views sufficiently explain the subjects of the engravings, but we may mention that the geographical features of Northern and Eastern Beloochistan greatly resemble those of Afghanistan, but that in the centre and towards the south the scarcity of water and the paucity of rivers render the country somewhat arid and barren, although it is well cultivated where water is to be procured. The Beloochees themselves are tall and well-formed, and although more disposed to pastoral and agricultural pursuits than the Afghans, they are exceedingly brave and warlike, and the Bugties will probably prove valuable allies should the crisis result in actual warfare. The natural arch shown in one of our illustrations is in the Sungseela Valley near Rehracka Deyra, where are situated the headquarters of the Bugti tribe. The Passes in the Bugti Hills, although too small for artillery, will probably be utilised in communicating with Quettah from the south.

CYPRUS—A DAY ASHORE AT LARNACA

We have already fully described the seaport of Larnaca, which has received a new lease of life since the English occupation, so that we need say no more than that our sketch represents two travellers enjoying the delights of a "day ashore," after a week's sea voyage, and thoroughly appreciating the advantages of terra firma after the somewhat unsteady footing that a rolling steamer affords, even in the comparatively calm waters of the Mediterranean. The couple in our sketch are on a tour of exploration round the neighbourhood, and are on their way to visit the Tomb of Lazarus.

GROUSE "DRIVING" IN OCTOBER

The first week or two of grouse-shooting in the Highlands, with the exhilarating weather and large bags of grouse, bears a decided contrast to the sport a couple of months later, when the birds become wary and shy, and congregate in large packs. Then the young birds are hardly inferior to the others, either in beauty of plumage or in strength of wing. They will scarcely allow the sportsman to approach them nearer than a hundred yards, so that "driving" is often nowadays tried. The sketches represent the party starting, with the usual troop of beaters and gillies, who, as soon as the ground is reached, separate from the "guns," tie handkerchiefs or pieces of rag to their sticks, and, waving them about and shouting, drive the grouse towards the particular spot where the sportsmen are posted. On a few moors the sportsmen sit concealed in pits, which are dug for the purpose; but as a rule, when driving is only resorted to towards the end of the season, juniper bushes or tufts of heather form the usual screen. The last sketch shows the old man sent on ahead with the pony and lunch-basket to the spring, where the party propose lunching.

SKETCHES IN SOUTHERN INDIA

"After Service, Sunday Afternoon, Peer Merde Hills, Travancore." One of our engravings represents a scene outside Peer Merde Church on a Sunday evening. Owing to the long distance people live from the church, and the bad state of the roads, a variety of means of locomotion are called into use by the members of the small congregation. The mounted party on the right of the picture wait for some of their friends going the same way as themselves, who are still talking at the door, with whom they will gallop back through the forest, trusting to hard riding to reach home before dark. The lady about to get into her "ton-jon" will be carried home by the bearers who stand around waiting. They sing a monotonous song as they trot along down the steep stony road. Another prefers a slow progress in a "tonga" drawn by long-horned bullocks; while a third waits for the "shigram" (and pony) in which she will be driven home (these two conveyances are represented in the picture as coming up the hill in the background). Those who live at an ordinary distance saunter slowly homewards in the cool of the evening when the friendly talk in the churchyard is over, and so the small congregation disperses north, south, east, and west, leaving the little church to darkness and any prowling tiger that may chance to come that way.

The other engraving shows the manner in which people generally go to pay calls on the Peer Merde Hills. It being essentially a coffee-growing district, and large pieces of land being taken up for estates, the houses are consequently far apart. The roads are too bad to admit of carriages. The only alternatives left are either to ride, or to be carried in a chair like a Fifth of November Guy Fawkes. The strong sure-footed little "Pegu ponies," brought, as their name implies, from the Shan States, are best suited for these rough mountain roads, and pick their way easily and swiftly where a larger animal would stumble and fall. The two men running behind are the horse-keepers or syces, whose duty it is to run behind "Sahib" or "Madam" whenever they ride out.

TIMBER CUTTING IN THE THAMES DISTRICT, NEW ZEALAND

The Kauri pine, from which the timber is chiefly cut in the north of New Zealand, furnishes the finest spars in the world, the barrels of many of the trees being over 100 feet long to the first branches, and from 2 to 6 feet in diameter, scarcely tapering at all towards the top. Trees are met with from 20 to 25 feet in diameter. These engravings show the way the timber is got out from the hilly districts. In the flat country it is to a great extent got out by tramways.

No. 1 is a shoot for sliding the logs down the side of a hill into the creek. This one is one-third of a mile in length. The logs come down with great rapidity, and occasionally get jerked out. Some are seen here and there on each side that have got thrown out. The spars forming the shoot are from 50 to 80 feet long, and from 1½ to 3 feet in diameter. The man standing by the log in the foreground will give an idea of the size; that one is more than 18 feet in circumference. No. 2 is a rolling-road at the top of the shoot. The logs are rolled along these by means of timber-jacks, as can be seen. The general size of the logs is from 3 to 6 feet in diameter, and from 12 to 30 feet in length. Many of these have been brought from a distance of over a mile back. No. 3 is a portion of No. 2 enlarged. No. 4 is the creek at the bottom of the shoot, with some logs dropped in. Up the creek, in the background, with two men standing beside it, is a log measuring 35 feet in circumference. The logs are driven down these creeks by means of water collected in dams. No. 5 is a small dam on a branch of the main driving-creek, 25 feet perpendicular depth, and 100 feet wide at the top. No. 6 is a view of the booms erected across the Waiwhakaurunga, near the mouth, to stop the logs, and prevent them from being carried out to sea. Sometimes there are from 1,200 to 1,500 logs collected there. At this time they were nearly empty. No 7 is a view of the settlement—two dwelling-houses, stables, cow-sheds, and other buildings—and gives a pretty good idea of the change now taking place throughout New Zealand. Three years ago this was wild bush-land, all but inaccessible. — Our engravings are from photographs by Mr. H. A. Frith, Thames, New Zealand.

BUSH LIFE IN QUEENSLAND

As in the other Australian colonies, droughts and floods often alternate in Queensland; and our first and fifth sketches exhibit the condition of affairs when moisture is in excess. The so-called bush-roads are merely tracks over the natural surface of the ground. During dry weather these are hard and firm enough, but after a long continuance of rain, the mud assumes a depth almost incredible to "new chums" fresh from the macadamised thoroughfares of Europe. One of the regular stock Australian stories is that of a hat being seen on the surface of a sea of mud. Underneath the hat was a man, and underneath the man was a horse. Bullocks are much slower than horses, but they are more capable of a long, persevering, steady pull than their equine brethren, especially when aided by the formidable whip and the adjurations of the driver. There is more individuality about bullocks than horses, every animal in the team has his name, and each pulls more vigorously when addressed personally as "Captain," "Nobbler," or whatever that name may be. As for the floods, they come on with the most marvellous rapidity, and a coach may be stopped by a raging torrent where only an hour before there was a dry gully.

The gentleman to whom we are indebted for these sketches spent many months in tramping through the Queensland bush with a companion, obtaining transitory occupation at sheep-washing, fencing, corn-hoeing, cane-planting, &c. He came frequently in contact with the natives, and speaks of them as harmless and good-natured. "We fearlessly went to sleep in our blankets right in the midst of their camp, and never once can I remember any disposition to molest, although they could by sheer numbers have easily overpowered and slain us." He thus describes a native camp:—"The party numbered about a dozen, and included five 'gins,' or native women. Breakfast was being served up, and the savoury smell from a portion of kangaroo hung on a spit over a small fire was most appetising.' The camp was on the bank of a small creek, and one of the party at a little distance was boomeranging a kangaroo.

"Wild honey is made by a small stingless bee, plentiful in Queensland. The blacks are most skilful in discovering and cutting out the 'sugar-bag,' as they call it. It is always found in a tree, generally a withered and a dry one, and a hatchet is used to get out the plunder.

"Numerous herds of perfectly wild horses graze on the vast inland prairies. They are caught and driven in in the following manner. A strong stockade in the shape of a triangle is made in a small collection of trees, one of the corners being left open. From one of the trees near the open corner there is carried out to about two hundred yards, and attached to another tree, a strip of calico six inches wide and fastened breast-high. Then the wild horses are with a mixture of enticement and gentle persuasion got to within a distance sufficient to enable them to see the white of the calico slip, when their curiosity is aroused, and they approach to examine the strange sight. Then the horsemen in ambush burst out with a wild halloa, and, using sticks, whips, and lungs, drive the distracted animals towards the strip of calico. This through fear they will not jump, or even go quite near to, but continue to run parallel with it until they find themselves trapped in the strong stockade with the horsemen behind them.

"Our last sketch depicts an aboriginal letter-carrier in the Never Never country. The letter is carried in a slit stick, and is most carefully preserved during a journey of from fifty to a hundred miles, when the recipient pays for the postage on delivery."

H.M.S. "DREADNOUGHT"

This vessel, originally named the Fury, was intended by her constructors to be in every respect like the sister-ships Devastation and Thunderer, but, finding that these vessels might be much improved upon, it was subsequently resolved to alter the lines of the third ship throughout. The Dreadnought is much longer, and carries heavier armament and armour-plating, besides having more space and comfortable quarters between decks. One of the greatest improvements is that her hull is thickly armoured all round, whereas other ships of the Monitor type are but thinly clad at either end, the battery in the centre of the ship being the only part protected. The Dreadnought has also a flush deck from stem to stern, thus doing away with the low freeboard forward and abaft, and likewise the cul de sac of the Devastation, which had to stand such hot criticism from so many quarters. She was built at Pembroke, and launched in March 1875, but has only recently been completed at Portsmouth. Her length is 343 ft., extreme breadth 63 ft. 10 in., and her armour which extends 5·7 below the load line, weighs 2,446 tons. She has two turrets, in each of which are two 12½-inch 38-ton guns, the four being manned by a complement of sixty men. The charge is conveyed along tram-lines on a small trolly, the shell lying longitudinally at an angle of 14½ degrees, until it reaches a spot immediately under the muzzle of the gun, where a cylinder, rising from beneath the deck by hydraulic power, lifts both charge and trolly till it is close to the cannon's mouth, the bolt is then rammed home by a rod also worked by machinery. This done the gun is made to resume its horizontal position, and is ready to be worked forward through the porthole.

There are in all thirty-six sets of engines on board for working the turrets and guns, and steering and propelling the vessel, and in fact very little is left for human hands alone to work.

Besides the big guns, there are two Gatlings, which are used either on the hurricane deck or from the masthead, and there is no doubt that they would give a good account of any number of the enemy's torpedo boats approaching too near. Even at night time they would stand little chance, for the Dreadnought is fitted with powerful electric lights, one at each end of the hurricane deck. Experiments with these lights were made recently as the ship lay in the Basin of Portsmouth, and at a distance of two miles, through thick weather, buildings became quite as clear as in broad daylight.

In action the deck is cleared of everything that the guns may have a clean sweep, and the men are all down below, well protected behind the plated sides, where the guns are worked. The heaviest charges are to each gun 160 lbs. powder, and an 810 lb. shot, which latter is 110 lbs. heavier than that carried by the heaviest gun of the Thunderer. When the guns were fired a short time since, everything breakable within the circle of concussion was smashed, even an overhanging whale boat started every plank, the nails in the bows being drawn cleanly out. If such are the results from the discharge of a 38-ton, what will be the effect of the Inflexible's 81-ton? The sides of the ship have lately been pierced so that the Whitehead torpedo can be used. The Dreadnought's full complement of officers and men is 387. Every precaution is taken against the ship sinking by means of seventy-one watertight doors to the compartments. Rear-Admiral Boys is expected shortly to hoist his flag on board.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——One of the chief events of the past week has been Mr. Gladstone's reception at Rhyl by the Liberals of North Wales. Among the decorations of the town were two triumphal arches bearing laudatory inscriptions, and the streets were thronged with spectators, who were enthusiastic in their shouts of welcome and approval. The day began with a conference on the best means of Liberal organisation, after which the local leaders went to the railway station to meet Mr. Gladstone, who was subsequently entertained at a banquet, and in the evening there was a public meeting, at which the Duke of Westminster moved, and Mr. Osborne Morgan, M.P., seconded, a resolution expressing unfaltering faith in the ex-Premier as a statesman and patriot, and thanking him for the efforts he has made to expose and counteract the secret and imperious policy of the Prime Minister. Mr. Gladstone, in replying, defended the part he had taken in criticising and condemning the action of the Government, complained of the absence of information in regard to the Afghan difficulty, and asked whether, in censuring the acts of Russia, we were prepared to justify our own interference with the Ameer, and the frontier States of India. He contrasted the present position of the country with what it was when the late Government left office, and said that "Peace with honour" really meant depressed trade, broken treaties, mystery, breaches of law, and usurpation of the privileges of the Crown.—The Birmingham National Liberal Federation and the Liberal Six Hundred have adopted resolutions condemning the extravagance and reckless policy of the Government, declaring that Parliament ought to be dissolved in order that the country might decide the grave issue of peace and war and of constitutional as opposed to personal rule, expressing admiration of the services rendered by Mr. Gladstone to the cause of freedom in Europe and the East, and towards saving the country from the disgrace of an unnecessary and unjust war. At the Mayor's dinner to the borough members last week, which by the way Mr. Bright was unable to attend, Mr. Chamberlain, replying to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's recent strictures, said that those who were alarmed at the increase of local indebtedness ought at least to bear in mind the enormous distinction between national and local obligations. The national debt was of no present or prospective value. It had been incurred in wars, the wisdom of which he would not then discuss; and at the present time that enormous debt was a liability which had no productive capacity whatever. On the contrary, the vast liabilities that had been incurred by local authorities were investments which he hoped would at all times be productive of the greatest possible advantages to the community. Parliament was overworked. The machinery as a rule was clogged, the wheels were choked with petty difficulties of infinite detail, and sooner or later there would be a popular cry for some sort of Home Rule for England—some great measure of decentralisation, which would cause local work to be better done.—Lord Carnarvon, in opening the winter session of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution on Monday, delivered an address on "Imperial Administration," which was meant, he said, to be mainly supplementary to the one delivered in the same place three years ago by Mr. W. E. Forster, on "Our Colonial Empire." He dwelt on the extent of our colonies, on the onerous duties discharged by the Colonial Office, and spoke of signs cropping up of division arising between the Home authorities and the Indian officials, and the absolute necessity for some scheme which would render any such collision impossible.—A large number of extra-Parliamentary speeches have been delivered by supporters and opponents of the Government which our limited space forbids us even to enumerate.—The yearly municipal elections which have taken place during the week were in most instances contested on political grounds, and, speaking generally, to the advantage of the Liberal party. Whether in such contests it is wise to subordinate the local administrative capacities of the candidate to his general political proclivities, is a question which certainly cannot always be answered in the affirmative.

MISCELLANEOUS.——Guy Fawkes' day was somewhat lamely celebrated in London, although during the day a number of "guys" were borne about the streets, the favourite effigies being those of Shere Ali, Leo XIII., the Czar of Russia, and the Sultan of Turkey. In the evening many fireworks were let off in the suburbs, and at the Crystal and Alexandra Palaces there were special pyrotechnic displays. At many places in the provinces, notably at Lewes, a place celebrated for such displays, and at Brighton, Maidstone, and Tunbridge Wells, the anniversary was observed in a more systematic manner. At Oxford and Cambridge the undergraduates were more than usually orderly, the Town and Gown riots being evidently looked upon as a bygone custom.—On Friday last Maynooth College was partially destroyed by fire, the damage being estimated at 30,000*l*. A fire-engine was sent from Dublin by special train. The books in the Library were saved.—On Friday last the coastguard cruiser Fanny was run down in the Irish Channel by the steamer Helvetia. The cutter sank immediately, and out of her crew of twenty-four seventeen, including the captain, were drowned. A Board of Trade inquiry will be held at Liverpool on the return of the Helvetia from America.—The temperance advocates have been very busy during the past week. Besides a number of minor meetings at other places, a Conference has been held at Oxford under the presidency of Lord Aberdare, while at Belfast there have been some enthusiastic gatherings in honour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, who, in one of his speeches alluded to Lord Aberdare's suggestion of music as a check to intemperance, and offered to travel about the country with his lordship on the Moody and Sankey plan, Lord Aberdare to sing temperance songs, and himself to preach temperance.—Mr. C. H. Robarts has been elected to the office of Remembrancer of the City of London, in succession to Mr. Corrie, who has retired through ill-health. There were more than a dozen candidates for the office, the duties of which are partly legal and partly social.—On Saturday Mr. Werderman's invention for electric lighting with a divided current was tried at the British Telegraph Works, Euston Road. Ten lamps of forty-candle power were used, and were shown to be independent of each other though fed by one current.—Billingsgate Market was to have been illuminated by the electric light on Tuesday night, but at the last moment it was discovered that although the engines and machinery had all been fixed, the electric apparatus itself had not arrived.—The Marylebone Guardians intend to make their casual paupers very comfortable this winter. They have just completed a new ward at a cost of 9,000*l*., wherein each casual will have a separate cell, warmed, lighted, and ventilated, with an electric bell for the purpose of calling the attendant on duty. The courtyard is partially roofed and fitted with seats, and all passages, waiting-rooms, and staircases are to be kept at an agreeable temperature, while the bathing accommodation, we are told, is "such as most middle-class householders might envy."—On Monday the Duke of Cambridge went to Aldershot to witness a trial of the new system of field-firing, in which the ball practice of the troops is tested by the employment of a number of dummies to represent the enemy, and a comparison of the number of effective shots with the amount of ammunition expended.—The Princess Alice Relief Fund amounts to a little over 37,000*l*., of which about one half has already been distributed amongst the survivors and the relatives of the dead. The remainder is to be used in placing nearly a hundred orphan children in public institutions until they reach the age of fifteen.

THEATRES

MR. BURNAND is not the first dramatic author who has written a burlesque of one of his own pieces; nor is there any good reason to be found why he should not, if so disposed, make a little harmless fun out of the romantic drama entitled Proof, which as adapted by him from D'Ennery and Cormon's Cause Célèbre is now enjoying at the Adelphi Theatre a well-deserved popularity. The title of the amusing trifle which was produced at the ROYALTY on Wednesday evening is Over-Proof; or, What Was Found in a Celebrated Case, and, as may be imagined, its humour consists chiefly in exaggerating the melodramatic incidents of the original play, while associating them with droll and incongruous ideas. Melodrama, to be appreciated, must, as we are all aware, be regarded with a certain amount of indulgence. The spectator who finds himself frequently pausing in an entertainment of this kind to ask himself whether the personages of the drama are behaving exactly as rational beings might be expected in the circumstances to behave, is clearly not fitted by nature for the comfortable enjoyment of romantic plays. On the other hand, the improbabilities and impossibilities, and the occasional exaggerated vein of sentiment which is proper to this kind of work, offer excellent opportunities for the parodist, and no living writer is more skilful than the author of "Mokeanna" and "Strapmore" in treating these little weaknesses in a droll, whimsical, and paradoxical spirit. There is plenty of this kind of fun in Over-Proof, which, following pretty closely the scenes of the drama, yet contrives to invest every incident with a quaint touch of absurdity; while for those who delight in punning lines and allusions of amazing ingenuity and unexpectedness, the dialogue is really a feast of fun. The piece is provided with amusing songs, and is generally lively and picturesque. That it suits the capacities of the company directed by Miss Kate Santley (who plays the innocent child of "five, more or less," the cause of Pierre Lorance's misfortunes, with sprightliness and humour) need hardly be said; Mr. Anson's grotesque imitation of Mr. Arthur Stirling, and Mr. Walter H. Fisher's absurdly pathetic performance of the part of the persecuted soldier are extremely clever performances; and other parts are sustained in the spirit of the piece by Mr. Charles Groves (a very promising actor new to the London stage), Mr. Lytton Grey, Miss Rose Roberts, and Miss Lavis. The burlesque is preceded by the late Mr. Andrew Halliday's admirable little domestic drama entitled Checkmate, originally produced here some years ago under the management of Miss Oliver.

The afternoon performances at the AQUARIUM have recommenced with revivals of the old Haymarket comedietta entitled Grandfather Whitehead, and the late Charles Mathews's compressed version of Foote's comedy, The Liar, founded on Le Menteur of Corneille. In the former piece Mr. William Farren sustains his late father's famous character with much force and variety of resource, though hardly reaching the point of pathos and tenderness which rendered the original performance so touching. In other respects the little piece does not greatly interest audiences in these days. In the part of Young Wilding, in The Liar, Mr. Farren has necessarily to contend with very recent impressions of Charles Mathews's incomparable performance of the same character. The careless grace and gay insouciance of that impersonation are, indeed, not to be expected from any other actor; but, with this allowance, Mr. Farren's performance is spirited and clever, and the amusing situations in which he appears rarely miss their effect. The performance of the French valet, Papillon, by Mr. Collette could hardly be excelled for restless vivacity and variety of comic expression; and in Miss Litton we have a heroine of very charming presence, and genuine sprightliness and ease of manner.

The Shakespearian performances at DRURY LANE do not appear to have been very successful in attracting audiences; nor is it to be expected that the classical poetical drama can flourish without more systematic cultivation, and a more earnest effort to attain a general level of excellence than have been indicated by these revivals. Macbeth will this evening give way to Othello for a few nights only, after which Mr. Dillon will return to his old part of Belphegor the Mountebank.

Mr. Hollingshead is preparing a new burlesque extravaganza on the subject of Fra Diavolo, written by Mr. Byron.

MR. FAIRCHILD'S READINGS.——Mr. George E. Fairchild, whose reputation as a dramatic reader is now so thoroughly established that he invariably attracts large audiences, gave some selections from the Poets and Humourists at St. George's Hall, Langham Place, on Saturday last, and with his accustomed success. The programme was a judicious admixture of the grave and gay, and the excellent way in which the pieces were rendered was productive of frequent applause. The final selection, "Floating a Finance," though exceedingly humourous in itself, had a somewhat saddening effect upon our mind, forcibly recalling as it did the criminal mismanagement and disastrous failure of the City of Glasgow Bank.

MR. AND MRS. GERMAN REED'S ENTERTAINMENT.——It is impossible, in the little space at our disposal, to give even an outline of the plot—or rather collection of plots—which Mr. Burnand has happily entitled A Tremendous Mystery. The mystery, however, is only tremendous to the dramatis personæ, for no matter how cunning or how deep the intrigue, the audience are never left in the dark. This, however, only makes the new piece the more enjoyable. Mrs. Reed is quite at home in her part of a sensational authoress who sees a plot in everything; Mr. A. Reed acted very well as the Count de Montgireau, a good-natured Frenchman, who is everybody's friend; Mr. Alfred Bishop is a clever substitute for Mr. Corney Grain (whose absence, however, is not to be the less regretted); and Miss Holland's dramatic singing is a special feature of the performance. Miss Rosa Leo, a new member of the company, possesses a strong contralto voice of fair quality, and though her acting lacks repose, it is on the whole natural. Her youthful exuberance wants a little control. The pretty and tuneful music is by King Hall, and Messrs. Gordon and Harford have supplied two very artistic scenes. The entertainment is brought to an amusing close by Mr. Arthur Sketchley's "Mrs. Brown's Home and Foreign Policy," the tenour of which is, "Keep a 'appy 'ome, and let them furriners look arter theirsels." The "furriners," however, have a bad habit of "looking arter us."

MR. SAMUEL PHELPS, who had been unwell for several months, died on Wednesday at the age of 72. He was born in 1806, at Devonport, and was originally a compositor, but took to the stage, making his début at York, where he attracted the attention and approval of Edmund Kean. He rapidly acquired a reputation, and coming to London in 1837 he was engaged first at the Haymarket, and afterwards at Covent Garden, then under the management of Macready. His arduous career and complete success (in every sense except that of money-making) as manager of Sadler's Wells, and his subsequent appearances at Drury Lane, the Lyceum, and the Gaiety, are matters of which our readers will need no reminder. As a genuine lover of Shakespeare he was unrivalled, and as an actor few could compare with him for conscientiousness and versatility. In heavy characters, such as Othello and Macbeth, he did not perhaps show to the best advantage, but his Iago was wonderful, and his Malvolio, Bottom, Christopher Sly, Job Thornbury, and Sir Pertinax MacSycophant simply inimitable.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT is to be introduced into St. Petersburg, and the Municipality are considering the best scheme for lighting the streets by that method.

DRAMATIC COMPOSITION IN GERMANY is far from flourishing for the triennial Schiller-prize for the best drama is again not to be awarded, none of the pieces sent up for competition being worthy of the prize.

A PILGRIMAGE TO THE TOMB OF PIUS IX. is proposed for the anniversary of the Pope's death next February. The Jesuits are said to have suggested the pilgrimage as a manifestation against the policy of Leo XIII.

INDIA IS TO HAVE A GOLD CURRENCY, according to a correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, who states that the Indian Government contemplates replacing the present silver standard by that of the more precious metal, and by making English gold coins legal tender throughout the country.

NATIVE SIGNATURES in Mysore frequently illustrate the occupation of the writer. Thus a cultivator will make a mark resembling a plough with two dots for bullocks, a cartdriver the mark of a wheel, a barber that of a razor, &c. Women make a round mark, supposed to represent a bangle.

CREMATION IN GOTHA is certainly not expensive, as each body submitted to the process will cost about 1*l*. 5*s*. The "Columbarium," or crematory edifice, in the new cemetery at Gotha, has been successfully completed, and regulations have been issued by the town authorities specifying the size of each coffin and that of the urns to be placed in the Columbarium at the conclusion of the process.

SHAKESPEARE is greatly relished by the Chinese in California, and Othello has lately been played at a Mongolian theatre in San Francisco. Some slight innovations, however, were introduced to suit local tastes, for instance, the plot of the tragedy was made to turn entirely upon the identification of Desdemona's handkerchief, which is recognised to slow music in the last act by a four-bitee laundryman.

PARISIAN CABDRIVERS have long been famed for their independence. They form a special body, own a special saint, St. Fiacre, and now are to have a special newspaper of their own, La Lanterne des Cochers de Paris. The journal will support the rights of the Corporation, publish all justifiable complaints of the cabbies against their customers, and suggest modifications and improvements in the existing police regulations respecting cabs and their drivers.

THE MICROPHONE AS A THIEF CATCHER has proved very useful to an English resident in India, who found his store of oil rapidly and mysteriously diminishing. He fixed a microphone to the oil cans, carried the wire up to his bedroom, and, after the house had been closed for the night, sat up to await the result. Very shortly he heard the clinking of bottles, followed by the gurgling sound of liquid being poured out, and running downstairs he caught his bearer in the act of filling small bottles with oil for easy conveyance from the premises.

THE LATE CHARLES MATHEWS, says Mayfair, was singularly liberal as a manager—liberal, that is to say, in his free admissions. The stalls were well-papered in those days, and the free list was never suspended. But he would sometimes act rather capriciously in refusing his favours. One friend wrote for the accustomed admissions, and got no answer; met the manager, and told him so. "Perhaps," said Mathews, "you did not enclose a stamp with your envelope?" The friend said he did. "Well," said the manager, "go on doing it, for they are often useful!"

AN INGENIOUS RUSSIAN GAMING HOUSE was recently pounced upon by the police near Moscow, several of the habitués who had lost so largely as to suspect foul play having informed the authorities. On examining the rooms it was found that the ceilings were covered with papers representing a starry sky. Holes were pierced in the stars, through which a man lying on the floor of the upper room could see the cards of the players, and by means of wires running down the walls he could communicate with the bool of his accomplices, and indicate their play by a code of taps.

A REVOLUTION IN DANCING-CIRCLES is promised in Paris this winter. Quadrilles and cotillons are to disappear, and to be replaced by stately ballets, such as were danced in the times of the three last Louises, and which will be regularly organised and rehearsed by the guests. Indeed, dancing altogether is to be far more general than usual, and short dresses will be largely worn for balls as well as in the street. Talking of Paris fashions the latest novelty in feminine foot-gear consists of high boots of white Russia leather, encircled at the top by a band of dark fur. Such dainty bottines would scarcely bear half-an-hour's experience of London mud.

ALL SOULS' DAY IN THE PARIS CEMETERIES this year introduced a novelty in funeral decorations. Wealthy mourners brought strings of pearls, which they draped round the monument according to taste, the length of the garland depending on the purse and affection of the relative. The traditional immortelle wreaths with touching inscriptions and the bead crowns were by no means abandoned, while many persons contented themselves with leaving their simple card and signature on the tombs of celebrities such as Thiers and Raspail. The advertising mania, however, disfigured many graves, for a number of energetic shopkeepers wrote their names on their own bills and scattered them on the tombs at Père Lachaise.

LONDON MORTALITY declined last week, and 1,386 deaths were registered against 1,445 during the previous seven days, being a decline of 59, and 205 below the average. There were 49 deaths from scarlet fever (an increase of 3, but being 52 below the average), 3 from small-pox, 15 from measles (a decline of 3, and being less than half the average number), 10 from diphtheria (a decrease of 2), 22 from whooping-cough (a decline of 11), 34 from different forms of fever (an increase of 4), 21 from diarrhœa (a decline of 9), and 353 from diseases of the respiratory organs (an increase of 6, exceeding the average by 5), of which 220 resulted from bronchitis and 90 from pneumonia. There were 2,532 births registered, being 33 below the average. The mean temperature was 41·0 deg., or 5·5 below the average. The duration of sunshine was 11·2 hours, the sun being 68·0 hours above the horizon.

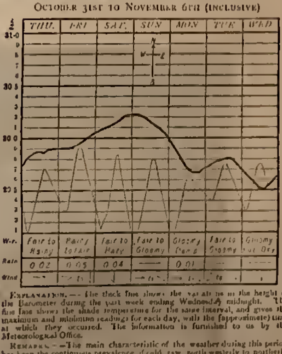
OCTOBER 31ST TO NOVEMBER 6TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The main characteristic of the weather during this period has been the continuous prevalence of cold, raw, north-westerly to northerly winds. These have been generally light to moderate in force in London, occasionally freshening, however, with squalls of cold rain and "graupel," or soft hail. On our east and north coasts, however, the wind has on several occasions attained the force of a stiff gale. Temperature has been several degrees below the average; but, owing to the cloudiness of the sky, the daily range has been small. The barometer was highest (30·23 inches) on Saturday night, the 2nd instant, lowest (29·50 inches) on Wednesday, the 6th instant; range, 0·73 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (48°) on Friday, the 1st instant, lowest (29°) on Sunday, the 3rd instant; range, only 19°. Wind has been mainly north-westerly and northerly, light to fresh. Rainfall: Total fall: 0·12 inches, on four days; greatest fall in one day, 0·05 inches, on Friday, the 1st instant.

The Eastern Question.——There is very little news from Eastern Europe this week. The International Roumelian Commission continues its deliberations at Philippopolis; but the Russians still decline to hand over the financial administration of the province; while, if we are to believe certain statements, the labours of the Committee are scoffed at by the Russians and Bulgarians, who ridicule the notion of Eastern Roumelia becoming a distinct province, and roundly declare that it will ultimately become part of Bulgaria—if in no other way, by force of insurrection. Indeed, the Russians continue to affirm their intention of adhering to the Treaty of San Stefano, and their organs openly declare that the Berlin Treaty is a dead letter, the British Government having failed in its efforts to induce the Western Powers to take steps to enforce its provisions. The insurrection, however, does not appear to be prospering, and the Russians officially announce that they have arrested a body of 500 Bulgarians on their way to Macedonia, that perfect tranquillity prevails in the districts which they occupy, that the Russian authorities have never encouraged insurgent bands nor the formation of insurgent committees, that the Russian officers have nowhere manifested any inclination to join the insurgents, and that "the Turkish reports on the subject are as false as those of the Rhodope Commission." In Bulgaria proper all is quiet; but Russia does not seem to be in any way withdrawing her troops from the south, although the Turks are now rapidly completing the evacuation of Varna and the other fortresses to be surrendered to her whilom enemy. The Turco-Russian Commission is authorising the return to Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia of those refugees who are landed proprietors, or who are capable of supporting themselves by trade, the repatriation of the poorer classes being deferred until matters are so much bettered that they will be able to find some employment.

Roumania is now definitively preparing to take possession of the Dobrudscha, and MM. Cogalniceano and Bratiano have gone to Silistria to fix the frontier boundaries. These will probably extend in a straight line from Silistria to Mangalia, on the Black Sea.—Servia is greatly annoyed at the movement for the incorporation of Eastern Roumelia with Bulgaria, and is somewhat apprehensive that her allotted portion of territory may be curtailed.—The cause of Greece is now being actively taken up by Italy at the request of France.—In Cyprus the chief incident has been the visit of Mr. W. H. Smith and Colonel Stanley, who, after inspecting Larnaca and Nicosia in company with Sir Garnet Wolseley, have now gone to Egypt to visit the Suez Canal.

France.——The Exhibition closes to-morrow, and throughout the week, although there have been plenty of visitors, there have been manifest signs of the end, many exhibitors having begun to remove their wares. Last month there were nearly three million paying visitors (a million more than in 1867), making a total since the opening of 12,621,908, while the total receipts amount to more than 500,000*l.*, against 340,000*l.* in 1867. According to official returns 203,152 foreigners have been admitted into Parisian hotels and lodging-houses during the time of the Exhibition. Of these England furnished the largest number, 58,914; Belgium came next with 28,830, Germany with 21,778, and the United States with 13,573. The number of English appears small with the enormous crowds who have crossed the Channel, the Calais and Dover route alone taking 186,747 persons, which, allowing for the double journey, would make 93,000, while, to say nothing of the Folkestone and Boulogne and the Southampton and Havre routes, the Newhaven and Dieppe line would not unfrequently carry daily loads of from 1,000 to 2,000 persons, so that we cannot help thinking that for once French statistics are at fault. There are various plans for utilising the building of the Champ de Mars, and the Municipality is considering a scheme for turning it into a monster place of popular amusement. The Cabinet, however, proposes to divide the building between the Ministries of War and Commerce, half to be devoted to military purposes, and the remainder to be utilised as an Industrial and Decorative Art Museum. Another project for which a committee has been formed is to induce French exhibitors to transfer their exhibits to the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, in order that a permanent International Museum might be formed there. This movement is headed by M. d'Agiout, who came over in 1871, to present Her Majesty with the address of gratitude for the assistance afforded to France by England after the war.

The great "national debauch," as one of the French papers terms the lottery scheme, still continues to engross popular attention, and the number of tickets has now been finally extended to 12,000,000, which produces nearly 500,000*l.*—almost the sum realised by the admission money of the Exhibition. The Opposition papers naturally criticise the action of the Government most severely, more especially as the raison d'être—that of furnishing Exhibition tickets to poor people unable to pay—no longer exists. The avidity with which all classes have rushed to buy tickets has shown how inherent the love of gambling is in the French temperament, though it is a question whether any Government is justified in fostering a taste which once acquired is never wholly lost. So great has been the demand for these tickets, that even children have been encouraged to invest their sous in a ticket, while it is doubtful whether the prizes when won will not in any case rather cause embarrassment than give satisfaction, for amongst them are a locomotive steam engine, a set of tickets for the Mabille, a smith's bellows, a live monkey, a dozen dozen false noses, a series of dinners at Bignon's, a boat, a life-size statue, 50 packages of mustard, a huge jar of magnesia, a million pins, and a thousand other marvellously incongruous articles. In the better class of prizes, however, the winner will have his choice of the prize or its worth in hard cash.

To turn to politics, there was a good field day at Versailles on Tuesday, when the question of the validity of M. Paul de Cassagnac's election was brought forward. A Committee of the Assembly had pronounced in the irrepressible Bonapartist's favour, but the Election Investigation Committee had reported against him, and the question had to be decided by the Chamber itself. M. de Cassagnac had distinguished himself on Monday by declaring during a debate that "there was nothing in common between the Bonapartists and the Marshal, since the latter had committed perjury." This, however, was nothing to the abuse showered upon the Chamber and the Republicans on Tuesday, when he accused his opponents of having determined to unseat him, of fraud and theft, stigmatised M. Gambetta's utterances as "disgraceful," announced that he was ready to fight any of the Deputies who might feel themselves insulted, and declared that on the famed May 16 France had a President who no longer exists to-day, and boasted that like the Duc de Rochefoucauld-Bisaccia "he was proud to cease to belong to such an Assembly." Even though M. de Cassagnac had the whole of the day to himself, he did not finish his speech, and the sitting was adjourned until Thursday. As had been expected, the election of Senatorial Delegates have resulted in a complete victory for the Republicans, who have carried off 48 of the 75 seats, a number more than amply sufficient to turn the scale of the majority in the Upper House. There is little other news save the death of M. Garnier Pagès, the publication of the official "Yellow Book," containing the correspondence with England on the Anglo-Turkish Convention, which is commented upon elsewhere, and the discussion in the Budget Committee of the subsidies accorded to the Opera and the various theatres. There is a good deal of talk about taking the direction of the Opera out of the hands of M. Halanzier (whose lease is just expiring), and placing it under State control. At present he receives a yearly subsidy of 32,000*l.*, and pockets the whole of the profits, which since he entered into possession in 1875 have amounted to 70,000*l.*!

Italy.——The Minister of the Interior, following the example of his leader, has made a noteworthy speech to his constituents, in which he unhesitatingly blamed the Italia Irredenta movement, but stated that the Government was unable legally to prevent it, and pointed out that Austria was so fully assured of Italy's "loyal friendship," that she never made the slightest remonstrance during the popular outcry which followed the Berlin Congress. Signor Zanardelli, in speaking of public security, indulged in unlimited regrets, firstly, that the prisons contained 375 prisoners condemned for life, while England could only number 211, and that from ten years to the maximum 16,335 persons were condemned in Italy to 658 in England, and secondly that there had been so many escapes from gaol, but promised to expend nearly 1,000,000*l.* in building new and secure prisons. The eruption of Mount Vesuvius has recommenced, the lava flowing into the same ravine into which it fell during the eruption in 1872. How active the mountain has been may be judged from the fact that 10,000 cubic metres of lava have accumulated in the old crater.

India and Afghanistan.——Lord Lytton has sent an ultimatum to Shere Ali, one copy having been delivered at Ali Musjid, and a duplicate placed in the Ameer's post box at Peshawur, the postal service having as yet not been discontinued. All accounts agree in stating that the Viceroy took this step greatly against his will, and only after a brisk interchange of telegrams with the Home Government, as he considers it most undignified and dangerous to hold any further parley with the Ameer. Much indignation is also expressed in the various Indian circles, as it is feared their effect on the minds of the frontier tribes will be bad, and that the action of the Government may be construed into a sign of weakness and of unwillingness to go to war, notwithstanding the great preparations which have been made. Thus a Simla telegram in the Standard declares that the step has caused "profound indignation and disgust among military men and civilians;" while The Times correspondent declares that it has awakened in India "a profound feeling of indignant dismay." The journals in India, however, are perfectly alive to the fact that adequate preparation must be made; and the Pioneer points out that an initial reverse would have a most dangerous effect upon the native mind. To return to the Ultimatum, the terms are, according to the usually well-informed Daily News correspondent, a full apology, the reception of the Mission, and other minor conditions. The time given to the Ameer to return an answer extends to the 20th November.

As there is not the slightest expectation that the Ameer will vouchsafe an amicable reply, military preparations are being pushed forward with the utmost activity and energy. Sir Donald Stewart has gone to Mooltan, where the reserve forces are at present assembled, and will shortly start for Sukkur with his troops, while a new division, under General J. M. Primrose, will assemble on the Lower Indus, as a reserve to General Stewart's army. The Peshawur force is to be divided into two portions, one at Peshawur, under Sir Samuel Browne, the other at Hassan Abdal, under General Munro. There is considerable sickness—though not of a dangerous character—among the soldiers at Peshawur. No pains are being spared that the troops, and especially those of the Mooltan division, should be well equipped. Most of the various frontier tribes express their willingness to fight on our side, while the whole tribe of the Sipah Afridis have promised us their allegiance. The native princes are freely offering their assistance; and Sir Salar Jung has placed both the troops and treasury of Hyderabad at our service. The Khan of Khelat also is exceedingly friendly, and is largely supplying our forces with corn.

As for the Ameer, we hear little of him beyond that he is busily engaged in preparing for the struggle. It is reported that he has offered to pay the heavy subsidies, as of yore, to the Khyberees, but, on the other hand, it is said that the various frontier tribes are far from eager in their offers of assistance. Thus the inhabitants of Kohistan have rebelled and murdered the Governor, so that the Ameer has been compelled to send a large force to restore order. His troops also are rumoured to be deserting, while great sickness prevails at Ali Musjid. It is now said that the Ameer had no particular desire to receive a Russian mission, but that he was compelled to do so, and, as a contemporary forcibly puts it, subsequently to choose between the "devil and deep water." One thing to his credit deserves to be chronicled. Gholam Hussein Khan appears to have been well treated, and was furnished with an escort of thirty men, who were threatened with death should any harm happen to the Envoy.

In the mean time the Russian journals continue to debate coolly whether or no they shall afford assistance to the Ameer. One advocates direct aid with troops and arms, another the despatch of a "scientific expedition," whose members may assist the Ameer with their advice, a third that private recruiting societies should be formed, and officers allowed to take service in the Ameer's army. In one thing they all agree, namely, that the Ameer must be assisted in one form or another, and the Vyedomosti speaks the popular feeling when it declares "that the great struggle between England and Russia, which has been coming on for centuries, will occur in Afghanistan. A radical change in the history and position of one of these two Powers must be the result."

United States.——Mr. Evarts' despatch relating to the Newfoundland Fisheries question has been enthusiastically praised by the Transatlantic Press, and the Times correspondent telegraphs that "Public opinion endorses the views of the American Government," and the Press generally declare that the 5,500,000 dols. assigned under the Fishery Award ought not to be paid to England until the question is settled. Another Note respecting the award has also been handed to our Government by Mr. Evarts.—The Republicans have made large and unexpected gains in the recent elections, the result of which is looked upon as a great blow to the Inflationists—the Republicans having carried New York, New Jersey, New England, and Pennsylvania, by adherence to the "honest" money doctrines. The strength of the Greenback party in next Congress will thus be materially diminished. For the Governorship of Massachusetts the Republican candidate, Mr. Talbot, obtained a majority of 30,000 over General Butler.—The yellow fever epidemic at New Orleans is now officially announced to be at an end.

THE COURT

The Queen and the Princess Beatrice will come south in about another fortnight. Meanwhile Her Majesty and the Princess have been living very quietly, receiving few visitors, and taking their usual outdoor exercise. Sir John and Lady Clark spent a night at the Castle, and joined the Royal party at dinner, and Lady Churchill and Lord Sackville have arrived in attendance in the stead of the Countess of Erroll and Colonel the Hon. H. Byng. On Sunday the Queen and Princess Beatrice attended Divine Service in Crathie Church, when the Rev. A. Campbell officiated. Her Majesty and the Princess left on Monday for the Glassalt Shiel, where they will spend a few days.—The Queen's memorial to Sir T. M. Biddulph, which will be erected at Balmoral, will consist of a granite Celtic Cross, somewhat similar to the monument to Lady Augusta Stanley in Frogmore Gardens.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have returned to England from Paris. Before leaving Paris the Prince and Princess on Saturday paid a farewell visit to the Exhibition, where they inspected the Bible Kiosk, erected by the Committee of the Crystal Palace Bible Stand, and, after presenting a donation, received each a small Bible in memory of their visit. Lord Lyons lunched with the Prince and Princess on Sunday, and in the evening they left Paris, Lord Lyons and the Embassy officials being at the station to see them off. The Prince and Princess crossed from Calais to Dover, and reached Marlborough House early on Monday morning. Prince Leopold lunched at Marlborough House, and in the evening the Prince and Princess, accompanied by the Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold, went to Her Majesty's Theatre. On Tuesday the Prince of Wales went down to Windsor with the Duke of Cambridge and shot in the Great Park, lunching at Cranbourn Tower. In the evening the Prince and the Duke were at Her Majesty's Theatre. On Wednesday the Prince presided at a meeting of the Council of the Royal Agricultural Society of England. To-day (Saturday) is the Prince of Wales' thirty-seventh birthday, which is to be kept with the usual honours. A ball is to be given in honour of the event on Monday at Abergeldie, the tenantry and servants being invited.—The Prince of Wales has promised to lend his Indian collection, on his return from Paris, for exhibition at the Edinburgh Museum of Science and Art.

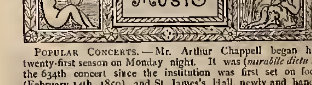
The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne are to be accompanied to Liverpool next week by the Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold. They will all arrive early on Thursday morning, will breakfast in Liverpool, and then go to the Town Hall, where addresses will be presented by the Corporation and the Chamber of Commerce. Afterwards they will drive to the landing-stage and embark on board the tender for the Sarmatian, which returned from Canada on Tuesday, and is being specially fitted up for the travellers. Meanwhile the Princess and the Marquis have been paying a farewell visit to Prince and Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge.—Prince Leopold returned to town last week, and on Saturday evening accompanied the Duke of Connaught to the Globe Theatre. On Tuesday night the Duke and Prince went to the Adelphi Theatre.—Princess Christian has become patroness of a bazaar to be held in March in aid of Mrs. Hilton's crèche in Stepney Causeway. The Princess has also promised some contributions to the bazaar.

CHURCH NEWS

The Arches Court and the Queen's Bench Division.——The judgment delivered on Saturday by Lord Penzance in the Prestbury Ritual case is interesting, and would be very amusing were it possible to shut out from consideration the serious and important issues which are involved. His lordship, in a very lengthy address, said that in issuing the writ of prohibition in the Mackonochie case, the Lord Chief Justice had fallen into a signal and unaccountable error of fact, and had totally misconceived the practice of Ecclesiastical courts. He would not ask whether expediency had induced the Queen's Bench to usurp power to abolish the Ecclesiastical Courts, but it looked like it. The Lord Chief Justice said that, even if a criminal should be taken red-handed, he should have the benefit of a flaw in the indictment; but he (Lord Penzance) confessed that this was a sort of triumph of law over justice which he had no pleasure in. After all that he had quoted and shown, it did not seem that at present he would have the power to punish Mr. Edwards, and, he saw no use in giving grounds for a fresh writ of prohibition; therefore he judged it expedient, as for sufficient reasons he did not wish to punish him by imprisonment, to hold his hand. The effect of this judgment is that nothing can be done with Mr. Edwards until after the Mackonochie case has been settled by the Court of Appeal.

A Singular Service.——A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette says that now that All Saints' Day is very generally observed by all sections of Churchmen, the extreme Ritualists seem to devote all their energies to keeping the Roman All Souls' Day. On Saturday there were some remarkable services, of which the evensong, or what passed for such, at St. Columba's, Kingsland, where the Guild of All Souls', instituted at St. James's, Hatcham, kept its anniversary, was the most noteworthy. The altar was stripped and clothed in black; a special Office, including the "De Profundis" and prayers for the faithful departed, was used. There was an elaborate Sarum ritual, unintelligible in many points alike to Romanist and Protestant—a remarkable feature being that it had been organised, developed, and elaborated by a layman, the sacristan, who had drilled the clergy; Mr. Walters, the incumbent, having known nothing of the Sarum rite. The sermon was by the Rev. Arthur Tooth, who preached in defence of the objects of the Guild—namely, reverent burials, and prayers for the faithful departed as members of the communion of saints.

Various.——At a meeting of the clergy and laity of the diocese of Norwich held last week, under the presidency of the bishop, Dean Goulburn urged that it was inexpedient to hold diocesan conferences, as they would trench upon the Episcopal prerogative, which should be maintained as far as possible in this democratic age, and Lord Walsingham opposed them as being more likely to lead to distractions than to heal differences. They were however defended by Mr. Read, M.P., and Lord Waveney as being in harmony with the spirit of the times, and on a division, an overwhelming majority declared in favour of holding them.—Dr. Pusey was to have preached at the Oxford University on Sunday last, but was too unwell to do so, and his sermon was read by Canon Liddon. In it he said that modern science in England does not for the most part deny God. Fanaticism like that in Germany, which said they must deny God and trample the Cross under foot before they could become scholars, far less masters, would shock England by its coarse blasphemy. The science which does not deny God might however forget Him; it would very likely acknowledge Him if it were asked, but it was so busy about secondary causes that it had not time to think about the first.—On Saturday the Bishop of St. Albans delivered a Charge to his clergy, and dwelt at some length on the Burial Question which he thought might be settled by a congress of Christians meeting in love, and willing to lay down the weapons of war. Such a congress would end in the shame and confusion of the real authors of the strife, whoever they might be, for the persons most clamorous for the alteration of the law were those who would be least satisfied with the change.—In relation to the eight days' general mission, which is to be held at York commencing on the 17th inst., the Archbishop has issued an address advising all to pray for its success, join its services, give every facility to their servants and workpeople to attend also, and if they hear it derided, to ask those who speak lightly of it, to take part in it and judge for themselves; and finally, to "consider it a call from God to give an account to Him of the use they had made of their time, and of the nature of their hopes for eternity."—It is said that the Church Association will not appeal against the recent judgment of the Queen's Bench in favour of Mr. Mackonochie, as the Treasury are about to instruct counsel on behalf of Lord Penzance.—The Solicitors' Journal, alluding to the rumour that the Bishops have agreed to refuse marriage licences to all divorced persons, says that some practical difficulty may arise as to the right to require an answer to the question, "Have you, or has your intended wife, ever been divorced?" and the officials who will have to ask the question should be careful to provide themselves with means of self-defence in case of "any emotional display" on the part of the person to whom the question is addressed.—Last Sunday, the Rev. H. G. Watt, preaching at St. Enoch's Established Church at Dundee from the text "Ye devour widows' houses, and make long prayers," said that no one could read without sad humiliating thoughts the announcement that all the directors of the City of Glasgow Bank, save one, were elders in Presbyterian Churches. Not only humiliation, but terror and alarm, were spread by the discovery through every Christian's heart, no persecution or disruption had ever scattered the ranks of the Christian Church or cut her so sorely to the heart as this. He had faith, however, that the shock would sweep away a great deal of the prevalent superstition and cant, that degrading evangelicalism, that corrupt theology, which reason had been powerless to remove; and that we should have less parade of spurious missionary zeal, few of those Gospel parodies which vulgar saints sing at revival meetings, less Pharisaic separation from members of a suspected Church, and fewer of those puffs of periodic pathos at a Communion season, which went as quickly as it came. He believed that the fall of these absurdities was sealed, and that we were now entering upon an era of purer, healthier, manlier religious life in Scotland.—The Rev. T. E. Heygate, vicar of Sheen, recently refused the Holy Communion to a young man because he had been guilty of "an act of impropriety" in wakening a young lady acquaintance by pulling a string which she had attached to her foot and hung out of window, and subsequently entering the house and assisting her at her lessons. The Bishop of Lichfield was appealed to on the subject; but he thinks the case admits of no authoritative decision, and declines to move in the matter, more especially as the Press has been appealed to.—The Rev. F. H. Layton, formerly an Anglican priest, and the last surviving of the original Irvingite "Angels" placed over the typical "Seven Churches" in London from the time of Edward Irving, has just died. Of the twelve "Apostles" of the community, two only remain alive, one of whom the Rev. N. Armstrong, is utterly incapable of work.



MUSIC

Popular Concerts.—Mr. Arthur Chappell began his twenty-first season on Monday night. It was (mirabile dictu!) the 634th concert since the institution was first set on foot (February 14th, 1859), and St. James's Hall, newly and handsomely redecorated, with sun-burners in place of the jets of gas that formerly gave more heat than light, was crowded in every part. Most of all were we pleased to see the ever constant "shilling" patrons of Mr. Chappells' at one time considered hopeless enterprise, and those seated behind the performers in the orchestra, probably the subtlest connoisseurs who flock together at his annual summons—"The Popular Concerts begin to-night; come, all ye faithful." Mr. Chappell, we are told, has frequently been advised to double the charge for the orchestral seats, but has invariably and persistently declined. Had he done otherwise, he would not be the "Arthur" of what are familiarly termed the "Pops." If the Popular Concerts were to expire to-day, the subjoined epitaph might be written on their tomb:—

POPULAR CONCERTS.
AGED SIX HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIVE.
UNIVERSALLY REGRETTED BY AMATEURS OF GOOD MUSIC.

There were no novelties to speak of at the concert on Monday night. We had Mendelssohn's superb quartet in E minor, belonging to the three numbered "Op. 44," played in absolute perfection by Madame Norman Néruda (recognised "Empress of the Violin"), Herr L. Ries, Mr. Zerbini, and (how often must we repeat it?), the "incomparable" Alfredo Piatti. The wonderfully graphic and—with a glimpse of sadness, here and there, so characteristic of Mendelssohn—no less wonderfully animated scherzo in E major, was unanimously encored. The pianist was M. Brassin, with whose reading generally of Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, in spite of his high merits as one who thoroughly knows his instrument, we are unable conscientiously to agree. The audience, evidently of another persuasion, called him twice back to the platform. Nevertheless, in the B flat trio of Schubert, about which Schumann raves so preposterously, we found M. Brassin far more at ease. This trio, indeed, Schubert's though it be, is far less difficult. Plain, straightforward playing is all that is required; and here M. Brassin is an unquestionable master. With such associates as Madame Neruda and Signor Piatti he was well mated, and the result was a deserved success. The vocal pieces were only two in number—Piatti's "O, swallow, swallow!" sung by Mr. Santley, to the violoncello obbligato accompaniment of the composer, and Handel's air, "Nasce al bosco," from his Italian opera, Ezio, so expressively rendered by the same artist that, being loudly called forward, he was obliged to sing again, his choice falling on Gounod's "Maid of Athens," the music of which is about as uninspired as the stanzas of Byron are the contrary. Sir Julius Benedict being absent, the post of accompanyist was, as always, assigned to Mr. Zerbini. The 4th of November being the anniversary of the death of Mendelssohn, the programme might gracefully have been exclusively devoted to works from the pen of that truly great composer.

Crystal Palace Concerts.——We have neither time nor space to say more than that the entire programme of Saturday's concert was given to the music of Mendelssohn, Nov. 2nd being the near anniversary of his death (Nov. 4th, 1847). The most remarkable feature in the selection was a symphony in F minor, the last of twelve such works composed between the years 1820, when Mendelssohn (born in 1809) was eleven, and 1823, when he was fourteen years of age. The symphony in F minor, scored, like its predecessors, for stringed instruments, is, under any circumstances, a remarkable work; but, remembering the early time at which it was written, it is nothing less than a marvel. Neither Mozart nor Schubert, whatever may be said to the contrary, exhibited such extraordinary precocity as Mendelssohn. Of this the symphony in F minor, immediate predecessor to the "C minor," long recognised as "No. 1," first in which instruments of brass, wood, and percussion are employed, stands forth a striking example. With such ingenuity, indeed, is it scored that wherever wind instruments might be expected the fiddles, high and low, are made to supply the desired effect. The finale—a double fugue in five parts, worked out in the most elaborate fashion, the age at which it was written, borne in mind—was neither more nor less than a prodigy. True, we have occasional glimpses of Mozart's "Jupiter," and elsewhere not only of Mozart, but of Haydn, and even of Beethoven (Symphony No. 1). Why not? The gifted boy was full of them. Later, however, the man spoke for himself—how, all the world of music knows. The scherzo and notturno from A Midsummer Night's Dream, both exquisitely played and the former encored, together with the splendid overture to Athalie, were the other orchestral pieces. In addition to these we had the pianoforte concerto in G minor, played by Madame Montigny Rémaury as Mendelssohn himself would like to have heard it—not only with the utmost enthusiasm, but in the purest conceivable style. The eminent French artist was greeted according to her deserts. Not less successful was Madame Montigny in two of the "Songs without Words," and the piquant Capriccio in E minor. Songs contributed by Madame Lemmens Sherrington and M. Candidus, the new and promising tenor at Her Majesty's Theatre, completed this really "commemorative" programme. The concert-room was crowded and the audience delighted. No wonder.

London Ballad Concerts.——The season for these entertainments recommenced at St. James's Hall on Wednesday, as usual under the excellent conductorship of Mr. Sidney Naylor. A new ballad, "Make Believe," by Cowen, charmingly sung by Madame Sherrington, was much applauded, and is likely to be popular. The rest of the programme consisted of ditties more or less well established in favour. Loder's "Philip the Falconer"—a very favourite song "in the days when we were young"—was capitally delivered by Mr. Barton McGuckin, and enthusiastically received. Miss Mary Cummings is a vocalist new, if we mistake not, to the Ballad Concerts, but already highly appreciated elsewhere. Her low notes are particularly good, and she was encored in Hullah's "Storm." Mr. Cecil Tovey, another new-comer at these entertainments, proved that he had a good voice in Kücken's "Good Night, Farewell." Concerning Mr. Santley, Mr. Sims Reeves, Madame Sterling, and Miss Mary Davies, we need only say that they were all heartily welcomed, and all deserved their welcome.

Her Majesty's Theatre.——Except Dinorah, with Mdlle. Marimon as Meyerbeer's romantic heroine, a character less suited to her, notwithstanding her facile vocalisation, than several others in which she excels, nothing calling for special notice has been produced at this theatre since our last. That the opera of the day is Bizet's Carmen none can question. The more it is heard the more it is liked. Verdi's Forza del Destino and Weber's Oberon are both in preparation.

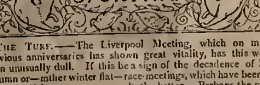
Alexandra Palace.——The Baden Baden weekly concert took place here on Wednesday evening. "The Diver" was sung with much taste and feeling, by Mr. Sutton Smith; "The Anchor's Weighed," by Mr. Janes, who, in response to a bis, gave "Come into the Garden, Maud;" and "The White Squall," by Mr. Field. It would be a great advantage if public singers distinctly enunciated the words as well as the music of the songs. This remark does not apply to Mr. Smith, whose rendering was all that could be desired. The chorus singing shows careful training by Mr. Beardwell, while Mons. Janssens is an efficient director of the band.



SPORTING

The Turf.——The Liverpool Meeting, which on many previous anniversaries has shown great vitality, has this week been unusually dull. If this be a sign of the decadence of late autumn or—rather winter flat—race-meetings, which have been all the rage of late years, so much the better. Perhaps the most interesting feature of the gathering was the appearance for the first time on the turf of the colours of Lord Hastings, who has purchased some of the horses recently sold by Lord Lonsdale to Captain Machell. Captain Machell acts for his lordship, as he has done for many aspirants to Turf honours, as friend, philosopher, and guide. The new colours were carried first past the winning post on more than one occasion during the week.

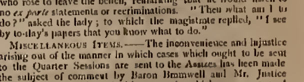
Aquatics.——The Coxswainless Fours at Cambridge have resulted in a victory in the final heat of the Lady Margaret crew over Jesus, the latter, after five years of uninterrupted success, excepting a dead heat in 1874 with First Trinity, having to succumb to the Johnians.—Both at Oxford and Cambridge Trial Eights for the Putney race are more or less in practice, and when the Fours are decided on the Isis, some judgment may be formed as to the raw material in hand for the next Inter-University race.

Football.——The Association Challenge Cup contest progresses but slowly. The Old Harrovians, however, have made mincemeat of the Southhill Park team at Kennington Oval, winning by eight goals to nothing, and showing such excellent form that many think they are the destined winners of the Cup.—The Forest School boys, too, have won their tie, beating Rochester by four goals to two.—As might have been expected, Oxford University had but little difficulty in defeating the Wednesbury Strollers, which they did by seven goals to nil.—South Norwood stand in, Leyton having scratched to them. At Greenwich, Cambridge University, in a Rugby Union game, gave the Royal Naval College but little chance, scoring three goals and three tries to love.—An eleven of Old Etonians was too good for the boys in the "field" at Eton, winning a fast game by four goals to nothing.—Richmond, in a Rugby Union game, has beaten the Woolwich Military Academy; and Oxford University the Cooper's Hill Engineers.—Under the somewhat erratic illumination of Kennington Oval by electric lights, two first-class teams of the Clapham Rovers and the Wanderers played an Association game on Monday evening last, and when "time" was called they had each scored two goals. About 2,000 spectators were present, but it can hardly be said that they were able to follow the details of the game.

Pedestrianism.——All interested in long-distance, or rather long-time, pedestrian contests, are already aware that the six-days' competition last week at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, was won by "Corkey," whose real name, it now appears, is William Gentleman. At more than one stage of the contest he had eclipsed O'Leary's best time, and at the finish had considerable time in hand compared with the victorious American's victory in March last. Corkey's score was 521 miles; and Brown, who rejoices in another euphonious title—"Blower," to wit was second with 506 miles. Vaughan and Crossland, two first-rate men, broke down before the end; and Weston, once thought a wonder, did likewise. It is interesting to notice that in the contest a proportion of running combined with walking paid best. Another six-days' tramp is going on this week for the men who were excluded from the first trial, and at the time of writing Hazael has a strong lead, and if he does not "crack up" (to use an elegant term), he will evidently do a good thing before Saturday night. We make this note of the Agricultural Hall proceedings, because there is no denying the fact that they elicit a good deal of public interest. However, we are still of opinion that these mere endurance contests are not legitimate sport, or conducive to any good end.

Bicycling.——Following in the wake of the mere endurance pedestrian contests, one of six days for professional bicycle-riders is to commence at the Agricultural Hall on the 18th inst., with a prize of 100*l.* for the winner. This is a sum worth winning, even with a week's terrible work "inside the Sundays;" but it will not compare with Corkey's guerdon of 500*l.* Why not have a competition for standing on one leg, or on one's head, or for fasting from solids and liquids?

Hunting.——The first week in November is to the hunting man what the third week in August and the first in September and October are to the lover of the gun. There were never so many packs of hounds ready for work as there are now since the sport became popularised, and from the reports of the cub-hunting it may be anticipated that the foxhunting season just begun will be as vigorous as any of its predecessors.—The Queen's Staghounds, "as per usual," had their opening public meet at Salt Hill on Tuesday, upwards of 500 horsemen being present. A first-rate run inaugurated the season.



LEGAL

Mrs. Weldon and the Lunacy Laws.——On Tuesday, Mrs. Georgina Weldon gave a lecture at St. James's Hall on the Lunacy Laws and the abuses which she alleges take place at private asylums. After relating her own personal experience—the particulars of which we cannot reproduce without breaking the law of libel—she read letters which she had received from Mr. Gladstone, and declared that she hoped to go on holding meetings until the Lunacy Laws were reformed, and the Commissioners in Lunacy altogether abolished. It might be vulgar to make a noise, but unless some one denounced the present abominable system of confining sane persons as lunatics the evil would never be remedied. It had been going on for fifty years, and she had been told that the needed reform should be left to masculine minds, but no man had the courage to come forward to seek after the infamous state of things that now existed. After the lecture, a Mr. Blake, who said that he had been wrongly incarcerated in an asylum, narrated his sufferings in such an excited manner that Mrs. Weldon asked him to be calm, whereupon he rejoined, amid much laughter, "Nobody but a lunatic could be calm under the circumstances." On Wednesday Mrs. Weldon appeared at Bow Street Police Court, with a bundle of newspapers under her arm, and attempted to address Mr. Flowers, who rose to leave the bench, remarking that he would listen to no ex parte statements or recriminations. "Then what am I to do?" asked the lady; to which the magistrate replied, "I see by to-day's papers that you know what to do."

Miscellaneous Items.——The inconvenience and injustice arising out of the manner in which cases which ought to be sent to the Quarter Sessions are sent to the Assizes has been made the subject of comment by Baron Bramwell and Mr. Justice Hawkins, both of whom cited instances in which persons accused of offences which, if proved, would only subject them to two months' imprisonment, would actually have to undergo a longer term while awaiting their trials. At Chelmsford the Grand Jury after listening to Mr. Justice Hawkins made a presentment on the subject, recommending certain alterations in the procedure with the view of avoiding the recurrence of such events. Mr. Stewart, one of the directors of the Glasgow Bank, has been admitted to bail in the sum of 15,000*l.*, but the other directors are still in prison. A National Relief Fund has been started, the subscriptions already amounting to over 68,000*l.*, and it is proposed to ask the chief magistrates of all the principal towns in the United Kingdom to organise subscription committees. It is suggested that either two funds shall be established, or that the general fund shall be devoted to the two objects of relieving the ruined shareholders, and assisting in the liquidations. Several more failures have been announced.—Sir Capel Fitzgerald is again in trouble. This time the prosecutor is an hotel-keeper at Richmond, who alleges that the baronet obtained by false pretences three dinners, two bottles of champagne, and other refreshments; an offence for which, if proved, five years penal servitude may be imposed. The case stands adjourned, and it is only fair to say that Sir Capel's counsel says that he has a clear and distinct answer to the charge.—An extraordinary charge has been brought against Lady Gooch, and a woman named Walker, for conspiring to palm off upon Sir Francis Gooch a strange child, as his own, with intent to defraud and deceive. On Wednesday when the summonses were called on, Lady Gooch did not appear, and it was stated that she was unwell. Mr. Newton, therefore granted an adjournment, but expressed his determination to go on with the case, and to compel Lady Gooch's attendance by issuing a warrant if necessary.—The three men who, in July last, stole 16,000*l.* from the house of a publican and money-lender at Stanningley, near Leeds, have been convicted, and sentenced to varying terms of penal servitude. The bulk of the money was found concealed in the house which they occupied, where some house-breaking tools were also discovered.—There is now in custody a gentleman who finds it convenient to go by several different names, and who has lately been doing a fine stroke of business as "Snelling and Son, stockbrokers, Fish Street Hill, City." He advertised "Profitable Investments on 'Change," and appears to have induced several gentlemen, with more money than wit, to send him large remittances on the faith of his representation that each 20*l.* invested would be sure to yield a profit of 80*l.* if not 150*l.* One of his victims has been defrauded of 500*l.*, which, to quote his own expression, he had "worked for like a horse, and lost like an ass."—A female domestic, lately in the employ of the postmaster at Wellingborough, has been committed for trial for stealing a letter containing 5,000*l.*, two bills of exchange, and other papers. A number of stolen articles were found in her box, and it would appear that she had for some time been in the habit of supplementing her salary by appropriating the contents of letters as they passed through the office.—Garcia, the Llangibby murderer, had a narrow escape of being lynched before leaving Gloucester, where the trial took place. A crowd assembled at the railway station, and made the most determined attempts to get at him. Their execrations were deafening, and the strong police escort, though assisted by the railway officials and some private gentlemen, had much difficulty in getting their prisoner into the train. Garcia appeared almost exhausted by fear.—A woman residing at Chatham has been committed for trial for the manslaughter of her son, a boy aged eleven, whose death was caused in a singular manner. The deceased, while sitting at the tea-table, was quarrelling with his brother; and the mother, having several times spoken to them, at last lost her temper, and threw a knife at him. The wound, which was in the temple, was strapped up; but no doctor was called, and the child died within two hours. The knife not only went right through the skull, but also the membranes of the brain, and a piece of bone was broken away by the force of the blow. The coroner told the jury that upon the evidence they would be perfectly justified in returning a verdict of wilful murder against the mother; but they could also give a verdict for the minor offence.—The burglar who shot at and wounded a policeman at Blackheath about a month ago, and who refused to give any account of himself, has been identified as Charles Peace, a Sheffield desperado, who committed a murder in that town in November, 1876. The discovery has created great excitement in Sheffield, as the murdered man, a civil engineer, named Dyson, was much respected.

I.

The Nineteenth Century contains plenty of matter suited to those who seek for something "to break their minds against," but we cannot help thinking that the editor would do well to diversify the somewhat excessively solid character of his periodical by a few occasional morsels lighter and easier of digestion. Concerning Mr. Gladstone's paper, "Electoral Facts," we need not say much. It is, as many of our readers are probably aware, an attempt to prove, by an examination of the results of the "bye-elections" of the last three years, the period during which the Eastern Question and the policy of the Government with respect to it have been the uppermost subjects in men's thoughts, that a revulsion is at work "in the electoral mind of the country," analogous to that which manifested itself in 1871-73. As a matter of fact Mr. Gladstone shows that since the beginning of 1876 the Liberals have achieved a clear gain of seven seats, counting as fourteen votes on a division; but this seems but a slender basis for the argument founded upon it.—Mr. Henry Dunckley, who, it appears, is the author of that famous "Verax" pamphlet, which made such a noise about a twelvemonth ago, gives us an article on "The Progress of Personal Rule," which seems to us in substance very little else than the pamphlet over again. Mr. Dunckley, we should say, had Baron Stockmar and Lord Beaconsfield on the brain. This pair, according to him, have been the evil genii of the Crown during the present reign, guiding it on ways alien to the spirit and principle of the Constitution. "A sinister harmony in events" raised up Lord Beaconsfield to be First Minister of the Crown "just after a zealous course of tuition in the principles of the prerogative had prepared the Crown for appreciating and welcoming his bolder doctrines." Hence, "the gaunt outlines of Personal Rule can already be discerned through the thin veil of constitutional forms, and the reality of power is slipping from our hands." All which might, no doubt, be very alarming to us, if, in common with most sober-minded people, we did not regard Mr. Dunckley as the discoverer of a mare's nest.—Much more weighty and better reasoned than this tirade about the power of the Crown is Mr. H. D. Traill's argument that a Democracy, and especially such a Democracy as the English, is unfit to exercise, and indeed incapable of exercising, a real guiding control over foreign policy. It proves its wisdom by submitting to the guidance of those leaders in whom it has confidence, who have the knowledge which it has not, and which cannot be imparted to it. The paper is one of considerable mark, and well deserves an analysis for which we cannot here find room.—In Professor Tyndall's "Virchow and Evolution" we have an interesting and able paper, a kind of "Apologia pro Vita Sua," the object of which is to show how unjustly he is accused of presumptuous dogmatism and a want of philosophic caution, when he has throughout his scientific career so carefully distinguished between hypothesis and established fact. It seems to us that he proves his case triumphantly; and a like victory attends Mr. Lowe's singularly able response to the attacks upon Political Economy put forth by Mr. Ingram at the recent Belfast meeting of the British Association.—Mr. Hardinge's translations from the Greek Anthology are smooth and spirited, and show much scholarship; and Mr. Ruskin's fragment on "The Three Colours of Pre-Raphaelitism" is, of course, interesting as coming from him, though its object is hardly obvious. It is, however, so far but a fragment, and will probably seem clearer when we have the sequel.

We have again a very good number of Macmillan. The sketch, by Mr. W. Blades, of what he calls "the pre-natal history" of The Times, telling how John Walter, originally a wealthy coal merchant, was led in 1785 to establish the Daily Universal Register, which developed into The Times three years later, is very curious and interesting; and full too of interest of a different kind is the elaborate "study" of the "Pilgrims' Progress," taken from a volume of lately published essays by Professor Bonaventura Zumbini, of which we have an epitome in English from Mr. R. L. Nettleship. The critical insight displayed by the learned Italian into a phase of religious thought so peculiarly English as the "Pilgrim's Progress" is truly remarkable.—From Mr. Hamilton Lang we have an article on Reform in Asiatic Turkey, chiefly noticeable, perhaps, for its insistence on the restoration of financial order as the one condition which must precede all other attempts at improvement; and Sir Douglas Forsyth puts forth "a Plea for Shere Ali," which is, of course, deserving of attention, though we think he hardly adds anything to what has already been urged by Lord Lawrence and Earl Grey.—The brief extract from a private letter of Sir Garnet Wolseley's, with which the magazine concludes, is certainly not the least valuable among its contents. Sir Garnet declares that "everything is and has been going on admirably," that the climate of Cyprus is by no means what some people have tried to make it out, and adds that "Cyprus is going to be a great success," and that he shall have a surplus even this year.

Fraser is, on the whole, rather dull this month, though Mr. M'Coan's paper, "How Turkey in Asia is Governed," is worth reading, as adding to our knowledge of the subject. Mr. M'Coan makes some modest suggestions towards improved administration—no large scheme of reform, he thinks, would for the present be practicable—but seems to have little expectation that anything substantial will be done if the doing of it is left to the Porte.—The sketch of Strafford's career, by Mr. A. H. A. Hamilton, tells over again what the writer admits is an old story, but shows diligence in research and clearness and sobriety of thought. It is no doubt true that Strafford was unfortunate in his time and his surroundings, and that "had he been the minister of such a sovereign as Elizabeth, he might have left a name as honoured as that of Burleigh."—The paper on the charms and substantial advantages of Colorado as a field for the English agriculturist, written by an English farmer settled three years in the State, is sensible, besides being well-written and amusing; and Mr. F. T. Palgrave's "Dorset Idyll," if not of high poetic excellence, is, all the same, much above the level of magazine verse.

A poem by Bret Harte, "The Spelling Bee at Angel's. Reported by Truthful James," is, perhaps, the feature of most interest in Scribner, though with not a few readers the paper entitled "A Night with Edison," in which we have a full account of the career of this wonderful discoverer, is likely to rival it in attractiveness.—In "Johnny Reb at Play" we have some anecdotes in illustration of the love of jokes, which, it is said, was so marked a characteristic of the Confederate soldiery, and we find again a good many pages devoted to Mr. Longfellow and his writings. The Illustrations, as usual, deserve all the praise that can possibly be bestowed on them. We may call attention in particular to the "Wind Storm in the Californian Forests," and the many charming illustrations of "Farm Life in New York."

In the University Magazine Mr. Eric S. Robertson argues against Malthus' theory, that population increases in geometrical proportion, whilst subsistence increases only in arithmetical proportion in a paper which is not without ability, though its sentiment is here and there a little high-flown.—The account of Mr. William Morris, in the series entitled "Contemporary Portraits," is good and appreciative; and there is a readable paper by Miss Helen Zimmern on the travels of Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, a celebrated voyager of the 12th century.

London Society for this month displays its customary characteristics, and it is perhaps enough to say of the number that the clever and humorous "Adventures of a Field Cricket" are here brought to a conclusion, and that some of the illustrations in "Switzerland by Pen and Pencil" are of more than common merit.

WINTER EXHIBITIONS—MR. M'LEAN'S GALLERY, HAYMARKET

FOR his Winter Water Colour Exhibition Mr. M'Lean lays under contribution both Old and New Water Colour Societies, and outsiders, and resorts to foreign schools as well as English. Some of the most conspicuous specimens in the collection have been already exhibited, as T. W. Wilson's two elaborate Dutch drawings, one of children, under a morning effect of light, playing with a toy-cannon at defence of the plank-bridge over one of the ditches which do duty for hedges in Holland, the other of the young wife of a Dutch mariner, with her children about her, crushed under the news of her husband's loss at sea. These drawings were exhibited at the Institute a year ago. Mr. Wilson belongs to the school of Herkomer and Gregory. His work, which sins on the side rather of over-labour than slightness, is the antipodes of the swifter style of the older school exemplified in the landscapes of Collier, Wimperis, Orrock, and Syer. Collier's large landscape, "Peat Gathering," has a place of honour here, and deserves it as the most vigorous illustration of the style of landscape work in which David Cox is the greatest master. Mr. Collier's smaller drawing, "Haslemere Common," is not unworthy of De Wint for depth and power of colour. There is a potent charm in the directness, swiftness, and freshness of good work of this class; and it is well illustrated here in the flat Lincolnshire sand and shore subjects of Orrock, in Wimperis's Surrey heaths and Welsh lakes and torrents under cloudy skies, and Syer's vigorous outdoor studies, in particular two at Southwold. To the same school belongs J. Staple's Welsh peat moss, with clouds breaking up after a storm,—the most powerful work I have ever seen of this artist. H. F. Grace's two drawings, "Early Spring near Lewes," and the ruins of Amberley in November, stretching along the water-side, show how near this artist can come to H. G. Hine, the master painter of our Sussex Downs, of whom there is one example here (34), but not of the highest quality. J. Aumonier's large drawing of a village near Dover is an honest but prosaic bit of work. Sir John Gilbert's "Danish Raid" and "Critical Moments," fugitives hiding in a wooded hollow from knights in pursuit, may or may not have been already exhibited. If we have not seen these particular drawings, we have seen others so like them as not to be easily distinguishable in memory. We might say the same of A. W. Hunt's beautiful large drawing of the "West Cliff at Whitby," with its crown of abbey ruins, and its fringe of red-tiled houses, crowded along the strand, and thrown into due distance by the black hull left stranded by the receding tide. The artist has made so many drawings of Whitby that one may be excused for feeling doubtful if one has seen this particular one before. Whether or no, thisis work the sight of which is always welcome, for its combination of earnest respect for truth, with delicate sense of beauty.

There is the same rare quality in Mrs. Allingham's work, of which here is a lovely little example (13), "The Apple Tree." Such work is all the more welcome nowadays, because of its serene cheerfulness. In Josef Israels' pictures the imagination of the painter seems steeped in a gloom there is no shaking off. The contemplation of such work, however impressive and pathetic, becomes, in the long run, depressing. The familiar sadness reigns paramount in the Dutch master's larger drawing here, "The Old Way," a grim, grey, twilight sky barred by a row of ill-grown tree trunks; through them a track, over a desolate waste of hungry bent, along which an old woman in garments as sombre as the scene follows a clumsy cart dragged by a dog. There could be no drearier embodiment of a life of sad labour slowly drawing to a joyless close.

In a smaller drawing, "Helping Mother," we have a little boy nursing his baby sister before the door, while the mother toils at her wash-tub in the cottage. Here a ray of light falls upon the child, the joy of the poor household. But both drawings are noticeable for the consummate skill with which colour and light and shade are employed to force home the painter's leading thought.

A drawing of otter-hounds, by Rosa Bonheur, may be compared with two groups of the same rough and rare breed by Basil Bradley. The French hounds are at rest; the English are active, in one scenting, in the other following their fierce and wily quarry.

"A Family of Cats," by L. E. Lambert, is a good example of a humble subject dignified by skilful pictorial treatment.

Mrs. Colman Angell's fine study of irises in a grey jar has been seen before, but it is not the less welcome as a noble proof of the rank to which flower painting may be raised in a strong hand. There is more grace and delightfulness, if less strength, in her "Peonies," white and rose flushed, in a blue porcelain jar; her "Wild Flowers in a Crackle Vase," and her "Wall Flowers in a Cut Glass Tumbler," are other excellent examples of this lady's work, justifying her right to the first place among the successors of W. Hunt. Some Irish drawings, with a new name, S. Bird, one in particular, "Irish Shelter," two hapless horses on a bleak sea shore, under a pelting rain, deserve notice for the truth of the local character and colour. Two full-lengths by E. K. Johnson, one of a tender-hearted maiden extracting a thorn from a lamb's foot, the other of a buxom farmer's daughter in a red cloak; several of Frederick Tayler's familiar, but always attractive little sporting figures and scenes of the olden time; a "Wreck off Holy Island," by E. Duncan; a storm, by S. Dodgson; an unfinished group of "Fern Gatherers," by F. W. Topham; several very mannered studies of daintily dressed children, by W. S. Coleman; a court martial by Ten Kate; and a pretty group of children on the Scheveningen Sands by Blommers; a Scotch tarn by F. Powell; a capital transcript of Nature, "Grazing Land, Summer Time," by Cuthbert Rigby; two excellent studies of red brick architecture on the Cam, the well-known river window of St. John's College, and part of the lower part of Queen's, and a little study of one of the many picturesque corners of Knole, by J. O'Connor; the "Cherry Feast" and the "Sunflower," graceful Surrey cottage studies, by Birket Foster; sea and shore views by J. Mogford, E. Hayes, and T. Hardy; a serene "Evening," with a range of farm buildings, relieved against the limpid sky, and a girl driving calves up the bank of a stream, by E. Waterlow; a strong and solid study of the Armenian Church, Venice, from the Lido, by G. Howard; figure subjects by Kilburne and C. Green, and many bright and brilliant Italian drawings from the host of young painters inspired by Fortuny, Simonetti, Cipriani, Tofano, Tapiro, Corelli, Frezzini, and others, will serve to show the great variety of styles and schools represented in Mr. M'Lean's present Winter Collection.

ON THE JURY

I BELIEVE that a "thunderbolt from a cloudless sky" is considered a fine, healthy expression, significant of the surprise with which the Unexpected—to speak vulgarly—"drops upon" a fellow. I have had my thunderbolt; from the blue empyrean it fluttered down without a moment's warning, specially and extravagantly prepaid by a threepenny stamp, and in the shape of a summons to appear at the Justice Hall in the Old Bailey at half-past ten in the forenoon precisely, to serve on the Petty Jury—ay, there's the rub, Petty Jury!—said summons being issued by an officer to the Sheriff hailing from the shady locality of Webber Street, Blackfriars. It came, of course, at the most inopportune moment, but of that I complain not. The rules of life go by "contraries," the friend always drops in for "a long talk" the very evening you have marked out for a good night's work; the box for the opera invariably reaches your house half an hour after you have left to attend a lecture on "Sawdust as a Nourishing Agent," or a reading from Hamlet by a friend who will take it as an affront if you go away before he has quite done with it—and for it; and we have a high literary authority for asserting that it is the tailor's bill which you draw from the envelope instead of the long-expected love-letter. I complain not of the blow it was to one's feelings to receive this mandate at a moment when boxes were packed for the seaside, and my parental bosom was swelling with the thoughts of promenading on the pier with those girls of mine when "copy" would allow. I shuddered not a great deal at being left in desolate quarters at home with an old housekeeper to give me breakfast every morning before starting in the service of my country, and to lock me out at night under the impression that it was too late for any respectable gentleman to come home. I could have borne all this without a murmur, but a Petty Jury—that sounded ungenteel and low. For I had been a Grand Juryman; I had sat in the inner sanctum with quires of paper and spluttering quill pens before me, and adjudicated "muchly;" I had cross-examined "prosecutors," and generally covered myself with that small amount of glory which is to be found hanging round the premises; it seemed like a drop in life to leave the Grand and descend to the Petty, an insult hurled at me from an unseen enemy—perhaps the "Poor Rate," which is mysteriously bound up with Juries, I have heard, or possibly one of my neighbours with City influence. I am afflicted by neighbours who are "something in the City," not much—but something.

I repaired to the Justice Hall of the Old Bailey wondering. I proceeded hopefully, with faith in my arguments to convince the meanest Central Criminal Court capacity that it was all a mistake, and that at the worst some other time more convenient would be granted considering the aggravating circumstances of my particular case. I left, full of hope and promise—a hope that I should be let off, and with a promise to join the family almost immediately.

Alas! the shriek of the engine that bore my loved ones from me was simply the death-wail of every aspiration I had had—the shadow of what was coming gathered over me when I was once within the murky precincts of an exceedingly stuffy Court, in company with other petty individuals, all summoned to kick their heels in empty rooms half-an-hour before anybody wanted to see them. I unbosomed myself to a fellow-sufferer, and he laughed at my aspirations; he told my story to the rest of the good folk about him, and they all laughed, and a surly policeman poked his head round a door to see what we were laughing at, and whether any irreverence for authority had crept into our midst. When an official appeared, he "smiled sarkastic," as poor Artemus hath it, at my excuses—and to a further statement, carefully prepared, that I was of a literary tendency, with "copy" on my mind that was behindhand, and pockets full of proof sheets for which publishers were waiting, he shook his head, and said he couldn't help it, and that was my look-out—which it was. Presently he commenced calling out the names of the Petty Jurors from a list which he held in his hand, and whether he regarded me as a man to be wary of and to be especially "down upon" or not, I cannot say, but it was the humiliating fact that he bawled forth my name twice, and flew into a passion because I had not answered the first time to his summons—which I had done clearly and distinctly.

"Why don't you answer when you're called—can't you hear?" he shouted; and I knew that from this irascible person there was no sympathy to follow.

It will end one section of my grievances to assert that no sympathy did follow—that the clerk of the Court, or whoever the individual may be who sits at the foot of the judge's bench, and makes occasional faces at the jurymen—was as discourteous as one human being could possibly be to another, and declined to pass my petition to his lordship on any pretext whatever—and I was very full of pretexts certainly. I accepted my position—my fate, at last—and gave in for my term of servitude, making a little display every morning, in the jury box, of my good friends the publishers' proof sheets, which I corrected to the last moment of business, to the disgust of the clerk and the confusion of my brother jurors, who thought I had been supplied with printed copies of the business on hand, and was taking a mean advantage of them in making notes by wholesale before the commencement of proceedings.

Trial by Jury is a fine institution, and Trial by Jury is a very fair specimen of a comic opera that is humorous and absurd; there were the elements of both the sublime and the burlesque in my week's experience of the Old Bailey. That there was any courtesy shown to the Petty Jury, or that the members thereof were considered of any importance whatever by any gentleman connected with the business of the Court, I failed to perceive at the time, I fail to perceive clearly now, looking at the matter composedly and from a distance, and with my blood off the boil.

There was the judge, or rather one of the judges, to begin with, who after summing up in a case of robbery from the person, was so utterly astonished that "twelve good men and true" could not see the matter in his own peculiar light, and it was a very peculiar light, indeed, and should return a verdict of "Not Guilty," that he lost his judicial serenity—he had been sniffing placidly at a bouquet during the morning, and putting me in mind of Sir John Chester, in "Barnaby Rudge,"—and told us, with a severe expression of countenance, that our decision was "a complete failure of justice, gentlemen"—a comment upon the wisdom of our deliberations that was nearly provocative of a strike, and a defiance of all fines by marching homewards in a compact body of discontent and gangrene. I was very much hurt at the time, but newspaper records of later date have consoled me—the jurymen are still being reproved by this particular gentleman, and in very much the same style, as when I had the honour of being enrolled amongst that useful body of fellow citizens. It's a way he has at the Bailey; the atmosphere is not conducive to philosophic or judicial calmness. Evidently "something in the air!"

There was something the matter with the usher, too,—at least, with one usher, whose path in life unfortunately crossed mine, between the Court and the retiring-room. His particular style of address to the Petty Jurymen was of the free and easy kind—what is best known in the upper circles as the "beastly familiar." He was the most rollicking of ushers—he always had his little joke with us in off moments, and at luncheon was the soul of the party in the ghastly back room where the sandwiches and pork-pies await consumption. One occasion is memorable on account of the absence of beer, and of the maid-servant who had been sent to fetch it. The jokes he poured into our ears as to the cause of the delay—encouraged by three or four jurymen who must have known him in private life, they were so fond of him—the lively sallies with which the maid was greeted on her return, too, were full of humour, but a little startling to a few out of the round dozen of us. Certainly we were a Petty Jury, and fine feelings are not expected in Petty Jurymen, I take the liberty of asserting in these pages—in fact, any feelings at all are very much out of place in the neighbourhood of the Old Bailey. You must go, my estimable brother juror of the petty dozen, whose turn is coming, prepared to "rough it"—as one goes to the diggings, or down Whitechapel or Ratcliffe Highway. You will be told—you always are told—that you are doing your duty as a citizen, and are of service to the country, but nobody will treat you with any degree of consideration for all that, and you will assuredly be bullied somehow and by somebody before you are thanked from the Bench for being true to your summons from Webber Street, Blackfriars. Stay, the counsel will compliment you in the course of the week—there is one learned in criminal law, who shall be nameless, who will certainly fix you with his admiring eyes and talk of the intelligence and sound common sense of the twelve gentlemen before him. During my week, such compliments became extremely painful to receive, and led one to think that he was being treated very badly, when it became a duty to return a verdict exactly opposite to that for which he had especially pleaded. However, he took it not to heart; he was not offended with us;—like the bold but bruised hero of old prize-ring days, "he came up smiling" at the next round, and spoke of our intelligence and common sense once more, and with the extremest unction, as though he had only just discovered them. I served my time out, and was free to go at the end of the week; I was in "luck's way" even, for there was a big case to come of many days, and the whole body of jurors who had been summoned that Sessions had their names shaken up in a hat—like an extempore "sweep" on a racecourse—and the first twelve drawn had the glorious privilege to "well and truly try." I drew a blank, and went on my way rejoicing at my freedom, but deploring that a little more courtesy, common civility, "good manners" could not be extended with a free and gracious hand even to a Petty Juryman.

THE NEW CIVIC DIGNITARIES

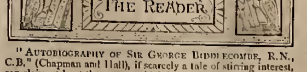
SIR CHARLES WHETHAM, who this day becomes Lord Mayor of London, is the second son of the late Mr. Stephen Whetham, of Bridport, to whose business of flax and hemp manufacturer he has succeeded. He was born in 1812, and is a native of Bridport, where he received his education. Coming to London at the age of twenty, he soon established himself as principal in the metropolitan office of the firm of which he is a member, and his clear-sightedness, integrity, and business capacity soon won him a position amongst his fellow citizens. In 1840 he became a member of the Leathersellers' Company, and, after filling various subordinate offices, was chosen Master of the Company. In 1842 he became a member of the Court of Common Council, being returned for the Ward of Bridge, and on the death of the late Sir J. Causton was elected Alderman of his Ward. He was Sheriff in 1873, and in that year received the honour of knighthood upon the occasion of the Civic reception of the Czar of Russia, after the marriage of the Duke of Edinburgh. Sir Charles is chairman of the National Provident Institution, the London and Blackwall Railway Company, the Metropolitan Bank, and the Scottish Australian Investment Company. He is a Deputy Lieutenant for the City of London, and has been a justice of the peace for more than twenty years. He was married in 1836, and has a family of five sons and four daughters, the eldest son, Mr. C. Langley Whetham, being second partner the firm. In politics Sir Charles is a Progressive Conservative, and in 1875 he unsuccessfully contested the seat for his native borough. He has taken a very prominent part in the organisation for the promotion of the holding of a great Agricultural Show in the metropolis next year, under the auspices of the Royal Agricultural Society.

Mr. Alderman and Sheriff GEORGE BURT, of Grosvenor Wharf, Westminster, was born at Swanage, Dorset, on the 2nd of October, 1816. He is a member of the firm of John Mowlem and Co., well known in London as road and general contractors, and in Aberdeen and Guernsey as quarry owners. Mr. Burt has long acted as outdoor partner of the firm, and some of the largest public works in and around London were executed under his immediate superintendence. He has been an active member of the Metropolitan Asylums Board from its commencement, and also holds many other public appointments both in London and Swanage. Mr. Burt, who is a member of the Whitehall Club, and a distinguished Freemason, was married in 1840, and has a family of two sons and three daughters. Mr. Wynne E. Baxter is his Under Sheriff.

Mr. Alderman and Sheriff THOMAS BEVAN is the son of the late Dr. Thomas Bevan, of Finsbury Circus, and was born in 1829. He was educated at the City of London School, where he was at one time Captain. He entered business life in 1853, and is the head of the firm of Knight, Bevan, and Sturge, cement manufacturers, of Northfleet; Belvedere Road, Lambeth; and Lime Street. Mr. Bevan is a magistrate for Kent, a member of the Shipwrights' Company, and belongs to the Devonshire Club and to the City Liberal Club. He married in 1852, and has two sons and four daughters. Mr. Bevan has appointed Mr. H. J. Godden, C.C., as his Under Sheriff.

On Friday the Sheriffs gave their customary inaugural banquet in the Grocers' Hall, and on Saturday the Lord Mayor Elect was presented to the Lord High Chancellor, who signified Her Majesty's approval of the choice of the citizens, and congratulated him on his accession to the office of Chief Magistrate of the metropolis. The civic banquet to-day (Saturday) will be attended by all the members of the Ministry except Mr. Smith, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and Colonel Stanley, the War Secretary, who are now in Cyprus. The procession or "Show" will this year, for the first time, cross the river, passing over London Bridge, through High Street Borough, Southwark Street, Southwark Bridge Road, back over Southwark Bridge, along Cannon Street, and so westward to Westminster Hall, returning by way of the Thames Embankment and Queen Victoria Street.

Our portraits are from photographs: that of the Lord Mayor by Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street; those of the Sheriffs by Maull and Fox, 62, Cheapside, E.C.



"AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF SIR GEORGE BIDDLECOMBE, R.N., C.B." (Chapman and Hall), if scarcely a tale of stirring interest, can claim at least the respect which is due to a genuine record of honourable and active service. It was not, indeed, the fortune of its author to be ranked among England's fighting captains. He belonged to that humbler but not less worthy class of Masters in the Royal Navy, on whom, though graced with no more ornate title than the plain "Mr." of quarter-deck etiquette, depended right often the safety of ships and squadrons in the navigation of dangerous waters. Of this class the veteran sailor whose services afloat were crowned in '54 by his appointment as Master to the Baltic Fleet might justly have considered himself the head. In it he had advanced step by step to the highest position open to officers of his rank—the post of Master Attendant at Woolwich Dockyard. From it he withdrew with a well-earned Knighthood and the retiring rank of Commander R.N. The rough old school of captains was by no means extinct when young Biddlecombe first went to sea. In after years he delighted to narrate how, on boat-duty off the Coast of Africa, the cutter under his charge having been driven out to sea, he contrived, after being thirty-six hours without food or drink, to rejoin his consorts and pull alongside the nearest for refreshment—ascertaining first that a recall signal from the Ætna's mast-head did not display his cutter's number—but, on resuming his course, was surprised by a sharp fire, first of blank and then of shotted guns in close succession, until by good luck his angry Commander became aware that it was not the young officer after all, but his own signal, that was in the wrong. Of his various services in war and peace—in the Douro, watching the rival forces of Don Pedro and Don Miguel, off Acre taking soundings before the attack of the Allies, among the rocks and shoals of the West Indian seas, or in the Baltic campaign aforesaid—it is unnecessary to speak. Especial interest will just now attach to his diary of the work done on this last occasion under Napier, and to the memorandum penned by him in '56 on the alleged failure of the fleet, the difficulties it had to encounter or to allow for, and the defects (in that first year of the war) in its equipment. The rewards and honours with which these services were in time requited, the tokens of esteem received from friends and neighbours at Keyham and at Woolwich, the summer trips in the holiday evening of life, are described at length with a simple complacency, in whose very ingenuousness there is something quite engaging. More entertaining books might easily be found—there are not many that give a healthier and cheerier picture of a meritorious career satisfactorily rewarded.

In "The Sea: Its Stirring Story of Adventure, Peril, and Heroism, Vol. I." (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), Mr. F. Whymper has presented us with a illustrated volume which, in respect alike of letterpress and illustrations, is of more than average excellency. The plan, of course, is somewhat discursive, at one time engaging us on a voyage round the world in an imaginary cruiser, with frequent pauses on the way to listen once again to the story of Gibraltar or of the Suez Canal, of Petropaulofsky or of the Diamond Rock; at another inviting us to compare the modern ironclad with the Nelsonian three-decker, and this again with the beaked galleys of the Norsemen; or at another recalling famous episodes of ocean history, hazardous cruises and daring mutinies, disasters aggravated by lack of discipline, or half-redressed by steadfastness and seamanship; wrecks like those of the Alceste and the Medusa, losses like the burning of the Kent or the sinking of the Captain. Of many of the coast and ocean scenes which he describes Mr. Whymper writes from personal knowledge, while to all he brings an acquaintance with the sea which is much above the range of the mere compiler.

The veteran Planché's magnificent "Cyclopædia of Costume, Part XXI." (Chatto and Windus), loses none of its attractions as we draw nearer and nearer to the time when costume (properly so called) was to exist no longer. It is quite like a fairy (or, at any rate, a traveller's) tale to listen to the Countess d'Aulnoy's description of fashions in Spain in the last decade or so of the seventeenth century—the dozen petticoats that hid the little feet which were the Spanish lady's greatest pride, and were never therefore shown unless to an accepted lover, the watches that were hung as pendants to the earrings; or (turning to the sterner sex), the long sword and buckler, the blue ribands, and the black velvet tights of the "exquisite" son of the Alcalde of Aranda. It is now, too, that regimental uniforms come into existence with the Guardsmen of the Stuarts and the Mousquetaires of the Grand Monarque, and that a whole host of Orders of Knighthood are founded or resuscitated to engage the attention of the connoisseur in heraldry. The illustrations, we need scarcely add, are as numerous and interesting as usual.

No town-traveller who loves to walk "abroad in the fields" but will greet with welcome a dainty volume, "Familiar Wild Flowers," by F. E. Hulme (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), or an account with beautiful coloured illustrations of some forty-three of the common flowers of the cornfield, the hedgerow, the thicket, and the marsh. The plates in this instance are so excellent that they fairly claim precedence over the letterpress, but this latter, too, is good and simple, giving, besides a fair description of the flower, its popular as well as its scientific appellation, and many particulars as to its properties real or supposed, whether resting, as in the case of the cowslip and the silverweed, on the authority of ancient herbals, or like those of the foxglove and the bryony on the more solid testimony of the modern pharmacopœia.

Among the swarm of weeklies that now vie with each other in depicting the chameleon features of "society," it is refreshing to light on one which, like Social Notes (Social Notes Office, Southampton Street), is still content to take for its theme the progress and the wants of society in the wider and less fashionable sense. The new serial may fairly boast that its aim is good and its method pure, and that its papers, if rarely piquant and at times too advocative of philanthropic "fads," are written as a rule by men who know their subjects. The column of "advertisements worth preserving" is also a novel and a valuable feature.

Of "Heredity: a Village Dialogue," by a Protestant Clergyman (Remington and Co.), suffice it to say that it is an argument for the more refined Malthusian doctrine of attention to the quality of the children that are brought into the world rather than limitation of the quantity. Hence pretty Mary Perkins must marry handsome Jack Robinson (albeit a little gay), and not Augustus Spooner, who has money in the bank, but whose children will probably want strengthening irons. A little book this of very questionable utility.

We quite blush not to have noticed a week ago so seasonable a volume as the "'Pyrotechnist's Treasury; or, Complete Art of Making Fireworks," by Thomas Kentish (Chatto and Windus), a very pretty and, so far as we can judge, very sufficient handbook to an art of which few good manuals exist in English, and which, indeed, has only recently attained its present wealth of forms and colours. Mr. Kentish will show the amateur everything from crackers to tourbillons, from squibs to Mongolfier balloons, and, better still, will teach him how to make them without soiling his hands with old-fashioned preparations of quick match, or endangering his life by compositions unsafe in themselves or risky to prepare.

Last, far from least, "Coughs and Their Cure" (E. Gould), by Dr. Shuldham, a lively, well-written, little volume on slightly homœopathic lines, and like most homœopathic books, quite intelligible to the general reader, may decidedly be commended to the weak of lungs were it only for the good chapter on the "Movement Cure," and the capital survey of useful health resorts—"If you can change nothing else," said a great doctor, "change your room"—from quiet Penzance to the most recent discovery, Davos-am-Platz.

THE POOL

I KNOW a silver space of waters deep
  Amid the tangled trunks and roots of trees,
Where shade and interspacing azure sleep
  The white day through unruffled by the breeze;
    Where grasses tell of flowers before their birth,
    And midnight whispers with the secret earth.

I know a lurking star which brooding shade
  Hides like a blue bud over-young to break.
I know the scents that timid night has made
  For morn, chaliced in flowers, yet, for the sake
    Of their sweet moon, forego the sun as lover,
    Steal into air and in the moonbeams hover.

I know the murmur of the far-off town,
  The shrill wind-music dying in the grass,
The low moan of the water plashing down
  Through lips moss-bearded in the western pass:
    I knew a voice that stole the song from streams
    To whisper in my ear the tune of dreams.

No more! no more may she beside that pool
  Watch with still eyes the sunken stars of night!
No more when fields are mute and dews are cool
  Shall airs of eve be charmed to our delight!
    No more in verdurous twilight after day
    Shall her voice steal my weariness away!

The stars above find spirit-stars below
  Through water ever-flowing to the sea;
My beacon-star above me shines, I know
  Through flowing time my beacon will find me:—
    This pool and I drift slowly to the Main
    To show each star its beacon-star again.

A RAILWAY ACROSS NEWFOUNDLAND is proposed, the line to run from St. John's to St. George's Bay, or to some other convenient place on the west coast. The Newfoundland Assembly has offered an annual subsidy of 40,000*l.*; and the Government has issued a circular, says Engineering, to American contractors inviting estimates, a survey having already shown the practicability of the scheme. The ocean voyage would be shortened some 1,000 miles by the construction of the line, which would also open up large deposits of copper, iron, lead, coal, and other minerals, and cut through the pine and spruce forests of the interior, which at present are utterly useless.

CABUL does not appear to have favourably impressed the Russian envoys, notwithstanding the warm reception of the Ameer, and a Russian writing from Samarcand to the Novoie Vrémia says that the Afghan capital, shut in closely by the mountains, is far more dull and ugly than Tashkend or Samarcand. The buildings are low and poverty-stricken in appearance, the Ameer's palace, built in the European style, being the only ornament of the town, while the bazaars, usually the great feature of an Eastern city, are very insignificant, and are only notable for their dirt and untidiness. General Stolietoff and his companions had a wearisome journey of twenty-one days to Cabul. They crossed nine high passes, and travelled through a very deserted part of the country, frequently traversing barren wastes of some seventy-five or ninety miles between the villages. The Russian envoy was greeted by a salute of 115 guns, and Shere Ali himself came to meet him, a step without precedent in Afghan history. A salute of thirteen guns is the orthodox reception of an ordinary English envoy to Cabul, while a Maharajah has a right to a salute of thirty guns, and the Viceroy to a salute of fifty-one.

A LARGE NORTHERN SPA

My large Northern Spa is not so very much larger than the small Northern Spa which I touched off some months ago, nor is it much less secluded from the world; but it is larger and more lively—if I may dare to say so without giving offence. Meg Merrilies, at least, who is intimately associated with its neighbourhood, would have said it was "grand beyond a' description"; and had Belted Will Howard seen it growing up in the neighbourhood of Naworth Castle, he would very soon have paid it a midnight or early morning visit, and worked havoc with its roof-trees.

Situated on the high land between Northumberland and Cumberland, on the northern extremity of the great backbone of England, Gilsland has a fine, elevated, cool and airy situation. That is to say its principal establishment has; for its railway station and hamlet lie low, and its chief mineral springs are in a deep gorge which it is easier for many people to descend into than to ascend from. In kind consideration of this difficulty the proprietor of the principal establishment has been considerate enough to plant a small establishment down in the gorge, vis-à-vis with the mineral spring, where the taste of sulphuretted hydrogen, sulphate of soda, and chloride of sodium (common salt) can be taken out of the mouth and strength be gained for the ascent. Accustomed to his native mountains the Cumberland statesman or farmer scorns to have recourse to this low place, and reserves his full strength for the purer beverages of the hotel above; but it is far otherwise with the weak-kneed dweller of the plain from far Newcastle or Sunderland, Tynemouth, or the two Shields. Sometimes even second-class guests from that quarter appear to have considerable difficulty in making the ascent, and, notwithstanding the stimulus provided for them below, have been seen lying quite exhausted on one of the benches about half-way up.

But it is not necessary at Gilsland to descend into the gorge either for drinking or for baths. The mineral water is brought up by hand at stated hours, and it is also pumped up for the many well-appointed baths which are conveniently placed in the hotel itself, and which, hot or cold, can be had at any reasonable hour. This process may cause some little loss in the quality of the water; and as the loss is chiefly, if not entirely, in that ethereal and delicious flavour which is conferred by sulphuretted hydrogen, it must be sadly missed by the connoisseur of mineral water; but we doubt if science would lament the loss, and the connoisseurs can always go down to the spring and have the genuine article in its full strength, in which, according to one analysis, there is the most satisfactory amount of seventeen cubic inches of sulphuretted gas in one gallon. The principal ingredients, according to Professor George Wilson's analysis of 1858, are carbonate of lime, sulphate of soda, salt, carbonate of soda (in large quantity), carbonate of magnesia, with abundance of sulphuretted hydrogen, and combined carbonic acid gas. This makes a strong mixture; and one might expect that it would make an exceedingly tasty one, sufficient to satisfy the soul of any connoisseur; but it is exactly in that latter respect that it is defective. When the gases have escaped from it Gilsland water has very little taste—so little that a favourite way of taking it (especially with old ladies) is to make it into tea. It is very different from the knock-you-down fluid of the old sulphur well at Harrogate; and is specially useful for the digestive and renal organs when taken internally.

German balnæologists have pretty well dispelled the illusion that baths of mineral water have any specific effect, except as regards external affections of the skin, beyond their heat and the effect of the saline matter which they contain in exciting the action of the skin. It cannot be said, according to such views, that Gilsland water acts powerfully when employed in baths; but still its effects upon the skin and indirectly upon the system are greater than those of ordinary water. It is chiefly useful when taken internally in moderate quantities. By those who are not well acquainted with mineral waters, it ought to be taken under medical advice; but that is rarely thought of; and, fortunately or unfortunately, there are no special practitioners at the place devoted to the mineral water and enhancing its value by charging a guinea an interview and by issuing such solemn prescriptions as "Take eight ounces warm of the Old Sulphuriated Bilge-Water Well to-morrow morning before breakfast. Then walk for fifteen minutes. After which take six ounces cold, and wait the result."

But in fact even "Old Sulph" himself (I beg leave to state that this is a name given by young ladies not to a doctor but to a particular well) would stand little chance of receiving much attention in the principal establishment of Gilsland. The real votaries of the water there are to be found in a smaller establishment, or scattered about in cottages drinking their Gilsland tea. In the Grand Hotel Gilsland water is not greatly in request, but other "waters" are, and so are all expedients for passing the time. It may be called a large Northern Spa, because the building is a very large one, with long corridors and with broad and narrow stairs on which plenty of exercise can be taken on wet days, and with a large covered court in which there is music and dancing in the evenings. Round the house are terraces, a lawn, splendid trees, and short umbrageous walks, and, descending into the deep valley of the Irthing, we come on most picturesque gorges, and on the "Popping Stone" where Sir Walter Scott is said to have settled affairs with Miss Charlotte Carpenter, and where his example has been often followed. There are also fine drives in the neighbourhood, as to Lanercost Priory, Naworth Castle, the Roman Wall, and the one (little) lake which Northumberland can boast of.

Hence Gilsland is what may be called a jolly place; and as the proprietor of the hotel is master of the local foxhounds there is even a baronial air about it, from the number of foxes' heads and tails which adorn it, a few hounds lying on the grass, and hunting horses coming out of the stables. Then there is great variety of company, and the bells never cease ringing summoning the guests to the frequent meals. For there are three classes of visitors, each with their separate rooms and tables, but with various common points of contact. A descent to the mineral spring in the morning, a long drive during the day, an hour in the well-stocked library before dinner, and the music, dancing, and general going about in the evening, do not leave anything to be desired in regard to means for filling up the time without having much recourse to the sulphates and chlorides. In fact, recourse is most usually had to something else, especially by the brethren from the banks of the Tyne, who make short visits to Gilsland apparently to indulge in anything except the mineral water. It must be admitted as a defect in the hotel that there is no night-porter to assist these gentry to their rooms at a late hour and to prevent them filling clergymen's boots with water, by way of relieving the tediousness of ascending to the top storey; but these are trivial matters compared with the general scope for amusement, the pure air, the splendid old trees and the picturesque surrounding scenery. We have only to add that a legitimate subject of complaint at Gilsland recently has been the closing of the baths beside the well, so that all visitors wherever residing had to go to the hotel if they wanted baths and had then to pay highly for them, while they had difficulty in getting them, especially when they wanted them.

BONFIRE BOYS AT LEWES

It has never been satisfactorily explained why the ordinarily pretty and peaceful town of Lewes, in Sussex, should on the Fifth of November lose its head, in a manner of speaking, and go stark bonfire mad. Guy Fawkes' Day at Lewes is a thing to remember. In more rational parts of the country, though we have given up the barbarous practice annually of wantonly outraging the religious feelings of our Roman Catholic neighbours, we must still confess to a partiality for fireworks on the Fifth of November, with a jolly blaze in the back garden for the delectation of the boys and girls. But by so doing we indulge in no ill-feeling against any one, and make brisk business for the pyrotechnist and his work-people. But at Lewes they stick to the text of the business in a wonderful way; and though two hundred and twenty years have now elapsed since the startling discovery in the vault at Westminster, the inhabitants seem to have the Gunpowder Plot as freshly at heart as though the miserable instrument of the conspiracy was just newly caught and caged, and awaiting his trial.

It must be admitted, however, that there is method, and a great deal of it, in this bonfire-madness of the good people of Lewes. They have regularly constituted Bonfire Societies—half-a-dozen of them—with a carefully selected committee and a responsible townsman for chairman. They enrol members, numbering several thousands in the aggregate, and these are the "bonfire boys," who are entitled to take part in the processions which usher in the glorious anniversary. They manage the preliminary business very quietly. A stranger entering the town, even as late as three o'clock in the afternoon, would have no suspicion that in the space of half-a-dozen hours the orderly Quakerish-looking streets would be changed to a scene as vividly suggestive of Pandemonium as can well be conceived. The first intimation that he, the stranger, would get of something uncommon being about to happen appears in shape of certain carts perambulating the highways laden with stable litter. These vehicles halt before every house and shop in front of which is an iron grating giving light to the kitchen or cellar below; and those in charge, forking out a portion of the wet straw, carefully plug up with it every chink and crevice. A little later, and as it begins to grow dusk, carpenters with lengths of wood on their shoulders, and their tool-baskets in their hands, appear in public, and, seemingly without asking leave of any one, proceed to nail boards over every ground-floor window which happens to be shutterless, while the shopkeepers, including the publicans, begin to close their establishments as though it were the ordinary shutting-up time.

When it has grown quite dark—at six o'clock, say—there is suddenly heard, as though started by some preconcerted signal, the sounds of brazen music, and from so many different parts of the town, that the ear is perplexedly tingled rather than pleasantly tickled. Next is heard a trampling of feet, and, heralded by fiery cressets held on high, and sulphurously flaming and smoking, comes the first procession. It extends nearly the width of the road, and is several hundred strong. The bravery of the fantastically costumed brass band is ably seconded by the gorgeous silken burdens borne by the banner bearers, foremost of which is one inscribed "No Popery," kept distinctly visible by means of blue and red fire. The processionists are attired as though for a fancy dress ball, and a great many wear masks. Those who do not, wear spectacles of fine wire, and shaped like half a walnut shell. More banners, inscribed "Girls, be true to your Bonfire Boys," and, oddly enough, "Free and Religious Liberty." More brass bands, followed by the "Commander-in-Chief and his staff of officers," the last-mentioned company comprising the immediate escort of a mock bishop "in full canonicals," attended by the mock clergy of his diocese, with a large troop of processionists bringing up the rear, and carrying in their midst two enormous effigies, the one of the Pope, the other of Guy Fawkes, while last of all comes a waggon high piled with great bundles of faggots for by-and-bye bonfire purposes.

This, however, is but a single battalion of the bonfire army. There are several others, separately organised and officered, and in every essential similar, and they, one after the other, march through the main streets, and this ceremony concluded, the "fun" begins. It is, perhaps, eight o'clock by this time, and the roads could not be more densely thronged if every inhabitant of Lewes, man, woman, and child, besides a few thousand visitors from Brighton, had turned out to assist at the carnival. Fancy costume is the order of the occasion, ladies adopting it as well as gentlemen; the former almost invariably wearing masks, and some kind of grotesque cloak, which it is to be hoped is fireproof; and the latter representing clowns, and harlequins, and imps of Satan, and Chinese and turbaned Turks and painted Indians. The staple of the fun is, of course, fireworks. It is no exaggeration to say that thousands of pounds must be expended in these last-mentioned articles. Every one seems to have his pockets stuffed full of them, and from the time the fun begins until midnight, the air is alive with squibs and Roman-candles, and "golden rain" and rockets, and each moment becomes more and more malodorous with the suffocating fumes of burnt gunpowder and smouldering brown paper. A favourite feature of this Bedlam-broke-loose is to make a target of any window in which a light appears, and to shower at it every variety of fiery and explosive missile until the light within is removed. At about ten o'clock the Guys are burnt with much pomp and ceremony, and no small amount of sacrilegious mockery. One is devoted to the flames at the churchyard threshold abutting on the High Street. The sham bishop, in full canonicals, mounts the churchyard railings, and his clerk ringing an enormous bell for silence, he proceeds to read a parody of part of the Church service, the mob joining hilariously in the responses; after which Guy is burnt amidst great uproar and rejoicing, the bishop and the mob dancing round the fire. An hour before midnight the carnival is at its maddest. Iron sledges laden with blazing tar-barrels, and dropping liquid fire, career through the thronged highway, the fireworks shower thicker, the bonfires, big in bulk as a high-piled Pickford's van, roar and crackle bravely. It is the custom to pitch one exactly opposite the Town Hall, which stands in the centre of the town, its foundation being tar barrels, on its upper stories huge bundles of faggots. At different parts of the town there are four or five such enormous blazings, and one way and another it seems nothing short of miraculous that half the houses are not burnt down before morning. So far, however, the Lewes Bonfire Boys have been lucky, and it is said that it is many years since an accidental fire happened in consequence of the celebration. No doubt this is mainly due to the diligence of the fire brigade. On the alert all through the evening, it turns out at midnight, and by one in the morning not a glowing ember remains to tell where the bonfires had been raging.

"Molly Bawn," by the author of "Phyllis" (3 vols.: Smith and Elder).—This is a better story than "Phyllis"—though that was one far above the average mark—for many reasons, of which it may be sufficient to name one, that it is told in the third person instead of the first. Heroines of the force and intensity of character of a Jane Eyre or a Lucy Snow may gain by being suffered to be their own biographers; but more ordinary damsels can hardly reveal to us in their own persons the history of their flutterings, and hesitations, and little sillinesses without an appearance of self-consciousness and affectation which has an unpleasant effect. "Molly Bawn" is par excellence a novel of flirtations—not that the element of serious passion is wanting in the end—and these flirtations are portrayed with singular sparkle and vivacity, and a happy lightness of touch. Molly, properly Miss Elinor Massareene, is—of course—half Irish by birth, and wholly Irish by temperament, a beauty of the coaxing and bewitching order, and a born coquette to the finger tips, but a coquette only in virtue of buoyancy of spirits, and an innocent girlish delight in being liked and admired, for there is, we are glad to say, nothing in her to remind us of the Cleopatra or the "panther-woman." The history of her subjugation of the handsome hussar, Tedcastle Luttrell, who comes as a visitor to the house where she lives with her brother and his wife, is extremely entertaining, with much in it that recalls the novel of the good old times, when the lover who could be exalted to the skies by Beauty's smile, and cast into despair by a frown or a pout, had not become a rarity in fiction. It is only after Captain Luttrell has yielded himself a hopeless captive to Molly's bow and spear in the earlier chapters that the story proper can be said to commence, with the girl's visit to the home of her maternal grandfather, Mr. Amherst. It is ingeniously contrived and well told, with many alternations between sunshine and cloud as far as the lovers are concerned—the cloud, it must be said, being due almost wholly to Miss Massareene's irrepressible coquettishness and caprice—but we need not attempt to describe it here. We come upon another flirtation, very original in character, in that between Sir Penthony Stafford and the wife whom he has married without seeing her face, and left at the church-door—the reason for this strange proceeding it would take too long to explain—and with whom he falls in love at first sight when he meets her in a country house. The situation is perhaps a little far-fetched, but at any rate treated very amusingly. Altogether, "Molly Bawn" is a very pleasant tale, full of gaiety that is never suffered to be wanting in refinement; and we like the likeable among its personages quite well enough to be grateful that the curtain falls at last upon a genuine "happy ending."

"Auld Lang Syne," by the author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor" (2 vols.: Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.).—This is a tale of the year 1806, the days of the great French War; and the scene is laid principally in the little town of Greystone, on the south coast. Cuthbert Shaw, the only child of the schoolmaster, Dr. Shaw, a man proud of his birth, proud of his learning, and prouder still of his firm "Church and King" principles, has married by stealth Jenny Strangfield, the lovely daughter of a red-hot Baptist shipwright; and on the very evening on which he is about to reveal the secret to the girl's father and his own, he is seized by a press-gang, who in the dark mistake him for a sailor, and carried on board H.M.S. Cleopatra, a ten-gun brig, under orders to look out for French cruisers in the Channel. In dismay at her husband's mysterious disappearance Jenny lets out the tie between them, and, as she cannot name the London church at which the marriage ceremony has been performed, her harsh Puritanical father chooses to disbelieve her story, and to put the worst construction upon the matter. The sequel of the tale we must leave to the reader, who, if he is wise, will not neglect to make himself acquainted with it. The novel is one of much interest and excellence; the portrayal of inward moods, and the pictures of the various aspects of external nature that we come upon in it being often of real beauty; though here and there we may perhaps complain of something like over-study and affectation in the language, as though the author were consciously imitating either Mr. Blackmore or Mr. Thomas Hardy, of both of whom we are continually being reminded. But the book as a whole will certainly, to say the least of it, not detract from a reputation already deservedly high.

"They Were Neighbours," by Laindon Hill (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley).—We have nothing worse to say of this novel than that it seems to be all talk. The dramatis personæ discuss such topics as strikes, the improvement of the lot of the agricultural labourer, the tendencies of scientific thought, modern infidelity, and the like. They most of them talk sensibly, and some of them rather cleverly; but they never do anything but talk, and they do not take hold of our interest. The book may have its own claims to attention; but it is only by stretch of language that it can be termed a "story."

"Verney Court: an Irish Novel," by M. Nethercott, author of "The Witch-Thorn," &c. (2 vols.: Remington and Co.).—This is a story highly melodramatic in character and very unequal, but in its best parts, as in the description of the shipwreck in the first volume, showing some power and more promise, which would lead us to think that its author might do better in the future.

"Now is the Winter of our Discontent."——The Farmers' Club opened its winter season on Monday evening, and determined upon unity of action, or rather they took their own way of grumbling. The corn was not so dear as it ought to be on account of foreign competition, and foreign competition being inevitable in corn, it was suggested that we should devote more attention to the production of meat and milk. The reader of the paper, Mr. Edwards, contended that if England had devoted her sole attention to agriculture "she would have been at the head of nations." Well, perhaps she is there still, but it would have been as well, perhaps, if she had devoted a little more attention to pruning hooks than to spears lately. But Mr. Edwards' notion is that it is all the fault of the farmers that they should suffer themselves to be aggrieved by labourers. Let them set a stern front on, join as the labourers join, and be as a bundle of twigs together. An animated discussion followed, inaugurated by the editor of the Mark Lane Express, who declared that in his opinion "Farmers' Clubs and Chambers of Agriculture had utterly failed in their duty, and that the farmers in this country were a laughing stock to the civilised world." Coming from such a distinguished authority, one who has promoted the interests of tenant farmers through evil and good report, we have no doubt that they will appreciate the rebuke and repent, and twine together as the ivy twines round the oak. Mr. Fowler was quite aware that farmers were not so much to blame as the agricultural press, many of which papers would not insert his letters; and Mr. Duckham, editor of the "Hereford Herd Book," was down upon Sir Charles Dilke, who being the proprietor, as he said, of the Agricultural Gazette, did not act in the double capacity of Member of Parliament and imparter of agreeable agricultural information. It was indicated to Mr. Duckham by Professor Voelcker that Sir Charles Dilke had nothing to do with the articles in the paper so injudiciously mentioned. Our good old friend, Mr. Mechi, thought that the sewage question was not so much attended to as it ought to be, that the unsatisfactory way of its disposal was a double loss to the country—a loss in health to the community, a loss in wealth to the tillers of the soil. So the grumble was over, and nothing arrived at particularly, as nothing could be beyond in effect that which was said in one of the "Topics" of last week's Graphic: "Landlords would in the long run increase their own rent-rolls, and would certainly put more spirit into their tenants, if they gave long leases and allowed far more liberty than they now do in the management of land for which rent is paid."

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.——This subject has been discussed at various meetings during the week—at the London Corn Exchange on Monday, where it was resolved that, in the opinion of the meeting, the cental of 100 Imperial standard pounds would be the convenient selling standard, and so it was decided with some dissentient voices. At the Central Chamber of Agriculture on Tuesday, Guy Fawkes' Day, one or two of the members got into a kind of pyrotechnic condition on the subject. They blew up like rockets against 100 lbs., and stuck in for 112 lbs. Much inconsequential talk was spoken about the difficulty of making out 100 lbs. from 112 lbs.; but finally the talkee-talkee ended in the adoption of the cental, and of a resolution for a deputation from the Central Chamber of Agriculture to tell the Board of Trade that they had decided that the cool 100 lbs. was the best of all measures and weights: and so, perhaps, henceforth we shall have to deal in decimals.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The agricultural labourers' strike is annoying, but it cannot last very long. The Union funds may be large, but they cannot stand the pull upon them when all trades are so depressed. Agricultural labourers appear to think that they are entitled to more consideration from their employers than that which cotton manufacturers and coalowners give. Depression of trade seems of no account in their eyes, and if they hold out they will be their own worst friends. Farmers cannot afford the money, as may be understood from this one fact that we quote from a paper of the other day's date:—"Mr. William John Evelyn, the owner of the extensive Wootton estates, near Dorking, has announced that he will grant to all his tenants a reduction of thirty per cent. in their rents. He also announced that, should the existing depression in trade continue, he will make a further reduction." This should give the labourers pause, and their ill-advisers patience instead of passion.—Everybody in connection with agriculture will be pleased to learn that Mr. Brandreth Gibbs, so long and so honourably associated with Agriculture, has received the honour of knighthood from the Queen. It is a graceful and well-earned compliment.

DEDICATING THE BELLS OF ST. PAUL'S

As the Bishop of London has explained in a letter to The Times, it would be a misnomer to call the service which took place in the belfry of St. Paul's Cathedral on Friday last "the blessing of the bells." "The bells themselves," says his lordship, "were not blessed. The service was of the same character with those in common use at the laying the first stone of churches, schools, and mission rooms, and indeed, at the consecration of churches and churchyards; and with that familiar 'grace before meals' which most of us have heard repeatedly from our youth, and which I trust to hear at times as long as I live—'Bless, O Lord, these Thy gifts to our use, and us to Thy service.' In all these cases the blessing asked is not on the material objects, but on the persons for whose use or advantage they are provided. If such prayers are superstitious, I gladly plead guilty to superstition." At the ordinary afternoon service in the Cathedral, which was attended by an immense congregation, the preacher, the Rev. J. V. Povah, discoursed on the duty of praise, and remarked on the circumstance that Wren's bell-tower had waited 200 years for its occupants, which would henceforth peal forth to summon worshippers, to celebrate the great festivities of the Church, to ring the old year out and the new year in, and to announce Royal accessions, marriages, and births. At the conclusion of this service a procession, headed by Dr. Stainer, the organist, and Mr. Martin, the sub-organist; and which included the Bishop of London, Bishop Claughton, Dean Church, Canon Gregory, Prebendaries the Rev. W. Cadman and the Rev. C. Mackenzie, several minor canons, and the choristers, was formed in the body of the Cathedral, and proceeded thence to the belfry tower. During the short dedicatory service the choir sang the "De Profundis," "Deus misereatur," "Afferte Domino," and "Laudate Dominum." The Lord's Prayer was recited by Dean Church, and the Bishop then said a number of special collects, in one of which reference was made to the silver trumpets which Moses ordered to be sounded at the time of sacrifice. The well-known hymn from "Hymns Ancient and Modern," "When morning gilds the skies," was then sung, after which the Bishop of London rang the first bell, the sound of which was immediately taken up by the ringers, members of the "Ancient Society of College Youths," all practical ringers, and, by the way, men well advanced in years, who stood in their shirt-sleeves upon boxes fixed to the floor, each man having one foot in a stout leathern loop secured to the box. There was no vibration of the masonry, and the unanimous opinion as to the tone of the bells was one of complete approval. A dense crowd had been waiting outside the Cathedral for three or four hours, and remained for some time listening to the music from the tower, but it gradually thinned, and had almost entirely dispersed before the ringers ceased from their labours, which they did not do until a thousand changes of "Stedman's Cinques" had been exceeded. It was remarkable that though the clash was very great on the ground immediately underneath, the sound in the middle of Ludgate Hill was quite muffled by the passing traffic, and at the beginning of of Fleet Street was almost wholly inaudible. Yet along the Embankment, as far the Cleopatra's Needle the peals were far more distinct even than in the immediate neighbourhood of the Cathedral. The bells are not connected with the clock, so that the hours and quarters will not be struck by them, and a carillon is still wanting; but they will be chimed by hand before each daily service, and upon the usual festive occasions. Their combined weight is thirteen tons, and they have cost 3,500*l*. The limited space in the belfry made it impossible for many invitations to be issued for the dedicatory service; but representatives of the City Companies and some other favoured persons were invited to the Chapter House, where they drank tea and coffee while listening to the chimes.

THE SEAMEN'S ORPHANAGE AT BRIXHAM

BRIXHAM is a thriving seaport town, situated near Dartmouth, and is celebrated in history as the place where William, Prince of Orange, landed in 1688; and also where the Bellerophon lay at anchor for some days with the great Napoleon on board, before taking that illustrious prisoner to the island of St. Helena. It is one of the largest fishing stations in England, and it has recently been the scene of a strike in that branch of industry; a compromise was, however, effected, and on Saturday the trawling fleet returned from its first trip since the settlement of of the dispute. There had been good catches of fish, and after the sale the fishermen and apprentice lads marched through the town, accompanied by a band of music. The British Seamen's Orphan Home for the western ports was established in 1870, for the purpose of making provision for the orphan sons of seamen, who are admitted to the Institution between the ages of eight and ten years; and fed, clothed, and educated until they reach the age of fourteen, when they are apprenticed to the merchant service. It is supported by voluntary contributions, and was for some time chiefly maintained by the liberality of the founder, the late Mr. W. Gibbs, of Tyntesfield, near Bristol, whose widow still contributes 100*l*. per annum to its funds. The Asylum, which has been recently enlarged, now affords accommodation for fifty boys. The Bishop of the Diocese is Patron of the Institution, and amongst the most liberal of its supporters are the Earl of Devon, Earl Fortescue, and the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe. One of the most interesting things in connection with the Home is the "Hans Busk" Life-boat, which was presented a short time ago by Captain Hans Busk, and, being manned by the senior boys, has already done real service to distressed vessels upon more than one occasion, and is also useful in giving the lads experience afloat. Another notable feature is the Torbay Mission to Seamen, which is affiliated to the Orphan Home, and has a church capable of seating a congregation of two hundred persons, especially intended for the use of seamen and fishermen, by whom it is well attended. The chaplain also visits the numerous vessels lying in the harbourage, the greater portion of whose crews do not come ashore, and during the past year more than two hundred vessels were thus visited, services being held on board many of them, and more than two thousand seamen supplied with wholesome and improving literature. Those who wish to aid in the good work which we have thus briefly noticed would do well to communicate with the Rev. Herbert H. Mayo, Rock House, Brixham, who is the Chaplain and Hon. Secretary of the Institution. Our views, which need no special description beyond that conveyed in their respective titles, are taken from photographs by Mr. Sugden of Exeter.

"COALY TYNE"

NOTED in history, renowned in ballad, the "Water of Tyne"—to use the phrase of Jock o' the Side—has in latter days had a reflected reputation—one derived in very large degree from the mineral field it traverses, the coals it carries, the vessels it bears, and the oarsmen it has trained. Its southern branch rises in Knaresdale and flows to Hexham, where it unites with a branch from the bleakness of the Borderland, and thus formed, the Tyne rolls an augmenting course by "canny Newcastle," under the soot-stained memorial of Bede, to Tynemouth, where the cold North Sea swallows it. It flows for twenty miles over coal measures, and thus for generations—before the coal trade of other districts had become developed—it was the water-way of the collier fleet. From the meeting of the waters until the vicinity of Blaydon is reached, the course of the Tyne is through a land like that of the lotos-eaters—"where all things always seem the same"—and where its course is through fields of green and by banks little pressed by industrial weights, but when the old boundary of the barges is reached, we come into a region classic in the annals of trade, and one which gives such a panorama in its course to the sea as perhaps no other river in England can. Sailing down the river from Stella Staith to Shields, right and left with little intermission there are wharves and works, collieries and chemical factories, ship-yards and staiths, coke ovens and colour works, furnaces and fuel works, potteries and paper mills, and a mass of other indications of the varied trades that have sprung up on coaly Tyne. It is only an industrial oasis is the strip of riverside from Blaydon to Scotswood; and below to the King's Meadows there is a resumption of the charming dulness of green villa-dotted fields; but Elswick takes up the strain which Whittier has sung, "Blast on blast the sooty smithy jars," and thence to the sea the Tyne becomes one long dock. The "long unlovely streets" of Newcastle stretch themselves; the stream is impinged on by lines of rails, by quays, works, and mills; and pressed by the craft that have come above bridge. By gas works and stations, by the primal engine factory of the world, by the noisy babulous quays, where the Tynesider has often, in Thackeray's words, "taken off its hat and huzzaed to success in life," whilst the rough northern burr has grown homely and pleasant, and then we are at one of the lions of Newcastle—its high level bridge.

It is a striking scene by day to leave the low stream and look down upon it from the heights of the bridge; to look on the dingy houses stretching in terraces down to the wharves that abut on the stream; on the factories where trade flings "its clamorous iron flail," on the river rolling its dark tide below the cloud of smoke down through a thick border of mills and drops, and on the barges and vessels that discharge or receive their cargoes there, as well as the noisy little tugs and river boats threading the intricacies of the stream. But at night the scene becomes spectacular; the course of the river would be hidden in the enveloping smoke were it not for the lamps that mark the streets by its side in waving lines of light; for the glow from furnaces; and the parti-coloured lights shining from quay, landing-stage, and mast, and reflected in the dark waters. Even then the "forges glow, the hammers all are ringing," down the river side; there is the rattling and rolling of trains over the bridge, and the reflection of their red-litten windows is flung down on the waters, whilst the roar of the traffic of the great town comes incessantly, though dulled by distance. Down from the bridge to the sea, by night or day, the route is one the very names of which bring up the memories of the victories of the Tyne. There are chemical works unsurpassed for extent in the world, probably, collectively; there, blast furnaces which, small and disused now, have been the pioneers in the building up of a great trade; there "Wallsend" recalls first the memories of those who built this, the commencement of an enduring momento, and then the name of a branch of an industry famous all the world over; yonder, Jarrow takes us back from its busy and bustling present, from the glare of its iron manufactories and the clang of its riveters to the lonely monk who, in its monastery, kept up through the crawling years the light that throws its gleam in on the dark ages he lived in. Then through the midst of timber yards and coal docks, of glass works and graving docks, beneath the shade of the green mound between Whitehill and Tynemouth, and we are approaching the spot where "glooms the dark broad sea."

It is not the sight of a "river clear as crystal," nor one like that whose banks the pilgrims trod "where were orchards, vineyards, and gardens, and their gates opened into the highway;" it is that of a commercial river which has few compeers. Except the Mersey, no other river in the world has so large an export trade. From it yearly nearly twenty thousand vessels sail, of increasing size, from it more than seven million tons of coal are shipped, while three thousand vessels enter with cargoes. It builds a hundred vessels yearly; it gives to the Customs a revenue approaching half-a million annually; whilst building on these varied supports, but with the ultimate foundation of its renowned coal deposits, there have grown up industrial centres such as make the banks of the Tyne workshop, factory, mart, and dwelling of the children of commerce. The old days of Pons Ælii are passed; the castle that standeth on Tyne is needed no longer "agayne the Scottes the country to defende," as the old chronicler phrased it, kings are no longer the residents of the Tyneside town, but another monarch there fixed his abode, and draws tribute from the stores of "bottled sunshine," and since then, increasingly, the Tyne has lost the pomp and circumstance of war, and known the victories of peace. And though the days of the picturesque and the quaint in black diamonds—the days when the "keel row" was more than a favourite local song, and "through Sandgate" more than a memory of the keelmen—though some of the once pleasant denes and little valleys about the town are brick-and-mortar-covered now, there is in our modern days that "jingling of the guinea" which heals many wounds, and which also gives to an enlarged population its daily bread, and to an expanded commerce its motive power.

BURGLARY appears to be a very profitable profession in America. Two burglars now in New Hampshire Prison state that they have had seventy successful professional "engagements" within the last eighteen months, and are now caught for the first time.

YOUNG ITALY is bent on the aggrandisement of the kingdom. The students of various Italian universities, schools, and colleges have formed a league with the object of acquiring the "Italian provinces not yet enjoying freedom," and style themselves "Figli d'Italia per le Provincie Irredente."

A NUMBER OF VALUABLE RAVENNA MOSAICS have been found in the vaults of the New Museum at Berlin. They had been placed there in cases early in 1848, and owing to the excitement caused by the revolution in that year the Museum authorities forgot them altogether until recently.

. NEW ENGLAND STUDENTS from some of the Eastern colleges, possessed of more ambition than means, have been hiring themselves out this season as waiters and maids at the hotels in the White Mountain region, in order to obtain sufficient money during the vacation to finish their education.

ELKS AS BEASTS OF BURDEN have been tried across the Atlantic. At a recent fair in Minnesota a splendid team of elks was shown which could draw a buggy with two passengers at the rate of sixteen miles an hour, and were so well broken that a woman might drive them. The experiment, however, has been made before, as in Sweden at one time elks were used to convey couriers, being able to travel over 200 miles per diem when attached to a sledge.

THE USE OF THE WHISTLE IN MILITARY OPERATIONS, in preference to the trumpet or bugle, is advocated by Brevet Lieut.-Colonel Twentyman, of the 19th Hussars, who has published a pamphlet containing some brief instructions on the subject. Lieut.-Colonel Twentyman alleges that when in close proximity with the enemy, or in night surprises, a trumpet or bugle-call frequently gives the alarm, while the whistle is quite as effective, and far less noticeable.

BRITISH TRAVELLERS ON FRENCH RAILWAYS have long chafed at the objectionable Continental custom of keeping passengers cooped up in waiting-rooms to stare angrily at the empty train outside and only letting them out at the last moment to struggle for their seats. The Chemin de Fer de l'Est, however, has reformed its ways, and now allows passengers on the platform as soon as they have taken their tickets. It is to be hoped that the other lines will follow this good example.

THE ANIMALS AT THE NEW YORK MENAGERIE in Central Park had a narrow escape from drowning during a recent storm, the menagerie, which lies in a hollow, being flooded by the water from the higher lands. The bears, foxes, wolves, and jackals all had to swim for their lives, the water rising high in their dens, while the giraffe stood quietly feeding as the water gradually crept up to its back. The other animals kept up a mournful chorus of howls and grunts, but the sea-lions heartily enjoyed their impromptu bath. Their tank was broken by the flood, and the creatures escaped into the enclosure, where they paddled about, cleverly evading their keepers, who were several times knocked down in the water by a sudden dash of their lively charges.

THE INDIAN PRACTICE OF CHILD MARRIAGE is gradually encountering a steady opposition as civilisation and education spread among Hindoo circles. Thus a "marriage pledge," in the place of the temperance pledge, was recently instituted at a Calcutta meeting, and twenty-five native students at once signed the "pledge." The document runs as follows:—"Deeply impressed with the pernicious character of the custom of child-marriage and the evils which have followed in its train, convinced of the solemn duty I owe to myself and my countrymen to discourage a custom so prejudicial to the best interests of my countrymen, I hereby solemnly declare that I will not marry nor allow myself to be given in marriage, till I have completed the age of twenty-one years, my present age being——."

THE LADIES' CHRISTIAN HOMES FOR DEAF AND DUMB CHILDREN at 74, Pentonville Road and 1, Victoria Park Square, have proved so valuable in the North and East of London that it is greatly wished to establish similar homes in the West and South of the metropolis, and funds are thus urgently needed. These homes are intended to admit those poor children who can be taught by the system of the School Board but live too far away to attend the schools. The children are accordingly boarded from Monday till Friday, but it is now proposed to take as permanent boarders such deaf and dumb children as have no proper homes, in order to teach them on the oral system. Donations to be sent to the Rev. W. Stainer, Treasurer, Avenue House,, Gow Road, Victoria Park, E., or to Mr. W. J. H. Yates, Assistant Secretary, 74, Pentonville Road.

A MOMENTOUS DECISION—SHERE ALI DICTATING HIS REPLY TO THE BRITISH VICEROY

FROM A SKETCH NOT BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST

Topics of the Week

THE CZAR'S MESSAGE.——In his Guildhall speech Lord Beaconsfield was very hard on the people who had ventured to say that the Treaty of Berlin was in danger. But if it was always quite safe, why should the Czar offer a solemn assurance that he means to abide by his engagements? A man who makes a promise, and never dreams of breaking it, rarely thinks it necessary or desirable to boast of his honesty. We have all along maintained that Russia was not in a position to fight for the purpose of overturning the settlement of Berlin. But without wishing to go to war, she might hope by persistent audacity to get the better of Europe. Austria being occupied in Bosnia, and England in Afghanistan, it seemed to her that a magnificent opportunity had offered itself; and that she meant to take some advantage of it was proved by the facts that her troops halted midway between Constantinople and Adrianople, that an artificial agitation was got up among the Bulgarians against the Berlin Treaty, and that a warlike tone was suddenly adopted by the inspired press of Moscow and St. Petersburg. It is tolerably certain that Russia received some plain hints as to the manner in which her policy was regarded by those whom it most nearly concerned. The English Government can hardly have failed to let the Czar know what the Premier openly proclaimed last Saturday: that we can make no more concessions, and that if the Treaty of Berlin is broken the result must be war. Austria, also, seems to have shown pretty distinctly that she would not be a mere onlooker if the Russian troops did not take themselves off by the time appointed; and it was clear to all the world that the Oriental policy of France could not, under all circumstances, be a purely negative one. To these considerations it must be added that the mission of M. Greig to the European capitals revealed to Russia the utter hopelessness of her financial position. Taking all things into account, it is wonderful that Russia should have done so much to provoke hostilities; and her audacity ought to be a warning to Europe not even yet to trust to her fair words. She is labouring for a magnificent prize, and will miss no opportunity of grasping at it. The task of England ought to be to hasten her retreat not only by resolutely confronting her, but by removing everything that could give her a pretext for unscrupulous action. There is, for instance, the Greek demand for a rectification of frontier. If this is unsatisfied war may break out in spite of us, and Russia will then have a splendid field for intrigue. Fortunately the activity of M. Waddington gives the British Government an excellent chance of settling the question without serious difficulty.

THE LOSS OF THE "PRINCESS ALICE."——This lamentable accident, the most serious, perhaps, as regards the number of victims which the metropolis has ever experienced, for many days aroused the most intense interest. Gradually, however, as always happens, that interest slackened, and few persons, probably, except those who had friends among the lost, or who were specially concerned with river traffic, cared to read and digest the voluminous evidence respectively adduced before the Coroner and the Board of Trade Court. But now that the latter body has issued its Report, public interest is reawakened, and with good reason, for that report contains suggestions which, if properly attended to, ought to render such collisions far less probable in the future than they have been in the past. We use the word "probable" because in actual fact cases of serious collision have been very rare. No doubt there have been numerous cases of hairbreadth escapes—escapes of which passengers have seldom been aware; nevertheless, the immunity from accident which existed up to the time of the Princess Alice tragedy proves no small amount of skill on the part of those persons who are engaged in navigating vessels on the river, and this skill was, perhaps, none the less diligently exercised because little regard was paid to official regulations. We think it is but fair to remember this, that in spite of the crowded state of the Thames, in spite of the hulks and barges, in spite of the fogs, and of the difficulty of distinguishing between lights ashore and lights afloat, Londoners did undoubtedly, up to that fatal Third of September, regard river travelling as the safest kind of travelling. They experienced few qualms—except those arising from fear of sea-sickness—when embarking on board the boat, whereas the idea of collision could scarcely fail to be absent from the mind of the passenger by excursion train. Henceforward this sweet sense of security will no longer be felt, and, for generations to come, holiday voyagers on the lower Thames will remember the Princess Alice. Yet we may reasonably hope that the chances of accident will have been sensibly lessened by the teaching of this calamity. If a clear and intelligible rule of the road is not only promulgated but enforced; if the fairway is made as ample as possible by the removal of stationary hulks, and by the prohibition (above Gravesend) of tide-borne barges; if either the monopoly of the Watermen's Company is put to an end, or the freemen of that Company are practically tested before being allowed to serve on board river boats; and if, finally, though there is no mention of this in the Report, the Board of Trade and the Conservancy Board take care between them that their own rules are strictly observed, and that pleasure-steamers are properly built, well-manned, and not overcrowded; the Thames may still, in spite of the constant increase of traffic, remain one of the safest thoroughfares in the world.

GOLD IN INDIA.——It is announced that a district in the Madras Presidency is "highly auriferous," and as the announcement is made, after careful investigation, by so eminent an authority as Mr. Brough Smyth, we may assume that it is not without genuine foundation. The fact is likely to be of considerable importance to India. Nothing attracts an adventurous class of workmen like the chance of finding gold, and if the news now published should be confirmed, multitudes of diggers are likely to stream into India from Australia and from England. For three months in the year the district is said to be "somewhat feverish," but during the remaining nine it is "healthy and pleasant for Europeans." A large supply of gold would enable India, if she chose, to adopt a gold currency, and it is generally agreed that if she were in a position to do so she would enter upon a new career of prosperity. This could not be for some time; but in the mean time wealth and fresh energy would be brought into the country by the influx of capitalists and labourers. It is true that "diggings" do not tend, in the first instance, to exalt the moral ideals of a community; they are apt, on the contrary, to bring together a horde of sorry rascals who are a curse to themselves and everybody connected with them. But honest labourers also come, many of whom settle in the country, and give an impetus to its agriculture and manufactures. This, we believe, has been the case in South Africa, to which Cape diamonds have been the means of bringing a large number of persons who are now prosperous farmers. India presents, in many respects, a far more promising field than South Africa. Half its resources are still unknown, and those which we do know have been very inefficiently cultivated. It probably needs only skilled labour and capital to become one of the richest lands in the world.

CABMEN IN COUNCIL.——The British cab-drivers have hardly yet reached the point of organisation attained by their Parisian brethren, who have actually started a weekly journal for the better ventilation of their grievances, still we are glad to see that they have held a Conference, which appears to have been of a thoroughly representative character, inasmuch as it was attended by delegates from every district of the metropolis, from Manchester, and from several other towns. With two of the resolutions which these worthies passed unanimously we are unable to agree. We all like to try and reform other people rather than ourselves, and cabby holds that two classes which especially need reform are the stipendiary magistrates and the police. Now for a good many years past we have watched the behaviour of our London magistrates in regard to cab cases, and we are bound to say that, as a rule, if they have shown a leaning, it has been towards the driver rather than towards the fare. Of the conduct of the police we cannot of course speak so confidently, and no doubt there are individual cases of tyranny and meddlesomeness, still we doubt if the force would be improved by being brought under the direct control of the ratepayers. The amendment and consolidation of the cab laws, and the establishment of a civil court for licensing and superintending hackney carriages, is a far more practical and interesting matter. With regard to the extremely difficult question of fares, we have always maintained that, considering the price of horse flesh and horse feed, the present scale is too low. The compulsory shilling for any distance under two miles was no additional boon to the drivers, because it had always been exacted, few persons (except perhaps the redoubtable Mrs. Prodgers) venturing to tender a sixpenny fare. Then the fixing of the radius at Charing Cross instead of at a point further east gives the comparatively wealthy cab-user of the West an unfair advantage over his fellow citizen Eastwards. One reason why cabmen are often so exorbitant, especially towards midnight, is that they have done very badly during the day, and are in danger of having nothing left for themselves after paying for the hire of horse and vehicle. Altogether, we believe that cabby has been over-regulated and over-legislated for. Why not try the freedom of contract system for a twelvemonth, and, if it should prove utterly intolerable, afterwards revert to the old plan? Our own belief is, that the public would get better drivers, better cabs, and better horses than they ever got before.

AMERICA AND ENGLAND.——The Americans have not shown a friendly disposition in raising at the present crisis the trumpery question about which Mr. Evarts has been writing valiant despatches. Surely it would have been a more manly policy had he and his colleagues waited until we were in a position to examine their demands in a calm and impartial spirit. America, however, is fond of gaining an occasional triumph over the Old Country, and we have never found her very scrupulous in the means she adopts to make us "knuckle under." It is hard to understand her anger in the present instance. If the authorities in Newfoundland find it desirable to make Sunday a close day to the native fishermen, what possible hardship can it be to the Americans to submit to the rule? They can hardly expect to enjoy advantages superior to the population to which the fisheries naturally belong. We hope the English Government, while perfectly willing to consider the American arguments, will show no disposition to yield without full proof of the justice of the claim now made. England has been far too ready in the past to let the United States have everything their own way, and the sole result has been a steady increase of arrogance in their mode of treating us. As to the threat that, if we do not give in, the amount of the Halifax award will be withheld, it need only be said that the money can without much difficulty be dispensed with. But what other nation would be guilty of such incredible meanness as to make a threat of this kind? What has the Halifax award to do with this new dispute? If fresh arbitration is wanted, by all means let us have it; but it is obvious that each case ought to be judged on its merits, and that we should be paid what is our due whether or not we have been guilty of offence in connection with a wholly different matter. We are glad to see that Lord Salisbury has adopted a firm tone in regard to this point, and that the latest intention of the Americans is to pay the money "under protest." But they can hardly undo the harm caused by their reckless conduct. What Power will hereafter care to submit a dispute to an arbitrator, if there is a chance of an ignoble evasion of the decision by one of the parties to the controversy?

A ROWDY DISTRICT.——In no foreign capital would the municipal authorities allow such scenes of disorder to occur, as frequently, we may say almost every night, occur in the region round about the Haymarket. Sometimes the rowdyism blossoms into downright riot, and then the charges thence accruing at the police courts are reported in the papers. What makes the matter worse is that the crowd by whom these disorders are committed is for the most part a well-dressed crowd. We say nothing here of the female element of this motley gathering, but among the males present there are to be found some of the greatest scoundrels in London. But although these people often profit by the rows, they do not, as a rule, make the rows, for it is not their game to attract the attention of the police too closely. The rows are almost invariably made by foolish young men of respectable position, who have taken more drink than is good for them, and who visit this midnight Alsatia for the express purpose of having a "lark." The lark begins in shoving people off the footway or knocking policemen's helmets off, and too often ends in one or more of the company of viveurs (usually the greenest and least guilty) being "run in" to Vine Street police station. Perhaps the closing of the Argyll Rooms may hereafter make the neighbourhood quieter, but if not, we recommend that all the places of entertainment in the neighbourhood, the theatres and music-halls—as far as their refreshment licenses are concerned—and all the public houses within the infected district, should be compelled to close an hour earlier than they now do. The absence of any alcoholic stimulus obtainable close at hand would have a wonderfully sobering effect, for all these disorders are committed under the exciting influence of "Dutch courage."

"A PLACE OF ARMS."——The Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Cross have repeatedly dwelt on the moral effect which the British administration of Cyprus is likely to exert on Asia Minor. Lord Beaconsfield, in his great speech, although he referred to this aspect of the question, plainly stated that it was as "a place of arms" that Cyprus was valuable to us. And as a place of arms it might, we think, be of much higher worth than has hitherto been generally recognised. Suppose it were made the first of a line of communications stretching down the Euphrates Valley to the Persian Gulf? In that case Russia would be unable to march on Constantinople through Asia Minor, for her flank would be open to our attack. What is still more important, she could not send an expedition through Persia to India, since her flank would again be exposed to us, and we could without difficulty cut off her army from its base of operations. Thus if Cyprus is turned to proper advantage, instead of being the utterly useless place it has so often been called, it might be the means of saving us from our two greatest perils. For that there is some danger of Russia trying to make the Caucasus a starting-point both for Constantinople and India, is, we think, proved by her anxiety to get hold of the strongholds of Asia Minor. Hence her intense bitterness respecting our acquisition of Cyprus, to which she has attached far more importance than the other European Powers. It is tolerably certain, therefore, that we have not yet heard the last of what England proposes to do in the Asiatic possessions of the Porte. Besides civil reforms there are likely to be important military preparations. The Prime Minister alluded to the new fortifications in Erzeroum; he might probably, if he had chosen, have spoken of other and equally important schemes in which we are directly interested. Whatever the Porte may think of our anxiety about its subjects, it will throw no difficulty in the way of even the largest plans for warding off future Russian attacks. And if Great Britain were to give active help by aiding in the creation of the much talked-of Euphrates Valley Railway, she would do no more than might be expected of her, for she would merely be acting on the instinct of self-preservation.

CHEMISTS AND APOTHECARIES.—The Society of Apothecaries has thus far been defeated in its attempt to recover a penalty from a chemist for examining patients medically, without being duly certificated. As the case in question was selected as a "test-case," there will probably be an appeal to a higher tribunal; but, if such a course is followed, we trust Baron Pollock's decision will be upheld, because it seems to us to be based not merely on a technical point of law, but on humanity and common sense. Hitherto, and for generations past, the chemist has, as far as minor ailments are concerned, been emphatically the poor man's doctor, and to prohibit him from looking into a patient's throat before handing him a cough mixture would be to deprive the chemist of one of his most useful functions. And the fact remains that the chemist of long standing, albeit not certificated, possesses no small skill as a healer, because so many ailing persons visit him, and so many prescriptions pass through his hands. Nor do we believe that certificated men lose anything by the services he renders; on the contrary, if the chemist were deprived of these humble clients, there would only be a greater crowd of sick persons at the public dispensaries, and in the out-patients' waiting-rooms of the hospitals.

THE CAPTIVE BALLOON AT PARIS

WE have already in a previous number (No. 455, Aug. 17, 1878) illustrated and described the main features of M. Giffard's monster balloon which, for the past few months, has occupied the courtyard of the Tuileries at Paris, and we now depict a few of the incidents which our special artist has witnessed during an ascent. Notwithstanding the somewhat high price charged (twenty francs) for each person who wished to ascend, there have been no lack of applicants, and as the balloon has frequently made from ten to fourteen ascents a day, carrying upwards of thirty people each trip, the undertaking may be fairly pronounced a commercial as well as a popular success. That it has been a popular success the crowds which have thronged the enclosure, to which people were admitted on payment of a franc, have amply testified. Various Royal personages have made the ascent, amongst others the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Crown Prince and Princess of Denmark, who all went up in one party—a fact which raises the surmise as to what would have happened had some evil-disposed Republican of Socialistic tendencies severed the rope connecting the balloon with mother earth. Don Carlos also has made an aerial trip; while the present theatrical diva of Paris, Mdlle. Sarah Bernhardt, for some time made a daily practice of making the ascent, so beneficial to her health did she find that mode of taking the air. To turn to our illustrations, the car of the balloon is attained by means of a gangway, where, as a rule, the more timid of the fair sex first began to express their fear. The sensation felt at starting is that of the earth receding rather than of the balloon ascending, and no disagreeable feeling is experienced, while the prospect which opens out as the distance increases from the ground is, when no fog or mist prevails, beyond description, all Paris and its picturesque environs lying beneath the spectator, mapped out in an unmatched "bird's-eye view." Some meteorologically inclined savants are wont to ascend laden with a car of instruments in order to register the height attained, and the temperature, humidity, and other various characteristics of the air at so unusual an altitude; while the sybarites of the boulevard are careful to bring [illegible] lest the keen air should have any unfavourable effect upon their delicate constitutions.

BEFORE THE MAGISTRATE—"UNFIT FOR WORK"

IT is very doubtful whether in this country horseflesh will ever become—like beef, pork, or mutton—a favourite article of human food. Even in France, where, it may be said without offence, people are less particular about the quality of their meat, because its native flavour is so cunningly disguised by the culinary art, even in that paradise of cooks, horseflesh holds but a precarious footing, and there is no reason to suppose that the flesh of the horses consumed in Paris by human beings is any better than that which in this country is disposed of as cats' meat. Most of those persons who wish well to their fellow creatures would rejoice if hippophagy became really popular, not so much because the stock of animal food in the world would be thereby increased, as because the development of such a taste would prove an enormous boon to the horse tribe generally. If horses were eaten as bullocks and sheep are, they would be spared the miseries which now almost invariably embitter their declining years. As soon as the prime of life was passed, they would be liberally fed, lightly worked, and put to death in a moment while in the enjoyment of all their faculties. At present the career of a horse is almost always downwards, and as he gets older he gradually exchanges good feeding, caresses, and easy work, for semi-starvation, blows, and grinding labour. His last master is generally his worst master—some callous wretch, himself steeped in poverty, who reckons that he can screw a few pounds' worth of work out of the diseased, worn-out creature, before the last scene of all is reached in the knacker's yard. It is at this stage of their career that horses make the acquaintance of police magistrates as represented in our engraving. A constable, perhaps that particular City constable who has such an eye for a horse, has detected the poor wretch's lameness, and now the magistrate, fortified by the opinion of the vet., who is putting on the bandage, has pronounced the sentence, "Unfit for work." A merciful decision, albeit it is a condemnation to death. Surely of all the lower animals, considering their service to man, and their inconsiderate treatment, horses most deserve the enjoyment of a future state. Why may not the sleep of death in their case be succeeded by a glorious awakening in prairies clothed with the sweetest grass, where the delight of existence will be intensified by a dim recollection of previous hardships?

MACCLESFIELD FREE LIBRARY

THIS building may be taken as a good architectural sample of these useful institutions, the number of which it is hoped will so increase as to leave no town of any importance without a free library and reading-room. Macclesfield having several times refused to adopt the Free Libraries Act, Mr. David Chadwick, M.P., one of the members for the borough and a native of the town, offered to erect a suitable building, and give 10,000 volumes of books, if the Corporation would accept it and keep it open free for ever. The building consists of a lofty public reading-room 45 feet by 30 feet, and a library of the same dimensions, with committee and other rooms. The style is Gothic of the Victorian period, and it is built of stone from the neighbouring Cheshire quarries, the pillars inside and outside being of polished granite. The carvings include heads of Shakespeare and Milton, and the arms of the donor and of the borough. The interior fittings are oak. The architect was Mr. James Stevens, and the builders Messrs. Neill and Sons. The cost of the land, buildings, and fittings, and of 10,000 volumes of books, together with sundry contingent expenses, was about 7,000*l.* The average number of books issued has been upwards of 1,000 volumes weekly, and the average number attending the reading-rooms has been nearly 1,500 weekly. A life-size portrait of Mr. Chadwick, painted by Mr. Norbury, of Liverpool, the result of a public subscription, was last month placed in the Free Library.

SOUTH AFRICAN SKETCHES—"PITCHING CAMP"

BY last accounts, the Perie Bush is unoccupied by troops, the Hottentots having been withdrawn from the positions held by them there, and disbanded. The sketch represents these troops arriving on their camping ground and pitching tents. The name "Hottentot," it may be observed, is given by men of European origin to that singular race of people, supposed to be descended from the aborigines of South Africa, who now dwell in and about the Cape settlements. Their language has a peculiar clicking sound, and has been compared to the clucking of a hen when laying an egg. Hence the Dutch styled them Hot-en-tot (Hot and tot), indicating thereby the way in which they talked. Dampier calls them the Hodmadods. They are not negroes, but are more akin to Mongolians, having broad foreheads, high cheek-bones, oblique eyes, and a dirty olive-coloured complexion. They live in kraals or villages, consisting of a number of circular huts like beehives. They show great skill in the management of oxen and sheep, and are also addicted to the chase, in which they use poisoned arrows, javelins, and spears. No uncultivated people appear to have received the instruction of the Moravian missionaries more readily than the Hottentots, or to have been more fully reclaimed and civilised. Under the Dutch rule they became the absolute slaves of the Boers. From this they were rescued by the humane policy of the British Government, and, as free labourers, they make excellent herdsmen and drovers.

DEPARTURE OF THE NEW GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA

ON Thursday the Marquis of Lorne, accompanied by H.R.H. the Princess Louise and suite, left the Mersey for Canada, after having received farewell addresses from the Liverpool Corporation and Chamber of Commerce. The steamship Sarmatian, which has been specially chartered for the voyage, belongs to the Allan Line, and is one of the finest passenger vessels in the world. She was built at Greenock about six years ago, is very strong, and is divided into seven water-tight compartments. She is an excellent sea-boat, being very steady, and capable of steaming fourteen knots an hour with ease. The deck saloon is very handsomely decorated and furnished, and the ladies' cabins have been converted into a boudoir for the Princess, whose sleeping cabin is fitted with a berth of novel construction, the object of which is to prevent the possibility of sea-sickness. The pillows throughout the vessel, and on board all the Allan steamers, are life-buoys, being stuffed with a material nearly as soft as feathers, and lighter than cork. Two pillows are provided for each bed, and they can be adjusted as a life-preserver in less than one minute. The Sarmatian has already played a conspicuous part as a Government Transport Ship. She conveyed the 42nd Highlanders (Black Watch) to the West Coast of Africa during the Ashantee War, and brought home the despatch which gave the first official intelligence of the fall of Coomassie. Captain Aird, the commander, relates with much pride the circumstance, which seemed to him no less amusing than it was important, of being formally handed a small letter containing the despatch, which he was ordered at once to carry [illegible], a distance of three thousand miles, as the sole cargo of his big ship. The Sarmatian will have no convoy across the Atlantic, but H.M.S. [illegible] is to meet her at some distance from the Canadian shore, and on her arrival at Halifax she will be welcomed by the whole Anglo-American squadron, which will escort her into the harbour. The new Governor General, after staying two days at Halifax, will go straight through to Montreal, where, on St. Andrew's Day, a

THE FIRE AT MAYNOOTH COLLEGE

THE fire which occurred on the 1st inst. at Maynooth College, and which at one time threatened to destroy the whole building, is supposed to have originated from the overheating of a stove-pipe. It broke out about 8 A.M. in the western wing, the occupants of which had barely time to escape. The students, some 500 in number, rushed en masse to the Library, and worked hard to save its contents, which they fortunately succeeded in doing, as some of the books could never have been replaced. The Lord Mayor of Dublin, on receiving a telegram, immediately despatched a steam fire engine and ten men, breaking through the rule that the Brigade should never leave the city, in consideration of the College being a national institution. Delay was, however, caused by the telegraph service being out of order, and the difficulty of getting horses to draw the engine from the railway station. The students had, however, besides rescuing the valuables, done good service in keeping the flames in check by means of a hand engine and some water buckets, but when the Dublin engine arrived the whole of the wing was in flames, and it was only after four hours' arduous labour that the fire was subdued. Our engraving, which is from a photograph by Messrs. Chancellor and Son of Sackville Street, Dublin, shows the condition of things on the day after the catastrophe. It will be seen that the whole of the western wing is in ruins, and in addition to this much valuable furniture has been destroyed, many of the students losing all their belongings. There was, however, no truth in the rumour that several persons were injured, and that one student was killed, the fact being that no one received the slightest injury. The College was established in 1795 by an Act of the Irish Parliament to provide for the education of the Irish Roman Catholic clergy, but its endowment was withdrawn under the Irish Church Act of 1871. It was repaired and enlarged in 1860.

HOME.

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.——Favoured by fine weather, the outdoor portion of the Civic festivities was a perfect success, albeit the procession was nothing like so gorgeous as that of last year. The streets in the Ward of Bridge, to which the new Chief Magistrate belongs, were tastefully decorated by Messrs. Defries, the chief feature being London Bridge itself, which was turned for the nonce into a floral avenue, at each end of which a graceful arch of evergreens spanned the roadway. Along the edge of the kerb were rows of dwarf cypress trees in stands, and it is a remarkable thing that, directly the procession had passed, the crowd "went for" these trees, and quickly denuded every one of them of its branches, so that in the afternoon the singular spectacle of a double row of naked and unsightly poles presented itself. We know not whether to attribute this freak to the inherent love of mischief for mischief's sake, for which our countrymen have such an unenviable notoriety, or whether it might not possibly be the outcome of some occult political feeling in the minds of the destroyers, nor can we explain the apparent inaction of the police. The only novelty in the procession itself was a lifeboat fully manned and equipped, and, although the day was very gusty around our coasts, we have not learnt that the services of this particular boat were required at its station. At Westminster, the Lord Mayor received the congratulations of the Exchequer Barons, Lord Chief Baron Kelly remarking in the course of his speech that, though he had sometimes been censured by a few, for touching upon political subjects, he had yet to learn that upon such an occasion a judge was forbidden to call deep and earnest attention to matters which imperil the commercial interests of the country. He had read with burning indignation the report of the Rhodope Commission, and he considered it to be the duty of England, Germany, Austria, and France to hasten at once to rescue the victims of Russian barbarity. Russia was disregarding, evading, and he might almost say violating and setting at nought the Treaty of Berlin. If we could stop her encroachments by negotiation, we should escape a mighty evil; but if not, we must defy her to meet us in the field. The return of the procession to the City was welcomed with shouts and cheers by the crowds who had thronged the streets all day. The banquet at the Guildhall—about which, by the way, there has been some grumbling in consequence of the old order of precedence at the tables being in some degree departed from, and also the non-invitation of the majority of the representatives of the Sunday newspapers—was served with customary magnificence. The event of the evening was of course Lord Beaconsfield's speech, which dealt mainly with the Berlin Treaty, the execution of which, he contended, was making satisfactory progress, considering that only a third of the time, agreed upon for carrying out its provisions, had elapsed. He repudiated the idea that any of the Powers wished to evade its engagements, spoke contemptuously of the "gossip of subalterns of different States," and declared that the world was governed by sovereigns and statesmen, not by anonymous paragraphists or the "harebrained chatter of irresponsible frivolity." With regard to Afghanistan, the Administration had not considered that an invasion of India on its North-Western frontier was practicable; but the frontier was a haphazard and an unscientific one, and its rectification had been the subject of deliberation under various Viceroys and different Ministries. Such measures had now been taken as would effect the object required, and the North-Western frontier would soon cease to be a source of anxiety. If Asia Minor were in the possession of a very weak or a very powerful State, an adequate force might advance through Persia, and menace India, and therefore the Convention with Turkey had been entered into, in order that Asia Minor might remain in the possession of our ally. Cyprus would be no burden to this country, and its administration would exercise a most beneficial influence on the contiguous dominions of the Sultan. With regard to statements which had been made pointing to the decline of England, her fate was in her own hands, and while she retained the courage of her forefathers there would never be any diminution of her power.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——Lord Northbrook, speaking on Monday at a banquet given to the ex-Mayor of Winchester, said that he was responsible for the settlement of some of the difficulties which arose in 1876 between the Khan of Khelat and his nobles, but he had always been opposed to the occupation of Quettah, and to other suggestions which had been made for the rectification of the North-Western frontier. He believed that our present frontier was unassailable, and to make any further advance into Afghanistan would be unwise. Our greatest difficulty was in dealing with the independent tribes, and the further we advanced the greater this difficulty would become.—On the same day, Mr. Blake, M.P. for Leominster, addressing his constituents, laid a heavy indictment against Lord Beaconsfield. He was the greatest troubler of England and of Europe, he abused the prerogative of the Crown, ignored Parliament, favoured despotism, restrained liberty, broke European law by secret treaties, duplicity, and double dealing; sacrificed the national honour, deceived Turkey, betrayed Greece, insulted friendly Powers, stimulated the war feeling, squandered the revenue, increased taxation, depressed trade, upheld ecclesiastical intolerance, and opposed all popular reforms. To prevent further national disaster, the country should petition the Queen for his instant dismissal, and if necessary to summon a new Parliament.—On Tuesday, Mr. Fawcett, M.P., speaking at Bethnal Green, condemned the policy of the Government as one of obscurity and mystification, and said that the new doctrine of having things decided for the people, and not by them as a self-governed nation, was a farce and an empty mockery. All military commanders and every Viceroy who preceded Lord Lytton were opposed to an extension of the Indian frontier, and their opinion was overwhelming when compared with the anonymous military authorities to whom the defenders of the Government were constantly referring. It had been truly said that England's real trouble would begin as soon as she had Cabul at her feet.—Mr. Gladstone, in a long letter to the Bedford Liberal Association, commenting on Lord Beaconsfield's speech on Saturday last, says that "rectification of frontier" is only the diplomatic phrase for annexation of territory. He considers that each new Ministerial manifesto discloses fresh reason for disquietude.—The Colston Anniversary Dinners were held at Bristol on Wednesday. At the Liberal banquet Lord Carlingford objected to the entire Eastern Policy of Government, and asked why they had not seen the Berlin Treaty carried out before "firing off an embassy" at the head of the Ameer of Cabul. At the Conservative gathering Mr. R. Plunkett, M.P., spoke of the obstruction in the House of Commons last session; the Duke of Beaufort declared his belief that the provisions of the Berlin Treaty would be loyally carried out; and Lord H. Thynne, M.P., dealt with the depression in trade, much of which he thought might have resulted from Liberal legislation during the last forty years.—The Liberals of Bristol have adopted a resolution urging the Government to make strenuous efforts to secure a peaceful solution of the Afghan difficulty.—The dissension amongst the Home Rulers goes on as briskly as ever. Mr. Butt has issued a manifesto (the first of a series, in which he intends to deal with the whole question in detail). He again repeats that he will resign his seat rather than yield, and warns his opponents that if the Irish party is once broken up, the work of reconstruction will be long and weary, if not impossible. To this Mr. O'Connor Power replies that Mr. Butt's policy has irretrievably failed, and Mr. Parnell, while denying that he and his friends desire the expulsion of Mr. Butt and some of his supporters from Parliament, alleges that the "energetic party" is the only one having a chance of success in Irish affairs. —Mr. Parnell is stated to have received from the Fenian Brotherhood of New York, now revived under the secretaryship of the once famous James Stephens, an offer of assistance pecuniary "and otherwise" in a constitutional but aggressive policy in Ireland.—On Wednesday the Irish Society of London held a meeting to congratulate the Fenians Clancy and Aheane upon their release.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Board of Trade Report on the loss of the Princess Alice, issued on Saturday, attributes the disaster entirely to that vessel not porting her helm, but no personal blame is attached to any of her crew. Various recommendations are made for improving the navigation of the river, and on these some remarks will be found in our "Topics of the Week." The inquest was concluded on Wednesday, the coroner asking the jury to say which vessel was to blame, and whether the other contributed at all, culpably or accidentally, to the collision, and also, whichever vessel was in fault, whether "the cause originated wilfully, criminally, or culpably; or from gross negligence; or from pure accident." The jury retired at five o'clock, and during the night the coroner was several times called in to explain legal points to them. He drafted no fewer than four verdicts, to none of which they would agree; but at 7.30 A.M. on Thursday a decision was arrived at by 15 votes to 4 to the effect that the collision was not wilful, that the Bywell Castle did not take the necessary precautions in time, and that the Princess Alice contributed to the collision by not stopping and going astern. A rider was added declaring that the Princess Alice was seaworthy but not efficiently manned, that she carried more passengers than was prudent, and that the means of saving life were insufficient.—The water in the Abercarne Colliery is now sufficiently reduced to allow explorers to enter the workings. Five bodies were recovered on Saturday last.—The weather during the past week has been very severe. Heavy snowstorms have fallen in Scotland and some parts of England, and violent gales have been experienced around the coast, where many wrecks, some of them attended by loss of life, have occurred. Inland, the railway and road traffic has been greatly impeded by the snow, and much damage has been done to property by the violence of the wind. The cold has been most intense; on Tuesday, at Bristol, a farmer's wife, who had left home hale and hearty, was found dead in her market-cart from exposure.—The wages' agitation amongst the Kent and Sussex farm-labourers is increasing. On Monday a great meeting is to be held at Maidstone, to be followed next day by one at Woolwich, whence the labourers are to march on Wednesday to London, and after passing through the City with banners and music, they will hold a great "demonstration" in Exeter Hall. The Executive Committee have received offers of grants of land from the Government of Canada and South Australia.

THEATRES

A NEW romantic play in five acts, entitled A Republican Marriage, was produced on Saturday last at a morning performance at the OLYMPIC Theatre, where the performance will be repeated to-day. The piece is understood to be the work of a lady who has had no previous experience of writing for the stage; but it is nevertheless constructed with a good deal of skill, and, in spite of many obvious defects, it has the merit of unfolding an interesting plot, and, what is rarer still, the author is able to keep the main issue of her story constantly in the mind of her audience. A slight resemblance between the theme of A Republican Marriage, and that of Lord Lytton's Lady of Lyons has been pointed out, and, so far as regards the circumstance that in both plays a poor—or at least a presumptively poor—hero contrives to marry an aristocratic heroine, and endeavours afterwards to soothe her offended feelings by generous forbearance and respectful treatment, the observation is just enough. But there is little more than this. Henri Duval, the hero of the new play, simply marries Marie de Courcelles to save her from a massacre during the Reign of Terror—a somewhat perilous proceeding for a hitherto unsuspected Republican. His act therefore has nothing of the mean and base complexion which not even the rhetorical speeches assigned to Claude Melnotte can make us forget. On the other hand, the writer certainly fails to extract from the situation the strength of which it might be capable in more experienced hands. Henri treats his reluctant bride in a style of good tempered but rather inconsiderate banter, chiefly à propos of her ignorance of domestic duties; and the young lady on her side exhibits no consciousness whatever of the generous nature by which her deliverer has been actuated in rescuing her—certainly at great risk to himself—from certain destruction. But Henri and Marie are not a common hero and heroine. Each has a certain vein of pleasantry even under difficulties and distress; together with a dash of self-will which at least relieve them from the charge of insipidity. All this is very cleverly depicted, and the little domestic scenes between them, and the gradual development of a sincere affection under the cruel persecutions they suffer at the hands of a designing Republican rival, undoubtedly inspire interest in the audience. In the end the young lady, restored to her family, is exhibited as cherishing an unabated regard for her quasi-husband, and a resolute determination not to acquiesce in the brilliant marriage which her friends, who are applying for a divorce, have devised for her, until the discovery that her eligible lover is no other than Henri in disguise, and that Henri is in fact not an humble but an aristocratic admirer, furnishes a happy dénouement. Miss Marion Terry plays the part of the heroine with much refinement and true tenderness; and no better representative of the generous impulsive Henri than Mr. Neville could well be found. The serious element in the piece is skillfully relieved by the humours of a pert but good-natured gamin very cleverly represented by Miss Lizzie Coote. Mr. Frank Archer, Mr. Macklin, Mr. Vollaire, and Mrs. Huntley also lend efficient aid in minor parts.

Mr. Chatterton's Shakesperian programme at DRURY LANE appears now to be finally abandoned. During the past week Othello has taken the place of Macbeth on alternate nights with The Winter's Tale; but both these plays will now be withdrawn. In their place the romantic play of Belphegor will be produced this evening, with Mr. Dillon in his old character of the Mountebank. It will be preceded by a revival of Colman's Jealous Wife, compressed into three acts, in which Mrs. Vezin will sustain the character of Mrs. Oakley.

In spite of the gloom and rain on Wednesday last, the funeral of the late Mr. Phelps, at Highgate Cemetery, was attended by a very large number of ladies and gentleman, among whom were several of the deceased actor's leading supporters in his Shakespeare revivals in old days at Sadler's Wells. The coffin bore the simple inscription, "SAMUEL PHELPS. Born February 13, 1804. Died November 6, 1878."

Mr. Byron's new burlesque extravaganza, Young Fra Diavolo, will be produced at the GAIETY on Monday next, supported by Mr. Terry, Miss E. Farren, and Mr. Royce, and other popular performers. Paul Pry will be revived on the same occasion.—The PHILHARMONIC Theatre, at Islington, has reopened under a new management, with a revival of the burlesque of L'Africaine. —The PRINCESS'S Theatre will reopen on the 30th inst., with a new romantic drama, entitled, The Shadow of a Crime, written by Mr. James Albery and Mr. Joseph Hatton.

An English version of Offenbach's La Perichole has been produced at the ALHAMBRA Theatre, with Miss Emily Soldene as the fair street singer, Mr. Knight Aston as her lover Piquito, and Mr. Aynsley Cook as Don Andres, the amorous Peruvian Viceroy. To criticise the piece itself would be superfluous, as it has already been played both in French and English in London; but, with regard to the dialogue, we may say that as usual with French Opera Bouffes, it has not been improved by translation, while the character of Don Pedro, the Governor of Lima, and right-hand man of the Viceroy, is rendered most vulgar and offensive by the would-be comic habit of stuttering with which Mr. Kelleher endowed it. The music, though hardly to be ranked with the best of Offenbach's compositions, is exceedingly light and tuneful, and is very well performed by Mr. Jacobi's band. The three principal performers, Mr. Aston especially, deserve considerable praise for the taste with which they sang their several airs and concerted pieces. The minor characters are very fairly filled, Mr. Frank Hall meriting a word of commendation for his humorous pourtrayal of Count Panatellas—who was comic without being coarse, and Mr. John Wallace for his effective acting as the Marquis de Santarem, the old prisoner of twelve years' standing. The choruses are good, and the scenery exceedingly pretty; but the dresses and ballet hardly come up to the high standard which of late years has been the speciality of this house.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——Glancing back for a moment at the Liverpool Meeting of last week, it is but fair to say that it increased in interest as it progressed. The Cup day was favoured with lovely weather for the time of year, and seldom has a larger or more aristocratic gathering been seen on the course. The race for the Cup itself, as the big handicap is called, was really a good one, the field of fifteen comprising many high-class animals. Touchet, who ran second in the Cambridgeshire, maintained his supremacy in the market till the fall of the flag, Belphœbe at the last supplanting Master Kildare, and becoming second favourite. The result of the race was an illustration of the accurate judgment often formed by backers, as the three animals just named finished first, second, and third, though not in the order of the betting, Belphœbe being successful, with Touchet second, and Master Kildare next. Lord Hartington's filly, however, only won by a neck, and only a head separated the two next. A finer finish has hardly been seen this season. It was quite in accordance with public running; but Lord Rosebery, the owner of Touchet, and Captain Machell, the owner of Kildare, may fairly claim some sympathy, especially the former, for the defeat of their animals. A more disappointing animal than Touchet has hardly been on the Turf for years, and he must have cost his backers, who have so often stood him, a little fortune. Last year, after being heavily supported, he could only get fourth for the Lincolnshire Handicap; and, starting first favourite, he was second for the City and Suburban. In the Rous Memorial Stakes he ran third, and now he has had to put up with second place in two such great handicaps as the Cambridgeshire and Liverpool Cup. He has run altogether in a great number of races, and is certainly a very fair class horse. As to Master Kildare, four times within the last few weeks he has run well—viz., in the St. Leger, the Cesarewitch, Cambridgeshire, and the Liverpool Cup, each time being strongly fancied by his friends; but victory has been denied him. Both animals seem now to have retired into winter quarters, and perhaps will yet do a good turn for their friends next season, as both appear to be perfectly sound. On her last day at Liverpool Belphœbe stamped her excellence by giving Julius Cæsar a year and 5 lbs. in the Duchy Cup, and winning by any number of lengths. On the last day, too, the Great Lancashire Stakes were specially interesting, from the fact that Sir Joseph made his first appearance on a racecourse since the Derby, for which he was so strongly fancied. Helena was made favourite, but she could only get third, Sir Joseph beating Tower and Sword, who ran second.—The revived meeting at Derby during the present week was a fair success, though the second day's racing had to be deferred till Wednesday, owing to frost and snow. In the Derby Cup, Muscatel, who has often proved a disappointing filly, for once ran up to her best form, beating a fair field of ten, in which was Lancaster, who showed prominently in both the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire. Nurseries are always popular at this time of year; and eighteen competitors contested the Chesterfield, for which Merry Thought and Sunnybrae ran a deadheat, the former winning the deciding heat. On the Wednesday, the Friary Nursery fell to C.B., and the Chatsworth Plate to Woodlark, neither of the winners being much fancied, in strongish fields.—The old-established Shrewsbury Meeting attracted large and good fields as usual, especially on the second day, when Woodquest won the Wilton Welter by a neck from Corona, Lord Rosebery's Strathavon the Grendon Welter, and Censer the Innkeepers' Plate. The Great Shropshire Handicap brought a round dozen to the post, of whom Avontes was made a strong favourite; and he won easily enough from Sunshade and Sutler, affording another instance of a horse eventually justifying the opinion of a powerful stable, even though he has been signally beaten after having been tried very highly for a great event. The Shrewsbury Meeting will be long remembered for a riot got up by welshers, thieves, and a whole band of ruffians, who nearly succeeded in capturing a stand and enclosure, and robbing the occupiers. A more disgraceful scene has perhaps never been witnessed on a racecourse; and it shows the necessity for having a very strong body of police present on all such occasions. The incident will, of course, be used to point a moral against the Turf; but it must be remembered that wherever there are large assemblies collected for any purpose of amusement, there also is to be found a large contingent of the predatory class.

Coursing.——The recent Champion Meeting at Newmarket is allowed on all hands to have been one of the best ever held in the vicinity of the famous Heath. A noticeable feature was the grand form displayed by the Duke of Hamilton's kennel, his Grace dividing three of the principal stakes, and thus indicating that his nomination for the Waterloo Cup is not unlikely to be in strong demand.

Aquatics.——At Oxford the final heat for the Fours was won by Magdalen, who beat University by five seconds. This is the first time in the history of Oxford Aquatics that this College has won this trophy.—At Cambridge the result of the Colquhoun Sculls was in favour of Sandford, of St. John's, who beat Knaggs, of Caius, by barely a second. At both Universities the Trial Eights are now in daily practice for the December race.—On the Tyne, John Hawdon has beaten William Lumsden in a match for 100*l.* a-side, and is evidently "the coming man" among scullers.

Football.——Several games in the first round of the Association Challenge Cup contest were played off on Saturday last at different trysting grounds. Barnes beat Maidenhead, the Pilgrims Brentwood, Reading Hendon, the Swifts the Hawks. But perhaps the two games which created most interest were those at the Oval, when Cambridge University overthrew the Hertfordshire Rangers, and the Old Etonians made seven goals to the Wanderers' two. The Wanderers played a very strong eleven, and as they have won the Cup three years in succession, to say nothing of the two first years of its institution, the tremendous defeat inflicted on them by the Old Etonians points to the latter as being very likely to come victorious out of the present contest.

Lady Nursemaids.——"It would be perhaps worth while," says a correspondent, "to record the experience obtained in an attempt in this direction. In response to a carefully worded advertisement, we received somewhat over a hundred replies. As a personal interview is specially desirable, we selected, within a circle of some fifteen miles, forty-three letters. These on examination gave only eleven worthy of consideration; the rest were evidently either from servants out of place, or from others totally unfit for the required duties. On these eleven we called without any previous notice, and with one exception they were of the class unfitted by pride and ignorance to be ordinary servants, and certainly fit for nothing else. The idle, would-be fine young lady, with little or no education, who appears in such force in reply to advertisements for governesses, was here conspicuous by her absence, and it appeared that the class specially fitted by nature for the required work would not undertake it; in fact, I think that the really useful young lady is rather a scarce commodity, and not easy to get hold of, as those who have her know her value only too well. The one exception referred to was one probably suitable, but who only wanted to go out for a short time, as she clearly put it, for a change, which would not suit us. Coming on them without notice, we met with one or two revelations. One, who in her letter objected to take a baby in arms out, we found with a black face, and in a general state of dirt, cleaning the front door step; another, who objected to anything 'menial,' had been a barmaid; and so on through most of the lot. The advertisement, to reach the eyes of the right class, was headed, 'Nursery Governess;' but plainly it had not reached any further than their eyes. The question is whether the idea is worth another trial, and if we shall go through the remainder (at no little expense), in the hope of finding the prize which did certainly not appear in the forty and three we did go through."

"Shall We Annex England?" is the title of an article in this week's New York Herald. After remarking on the decadence of the Old Country, and stating that England is like an old man retiring from business to live on his fortune, being no longer able to run successfully in the race with the younger and more energetic, though less wealthy nations, and after declaring that Lord Beaconsfield, with true foresight, is preparing the way for the "Empress to rule from Calcutta," or mayhap "Ottawa," as the Princess Louise has been sent with her husband to "occupy the ground," the writer declares both these ideas inadequate. "They are as delusive," he continues, "as the old woman's device who thanked Heaven that she had been able to borrow money enough to pay all her debts. There is but one real cure for the British difficulty, and we have sometimes thought that Mr. Gladstone was dimly beginning to see it. There is but one way to save England, and that is annexation to the United States. We have not space now to discuss the great merits of this plan, or to point out that the march of democratic ideas in England leads to this conclusion and none other. We are not certain that the American people, who have rejected Cuba and will not have Mexico, would consent to receive England into our communion of States; the advantages would be greatly on her side. But at any rate we have no doubt Secretary Evarts would readily correspond with Lord Beaconsfield on the subject, and, if necessary, pave the way with his accustomed urbanity for England to knock at the doors of Congress for admission to the Union. There she would be safe, and in these times it is a good deal to be merely safe."

Properly Warmed Rooms.——It is a very general complaint at this season of the year, when we are obliged to warm our sitting-rooms and shut the windows, that they become almost unbearable from an upper stratum of hot air that stifles our breath, and bakes the body above the knees whilst the feet are numbed with cold. This is a very dangerous state of things for those who have to remain the whole day long shut up in a room. In offices the clerks are often placed on high stools, so that they may be perched a foot above the ground; but we cannot well adopt the fashion in our dwelling houses. Happily a very simple arrangement of the fire grate will cure this evil. The public have to thank a gentleman who has so often brought to the front, not so much new inventions, as the proper application of well-known natural means to increase our comfort; and as an instance of this, what is known as the "Parson's Grate," and which may be applied to any chamber, is a case in point. Mr. Mechi, of Tiptree Hall, Kelvedon, Essex, on public grounds, for the sake of the comfort and health of the community, will send instructions to any one desiring to construct one of these; he is very desirous that they should be introduced into the waiting-rooms of railway stations, and no doubt those who read this will agree with him that these public resorts are anything but pleasant resting-places in cold weather. Whatever may be adopted, whether these "Parson's Grates," which are the cheapest; or hot air, or hot water, which are the cleanest, healthiest, and most agreeable, albeit too costly for a modest purse; no room can be properly warmed unless the feet are made the first consideration.

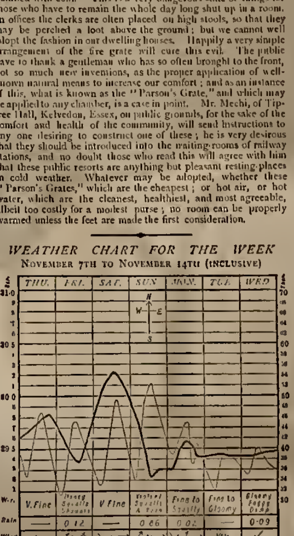
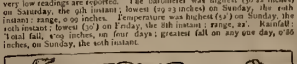
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

November 7th to November 14th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.—The weather during this period has been extremely unsettled. The week opened with a rising barometer, and beautifully fine weather; but on Thursday evening, the 7th instant, the mercury began to fall steadily, and on Friday, the 8th instant, clouds and showers were experienced, with heavy squalls, reaching the force of a fresh gale from north-west in the evening. The barometer had, however, by this time commenced to rise, and continued to do so until Saturday afternoon, the 9th instant. The sky once more cleared, and another very fine day was experienced; but the new fall in the barometer, which became more decided in the evening, was soon followed by an unpleasant change in the weather. The sky quickly clouded, and the wind increased, reaching the force of a strong gale in squalls on Sunday morning, the 10th instant. The remainder of the day was very wet; but the mercury began to rise towards evening, and the change becoming more decided next morning, fine weather once more set in. The changes in the barometer since Monday have been irregular, but not extensive, and cloudy, squally weather has prevailed, drizzling rain falling nearly all day on Wednesday, the 13th instant. Temperature has been low all the week; but as the nights have been usually cloudy, no very low readings are reported. The barometer was highest (30·22 inches) on Saturday, the 9th instant; lowest (29·23 inches) on Sunday, the 10th instant; range, 0·99 inches. Temperature was highest (52°) on Sunday, the 10th instant; lowest (30°) on Friday, the 8th instant; range, 22°. Rainfall: Total fall, 1·09 inches, on four days; greatest fall on any one day, 0·86 inches, on Sunday, the 10th instant.



Mr. Frederick Leighton, R.A., has been elected President of the Royal Academy of Arts.

Mount Etna is reported to be showing signs of an eruption. Several severe shocks of earthquake and loud subterranean rumblings continued recently for a week, and the inhabitants of Mimea were so alarmed as to quit the town altogether. In the meantime Mount Vesuvius is calming down.

German Artists are complaining bitterly of the hard times, and scarcely any pictures have been bought by private persons at the Annual Exhibition of the Berlin Art Academy. Indeed the Council of the Academy have petitioned Government to devote 150,000 marks (7,500*l.*) to the purchase of pictures in order to support art under such unfavourable circumstances.

The Jewish Working Men's Club and Institute, Hutchison Street, Aldgate, provides a varied supply of evening Lectures, Readings, and Debates, for the Winter Session, which opened last week. Established to afford the Jewish industrial classes social intercourse, mental culture, and recreation, the Club admits male members over 20 and female members over 16 by the payment of a small subscription, and, in addition to evening entertainments, furnishes them with a reading-room, circulating library, and coffee-room.

A Valuable Soporific for Railway Travellers has been invented by a French physician—a concoction which sends a person to sleep for a given time. The doctor can calculate the effect of his discovery within about ten minutes, and will give a dose ensuring sleep during a journey of twenty, fifty, a hundred, or two hundred miles, according to taste. The restless traveller is thus spared the weariness of a long night journey, while sleepily-disposed people can indulge in a good nap without fear of passing their destination. The invention—which, by the way, is said to taste like Chartreuse—might surely prove valuable to persons afflicted with sea-sickness.

Gold has been Discovered in the Wynaad, a small district in the Madras Presidency, and a mining engineer from Victoria has been exploring the quartz reefs to test the quality of the product. Mr. Brough Smyth has surveyed an area of 25 miles by 13, and has found a considerable quantity of ore reef with a thickness of from 2 ft. to 4 ft., yielding from a few pennyweights to 200 ounces per ton, while the richest stone shows a fine and coarse gold with jagged pieces as large as peas. Gold-mining in the Wynaad thus promises to become a productive industry if capital and good management be ensured. The Wynaad climate is healthy and pleasant for Europeans during nine months of the year, but feverish during the remainder.

London Mortality increased last week, and 1,590 deaths were registered against 1,386, an increase of 204, being at the rate of 23·2 per 1,000. There were 9 deaths from small-pox (an increase of 6), 18 from measles (an increase of 3), 60 from scarlet fever (an increase of 11, but 32 below the average), 11 from diphtheria, 33 from whooping-cough (an increase of 11), 30 from different forms of fever, and 26 from diarrhœa. Deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs numbered 433 (an increase of 81), of which 277 resulted from bronchitis. There were 2,607 births registered, against 2,532 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 38·8 deg., or 2·0 below the average. The duration of sunshine was 13·5 hours, the sun being 65·1 hours above the horizon.

Wine Growers in Southern France and Europe are becoming so alarmed by the rapid increase of the Phylloxera that, according to the Petit Marseillais, they have been experimentalising to discover what fruit would yield wine as nearly resembling the product of the vine as possible. The orange has been found most productive, as four kinds of wine have been obtained from the fruit, "Dry" and "Imperial" yielded by the orange in January, "Mandarin" obtained in April, and "Sparkling" produced by a special process. These wines are good in colour, clear, and well flavoured, with a slightly acid taste, while the three first contain 15 per cent. of alcohol and the last 12 per cent. The oranges must be gathered before their maturity, as when ripe they are too sweet for use.

The Leicester Square Soup Kitchen and Refuge, which daily distributes food to the destitute gratuitously, last year gave away 102,595 meals and Christmas dinners to 1,030 families, while 15½ tons of coals were distributed at the same season. In the Refuge 2,600 nights' lodgings were given, and here the houseless poor who are not vagrants are provided with supper, bed, and breakfast. This charity provides family tickets, which entitle the holder to two quarts of soup and a portion of bread, while the tickets for meals given away by missionaries and workers among the poor are a valuable substitute for the indiscriminate giving of money. As the winter is coming on, donations will be gratefully received by W. Stevens, Secretary, at the Soup Kitchen, Ham Yard, Great Windmill Street, St. James's, W.

British Art in India does not seem to reach a high pitch of excellence, to judge from the criticism of a correspondent of the Times of India who had visited the annual Fine Art Exhibition at Simla. "Most of the pictures," says the critic, "were atrocious daubs. There were skies, such skies that the blue heavens outside, could they have witnessed what an outrage had been committed on their azure purity, would have blushed crimson. There were foliage, and jungle, and seas displayed on canvas, and all as unlike nature as the ingenuity of man or woman could contrive. I saw a tiger with such a head and neck that the royal beast would have been perfectly justified in gobbling up the artist. There was an elephant knock-kneed, and such an infinity of caricatures of nature that it was a relief to look at the clear sky above after the fearful azures and blood-reds to which we had been exposed."

Prince Bismarck's Daughter, the Countess Marie, whose wedding took place last week, has married, after all, her first love, Count von Rantzau. When boy and girl together, the young pair used to meet as they were coming home from school, and the Count would carry Marie's books, tell her long stories, and pay her innumerable attentions. Count von Rantzau went into the army, and some time afterwards heard that his old love was engaged to Count Eulenburg. Henry von Rantzau fell into a gloomy state of mind, and was subject to fits of depression which greatly alarmed his comrades. Typhoid fever, however, carried off young Count Eulenburg, and Count von Rantzau speedily recovered his spirits, renewed his acquaintance with the Bismarcks, and again courted the Countess Marie, abandoning the sword for diplomacy. One of the great features of the wedding fêtes was the distribution to each guest of a brief poem, recounting this episode, written by a young relative of Prince Bismarck, and entitled "On revient toujours à ses premières amours." Countess Marie's young lady friends also gave her a large album, containing views of every place she had lived in before her marriage, and bearing the inscription, "The days that are no more."

The American Arctic Vessel Florence, sent out last year under Captain Tyson, as the pioneer of Captain Howgate's plan for establishing Polar colonies, and which was compelled to return through the failure of Congress to commission an expeditionary vessel to meet her at Disco, as had been arranged, has come back to Massachusetts in a very damaged condition. The Florence wintered in Annatook Harbour, lat. 66·28; long. 68·45; and spent an uneventful time, the naturalists and crew, however, obtaining some valuable specimens and skins. The weather was fair, and the thermometer during January averaged 20 deg. below zero, while March 1st was excessively cold, the thermometer ranging from 40 to 45 deg. below zero. The weather then broke up, and in July the Florence started south, passing through dense fields of ice, only to experience disappointment at Disco by the non arrival of the promised vessel. After waiting till August 22, the expedition started for home, and had a terrific passage, springing a leak and running so short of provisions on the road that they had consumed the last morsel of food before their arrival at Provincetown, and were contemplating eating the skins of their cargo. Such an icy season has not been known in the North for thirty years, and Captain Tyson has no belief in an open Polar Sea. Talking of Arctic exploration, the Dutch Willem Barents, sent to Spitzbergen to erect a monument to the discoverer, and to restore the graves of the early explorers, returned to Amsterdam rather unexpectedly last month.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——Matters have taken a more peaceful turn this week, the warlike tone of the Russian press, and their declarations that the Treaty of Berlin is no longer anything but a dead letter, have been considerably modified, while the Czar has despatched a Note to the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, assuring him that "it is the wish of the Emperor to give all due respect to the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin, and to bring about the much-desired pacification by the faithful execution of the Treaty, and that no Imperial functionary will fail in this respect." A St. Petersburg telegram also declares that Russia intends to adhere solely to the principles established by the Treaty of Berlin, adding that "Russia earnestly desires an understanding with England both in Europe and in Asia." These assurances have not been given before they were needed, as the apparently official violence of the St. Petersburg press, the utterances of Prince Dondoukoff on leaving East Roumelia (among other things he is said to have remarked "Traité de Berlin—Musique de Offenbach"), the obstructive policy of the Russian members of the East Roumelian Commission, and the massing of Russian troops south of the Balkans, had not unnaturally alarmed the other signatories of the Treaty of Berlin, and, apart from Lord Beaconsfield's declaration at the Guildhall on Saturday, had brought forth an announcement from the Emperor of Austria that his Government would "loyally stand up for the consistent and general fulfilment of the Treaty of Berlin." Moreover, the peaceful aspect is not confined to "words," but the Russians have definitively handed over to the Roumelian Commission at Philippopolis the financial administration of the new Province, notwithstanding that a popular demonstration protested against the measure; the Sultan has appointed Midhat Pasha to be Governor of Syria; while the Porte, yielding to the pressure of France and Italy, has at last determined to appoint delegates to consider the rectification of the Greek frontier as recommended by the Berlin Congress, the Austrians have issued a liberal amnesty to all Bosnian and Herzegovinian insurgents who will give themselves up within a fortnight, and, lastly, Count Schouvaloff is not going to replace Prince Gortschakoff as Premier, but is coming back from Livadia to London, laden, it is said, with peaceful assurances, having called at Vienna on his way to see the Emperor of Austria, and impress upon him that the Czar is bent upon carrying out the Treaty. It is rumoured also that an International Commission is to be formed to watch over the execution of the Treaty. Some such scheme as this was suggested at the Berlin Congress, but fell to the ground. In the mean time, the insurrection in Macedonia does not appear to be on the decrease; recruiting is being actively carried on by Bulgarian agents, while the insurgents are seemingly well fed and well armed, and, moreover, to be systematically officered.

To turn to ASIA MINOR, some so-called authentic particulars have arrived respecting the reply of the Porte accepting the English reforms in Asia Minor. The four fundamental points are the organisation of a gendarmérie with European officers, the appointment of European travelling inspectors, whose duties will consist in receiving complaints against the judges and watch over the administration of justice, the reorganisation of the finances according to the English scheme, and a five years' term of office for the valis and inspectors.—ROUMANIA has now taken the organisation of the Dobrudscha actively in hand, and is busily appointing the administrative officials, of whom there is to be a double proportion, owing to the difficulties anticipated in forming the new government. All the Powers have sent their Ministers to Bucharest, except England and France, those two countries abstaining until some definitive reforms respecting the future position of the Jews have been adopted by the Roumanian Government.—SERVIA is growing far more peaceful in tone, the elections to the Skuptschina have passed off quietly, while the report that should war again break out with Russia Servia would afford her effective help is officially denied.

Lord Beaconsfield's speech at the Guildhall has been pretty freely commented on by the Continental Press, but the general impression is that of disappointment—that the English Premier said nothing noticeable to surprise any one. In France, the Temps admires the dexterity with which he avoided touching upon the main difficulties, by simply telling people what they already knew. The Constitutionnel and Débats consider his statements too roseate-hued, although the latter notes the firmness with which he declared his intention of maintaining the Treaty of Berlin; while the République Française declares his language to have been prudent, and as worthy of an eminent statesman as of a diplomatist. The German papers also speak of the speech in this tone, the Cologne Gazette, after stating that Lord Beaconsfield has not only preserved England's power undiminished, but has even increased it, declares that his speech was the utterance of a calm and prudent politician, and the serious declaration of a firm resolution, which, in times of action, will be upheld by one of the most powerful nations in the world. "Let the St. Petersburg Cabinet lay this well to heart," it concludes. "To bring it home to Russian statesmen was perhaps one of the chief aims of Lord Beaconsfield's speech." The Vienna Press also highly approves of the speech; but the Russian organs are apparently not so satisfied, the Golos declaring that "Lord Beaconsfield has successfully attained the double object of delivering a speech of a pacific character, and at the same time showing that the basis of his foreign policy continues to be enmity to Russia."

FRANCE.——The World's Fair of 1878 is now a thing of the past, and, save for a few exhibitors who are staying behind to pack up their goods, Paris is rapidly resuming her normal condition. The weather was very cheerless and cold during the last few days, but the attendance as large as ever, the visitors on Tuesday, the closing day, numbering 120,000. The aggregate number of admissions has been 16,032,725, or an average of 82,000 a-day, while the receipts amount to upwards of 500,000*l*. against not quite 400,000*l*. in 1867. The free admissions also have been 950,000, against 400,000 in 1867; and while in that year the artisan delegates from the provinces only numbered 357, this year they have amounted to no fewer than 22,000. The Exhibition over, politics are beginning to resume their sway, and the violent diatribes in the Chamber of Deputies, last week, of M. Paul de Cassagnac (who, however, did not succeed in preserving his seat) and the coming struggle for the three vacant life senatorships, have excited lively discussion. After considerable negotiation, the various shades of the Right have selected as their candidates, the Comte d'Haussonville, M. Baragnon, and M. Oscar de Valleé, respectively Orleanist, Legitimist, and Bonapartist in their profession of faith. The Republican candidates are the Comte de Montalivet, the last surviving Minister of Louis Philippe, General Gresley, and M. Alfred André. The Right have at last issued their address to the Municipal delegates who are to elect the batch of seventy-five Senators next year. In this document the Republicans en masse are accused of all the excesses of Radicalism, and great points are made of the desire to establish "Godless schools, Churches without ministers, an undisciplined army, and a new and vexatious tax upon incomes." Finance is also occupying public attention; and the Budget Commission has been busily discussing the estimates of the army, which, by the way, has now almost attained the figure fixed for its peace footing, the prescribed strength being 469,310 men and 110,799 horses, exclusive of gendarmérie. The estimates for 1879 amount to nearly 20,000,000*l*., being an increase over those of last year of some 350,000*l*. The Committee, however, have reduced the general expenditure by a million sterling.

From Paris itself there is very little gossip. The lottery fever continues, and the mode in which the winning numbers will be drawn has been published. The smaller prizes will be divided into twelve groups, which will be severally contended for by each of the twelve series, into which the tickets are divided, but the larger prizes will form a special category for which every number will compete. The drawings will of course be public, and will probably last about a week or ten days. On Saturday, at the Continental Hotel, the Australian Commissioners presented Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen with a testimonial as a recognition of his extreme courtesy and good will. On the same day, at the Théâtre Château d'Eau, M. Louis Blanc presided over the distribution of the prizes to the successful exhibitors at the Working Men's Exhibition, and in his speech quoted Mr. Gladstone's expression that this was the century of workmen, but declaring that it was also a century of machines. He declared, however, that new inventions benefited the masses, but argued that as "a landowner whose property was expropriated for the purposes of public utility received an indemnity, so the workman whose labour was superseded by a new machine should be recompensed for the bread of which he and his family were deprived. . . . Science ought to be put at the service and not in the place of humanity." In theatrical circles the winter novelties are rapidly being produced. At the Palais Royal an amusing farcical comedy, entitled Les Provinciales à Paris, has been produced, while at the Odéon a three-act comedy by M. Louis Daryl has been brought out, entitled Monsieur Cheribois, which promises to be fairly successful, the plot turning on the obstinacy of a selfish and avaricious old man who refuses to pay his own son's debts, but is at last brought to reason by the suddenly decisive conduct of his wife, driven to desperation by a long course of domestic tyranny.

ITALY.——In view of the new electoral bill which the Government intends to bring forward, the Clerical party have determined to abandon its old policy of non-interference in electoral matters, and is now trying hard to secure the return of Clerical Deputies during the coming general elections. The Unità Cattolica, the mouthpiece of the Vatican, has announced the change of policy, and it is rumoured that the Cardinals intend to issue a circular to their Bishops, instructing them what course they should adopt at the elections. This movement is considered to be exceedingly serious in all political circles, and as not unlikely considerably to affect the relative positions of the various parties. The Vatican is also trying to establish better relations with Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, and Russia, and the Pope is said to have made a direct appeal to the Czar to ameliorate the condition of the Polish Roman Catholics. Should this be of no effect, Leo XIII. will denounce Russia to the Catholic world in an Encyclical letter.—The King and Queen have been to Florence, where they were enthusiastically received.—The Antonelli will case has again been before the Court of Appeal, but shows no sign of coming to an end.

INDIA AND AFGHANISTAN.——The military preparations for the expected Afghan War are being carried on with the utmost energy, the scale of operations against the Khyber Pass has been extended, no expense or trouble being spared to ensure complete success. All commanding officers have been ordered to exercise their men in route marching, in order to train them for a mountain campaign, and the various generals are rapidly repairing to the headquarters of their detachments, General Biddulph having reached Quettah, and General Browne being busily employed organising his forces at Peshawur. At this latter place, as is usual, a great deal of fever prevails amongst the men, though fortunately the malady is of a very mild type. The preparations are stated to be of a most complete character, including provision for telegraph, postal, and surveying parties, while as a precautionary matter European officers have been ordered to wear the native turbans. A reconnaissance has already been made into the Khyber Pass by the Guides, under Colonel Jenkins, who reports that additional guns have been placed on Ali Musjid, and that heavy artillery practice is continually carried on. This important position, however, is declared by General Ross to be easy of capture on account of the fort being commanded by the surrounding hills, while the Rifles have volunteered to storm the fort on the outbreak of hostilities. Further south at Mooltan and Sukkur, the preparations are equally forward. Numerous frontier tribes continue to manifest themselves favourable to us, and amongst others the Zuris, the most powerful tribe in the Kumm Valley; and should the Ameer fail a reply to the Viceroy's letter by the 20th, it is expected that a general advance will be immediately begun. Indeed, public opinion in India chafes at the policy of the Government in attempting further negotiations with the Ameer, and The Times correspondent in describing the position of affairs pictures the Government as treating the Ameer like an infuriated bear in a pit, handing him the ultimatum at the end of a long pole, being on the alert at the same time to beat a speedy retreat in the event of a dangerous outbreak. If, however, we are to believe the Times of India, hopes are entertained at Simla of a peaceful solution of the matter after all, as the Russians are now bringing their influence to bear upon Shere Ali to settle the question amicably, while it is also stated that Shere Ali himself despairs of success. There may be some truth in the first part of this statement, as the Russian Press has suddenly adopted a much milder tone than for some months past, although the irrepressible Golos, in a letter from Orenburg, demonstrates the possibility of a rapid concentration of Russian troops in localities situated at very great distances from the Russian frontier. The Afghan Envoy to the Turkish Government has passed through St. Petersburg on his way home, taking various samples of guns to show to the Ameer.

UNITED STATES.——The Newfoundland Fishery Question is being most actively discussed, and the full despatches of Mr. Evarts to Lord Salisbury have now been published. Apart from the attack on the fishermen, Mr. Evarts considers the award excessive, and complains that the arbitrators were not unanimous. No more were the Alabama Commission, and yet we paid over 5,000,000*l*. promptly, while we at once yielded on the San Juan Question on the decision of the Emperor of Germany. Lord Salisbury's reply to these remarks, however, is understood to be perfectly satisfactory to the United States Government, which is convinced that England intends in good faith to enforce the Treaty of Washington. Lord Salisbury, however, while agreeing to investigate the Fishery grievances, declares that the Halifax award is "final and binding," and declines to complicate it with other subjects. Thus the United States will probably pay the full Halifax award in London, under protest, on the 23rd inst., the date specified by the Treaty.

MISCELLANEOUS.——AUSTRIA, having completed her occupation of Bosnia, is now counting the cost, which is reckoned at 5,000 men dead, wounded, and missing, and 20,000 sick.—In GERMANY there has been a great torchlight festival in honour of the Emperor, who made a speech announcing his intention speedily to resume his former "active duties." The total amount of the Prussian deficit amounts to 3,900,000*l*., of which 3,500,000*l*. will be covered by a loan.—In SPAIN, Moncasi, who attempted to assassinate King Alphonso, has been tried and found guilty, and sentenced to death.—Fighting has again broken out in the TRANSVAAL, and a British detachment of some 400 men under Colonel Gilbert has been compelled to fall back before an overwhelming force of Kaffirs, who, however, were subsequently beaten back with heavy loss while attempting a night attack.—CHINA shows every disposition to quarrel with Russia, has forbidden the entry of all Russian products, and has ordered all Chinese subjects to quit Kashgar.

THE COURT

THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice spent a few days at Glassalt Shiel last week, returning to Balmoral on Saturday morning. Later in the day the Duke of Richmond and Gordon arrived at the Castle as Minister in attendance, and in the evening dined with Her Majesty. Next morning Divine Service was performed at Balmoral before the Queen, the Princess, and the Royal household, and in the evening the Duke of Richmond and Gordon again joined the Royal party at dinner. On Monday Earl Dufferin arrived at Balmoral on a visit.—Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice do not leave Balmoral until Friday next.—The Queen has written a letter of condolence on the death of the Scotch artist, Mr. Kenneth Macleay, to a member of the Royal Scottish Academy, of which the deceased painter was a member.

The Prince and Princess of Wales kept the Prince's 37th birthday at Sandringham last week. The young Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maude had been there for some time, and the Princess Louise, the Duke of Connaught, Prince Leopold, and the Marquis of Lorne also joined the party. On Saturday there was the usual bell-ringing and salute-firing in Sandringham and the neighbourhood, King's Lynn being decked with flags and giving a grand firework display in the evening, while at Sandringham House the annual dinner was given to the labourers on the estate. About 170 men were entertained in the Royal Mews, and the Prince and Princess with their children and their visitors were present during part of the time. Due honours were also paid to the day in London and Windsor, while the cadets of the Britannia training ship at Dartmouth, to which the Princes Albert Victor and George belong, had a holiday at the Prince of Wales' request. Next morning the Prince and Princess with their guests attended Divine Service at St. Mary Magdalene's. On Monday the Princess Louise and her husband, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold left Sandringham, and the Duke of Cambridge and Prince Christian arrived for a few days' shooting. Last night (Friday), the Prince and Princess were to give a dance at Sandringham. Next week the Prince of Wales will begin his usual autumn round of shooting visits. On Monday he goes to stay with Sir Richard Wallace at Sudbourn Hall, Suffolk, and at the end of the month he is expected to visit Lord Hastings at Melton Constable, Norfolk. He will return to keep the Princess's birthday on Dec. 1st, and on the following day will start for Luton Hoo to stay with Mr. Gerard Leigh. During his visit there will be a county ball, and on the 16th prox. he will go to Luton and inspect two of the chief manufactories.—The Prince has put up in Sandringham Church a window to the memory of his late chaplain, the Rev. W. Lake Onslow. The subject is Christ stilling the waters, and the window matches that given by the Prince in memory of his late equerry, Major Grey, David slaying Goliath. The church also contains a third memorial window in remembrance of the infant Prince John Alexander, the subject being Christ blessing little children.

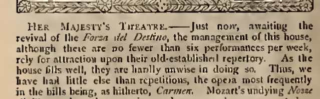
The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne have left England for Canada in the Sarmatian. Accompanied by the Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold they left London late on Wednesday night, and travelled to Liverpool by the Midland Railway, two Pullman cars being specially fitted for their accommodation, and new hangings and a quantity of real flowers being added. At Liverpool the Royal party received farewell addresses from the Mayor and Corporation, and the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne with the two Royal Princes subsequently embarked on a tender for the Sarmatian, which left later in the day, while the Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold returned to town.

The Duchess of Edinburgh and her children remain at Coburg, where the Grand Duke Sergius is shortly expected to visit his sister. The Duke of Edinburgh left Gibraltar in the Black Prince for Halifax a fortnight ago.—Prince Leopold has been installed Commander of the Cœur de Lion Encampment of Masonic Knights Templar of the Province of Oxfordshire. The Prince and the Duke of Connaught were last week advanced to the 33rd degree at the headquarters of the Ancient and Accepted Rite.—Prince Leopold went to the Globe Theatre with Prince Louis Napoleon on Tuesday night.

CHURCH NEWS

ARCHDEACON DENISON last week spoke at a meeting at Bristol, composed of members of the congregation of All Saints', Clifton. He said he would not use one word that could offend his opponents, for he was growing old, and wished to be at peace. They were happy—so full of happiness that they could spare some and give it to the lawyers, who were just now sadly in need of it. He had had a great deal to do with lawyers, and a more troublesome set he did not know. They had been very useful and kind to him; but he thought the less he had to do with them for the future the better it would be for him, and for all in that room too. His counsel to them was never to go into Court. He had never been beaten but once, but still he had a great horror of Courts, especially of Courts Spiritual. The Court of Queen's Bench and the other Court with no name were at daggers drawn just now, and used hard words to one another; and the legal amenities were likely to develope into something very strong before the present term was out. He denied that the battle they were fighting was a battle about ritual. All stuff! It was a battle about the Blessed Sacrament, and the battle would never cease until their opponents came to their senses. He hoped the Bishops would come to see that there was an essential difference between the position of a Bishop in a Church not established by law and the position of a diocesan in a Church established by law. Our Bishops were ever ready to avail themselves of both positions, but they could not do it. He had tried to awaken the episcopal mind to this, but in vain; still he should go on trying till he died. There was no such word as "discouragement" in his dictionary, and there was no such word as "compromise" in the Latin or Greek languages.

VARIOUS.——It has been decided by the Queen's Bench Division that Dr. Lee, Vicar of All Saints', Lambeth, is no more "an owner or occupier" of the church than any of his parishioners, and their Lordships have therefore discharged the rule for a mandamus, requiring Mr. Partridge, the magistrate, to issue a distress warrant, asked for by the Board of Works, who are anxious to recover the 100*l.* which they have spent in repairing the spire.—The Church Review, in a recent leading article on "Sacerdotalism," makes the following somewhat rash prophecy:—"There has been a good deal very respectable in Protestantism during the last three centuries, but these old traditions are beyond recall. The game is up. In fifty years from this time the whole Protestant world will be unbelieving, and all professing Christianity will be Catholic."—At the Derbyshire Archidiaconal Conference last week, Archdeacon Balston called attention to the spiritual wants of the mining districts, and remarked that the ground was generally covered by Nonconformists, with regard to whom it had been said to him that in a district where there was nothing but Dissent the next generation were atheists. The remark elicited some expressions of disapproval, and the Archdeacon explained that he had not said the opinion expressed was his own. He however appears to have made no effort to controvert it.—Mr. Spurgeon was too unwell last Sunday to preach to the mixed congregation in whose favour the regular attendants had given up their sittings. His son, the Rev. C. Spurgeon, who has just returned from Australia, occupied the pulpit both in the morning and in the evening.—The parishioners of East Ham, Essex, have made a presentment to the Bishop complaining that "Sunday after Sunday common decency is shocked by a strong healthy young clergyman of the Church of England holding the cure of 5,000 souls with 1,000*l.* a year stipend, and no family, getting through the entire service in forty minutes, in an undertone which (like the alteration of time from 11 to 9, the celebration of weddings and churchings in the middle of Divine Service, the abolition of music and of the Lord's Supper, and other recent innovations) is adopted for no other purpose than to drive people away, and so get an excuse for closing one of the two churches. The parishioners think that the Bishop should inquire into the nature of the Rev. S. H. Reynolds' "regular and paid nocturnal engagement at an office in London," and determine whether or not the living can be held in conjunction with it without a breach of law, or at least without injury to the cause of the Church."—Some excitement has been created at Knighton in Radnorshire, in consequence of the refusal of the curate to allow any service to be read over the grave of an unbaptised child aged two years. A service was read outside the churchyard wall by a Baptist minister, and, after the body had been placed in the grave, the sexton sent the mourners away with the remark, "Go away, go away; the thing is deposited."—We are soon to have an opportunity of seeing and hearing the famous (or notorious) Henry Ward Beecher, who, it is said, has just signed a contract for 25,000 dollars and expenses paid, for the delivery of fifty lectures in England, Scotland, and Ireland.—In a recent article on the Personnel of the Sheffield Conference, we spoke of the Rev. G. W. Weldon as "the reputed editor of the Rock." We have received a note from that gentleman, assuring us that he has nothing to do with that journal.



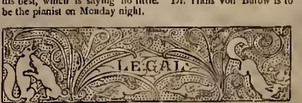
HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——Just now, awaiting the revival of the Forza del Destino, the management of this house, although there are no fewer than six performances per week, rely for attraction upon their old-established repertory. As the house fills well, they are hardly unwise in doing so. Thus, we have had little else than repetitions, the opera most frequently in the bills being, as hitherto, Carmen. Mozart's undying Nozze di Figaro, the other evening, welcome as always, presented us with a new Figaro, in the person of Herr Behrens, who, it may be said at once, possesses none of the qualifications indispensable to an adequate impersonation of the character. Nor is Signor Rota in his element as the Count. On the other hand, in Madame Pappenheim we had a Countess of the legitimate school, acting the part with appropriately staid dignity, while singing the music precisely as it should be sung, and as the composer himself, we believe, would have liked to hear it. Of the Cherubino of Madame Trebelli we need not speak. As a matter of course, she was asked to repeat the canzone, "Voi, che sapete," a like compliment being paid to Mesdames Pappenheim and Hélène Crosmond in the duet, "Sù l'aria," compliance following in each instance. Madame Crosmond, by the way, appears to be steadily improving, as was shown in her delivery of the melodious serenade, "Deh vieni non tardar" (Act II.), which earned for her much and well deserved applause.—The performance of Mozart's comic chef d'œuvre, (if "comic" it may reasonably be styled) was, under the direction of Signor Li Calsi, one, for the most part, of level excellence. This evening the Traviata will introduce a new singer, in the person of Mdlle. Emile Ambré, who, we are informed, comes from Oran in Algiers. A student at the Conservatory of Marseilles, she has already played in Holland (at the Hague), and, which is of more importance, has sustained with credit the trying character of Aïda, in Verdi's last and greatest opera, at the Théâtre Ventadour in Paris.

LOUIS MAURER, the once famous violinist and industrious composer, died at St. Petersburg, on the 29th of last month, at the age of ninety. Few of his many works are now remembered even by musicians, the only thing of his from time to time brought before the public being a certain quartet for violins, Concertante, which offers opportunities to four virtuosi of equal skill to compete with each other as well as to combine their talents. Maurer, at one time Royal Concertmeister at Hanover, subsequently held important musical posts in St. Petersburg, having as a youth at Moscow won the acquaintance and friendship of Wjewolowsky, a great patron of the arts, with whom, during the invasion of Napoleon, he fled to Siberia. A solemn service was held in the German Reformed Chapel of St. Petersburg at his funeral, which was solemnised with every mark of respect by the members of the leading musical societies, with the organisation of the greater number of which he had had something, more or less, to do.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.——At the concert on Saturday M. Brassin, whose performances elsewhere have met with well-merited praise, appeared not only as a pianist, but as a composer of unquestionable ability. His concerto in F major, for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniments, is a work of no ordinary merit. Originality of themes it can hardly be said to possess; but in many instances it assuredly reveals originality of treatment, and moreover is marked throughout by a certain freshness which, in these days of over-heated effort, is indefinably charming. Perhaps the best movement of the three is the andante in A—also the most unceasingly melodious. The first allegro and the finale, however, are vigorous, showy, and effective; while the orchestration is ingenious and brightly-coloured from first to last. M. Brassin's execution of his concerto was, as might have been expected, spirited and fine. A more genuine success could not have been attained. The symphony at this concert was Mozart's so-styled "Jupiter," superbly played under the able direction of M. Manns. The overtures were Cherubini's Elise (a masterly work, though rarely produced), and Miss Alice Mary Smith's Masque of Pandora—the clever work of a highly promising young composer—which, though already given in London, was heard for the first time at Sydenham. Mrs. Osgood, one of the best of our vocal guests from the other side of the Atlantic, gave a most graceful air from Mr. Cowen's Deluge, originally produced at Mr. Kuhe's Brighton Festival, with the utmost taste. Altogether the concert was a good one even for the Crystal Palace.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.——Four new songs were produced at Wednesday evening's entertainment. Barry Cornwall's pretty ballad, entitled "Song over a Child," deserved a somewhat more attractive setting than that provided for it by Mr. Macirone. Though charmingly rendered by Madame Sherrington, it was rather coldly received. Mr. Cowen's "It might have been," though excellently delivered by Mr. M'Guckin, was also listened to with no special marks of favour. Here, we venture to think, the audience were at fault, for the refrain especially is very pretty, and it is probable that when repeated the song will be more warmly welcomed. For ourselves, we prefer Balfe's setting of Longfellow's "Arrow and Song" to the new version by Pinsuti; but we are bound to say that the latter, possibly owing to Madame Sterling's effective delivery, was honoured with an encore. Altogether, of the four new songs we were most attracted by Cotsford Dick's "Olivia," which Miss Mary Davies sung with a pathos and simplicity all her own. Miss Annie Marriott, a new comer, scored a decided success, albeit rather nervous, by her delivery of Sullivan's ever popular "Let me dream again;" Mr. Cecil Tovey's powerful bass voice was heard to great advantage in Pinsuti's "Bedouin Love Song;" Mr. Santley aroused a storm of applause in Dibdin's "Blow high, blow low;" and Miss Margaret Bucknall, at the piano (in the place of Madame Arabella Goddard, kept away by a lame finger), showed great facility of execution in Weber's "Polacca" in E.

WAIFS.——Professor Macfarren's oratorio, Joseph, has been performed with great success at the Corn Exchange, Oxford.—Madame Adelina Patti has declined to accept any engagement for St. Petersburg, on the very intelligible plea that the climate is injurious to her health. Her engagement at Brussels has proved an extraordinary success.—Tamberlik, the great Roman tenor, has been at Lisbon, singing with all his old enthusiasm.—Dr. Hans von Bülow is daily expected in London. As where Rubinstein is Bülow cannot come (which was said by Haydn of Mozart), so where Bülow is Rubinstein cannot come (as was said by Mozart of Haydn). Thus we shall be spared the presence of two "thunderers" at a time.—Mr. Arthur Sullivan's overture, "In Memoriam," is about to be performed at the Paris Conservatoire, mainly through the influence of M. Ambroise Thomas. Better late than never. Perhaps they will sooner or later accord a hearing to Sterndale Bennett.—Wagner's Rheingold has been performed at Hamburg with such favour that Siegfried is now in active rehearsal, and will in all probability be followed by the remaining two parts of the "Tetralogy."—There appears some chance that the Paris Théâtre Lyrique may obtain a home once more at the old Salle du Châtelet.—Mr. Charles Hallé has returned to the post he has held so long and honourably at the Popular Concerts, playing his best, which is saying no little. Dr. Hans von Bülow is to be the pianist on Monday night.



CAB-DRIVERS IN CONFERENCE.——On Sunday Mr. Rowland, the Secretary of the London Cab-drivers' Association, presided at a Conference, held in Castle Street, Oxford Street, and attended by delegates from every district of London, as well as from a number of provincial towns. A variety of papers were read, and resolutions were adopted, urging the necessity of a reform in the system of appointing stipendiary magistrates, "whose conduct is often calculated to bring our Courts of Justice into contempt;" a better system of police; placing the force under the direct control of the ratepayers, "otherwise our liberties are in danger;" the consolidation of the cab laws into one Act; all offences not criminal in themselves to be tried by civil procedure; and the establishment of a Civil Court for licensing and superintending hackney and stage carriages in London, "removing the control altogether from the police authorities, with freedom of contract in hiring, and other necessary reforms." It was also declared that the system of summoning drivers for "loitering," when the standing accommodation provided was not sufficient for the number of vehicles licensed, was grossly unjust, and the regulation which makes it compulsory to wear the badge instead of exhibiting it upon the carriage, was also condemned. Finally, it was resolved to make an appeal to the Government on the whole subject.

THE SHEFFIELD MURDERER.——The old adage that "truth is stranger than fiction" is forcibly exemplified by the career of Charles Peace—that is, if the extraordinary accounts given of his doings are to be relied upon. It appears that a long time ago he was an honest working man, that he abandoned his trade for the music-hall stage, upon which he appeared as "the Ethiopian Paganini," and that, subsequently sinking into crime, he was caught and sentenced to five years' penal servitude. This term he served, and ever since his release he has carried on an elaborate system of robbery. Keeping several sumptuously furnished houses in various parts of the country, and invariably eschewing male accomplices, he managed to pass himself off as a gentleman of property, and contrived to arrange his predatory excursions in such a manner as not only to elude the vigilance of the police, but also to deceive a large circle of intimate associates, whom he doubtless plundered with perfect impartiality. He is a talented musician and a clever carver in wood, and in both occupations his taste seems peculiar (for a burglar and murderer), for he played nothing but sacred music, and carved little besides models of churches. He has also some pretensions to be considered a man of science, for he is the inventor and patentee of a contrivance for raising sunken vessels. It will be remembered that at the time of Mr. Dyson's murder, two years ago, it came out in evidence that some kind of illicit correspondence had been going on between Mrs. Dyson and the murderer. Shortly after the inquiry Mrs. Dyson left Sheffield, it was supposed for America; but it is now conjectured that "Mrs. Thompson," the prisoner's housekeeper, whose statement first led the police to suspect that the Blackheath burglar was Peace, is no other than Mrs. Dyson herself, who is supposed to have been prompted to betray him by jealousy. However this may be, "Mrs. Thompson" disappeared immediately after making the revelation, and the police have not yet been able to find her, although, as they always say in such cases, they "have a clue." Mrs. Peace, the prisoner's wife, is still in custody at Sheffield, and was to have been examined on Thursday on the charge of "receiving."

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——On Monday, the Lord Chancellor spoke in high terms of the "learning and ability" of Lord Justice Christian, who has been compelled to retire from the Dublin Court of Appeal in consequence of his increasing deafness.—The Court of Appeal has confirmed the decision made in May last by Master Bennett, ordering that Mrs. Ellen Twycross should, as the administratrix of her late husband, be at liberty to carry on the action which he had commenced against Mr. Albert Grant, for losses resulting from the purchase of shares in a company of which Mr. Grant was a director, and in the prospectus of which no mention was made of certain contracts which had been entered into.—At the Liverpool Assizes 20*l.* damages has been recovered from the London and North-Western Railway Company for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. The plaintiff had travelled from Liverpool to St. Helen's with a return ticket, and in the evening, finding the gate locked, he climbed over the wall on to the platform, and a porter, thinking that he had arrived by a train which had just come in, demanded his ticket, and refusing to believe his explanation, took him to the police station. He was, however, released, and a fortnight later proceedings were taken against him.—Mr. De Rutzen, the Marylebone stipendiary, in dealing with a number of adulteration cases on Monday, said that the question of "prejudice to the purchaser" had already been disposed of by Mr. Justice Lush, who had decided that if the purchaser did not get the pure article which he was entitled to "prejudice must be presumed." He accordingly inflicted penalties in several cases, varying from 10*l.* to 1*l.*, with costs, and said that he should be happy to grant a case for the superior courts.—In the report of the Greenock Railway Company the extraordinary statement is made that the secretary had fraudulently sold 15,162*l.* 10*s.* ordinary stock and 1,250*l.* preference stock in excess of the company's registered stock. The frauds were effected by fabricating the names of shareholders who did not exist, and the proceeds were appropriated by the secretary, who is now awaiting his trial for forgery and fraud. The directors have been advised that the purchasers of the fabricated stock, having acted bona fide, must be held to be shareholders, and that the company must apply to Parliament for powers to adopt whatever course may be resolved upon to remedy the frauds.—A railway thief has been captured at Plymouth. At his lodgings were found a number of portmanteaus, one containing securities worth 12,000*l.*, and another jewellery valued at 100*l.*—The charge against Lady Gooch of conspiring with Annie Walker to palm off a strange child on her husband, was opened on Wednesday before Mr. Newton at Marlborough Street Police Court. The motive alleged was that of keeping Sir Francis Gooch's property from his relatives, who in the event of his dying childless would inherit it. The chief witness examined was Miss Garrod, companion housekeeper to Lady Gooch, who alleged that her ladyship had confided her intentions to her, and that after vainly trying to dissuade her from carrying them out she had revealed all to Sir Francis. The hearing was adjourned for a week, both the accused being liberated on their own recognisances.—The Tichborne Claimant has written another letter to Mr. G. Onslow, in which he expresses a hope that the Home Secretary will grant his petition and allow his two sentences to be concurrent, in which event he would be liberated next August. There is little fresh news respecting the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, and nothing further is likely to be revealed until the trial takes place. Stewart is the only director who has been released. The relief fund in Glasgow alone already amounts to over 100,000*l.*—At the Warwick Assizes last week, Baron Huddleston had to deal with a case which he characterised as almost the most painful in his extensive criminal experience. The prisoner, a young artist, well educated, having exhausted the means of his mother, a widowed lady, persistently pestered her with letters, always demanding money, and containing shocking threats. He then renewed his menaces personally, and threatened his sister, and upon her evidence and that of his mother, who was the reluctant prosecutrix, the prisoner was convicted and sent to ten years' penal servitude.

NUMEROUS OPERATIC NOVELTIES FOR THE WINTER SEASON are announced in Paris. M. Lecocq brings out his Camargo at the Renaissance next week, M. Offenbach follows with Madame Favart at the Folies-Dramatiques, and shortly afterwards will produce another opera-bouffe, La Marocaine, at the Bouffes Parisiens. M. Sardou has written the libretto of an opera, Les Noces de Fernande, for the Opéra Comique, the scene being laid in Portugal during the 17th century, while M. Halanzier promises a new work at the Grand Opéra, La Reine Berthe, by V. Joncières.

"DREADNOUGHT" SEAMENS' HOSPITAL, GREENWICH.——At a meeting of the governors held last week, Mr. Joseph Moore in the chair, it was reported that, owing to the depression in trade, the applications for relief from seamen of all nations were daily increasing. The governors of the old Dreadnought are scattered throughout the United Kingdom, and many reside in Scotland. The failure of the City of Glasgow Bank threatened this Society with a loss of more than 100*l.* a year in annual income; and a further loss of 250*l.*, owing to the depression in trade, was reported. An urgent appeal to the public for funds to enable the Committee to continue the beneficent work of the Society—a work which benefits the whole maritime world—has, therefore, become necessary.

IRISH "WHISPERERS"

IRELAND, as well as the far north of Scotland, had—possibly still has—its "horse whisperers;" though the "brotherings" which give such permanence and geniality to the Scottish "ploughman's whisper," never seem to have existed in the sister island. Irish "whisperers" have been lonely men whose secret has generally died with them.

The most famous "whisperer" of modern times was James Sullivan, of Dunhallow, of whom traditions were still afloat in the present writer's boyhood, and whose exploits are fully detailed in Townsend's "Survey of the County of Cork." Sullivan was the Rarey of his day. No horse was ever brought to him which he did not permanently tame. Ordinarily restive animals he would master in a few minutes. For exceptionally vicious horses he took about half an hour, during which time he shut the stable door, and forbade any one to open it till he gave the signal. When the door was opened, the horse was seen lying down, and Sullivan by his side playing with him as a child does with a puppy. There was no tying up of the foreleg, or any other visible means of coercion. How his ascendancy was obtained no one could tell; "natural intrepidity," suggests Mr. Townsend, who was an eye-witness of many of his surprising feats. Anyhow, if he passed on the secret to his son, the latter must have learned it very imperfectly; for, though he gave himself out as his father's successor, he never showed the same power, and soon fell into disrepute. In one respect Sullivan differed from Rarey; he could never be persuaded to leave home. Many brilliant offers were made to him, but he could not give up Dunhallow and the foxhounds.

A successor of Sullivan named O'Ham became almost equally famous, and was often urged to explain what was the secret of his influence. But O'Hara treated his questioners as Samson did the Philistines, deluding them with various and unsatisfactory answers. At one time, for instance, he said the secret lay in rocking the horse—putting one hand firmly on his crupper, and with the other grasping his shoulder, and then swaying him to and fro, gently at first, and gradually increasing the motion till you throw him. At another time, he protested that his plan was to bite the animal's ear. Both these are well-known jockey-tricks; the stubbornest horse, they say, will be wholly subdued by being thrown twice or thrice; and if you can get a vicious horse's ear between your teeth and bite hard, you are his master and he your submissive slave from that time forward. As to the idea that the "whisperer" works by kindness, it stands to reason that that method supposes the entire education of the animal to be in your hands. If you have only half an hour to do your work in, you must show overmastering power as well as kindly feeling. A horse whose temper has been spoiled by chronic bad treatment looks on all men as alike tyrants and bullies; much as a Melanesian islander, whose cousins have been carried off and his village burnt by a kidnapping captain, naturally murders the next whites who come ashore.

In the Irish Penny Journal, in which Dr. Petrie, Martin Doyle, and Carleton used to write, and which died nearly forty years ago because, like our English Penny Magazine, it was too good for its time, there is a very interesting notice of these "whisperers;" one of them is also (I believe) introduced in Banim's too little known novel, "Boyne Water," which gives throughout the best picture I know of Irish life at the close of the seventeenth century.

THE VINTAGE OF HUNGARY is considered to have been extraordinarily good this year—the best since 1834.

THE SECOND LARGEST DIAMOND ever found in South Africa has lately been discovered in the Dutoitspan fields, which recently have been specially productive. The stone weighs 244 carats, and, although not of the finest water, is without flaw and will cut well. The only South African stone exceeding this in size was the Spalding diamond, which was found some years since, and weighed 288½ carats.

THE MAINTENANCE OF THE EXHIBITION BUILDING on the Champ de Mars is under serious consideration by the Minister of Agriculture and the Paris Municipal Council. A petition has been sent to the latter, urging them to form the buildings into a winter garden, and to offer in its stead some suitable space outside the city for a manœuvring ground. Meanwhile M. Teisserenc de Bort suggests that the gardens should be left in their present condition, the annexes pulled down, and the four chief galleries and the dome be preserved in order to contain an Industrial, Agricultural, and Commercial Museum, including a fine collection of machines for the benefit of the artisan classes. The funds for the latter object would be obtained from the surplus of the sum intended to defray the expenses of workmen visiting the Exhibition derived from the National Lottery.

FEMALE NAMES

THE oft-quoted remark of Shakespeare's recurs to our mind in connection with names. "What's in a name?" he asks, or rather makes Juliet ask; and the world has over and over again answered the question that there is a great deal in it. Shakespeare himself would seem to have considered there was something, to judge from the pretty-sounding names of his favourite characters.

But it is difficult to say whether sound or association has most to do with our opinions of names. Association must do much, to judge from the various changes in fashion. Elizabeth, Mary, and Anne were once considered to be queen-like names, and have been borne by queens-regnant and queens-consort of England. But in these days we should not hesitate to call our domestic servants by such appellatives, though we should scarcely address our housemaid as Sybil, or our cook as Mabel; names which are much in fashion just now. Whether Sybil and Mabel, and many other such names as are in vogue with lady novelists, will ever become common enough to do for servants, or whether servants will achieve such an independence that they will insist on being addressed by their proper baptismal name, we cannot guess. At present the race of female domestics have to put up with such names as their mistresses think appropriate, no matter what their godfathers and godmothers did for them at baptism.

One old lady of our acquaintance, of an easy and amiable disposition, who keeps three maidens to wait upon her, declares she would not do anything so wicked as to rob a girl of the name that was given to her at the time when she "was made a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven." Therefore she calls her maidens by what she supposes to be their baptismal names: and it is to be feared that these maidens rather take advantage of the amiable old lady and re-christen themselves on entering her service; for at present Belinda presides in the kitchen, Rosalie attends to the house-work, and Seraphina waits at table.

If we look back to the time of our grandmothers and great aunts we find that besides Elizabeth, Mary, and Anne, there were Margaret, Emma, Caroline, Sarah, Jane, Martha, Sophia, Susan, Maria, Matilda, Louisa, Rebecca, Phœbe, Ruth, Lydia, Charlotte, and other names. Bridget, Dorothea, Chloe, Cicely, Tabitha, belong perhaps to even an earlier generation. But some thirty years ago such names were voted to be common; and Constance, Florence, Beatrice, Blanche, Alice, Adeline, Maud, Mabel, Sybil, Muriel, Grace, Isabel, Millicent, Gertrude, became the fashion.

It was not the custom for English people to have more than one Christian name before the reign of George the Third. Two or more names were first used by the Court, and the fashion soon spread all over the country, though at first it was considered presumptuous for a person of low degree to confer more than one name on his child. The conjunction of Anna with Maria was once considered aristocratic, but is no longer so. Mary Anne also was a novelty, but is now common in the extreme; and ladies who have been so christened prefer to write Marian or Marianne. Some ladies even affect the French form of Mary, and insist on being called Marie. There is a tendency to turn y in ie in all names; even the pretty homely Fanny expects to be Fannie now. The combination of Anne with other names was very usual at one time, there being Frances Anne, Sarah Anne, Margaret Anne, and Julia Anne, this last having often in the pronunciation an r inserted for cockney euphony; as also did Jemima Ann, a name by no means uncommon.

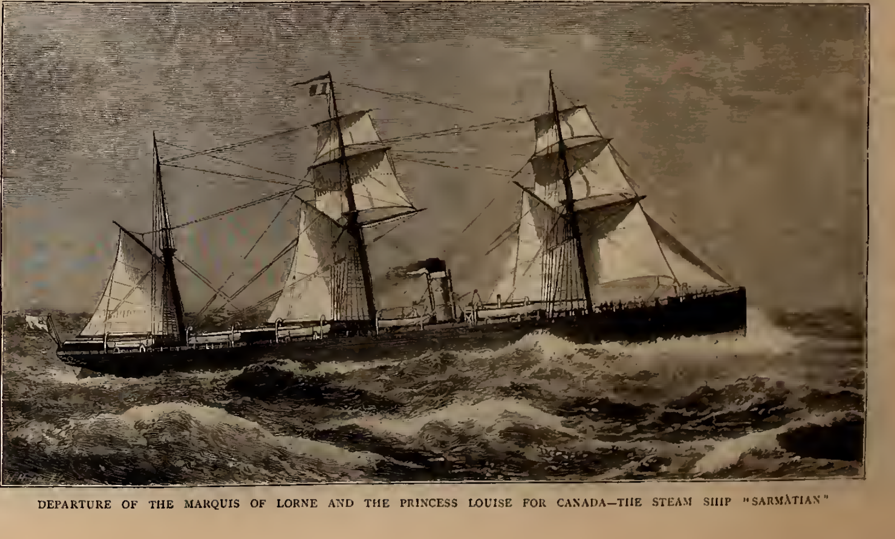
The lower-class Welsh are fond of many and fanciful names. On one occasion when driving in a byway in North Wales we have had to pull up suddenly that a little urchin, making mud pies in the road, who was shrieked at as Victoria Jemima, might be pulled out of the way. This induced us to inquire concerning female names in the Principality, and we found in the very family in which we inquired three girls named respectively Averina Christina, Euphemia Angelina, and Estella Lavinia. Alas! their cognomen was only Jones.

History and literature supply us with the names that have been in use in England in all ages. It is perhaps the inferior authors who give us the best idea of the particular names that are in fashion at the time they write. They endeavour to create an interest in their characters by giving them fine names; whereas a good writer will create a character that will give a halo to the name chosen for it. When Chaucer wrote "Up rose the sun and up rose Emily," he made for us a picture that we for ever connect with the name of Emily. We imagine an Emily must be a bright, happy, and industrious girl. We can only think of Rosalind as Shakespeare's saucy, witty, courageous, true-hearted girl in doublet and hose; of Miranda as the innocent, modest creature who was not ashamed to show her love; of Portia as the rather strong-minded young lady who wanted to prove her husband's love; of Juliet, as the sentimental girl.

Ben Jonson brought the pretty classical name Earine into English use. But this name loses its beauty when it is mispronounced, as it often is by those unacquainted with the classics. It should be in four syllables, with the accent on the second. But that it is turned into two syllables by educated people is evident; for when it was adopted by a late novelist for one of his heroines, it was denounced by a reviewer in a paper supposed to be written for the upper classes as "savouring of a barber's unguent."

Richardson's names, Clarissa and Pamela, remind us of Watteau shepherdesses. But from an autograph letter of Richardson, in the possession of Mrs. Charles Kingsley, it would seem that the romance of Richardson's youth was connected with a lady named Clarissa.

Fielding is content with the very plainest names. When he wrote "Joseph Andrews" as a parody on "Pamela," and to counteract the effect of Richardson's style, he no doubt



DEPARTURE OF THE MARQUIS OF LORNE AND THE PRINCESS LOUISE FOR CANADA—THE STEAM SHIP "SARMATIAN" purposely made the names plain in contrast to Richardson's. Miss Burney was fond of long-sounding names, and calls one of her novels "Evelina."

Miss Austen made use of Emma, Jane, Susan, Harriet, Elizabeth, Charlotte, and such names. Coleridge made the pretty name of Christabel familiar to us.

Charles Lamb wrote some amusing lines concerning the name of Frances, in an album of a lady of that name. After remarking that the name suits either man or woman, he says—

> She who this twin title decks,
> Combines what's good in either sex;
> Unites—how very rare the case is!—
> Masculine sense to female graces;
> And quitting not her proper rank,
> Is both in one—Fanny and Frank!

The female novelists of the present day have exhausted almost every form of female appellation; and the worse the writer, the more far-fetched and high-flown are the names. This will probably cause a reaction in favour of plain names again.

The names of the Royal Family are always in favour, but it is curious that the Queen's first name Alexandrina has never been much used; especially as she was in her early childhood known by it. That of the Princess of Wales was very quickly adopted.

But whether names are pretty or ugly, or common or fanciful, how few ladies there are who are not called by some pet word. A stately Elizabeth or a strong-minded Frances are perhaps addressed in the family circle by names that are not in any way connected with those given at their baptism, such as Tootums or Dumps or Widjums, or some other such ridiculous words. What lady when she is engaged to be married does not have some secret pet name by which she is known to her lover? Coleridge wrote:—

> I asked my fair one happy day,
> What I should call her in my lay;
> By what sweet name from Rome or Greece;
> Lalage, Neæra, Chloris,
> Sappho, Lesbia, or Doris,
> Arethusa or Lucrece.
> "Ah!" replied my gentle fair,
> "Beloved, what are names but air?
> Choose thou whatever suits the line;
> Call me Sappho, call me Chloris,
> Call me Lalage or Doris,
> Only, only call me thine."

And this would doubtless be the answer of many a young lady under the circumstances.

MARRIAGE.

On the 20th ult., at St. Nicholas Church, Sturry, by the Ven. Archdeacon Gray, late of Canton, China (cousin of the bride), assisted by the Very Reverend the Dean of Canterbury and the Rev. P. Collings, Vicar of Sturry, Major WILLIAM MACDONNELL, Army Pay Department, late 88th Connaught Rangers, son of the late WILLIAM MACDONNELL, of Lansdown Road, Dublin, Esquire, to ANNIE JESSIE PHILIPPA SOPHIA, only daughter of Colonel CHARLES JAMES COX, of Fordwich House, Fordwich, Kent.

THE INTERNATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

Announcement of a NEW PORTRAIT GALLERY (of INTERNATIONAL PORTRAITS), uniform with "THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY," recently completed in 80 Sixpenny Parts, and now published in Four Volumes, price 12s 6d. each.

THE INTERNATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

Each Part containing a life-like Portrait in Colours. What the National Portrait Gallery has done for our own countrymen it is proposed that THE INTERNATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY shall do for the celebrities of foreign nations. Foreigners of distinction, whose names are as familiar as household words in British ears, and yet with whose distinguished career the majority of readers may not have been familiarised, will in this new Work be made known by accurate Portraits in Colours and interesting Biographical Sketches.

CASSELL, PETTER, and GALPIN, London, and all Booksellers.

THE INTERNATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

Part I., ready Nov. 25 (price 6d.), will contain a life-like portrait of the EMPEROR OF GERMANY in Colours, and Biographical Sketch.

CASSELL, PETTER, and GALPIN, London, and all Booksellers

THE INTERNATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

Of THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY the British Quarterly Review remarked:—"The portraits are very admirable, both as likenesses and popular works of art. We do not know where a set of more perfect likenesses, natural in expression, and harmonious and delicate in tone, conveying more exactly the impression of the originals, could be met with. The biographies are also good—genial without flattery, discriminating, and terse."

The high standard of excellence which characterised THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY, and secured for it so striking a success, will be more than maintained in all particulars in THE INTERNATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY by improvements in the process of production, and it is believed that a corresponding measure of success will attend the issue of the new Work now about to be placed before the public.

OUR VILLAGE.

The Scotsman says: "There must be some readers who still remember the pleasure they experienced long ago in reading Miss Mitford's sketches. If they will recall that pleasure, and add to it all that can be given by beautiful illustrations, they will understand what a charming volume is here presented. . . . A singularly beautiful book for a present."

OUR VILLAGE.

Light says: "The illustrations are by Messrs C. O. Murray and W. H. J. Boot, and where the work of both gentlemen is so exquisitely beautiful, it is difficult to select subjects for special praise."

Light says: "The season is fast approaching when much trash is got up to sell for a guinea — when people buy gift-books indiscriminately, with a keen eye to the amount of gold in the binding. BUT TO ANYONE WITH A TASTE for what is sweet, simple, and beautiful, we recommend the illustrated "OUR VILLAGE."

"WE KNOW OF NO WORK WHICH WE can more cordially recommend as a Birthday or Christmas Present."—Light.

THE IMPENDING AFGHAN WAR—A STREET IN PESHAWUR

THE

Impending Afghan War

THE AMEER OF CABUL DICTATING HIS REPLY TO THE VICEROY

Unfortunately for us there is no telegraph office in the City of Cabul, nor has "our special correspondent" been yet able to penetrate those inhospitable regions. We must, therefore, wait patiently for the Ameer's reply to the Ultimatum of the Viceroy of India. In the mean time, the vivid imagination of one of the few Europeans who have had the honour of the Ameer's acquaintance has enabled us to present to our readers a sketch of the event as it may be supposed to take place within the audience chamber of the Ameer, in the Bala Hissar, in the City of Cabul.

The prominent figure in front is the Ameer himself, and behind him are his trusted advisers, the Mastophee, and the Meer Akhore, the former with the ordinary fur cap of an Afghan soldier, the latter in the usual dress of a Mohamedan gentleman. The official seated on the ground is the Ameer's confidential amanuensis, or Munshee, writing the words in Persian as they fall from the Ameer's lips; but with an occasional pause, as the wily Muscovite intrudes his advice. The other two attendants are of the Ameer's armed body guard.

"To be or not to be, that is the question." And we are afraid, from the resolute look of Shere Ali Khan, he is too blindly following the advice of the Russian diplomatist, and the message of peace is "not to be!" And soon the news of the coming conflict is carried to the Harem; for, unknown to that solemn conclave of privy counsellors, there has been standing, silently and secretly, at an inner door, a veiled female figure; a spy, deputed to unravel these hidden mysteries of State, and sent by no less a person than the Ameer's favourite wife, the mother of the late Abdullah Jan, who is ever watchful lest some sudden change of circumstances may favour the rival cause of that brave young soldier who for five long weary years has been imprisoned and disgraced—Yakoob Khan, the son of a rival mistress.

A FAC-SIMILE OF A CERTIFICATE SIGNED BY THE BRITISH PRISONERS IN CABUL, MARCH 11, 1842

Below is a fac-simile of a testimonial given by the British officers and ladies who were imprisoned in Fort Buddeeabad in Lugmān, as hostages after the rebellion in Cabul and the massacre of the British army of occupation in November, 1841. It is a certificate given to Meerza Bawudeen Khan, who had charge of the English prisoners from the 20th of January till March 18th, 1842, and which was brought to Peshawur by a descendant of the Meerza not long ago, and was photographed. Lieutenant Eyre, now Sir Vincent Eyre, says in his Diary (page 258), "Bawudeen Khan was an old acquaintance of Captain Troup who in peaceful times styled himself a Syud, but now for a time sunk his religious distinction of Syud in the more warlike distinction of Khan. This man had, at the outbreak of the rebellion, been imprisoned on suspicion of favouring the English, but was released immediately on the arrival of Mahomed Akbar, whom he had befriended during that chief's confinement at Bokhara, and to whose fortunes he now attached himself. His manners were exceedingly boorish, and he took little pains to render himself agreeable, though from his previous conduct there was reason to believe that, under his roughness of exterior, there lurked a secret preference for our cause."

Bahoow Khan whom Sirdar Mehemed Akbar Khan placed in charge of the Ladies & others of the Kabool Force detained at this place having requested a certificate of his conduct we the undersigned have much pleasure in stating that he has conducted himself with great kindness, & attention. showing every desire to make our situation as little irksome as possible.

A FAC-SIMILE OF A CERTIFICATE SIGNED BY THE BRITISH PRISONERS IN CABUL, MARCH 11, 1842

The date of the certificate, it will be seen, is March 11, 1842, namely, a week before the Meerza made over charge of the prisoners to his successor; and it will be of some interest to read Lieutenant Eyre's diary on the previous day, from which it appears that the Meerza had rendered some little service:—

"March 10.—In consequence of repeated earthquakes we deserted the house and took up our abode in some small wooden huts constructed by our servants. To-night our slumber was broken by loud cries of 'Murder!' which were found to proceed from Lady Sale's Hindoostani ayah, whom one of her admirers, in a fit of jealousy, had attempted to strangle in her sleep. The wretch, failing in his purpose, jumped over the wall, which was about twenty feet high, and, being discovered in the morning, narrowly escaped a hanging by lynch law at the hands of the Meerza (i.e., the official to whom this certificate was given next day), who was with difficulty persuaded to alter his sentence to banishment from the Fort."

The names appended to this are of historic interest:—

- Major-General Elphinstone, the unfortunate officer who was in command of the garrison at Cabul at the time of the rebellion, and to whose indecision of character much of the misfortunes attending the affair are attributed. At the time General Elphinstone wrote his signature he was suffering from much bodily and mental weakness, and he died on his way from Fort Buddeeabad, and was eventually buried at Jalalabad.
- Brigadier-General Shelton, who succeeded General Elphinstone in command of the troops, but with little success.
- Captain Colin Mackenzie (now General Mackenzie), Assistant Political Agent, who was wounded in action at Cabul, and who was present at the assassination of Sir William M'Naughten by Sardar Akbar Khan.
- Major Griffith, of 37th N.I., who was wounded on retreat in Khoord Cabul Pass.
- Captain Souter, of H.M. 44th Regiment, wounded on retreat at Gundnamak, and who bravely preserved the colours of his regiment by tying them round his waist.
- Lieutenant Vincent Eyre (now Sir Vincent Eyre), whose stirring narrative of his imprisonment the great Duke of Wellington declared had deprived him of a night's sleep!

Lieutenant R. Waller, of the Horse Artillery, wounded in action at Cabul, and who was a prisoner with his wife and two children.

Captain G. St. P. Lawrence (now Sir George Lawrence) Military Secretary to Sir William Macnaughten.

Captain Anderson, who was a prisoner with his wife and child, and whose eldest child, a little girl, was missing, having been lost in the Khoord Cabul Pass during the retreat. Lieutenant Eyre afterwards records the intense joy of Captain and Mrs. Anderson when, upon their release from prison, they found their eldest girl had been an inmate of Nawab Zerman Khan's family, where she had been treated with the greatest kindness. She had been taught to say, "My father and mother are infidels, but I am a Mussulman."

Major Eldred Pottinger, whom history will always celebrate as the "Hero of Herat," and of whom Sir Vincent Eyre has recently written:—"Should any similar crisis occur, whether in India or elsewhere, let us hope another such British hero as Eldred Pottinger may as opportunely start forth into the full blaze of fame, fired by his example and animated by his spirit."

Captain John Troup, wounded in the Khoord Cabul Pass. This officer lately died at Meerut, in North India, where he had commanded the garrison as Major-General.

Captain Bygrave, who had the toes of one foot nipped off by frost on retreat from Cabul.

Captain H. Johnson, of the Shah's service.

Mrs. Anderson, wife to Captain Anderson.

Lady Macnaughten, the widow of the late British Envoy, Sir William Macnaughten.

Dr. John Magrath, of the 37th Native Infantry.

Mrs. Eyre, wife of Lieutenant Eyre.

Lieutenant B. Melville, of the 54th Native Infantry, wounded on retreat near Huft Kotul.

Lady Florentia Sale, whose narrative of the "Cabul War" has been published, and whose brave husband, at the time of her imprisonment, was nobly defending his garrison at Jalalabad.

Mrs. Sturt, Lady Sale's daughter, and widow of Lieutenant Sturt, of the Engineers, killed in the Khoord Cabul Pass.

Mrs. Waller, wife of Lieutenant Waller.

Mrs. Trevor, widow of Captain Trevor, who was cut down as he was riding away from the conference with Akbar Khan, at which Macnaughten was assassinated.

Mrs. Trevor and her eight children were imprisoned at Buddeeabad, the eighth being born in the fort.

Lieutenant Mein, of H.M.'s 13th Regiment, who was wounded in action under General Sale, in the Khoord Cabul Pass.

J. Trevor, probably Mrs. Trevor's eldest child.

Mr. Ryley, Conductor of Ordnance, who was imprisoned with his wife and three children.

J. Waller, probably the eldest child of Lieutenant Waller.

Captain Boyd, Assistant Commissioner-General, who was imprisoned with his wife and three children; the youngest being born in prison.

Mrs. Boyd, the wife of Captain Boyd. The eldest child of Captain and Mrs. Boyd had been lost in their retreat from Cabul, but he was found by Sardar Akbar Khan, and made over to his parents.

H. B. Mainwaring, probably the wife of a non-commissioned officer, as the name appears amongst the ladies released from prison, but does not occur in the published list of the commissioned officers of the Cabul force.

Major-General Elphinstone assumed the command of the troops in Afghanistan, in April, 1841, when the country enjoyed a state of apparent tranquillity, and had not taken any previous part in the military occupation of Cabul. Of General Elphinstone Lieutenant Eyre writes: "No one who knew General Elphinstone could fail to esteem his many excellent qualities both in public and private. His professional knowledge was extensive; and before disease had too much impaired his frame for active exertion he had zealously applied himself to improve and stimulate every branch of the service. He had, indeed, one unhappy fault as a general—the results probably of age and infirmity—and this was his want of confidence in his own judgment, leading him to prefer everybody's opinion to his own. Hence much of that indecision, procrastination, and want of method which paralysed all our efforts, gradually demoralised the troops, and ultimately, not being redeemed by the qualities of his second in command, proved the ruin of us all. I might add that during the siege no one exposed his person more fearlessly or frequently to the enemy's fire than General Elphinstone. His courage was never doubted."

PESHAWUR

The only portion of Afghanistan now in possession of England is the Peshawur Valley, which lies between the celebrated Khyber Pass and the River Indus, together with a portion of the Kohat and Dera Ismail Khan districts, which are separated from the Peshawur Valley by a range of mountains inhabited by independent sections of the great Afghan tribe of Afreedees, but through which there is a road known as "the Kohat Pass," which is available for the transit of military stores and merchandise. This Pass is kept open to the British in consideration of an annual sum paid by the Indian Government to the heads of the Afreedee tribes. The Peshawur Valley came into the possession of the English Government in 1849 as part of the kingdom of Runjeet Singh, who had some years previously conquered it from the Afghans. It contains an area of 2,400 square miles, and is divided through its whole extent by the Cabul River (the ancient Cophes), which falls into the Indus immediately above Attock. The population of the entire district is estimated at 524,000, and the whole of the village population consists of Afghans, speaking the Afghan language (Pushto), and intermarrying with the Afghans of the surrounding hills, as well as with those of the kingdom of Cabul.

The city of Peshawur is not only a great commercial centre, but situated as it is at the gate of Central Asia, it is regarded as the most important military outpost in our Indian Empire. The regular military garrison of Peshawur consists of three batteries of artillery, two English regiments, two native cavalry, and three native infantry regiments. There are also at Nowshera (a station within the valley), one English regiment and one of native cavalry, and one of infantry; whilst at Murdan is stationed the Corps of Guides, a well-known native corps of infantry and cavalry (the Prince of Wales's Own), under the command of Colonel Jenkins. There is a line of mud forts along the frontier line which are usually occupied by detachments of native troops, namely, Fort Mackeson, commanding the Kohat Pass, Fort Michnee at the entrance of the Tartara Pass, and Fort Shubkudder, which commands the Caroppa Pass leading to Lalpura, the strong garrison of Peshawur itself standing sentinel at the mouth of the Khyber, with the police watch tower (represented in our engraving) on the extreme frontier line.

Peshawur has, unfortunately, obtained an unenviable notoriety on account of the unhealthiness of its climate, and is known amongst British soldiers as the "Valley of Death." Since the British occupation of the valley there have been as many as seven cholera epidemics of a very fatal character. The five cemeteries of the place testify to the sad fact that many a young soldier crossed the Indus never to return. The repeated assassinations of Europeans which have taken place in the district have also rendered it famous in the annals of Indian history, and it will doubtless interest many of our readers if we record the names of those who have thus fallen at Peshawur.

Lieutenant Arthur Houlnois, Bengal Engineers, who was killed by a band of Momunds, at Michnee, January 12, 1852.

Colonel Mackeson, Commissioner of Peshawur, who was assassinated by an Afghan fanatic, in the portico of his house, September, 1853, and of whose death Lord Dalhousie said "it would have dimmed a victory."

Lieutenant Thomas More Hand, of the 51st Native Infantry, who was shot by an Afreedee, near the Khyber Pass, January 27, 1857.

The Rev. Isidore Loewenthal, the translator of the New Testament into the language of the Afghans, who was shot by his watchman, April 27, 1864.

Major Robert Roy Adams, Deputy Commissioner of Peshawur, who was murdered by a Mahomedan fanatic near the city gate, January 22, 1865.

Lieutenant A. M. Ommanney, who was assassinated at the regimental band-stand at Murdan, by an Afghan from Swat, October 3, 1865.

Mr. Bean, an equestrian, who, having been invited by Cumadan Azim Khan to proceed to Cabul, was shot by his treacherous host near Fort Michnee, March 21, 1867.

Major Macdonald, who was cruelly murdered by Momund Afreedees, near Michnee, March 21, 1873.

Several European soldiers have also been assassinated by Afghans; and both Chief Justice Norman, of Calcutta, and the lamented Earl Mayo were stabbed by Afghans from the Peshawur district. The assassin of Earl Mayo, Shere Ali, was for some time an orderly to the Commissioner of the Peshawur district.

The climate of Peshawur is exceedingly hot in summer, but cool and pleasant in winter. During November, December, January, and February it very much resembles the climate of the south of France, whilst the thermometer in June and July frequently reaches 102° in the shade. There is no rainy season, as in other parts of India, but there are frequently days of incessant rain in January and February. The whole valley is naturally well-watered and exceedingly fertile, and its principal crops are rice, wheat, barley, and maize, whilst English vegetables are cultivated with great success. The grapes of Peshawur are celebrated in all parts of Northern India, and are cultivated in the villages on the Bara River without much trouble, whilst plums, figs, peaches, pomegranates, mulberries, and quinces grow in abundance, although inferior in flavour to those grown in Europe.

The native city of Peshawur is a flourishing town about five miles in circuit, and contains 60,000 inhabitants of mixed races of Afghans, Sikhs, and Hindus, about two-thirds of the inhabitants being Mahomedans. It is surrounded by a mud wall, with eight principal gates, the chief entrance from the Khyber Pass being the Cabul Gate, where a new structure is being erected as a Memorial Archway to the memory of the late Major-General Sir Herbert Edwardes, K.C.B., who was Commissioner at Peshawur during the Indian Mutiny. With the exception of a large mosque, with its two lofty minarets, there is no building of any architectural pretensions in the city, although the place has been much improved by the recent widening of streets and very careful drainage carried out with great energy and skill by Major Ommanney, the late Deputy Commissioner of the Peshawur.

During the winter months Peshawur is the great commercial mart for the whole of Central Asia, and its streets are crowded with motley groups of strangers from Cabul, Ghuznee, Chitral, Kohistan, Pugwar, Khawak, and hundreds of unheard-of-places known only to Europeans who take Lord Salisbury's advice, and study "large maps" of Central Asian Provinces. These men generally bring down horses, furs, skins, chogas, and rough woollen cloth, which they readily sell in the Peshawur market. But Peshawur is not only known to the Central Asian world as a place of merchandise, but it has always had its reputation as a centre of learning, for Akhund Darweza, Pir Baba, Kaka Sahib, and more recently the Akhund of Swat, are names as well known in the Mahomedan theological world as Westcott, and Pusey, and Stanley, are known to modern Englishmen. Consequently an extensive book trade is carried on at Peshawur, and every year numerous camel-loads of Korans and other religious books find their way over the steep mountain passes to the regions of Turkistan and Badakshan, for the cheapness of lithographic printing has promoted the study of Mahomedan books, which are printed by thousands at Delhi, Lucknow, Cawnpore, and Bombay. Peshawur has also been the source of most of the Afghan literature, and the great national poet of the Afghans, Abdur Rahman, lies buried in a graveyard not far from the city.

For many years several of the leading members of the present Ameer's family resided at Peshawur, and the old fort, once held by the Barakzais, has been only recently levelled to the ground. The grave of the mother of Shere Ali is still to be seen not far from the Wazeeree Bagh on the old residence of the Barakzai family. The palaces of two of the Ameer's uncles, Yar Mahomed Khan and Peer Mahomed Khan, are used respectively as the Government Dispensary and the Church Mission Anglo-Vernacular School.

THE STREETS OF PESHAWUR

The chief street of Peshawur is the entrance to the native city from the military cantonments, and as most of the necessary stores needed for the expedition are collected within the native city, one of our illustrations represents a commissariat train of mules and camels conveying the supplies from the city to the military camp outside the walls, whilst another is a sketch of a very characteristic side street of the same city, with the native troops fresh from Hindostan marching to cantonments. Both sketches have been drawn from photographs taken on the spot by an officer of the Indian army.

THE BRITISH TROOPS ENCAMPED IN THE HILLS AT CHERAT

As a remedy against the unhealthiness of Peshawur, the British troops are every year moved from that station to the Khuttuk Hills, which are situated about thirty miles from Peshawur. Our engraving represents the encampment of Her Majesty's 55th Regiment at Cherat, which is 4,000 miles above the level of the sea.

It was at a picket on the outskirts of the Cherat encampment that the Jowaki tribe of Afreedees attacked a native guard and killed some fifteen sepoys last year, and which led to the successful Jowaki Expedition of January last, under the command of Generals Keyes and Ross. There are two English cemeteries at Cherât; and in the midst of the rugged rocks may be seen the graves of many a brave fellow whose fine English constitution succumbed beneath the malarious influences of the Peshawur climate. The cemetery of the 42nd Highlanders is exceedingly picturesque, for most of the tombs are formed out of the solid rocks, which bear the names of the departed. It will, perhaps, be some consolation to the friends of those whose remains lie in the midst of these distant hills to know that the resting-places of Britain's dead are carefully preserved and guarded by each succeeding garrison as it occupies the Cherât encampment.

THE HOUSE IN WHICH AMEER SHERE ALI RESIDED AT PESHAWUR IN 1869

On his way to meet Lord Mayo at Umballa Ameer Shere Ali stayed at Peshawur, and at his own special request he resided in the Mission House of the Church Missionary Society, which was kindly lent to him by the missionaries of that Society. The house which is represented in our engraving is built upon the walls of the Serai, which is situated in the centre of the native city, and is known as the Gurkhuttree, and it is remarkable that this enclosure contains representative institutions of the three great religious creeds in India; for, in addition to the Christian Mission House, there are both a Mahomedan Mosque and a Hindu Temple. The Gurkhuttree is the most ancient part of the city, and is celebrated as the residence of the Italian General Avitable, who ruled Peshawur for the Sikhs with a rod of iron. In General Avitable's day the most common sights on the walls of the Gurkhuttree were the decapitated heads of Afghan brigands, which were exposed to view for days both as an example and a warning to his turbulent subjects. The General is said to have amassed a large fortune during his brief protectorate, but to have found it absolutely impossible to obtain leave to retire with his gains from the Sikh service. Fortunately for him, however, the British troops in Cabul needed money, which he most readily advanced for bills of exchange on Calcutta and London, and he was in this way able to decamp with his treasure without exciting the suspicions of the Sikh Government. For some time he resided in his native land, but was eventually poisoned by a member of his own family. The name of "Avitable Sahib" is still a word of terror to the children of Peshawur, whilst the recollection of his iron rule is yet green in the remembrance of many of the old folks of the valley.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH AT PESHAWUR, WITH THE KHYBER IN THE DISTANCE

The first object which strikes the eye of the traveller as he enters the Peshawur valley from the Khyber Pass is the tower of the Peshawur Church. It is a fine Gothic structure erected in the Cantonments, close to the highway to Cabul. It is an exceedingly handsome structure, and is capable of seating about 1,200 troops. When the residents of Peshawur some years ago decided to erect the church, the spot selected was said by the natives to have been the site of a celebrated saint's grave, and as the foundations were being laid some of the old sages of the valley shook their heads, and declared that such sacrilege could never obtain the blessing of the Almighty! Strange to relate, it did take an unconscionably long time to get the roof on, and then at last, the money fell short; but the Freemasons, true to their craft, came liberally forward and collected the sum of money needed, and the present handsome structure represented in our engraving now stands as a monument to the piety and religious zeal of Englishmen, at the very gate of Central Asia. The church contains numerous monuments to English officers and others who have died at Peshawur. The mountains in the background are the regions inhabited by the Afreedee and Momund tribes, with the Sufaid Koh, or White Mountain, in the distance.

COLONEL SIR LEWIS PELLY, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., LATE ENVOY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY TO THE AMEER OF CABUL

Sir Lewis Pelly was the officer selected by Lord Salisbury to carry on negotiations with the Ameer of Cabul in 1877. The Ameer did not follow the example of his father, and meet the Viceroy's Agent in person, but sent as his representative Syud Nur Mohammed Shah, accompanied by the Meer Akhor, to meet Sir Lewis Pelly at Peshawur. The Peshawur Political Conference commenced on the 27th of January, 1877, and lasted some six weeks, and it was on that occasion that Sir Lewis Pelly was able to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the English Government the fact that the past conciliatory policy had not found favour with the Ameer of Cabul.

Sir Lewis, having been educated at Rugby, entered the Bombay Army in 1840, and served his regiment in Sindh. In 1851 he was Acting Political Assistant at Baroda, under Colonel Outram, and the next year he was appointed to the Sindh Commission, in which he served as revenue officer, and in other civil departments. He was made Personal Assistant to the Commissioner of Sindh in 1856, and the same year accompanied General John Jacob as Aide-de-Camp in the Persian Expedition, and afterwards became Political Secretary to Sir James Outram. In 1859 he was Secretary of Legation at the Persian Court, under Sir Henry Rawlinson, and Chargé d'Affaires upon Sir Henry Rawlinson's retirement. In 1860 he was sent on a special mission to report on the condition of the Persian army in Turkomania, and on the political situation of Herat and Afghanistan. In the following year he was selected by Lord Canning as Political Agent of the Indian Government to the East Coast of Africa, where he confirmed treaties with the Syud of Zanzibar on the separation of Zanzibar from the Imaumate of Muscat, and at the same time carried out measures for the suppression of the slave trade on that coast. In 1862 he was appointed British Resident in the Persian Gulf, and it was during his residence at Bushire that Colonel Pelly visited the celebrated Wahhaby capital in Najd. In 1866 he punished the pirates at Soor, and received a Companionship of the Star of India for his services. In 1869 he seized the pirate chiefs off the Island of Bahrin, and negotiated a Convention for the lease of the Banda Abbas by the Shah of Persia to the Sultan of Muscat. In 1872 he was sent to Constantinople to frame an Order in Council with reference to Persia, and in the December of the same year he accompanied Sir Bartle Frere on his Anti-Slavery Mission to the East Coast of Africa. Upon his return from Africa, Sir Lewis was appointed Governor-General's Agent in Rajputana, which appointment he at present holds, although on furlough in England. In 1874 he was created a Knight Commander of the Star of India, and was sent by Lord Northbrook on a Special Mission of Enquiry into the Affairs of the Baroda State, and on January 5th, 1875, arrested the Guikowar of Baroda. When on furlough in England in 1876 he was sent out by Lord Salisbury with Lord Lytton (who had just been made Viceroy of India), with a special view to his carrying on negotiations with the Ameer of Cabul, and after his labours in the Peshawur Conference of 1877 he returned to England, and was created a Knight Commander of the Bath. Sir Lewis was recently married in Westminster Abbey to a step-daughter of Sir Rutherford Alcock.

THE IMPENDING AFGHAN WAR

Sir Lewis Pelly's Mission lasted six weeks, during which time he was assisted by the well-known Orientalist and traveller, Dr. H. W. Bellew, C.S.I. There has been much discussion with reference to the nature of the communication which took place at that time between the respective envoys of the Indian and Afghan Government, and for the present the India Office seems determined to keep the whole matter a profound secret. This much, however, is certain, that the "Peshawur Conference" was the means of bringing to light the true state of things as they existed in Cabul, and of revealing the true character of the Ameer's dissatisfaction with the treatment he had received from England. That Sir Lewis brought with him all the fitness and necessary qualifications required for so important a Mission is evident from the record of his past services to his country which we are now able to record.

THE LATE SYUD NUR MOHAMED SHAH, LATE ENVOY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY FROM THE AMEER OF CABUL

Syud Nur Mohamed Shah was a native of Candahar, and for many years regularly visited India as a horse dealer. The late Ameer Dost Mohamed Khan appointed him to some subordinate post in his household, from which he gradually rose to one of some considerable power and influence. When the present Ameer of Cabul established himself on his throne in 1868 he appointed Syud Nur Mohamed Shah Prime Minister, and the Syud accompanied the Ameer to the Umballa Conference in 1869, and was the only Afghan official present during the Ameer's private interviews with Lord Mayo. Upon a more recent occasion he was sent by the Ameer of Cabul to negotiate with Lord Northbrook, and in January, 1877, he was appointed Envoy and Plenipotentiary to meet Colonel Sir Lewis Pelly at Peshawur. He was then accompanied by the Meer Akhor (the Agent from Cabul, who met Sir Neville Chamberlain in the Khyber), and the polite and gentlemanly bearing of the Syud was said to be a very striking contrast to the uncouth and ungracious bearing of his uneducated companion. On his way to Peshawur the Syud was seized with a painful illness, but he conducted his business with the British Envoy even when undergoing the most excruciating bodily sufferings. He was attended by the Civil Surgeon of Peshawur, Dr. Courtenay, and by two Afghan physicians, sent specially from Cabul, but he succumbed to the disease after a most painful illness, and died in the old Mess House of H.M.'s 51st Regiment, March 26th, 1877. By the death of the Syud Ameer Shere Ali lost his wisest and truest friend, and one whose wise counsels might, perhaps, have saved Afghanistan at the present hour. The Meer Akhor, who was afterwards deputed to turn back the English Mission under General Chamberlain, is a native of the village Akarpura near Peshawar. A man of mean extraction and of no education, he is, however, a personage of reputed sanctity, and is therefore employed by his master to excite, if possible, the religious sympathies of the people in behalf of the Ameer's cause.

THE GATHERING OF THE CLANS

Between that portion of Afghanistan occupied by the British and the territories of the Ameer there is a long line of independent tribes occupying the mountainous ranges which form our north-western barrier. Adjoining the Peshawur Valley, there are the Gaduns, Buneerwals, Swatees, Utman Kheyls, Momunds, and Afreedees, numbering some 80,000 fighting men. Further down our frontier, near to Banoo and Dera Ismail Khan, there are the Orukzais, Zaimoshtees, Turees, and Wazeerees, who can muster at least another 80,000. These men are armed with matchlocks, pistols, swords, and knives, and, being used to hill warfare, will be a powerful auxiliary to that side with which they cast in their lot. Every effort is being made by Generals Browne and Roberts to induce these warlike tribes to join the British standard, and already some of the leading tribes have assembled with our troops for an onward march.

THE ELEPHANT BATTERY OF ROYAL ARTILLERY

The heavy train elephant battery represented in our engraving is that commanded by Major Wilson, R.A., and which was detailed .for special duty with Sir N. Chamberlain. Being stationed at Peshawur, it now awaits orders to march forward to the Khyber Pass, where it will doubtless render most essential service.

FORT JUMROOD, AT THE ENTRANCE OF THE KHYBER

The old mud fort at Jumrood is situated ten miles from the Peshawur Cantonments, and close to the entrance of the Khyber Pass. It originally belonged to the Afghans, but it was seized by the Sikhs in 1837, and in an attempt made by the Afghans to retake it, the Sikh General Huree Singh was killed. According to the Sikh custom he was burnt, and his ashes are now entombed in a brick tower which is still seen in the walls of the fort facing Peshawur. Since the British occupation of Peshawur, Fort Jumrood has been held to be neutral ground, and nominally in charge of the independent Afreedee tribes. When the Ameer Shere Ali, in 1869, attempted to station a detachment of his troops in the Fort, he was reminded by the Peshawur authorities that such a step would not meet with the approval of the Indian Government. With a view to ulterior measures the Indian Government has placed troops at Jumrood, and the fact that this has been done without any hostile demonstration from the Afreedees, to whom the fort is supposed to belong, seems to be an indication of the friendly intentions of the Afreedee tribes of the Khyber towards the English.

HUREE SINGH KA BOORJ, THE FRONTIER LINE OF BRITISH INDIA

Huree Singh Ka Boorj, or the Tower of Huree Singh, a celebrated Sikh General, is a police station at the extreme north-west frontier of British India, about six miles from Peshawur, and four miles from Fort Jumrood. Beyond this tower no European is allowed to pass without a passport from the Peshawur authorities, and it was a disregard of this arrangement that cost Lieut. Hand his life in 1857. Parties of Europeans visiting the Khyber Pass are always escorted by Afreedee Chiefs from Huree Singh's Tower.

THE NATIVE CITY OF LAHORE AS SEEN FROM THE FORT

Lahore is the capital of the Punjaub, and the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province. It is here that the Viceroy intends to stay until the present arrangements for an expedition to Cabul are completed. The City of Lahore is a quaint old native town with narrow streets, and with a strange mixture of Mahomedan and Sikh buildings. Our illustration is from a photograph taken from the top of the Fort, and includes in the view a picture of the Jumma Musjid, or Great Mosque, in the centre, and of the tomb of Runjeet Singh, the late ruler of the Punjaub, on the left. The European part of Lahore is outside the city walls, and stretches out for a distance of three miles towards the military cantonment of Meean Meer. It is known as Anarkullee, being named after a celebrated native dancing girl, whose remains lie entombed in the building at present used as a church. Efforts are now being made by the new Bishop of Lahore (Dr. French) to erect a suitable cathedral at Lahore. Lahore is about 300 miles from Peshawur, 1,700 miles from Calcutta and Bombay, and 200 miles from Mooltan.

FORT ATTOCK, AT THE ENTRANCE TO THE PESHAWUR VALLEY

The Fort at Attock is situated on the left, or east, bank of the River Indus, and commands the entrance to the Peshawur Valley, which is approached by a bridge of boats. The fort was erected by the Emperor Akbar, and is still a fortification of some strength. It is held by a garrison battery of artillery and a company of British soldiers. The bridge is formed of some thirty boats at a point where the stream is about 550 feet wide. This bridge is sufficiently strong for all military stores and guns to pass over it, but elephants are made to swim across the rapids. In the summer, when the melting of the snow in the lofty mountains to the north raises the stream, the bridge becomes endangered, and it is withdrawn when communication between the Peshawur Valley and the rest of India can be performed by a ferry; the boatmen, who form a distinct tribe, have resided at Attock since the days of Akbar. The banks of the river are high on both sides, so that the increased fall of water deepens, rather than widens, the stream. The depth of the Indus at Attock is, when at its lowest, 30 feet, and at its highest some 70 feet. In the winter months there is a ford at Hood, a place five miles above Attock, but this ford is seldom used on account of the coldness of the water and the rapidity of the stream. In 1856 the Indian Government commenced the construction of a tunnel under the Indus at Attock, but the work has never been completed, as it has been decided eventually, upon the completion of the Punjaub State Railway, to construct a bridge over the river. The bridge of boats is generally available for traffic from October to May inclusive. The name Attock signifies obstacle, and with reference to which there is some discussion amongst the learned. Some say it was the first serious obstacle Alexander the Great met with in his invasion of India, although it is now generally supposed that the Macedonian conqueror crossed the Indus at Torbeyla, and not at Attock. Some state that the name was given to the place by the Emperor Akbar for similar reasons; whilst others suppose that the name was given under the presumption that no scrupulous Hindu would proceed westward of it. On the right bank, which is the Peshawur side of the river, there is the village of Khyrabad, where there is an old ruined fort, said to have been erected by Nadir Shah, and which was occupied by a regiment of Muzabee Sikhs during the excavation of the tunnel to which we have referred.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE AMEER SHERE ALI KHAN

BY AN ANGLO-INDIAN

I first met Shere Ali, the present Ameer of Cabul, in March, 1869, when he visited India for a conference with Earl Mayo at Umballa. He was then a man of about fifty years of age, of middle stature, with marked aquiline features, and with a fine soldierly bearing. Indeed, so anxious are the Barakzai rulers of Cabul to be considered soldiers and chiefs rather than kings that they have never assumed the title of Shah, but merely that of Ameer. Shere Ali struck me as a man of remarkably good common sense, and his powers of conversation were very great. During his stay at Peshawur, both on his way to Umballa, and on his return to Cabul, he held daily levees, and spent most of his time in friendly interviews with the Europeans and natives who visited him. In his lengthened conversation with European visitors (with whom he always took tea), he evinced a very correct acquaintance with the leading facts of European history. This was all the more notable because he was unable to read or write, and had thereby acquired his information from conversations with those of his attendants who were able to read, and a special clerk, acquainted with English, has always been kept at the Court of Cabul to translate articles and telegrams from the Indian newspapers. I found he knew much of the history of Napoleon the First, Peter the Great, Alexander, and even Alfred the Great. His favourite character was Napoleon, and on no account would he yield the palm to our Wellington. His sense of humour was very great. "I know I am a savage," he said one day, "but you English were just as bad three hundred years ago!" Once, when he was unusually talkative, he said, "How dreadfully afraid you English are of the Russians!" "Not in the least," I replied; "we shall be excellent neighbours some day!" "Ah," he said, "if you were not afraid of the Russians you would not make so much of me!" He affected not to be impressed with the beauty of English ladies, and several times remarked as he passed them, "Ah! I see you keep all your pretty women at home!" He frequently expressed his abhorrence of low-necked dresses and short-tailed coats, and said such advances in the scale of civilisation were contrary to his religion, for they were forbidden by the Prophet! He professed to be a devout and pious Muslim, but numerous empty bottles told of frequent departures from the strict injunctions of his religion, and when at Jalandar, where he was received in the most friendly manner by Sir D. Forsyth, he did not hesitate to suggest that cherry brandy was much more suited to his taste when served in tumblers than in small liqueur glasses.

He was most impressed by the fine manly bearing of the Viceroy, and all present at the Umballa Durbar observed how this semi-savage, fresh from his native hills, quailed beneath the hospitable, but truly British, grasp of Lord Mayo's hand. It was a long time before any one knew the real results of the Umballa Conference, but it was to Shere Ali's interest to make it appear that he possessed a Treaty, and it was this impression that he endeavoured to give upon his return journey, nevertheless I can now recall a gloomy mood of depression and despondency which was a marked contrast to the high spirits with which he entered India. "I am now a king!" he over and over exclaimed, as he witnessed the lavish expenditure of money upon his reception, but doubtless, when he found he had obtained no written security of friendship for his dynasty, an idea as cherished to a Barakzai as it is to a Bonaparte, his heart failed him, for he saw in the future but a repetition of the past—civil war! dethronement! death!

The Ameer's youngest son, Abdullah Jan, was with him, and appeared to be a youth of some promise—he was then about twelve years of age. He could read and write Persian, and was then learning English. The Ameer often spoke of his eldest son, Yakoob, in terms of admiration, and told me he was a very fair English scholar, and a fine soldier. The Ameer generally spoke Persian, but to the Afghan villager and hill-men he spoke Pushto; he could also make himself understood in Hindustani, and could give the military words of command in English. He has had the reputation of being an author, for a book against Wahhabyism bears his name, but it was written by a Moulvie in the name of the Ameer of Cabul. He always seemed much interested in the manner and customs of the English people, and conversed for hours on subjects connected with our national and domestic life. When in India he bought up all the second-hand uniforms of European officers he could lay his hands on for the use of his staff, and he also purchased rather an extensive English wardrobe for himself. He said the European dress was the dress for soldiers, and the Oriental dress for women and priests. When asked by Lord Mayo how he liked the dress of the Highland regiments, he said it was "terrific," but "was it decent?" Of all the presents he received at Umballa, the mountain train battery of guns and the two English horses which Lord Mayo gave him appeared to delight him most. Both to and from Umballa, a distance of about 500 miles each way, he was driven in a Government van by Mr. Faichnie, the English Superintendent of the Postal Department, to whom he gave a handsome gold watch. During his journey he was accompanied by the late Colonel Charles Chamberlain, a brother of Sir N. Chamberlain. This was at his special request, for upon his first arrival at Jumrood he requested that some relative of his old friend, Neville Chamberlain, might attend him during his visit to India. At Umballa he refused to receive a visit from Sir Peter Lumsden on account of some long-standing enmity which he, true to the Afghan character, would never forget or forgive.

During the lifetime of the Dost it was well known that whilst his sons Afzul and Azim Khan were in favour of an alliance with England, Shere Ali was always strongly pro-Russian. It was only dire necessity which brought him to Umballa in 1869, and it was the moral support which he obtained from the English then that has enabled him to maintain his throne. For several years he continued to send his brothers and other State prisoners into British territory for safe keeping, and his nephew Ismail Khan, who was the chief instrument in securing the throne for Shere Ali, died a prisoner at Lahore. Two brothers, Sharif Khan and Ahmad Khan, are still in India, and a nephew, the son of Akbar Khan, who assassinated Sir W. Macnaughten, Jalaluddeen Khan, is still at Rawul Pindee. Ahmad Khan being a son of Dost Mohamed by a Sudozai princess, unites in his person the two contending dynasties of Barakzai and Sudozai. Jalaluddeen Khan is not only Shere Ali's nephew, but also his son-in-law, having married one of his daughters. During the Ameer's visit to Peshawur, Jalaluddeen sought an interview, but it was refused. Out of a large number of brothers the Ameer has only one whom he can regard as friendly to his cause, namely Wali Mohamed Khan, who is now in Cabul. He has estranged his whole family from him by his unnatural treatment of his brothers, Aslam Khan and Husein Khan, whom he murdered, and of his son Yakoob Khan, whom he has imprisoned for so many years.

II.

Perhaps the paper of most interest in the Fortnightly Review is Mr. Matthew Arnold's plea for the organisation in England of a more satisfactory system of secondary instruction. In France, what with the Lycées and the Communal Colleges, there are 81 great secondary schools of the first class, and 252 of the second, "all of them with a public character, all of them under inspection, all of them offering guarantees of the capacity of their teaching staff, and in these schools a total of 79,241 scholars." In Great Britain and Ireland, on the other hand, there are certainly not more than 20,000 boys receiving a secondary instruction which can in any possible sense be said to offer guarantees for its efficiency. And these 20,000 boys belong all but exclusively to the aristocratic and upper-middle, or professional classes; the immense middle-class proper, the commercial class, is with us left to an education which Mr. Arnold calls "deplorable." In England the professional class, at an immense money price, which it can ill afford to pay, is brought up with the aristocratic class on "the first plane," the middle class on "the second plane;" while in France the whole middle class is brought up together on "the first plane." Hence in France the middle class is not cut in two as here, and has in consequence "a homogeneity, an extent and an importance, which it has nowhere else." Mr. Arnold's plan for improvement is the establishment throughout the country of a proper supply of secondary schools, supported partly by the State and partly by municipal grants. For the present it seems sufficient to say of this scheme that, with all its advantages, it would cost a great deal of money, and we do not see from what quarter the pressure necessary to extract such large sums as would be wanted could be expected to come. Besides, a good deal might be said, though we have not the space to say it here, on the political disadvantages attending that divorce between the professional and the governing classes in this country which Mr. Arnold seeks to bring about. It is at any rate arguable that the comparative identification "in thought, feeling, and manners" which at present exists between the two may have had its share in promoting political stability.—In a paper entitled "Civilisation and Noise," Mr. Sully discusses with much ability, and evidently a very deep personal feeling, a subject which comes home to the "business and bosoms" of many of us—the "whole Iliad of afflictions" to which, as he says, "a highly developed and cultivated ear" is exposed by the various noises—often quite unnecessary noises—of modern great cities. And these horrible discordant sounds are not only grievous in themselves, but have an even more distressing effect in disturbing and distracting the attention to an extent which in the case of many persons may lead to "an amount of suffering which may appreciably colour their conscious existence." We do not think that Mr. Sully at all overstates his case, though we are afraid he is right in holding that the time is not ripe for the sufferers from noise to look for much relief from legislation. But a great deal would be done if the community at large could be brought to understand that to people of sensitive ears and nerves, particularly if engaged on mental work, noise is a very real and distressing evil, and no mere imaginary annoyance, which would cease to be an annoyance at all if they made up their minds not to attend to it.—Mr. Chamberlain's defence of the Caucus against the strictures of Mr. E. D. J. Wilson and others is able and ingenious, but will hardly satisfy any who are not prepared to look on party organisation and party triumphs as ends justifying and sanctifying any sacrifices.—In a paper on "The Recent Development of Socialism in Germany and the United States," Professor Fawcett points out that that excessive dependence upon the State, which is the most prominent characteristic of modern Socialism, will inevitably exist in greatest activity in such countries as the above-named, where "industrial independence has been sacrificed to a wide-spread system of protection, and the lesson has been persistently taught that industrial prosperity is mainly to be secured by tariff-regulations and Custom-house restrictions." The "Two Foreign Opinions on the Treaty of Berlin,"—those, namely, of Señor Castelar and M. Emile de Laveleye—forms another article of considerable interest.

A noteworthy paper in the Contemporary Review is the first, styled "What is Going On at the Vatican?" by an anonymous writer, who would seem to be a Romanist of reforming tendencies, very deeply in the confidence of Father Curci, and a sworn foe to the Jesuits and the Roman Curia. He is very friendly to the Pope, and confirms the impression generally entertained as to his character. "The long-cherished and supreme ambition of Leo XIII.," he says, "may be described in a single sentence—it aims at putting and leaving the Church in relations of friendship and peace with all civilised States." But in this aim, we are told, he is hampered by the Cardinals, the large majority of whom are obstructive and reactionary. But though the writer would have us regard him as quite behind the scenes at the Vatican, readers will probably do well to accept his revelations with a certain amount of caution, as revelations from that quarter generally proceed from persons who think they know a great deal more than they do.—"The Alcohol Question" is discussed here in papers by Sir James Paget, Dr. Lauder Brunton, and Dr. Albert Bernays. Sir James Paget maintains that temperance is better than abstinence on the strength of the evidence of history. Broadly comparing the Western with the Eastern races we find that the former use, and the latter do not use, alcoholic drinks. Confining ourselves to the races of Europe we find, again, that those of the North use alcoholic drinks more freely than those of the South. But, says Sir James, there is no evidence to show that the Easterns live longer or are healthier than the Westerns, or Southern Europeans than Northern Europeans; whilst as to working power there can be no question that the advantage is with the consumers of alcohol. Dr. Brunton's account of the precise character of the action of alcohol on the system is also decidedly interesting.—Mr. G. Matheson's paper on "The Originality of the Character of Christ," as being a conception beyond the reach of the thought of the age, either Jewish or Gentile, is sensible enough—indeed, thoroughly orthodox as it is, it would hardly provoke dissent from the generality of modern sceptics—but it does not seem to open up any new ground. We cannot help remarking, however, that Mr. Matheson appears to insist too strongly on narrowness, exclusiveness, and fanaticism being general characteristics of the Judaism of the time of Christ. Any one would think he had never heard of Philo of Alexandria and his school.—We have also, from Professor Edward Dowden, an article on "The Text of Wordsworth"—which suffered to an unusual extent from alterations and improvements, or fancied improvements, effected by the poet himself during the course of his long life—which is an exceedingly careful piece of work and very curious reading.

In the Cornhill we have a paper on "The Eighteenth Century," by Mr. T. E. Kebbel, which, much as the eighteenth century has been written about of late, is still worth reading. What Mr. Kebbel chiefly insists on is the repose—in the State, in the Church, and in Society—that was so marked a characteristic of the century. Even the irruption of the Highlanders into England in 1745 seems on the whole to have been regarded with great indifference. "And it is wonderful," says Mr. Kebbel, "how shortly all record of it was forgotten. There are probably fewer local traditions of Prince Charles's advance into England than of any event in history of equal magnitude and interest. The fact is, nobody cared."—We have farther a rather subtle piece of criticism on "The Undefinable in Art," the object of which is to show—and which, we think, succeeds in showing—that in all our impressions from works of art, whether they be poems, pictures, or musical compositions, no matter how highly developed may be the intellectual appreciation of beauty, "there remains a wide margin of emotional effect which intellectual reflection cannot render definite."—The fine and thoughtful essay on "The Fear of Death" must also be mentioned as another ornament to the number.

In Blackwood "The New Ordeal" is brought to a conclusion, and must undoubtedly be pronounced a vigorous jeu d'esprit, though it is far from easy to understand what has been its author's exact aim in its composition.—In "A New Method of Social Evolution," which suggests to the Americans how they should by degrees establish an aristocracy similar to the English, we have one of those elaborate jokes which one only looks for in the pages of Blackwood. There is, no doubt, cleverness in it, though the fun, to those who do not regard the Noctes Ambrosianæ as the highest manifestation of humour, may be apt to seem a little elephantine.—In "India and Afghanistan" we have a clear and straightforward statement of the case in favour of Lord Lytton's frontier policy; whilst "American Facts and Gladstone Fallacies" is a sharp attack on the ex-Premier, whose article, "Kin Beyond Sea," would seem, from the extracts from American newspapers here given, to have been received with anything but unmixed favour on the other side of the Atlantic.

The Churchman's Shilling Magazine for this month seems entitled to a very creditable place among the minor periodicals. "The New Generation" is the title of a paper which examines the political ideas expounded in Lord Beaconsfield's novels with a good deal of justice and candour, even if it does not succeed in throwing fresh light upon a pretty nearly outworn subject. The sketch of Roumanian history through the course of the present century is good and readable, and the fiction we find here fully up to the average magazine standard.

The full account of the Afghan Passes, with the excellent map that accompanies it, ought to be enough to recommend the Geographical Magazine for this month to popular favour.—Besides this we are told "the rights" about that "Kuldja Question" between Russia and China, which, difficult as it may be to stir ourselves up to take an interest in a matter that seems so remote, may have consequences of vast importance in their bearing on the destinies of Asia.—The fragment by Dr. Robert Brown on an exploration of the interior of Greenland undertaken by some Danish gentlemen in the course of the last summer is also of interest.

In The Magazine of Art the papers on "Modern Art in Florence," and on the recent Exhibition of Paintings on China at Messrs. Howell and James' Galleries in Regent Street are well worth reading, and the many illustrations, full-page and small, with which the periodical abounds are of the usual excellence; The Garden for this month is full of information and suggestions of high value to the horticulturist; and The Day of Rest, though addressing itself apparently principally to very youthful readers, nevertheless boasts among its contributors for this month such names as those of Mr. R. A. Proctor, Rev. Dr. Vaughan, Rev. Dr. John Hunt, Miss Freser Tytler, Mr. Richard Rowe, and others of similar mark.

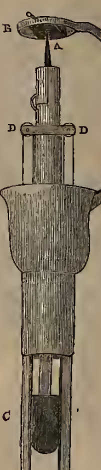
THE ELECTRIC LIGHT

The electric candle of M. Jablochkoff, which has lately played such tricks with the gas shares, has at length met with what will very probably become a formidable rival. We allude to the invention of M. Werdermann, which has on one or two occasions during the past few days been exhibited at the British Telegraph Manufactory in the Euston Road.

We must remind our readers that in the Jablochkoff candle, the two carbon pencils from which the light is given are placed parallel to one another, and separated by a strip of clay or plaster. In the older forms of regulators the carbons were invariably placed one above the other—their points nearly meeting, and the electric arc playing between them. M. Werdermann returns to this form of burner—in that he places one carbon above the other; but there the comparison ceases, for in every other respect the arrangement which he adopts is entirely novel.

His first experiments seem to have been in the direction of varying the relative size of the two carbon pencils, which led to the discovery that, when the negative electrode was represented by a mass of carbon larger than the positive by 64 to 1, some very advantageous results were arrived at.

The cut annexed will enable our readers to understand the form of lamp which M. Werdermann has adopted as the outcome of these experiments. The negative carbon is placed at the top of the apparatus, and is held in a metal ring by means of a set screw. This metal ring is supported by the curved arm on the right of the figure which forms the necessary metallic connection with the source of electricity at the base of the lamp. The positive carbon is represented by the fine point (A) which touches the negative block (B). (This actual touching of the two electrodes is a special feature of M. Werdermann's invention, and one in which it differs from all other regulators in use). The positive carbon is a rod of little more than one-eighth of an inch in thickness, and about a yard long. It is kept in contact with the negative block by means of a weight (C) which hangs below, and which acts upon two cords passing over pulley wheels (D D). By these means the carbon is constantly pressed upwards, like the candle in a carriage lamp. In practice it is found that the form given to the negative electrode prevents it wearing away to any appreciable degree, and that the positive rod is consumed at the rate of but two inches per hour. A yard length will, therefore, feed one lamp, without attention, for fifteen hours. A Jablochkoff candle only lasts one hour and a half; but four candles are commonly placed in one lamp, an arrangement being attached, which we have already described in these columns, for igniting them in turn automatically. It will be seen that, so far as simplicity is concerned, the new lamp has a decided advantage. But its merits do not stop here, for it presents many advantages which no other form of lamp has yet given.



The size of the electric arc is very small indeed—for, as just explained, the carbons actually touch—but the positive point is rendered incandescent, and gives out a large amount of light as well. The quality of the light is very soft and agreeable, and needs no interposing medium, such as opal glass, to tone down its radiance. It is, too, perfectly steady and unflickering, and of agreeable colour. With all this the light is so intense, that the shadows of adjacent gas flames are thrown upon the walls in the workshop where it is exhibited.

Another very important point in this last new phase of the Electric Light is, that it requires a current for its support of very low tension. This means lower cost of production and less expense in insulation of wires, &c. The lights can also be multiplied in a manner which no other system admits of. Thus, M. Werdermann shows a row of ten lights burning at one time, with the help of only a two horse-power engine. The wires from the magneto-electric machine (one of Gramme's, ordinarily used for electro-plating) were laid on each side of this row of lights, branch wires being attached to supply the carbons of each. This arrangement, perhaps, represents the nearest electric approach to a street gas main, and its issuing pipes to feed the lamps in its course. We congratulate M. Werdermann upon having made the most important advance of the present year in the field of electric illumination. T. C. H.

New Novels

"The Europeans: a Sketch," by Henry James (2 vols.: Macmillan).—Mr. Henry James, who has already won considerable reputation by some critical essays on modern French literature, seems likely to achieve no less distinction as a novelist, his "Americans" having already won him considerable popularity. It is true that there is hardly an attempt at plot in this present story—or rather, as he calls it, "sketch"—of his; but, thin as is the thread of narrative, it is yet strong enough to hold together a group of characters most of them wonderfully life-like and original. Foremost among these stands Felix Young, an American by descent, but born and brought up in Europe, a young fellow who has roamed about the Continent as actor, singer, and artist, settling to nothing, but always enjoying himself, and making the most of life, and as incapable of serious wrong-doing as he is of fixed and definite aims. Together with his sister, the Baroness Münster—she is the morganatic wife of a German Princeling, whose family are seeking to set aside the marriage—this airy young gentleman finds himself paying a visit to America, bent, at the instigation of the Baroness, on making the acquaintance of certain extremely well-to-do cousins who are living in the near neighbourhood of Boston. Of this Baroness we need not say much, for though she is drawn sufficiently well to make us understand that she is a clever, scheming, and not over-scrupulous woman, she does not fill that space in the reader's mind that the author, we fancy, intended her to occupy. But the contrast between Felix, with his brilliancy, his versatility, and his genial sunny nature, to which everything is full of interest for the opportunities of enjoyment it may afford, and his grave and sedate Puritan relatives, whose habitual mood is somewhat joyless and depressed from an overstrained conscientiousness and sense of the solemnity of life, is brought out in the happiest manner; many of the conversations by which this result is effected being as dramatic as they are exquisitely humorous. In particular, how this gay Bohemian, who for all his levity is yet so entirely amiable and worthy of confidence, gradually comes to exercise influence over the serious uncle, fatigued and overwhelmed by the ever-present feeling of his "responsibilities," to whom at first Felix, "as a young man extremely clever and active, and apparently respectable, and yet not engaged in any recognised business," is "an unfortunate anomaly," so that in the end Mr. Wentworth comes to consent to his nephew's marriage to his cousin Gertrude, is sketched with admirable vivacity and skill. We are, in short, in the book taken on new ground, and introduced to characters almost, if not altogether, novel and striking, who, unfamiliar as they are, yet impress the reader at once as real and living men and women. Mr. James ought to have a really brilliant future before him.

"Christine Brownlee's Ordeal," by Mary Patrick, author of "Marjorie Bruce's Lovers" (3 vols.: Smith and Elder).—This is a story of much more than average excellence, but it wants the freshness of Miss Patrick's earlier work. Indeed the situation which forms the "ordeal" of the heroine, Christine Brownlee, may pretty well be described as hackneyed. The beautiful girl who, to save her father from shame and ruin, consents to sell herself to the elderly suitor who covets her young beauty, though conscious that she loathes and despises him, and who to render her sacrifice effectual is forced to let her lover believe her a false and worthless woman, led away by the charms of title and position, is a figure to which we are by no means unaccustomed either in fiction or on the stage; so that from long experience we never have the slightest apprehension but that means of rescue will be provided for the unfortunate Christine ere it be too late. However, if Miss Patrick's main theme cannot boast of much novelty, she has made the most of it, and treated it here and there with considerable power. No doubt such a situation as we are called on to contemplate is not very probable, and that being so, we may leave without remark certain minor improbabilities attributed to some of the actors in it, which can hardly fail to catch the notice of the attentive reader. But it must not be supposed that the book is in the tragic vein throughout, for the lighter scenes, of which the first volume principally consists, are given with much playfulness and some touches of real humour. Altogether, the book may be considered satisfactory enough, though its author must be held to have done better on a former occasion.

"Christiern the Wicked: an Historical Tale," by H. Tagson. From the German, translated by the Author (Samuel Tinsley).—This seems an attempt at the "rehabilitation"—partial "rehabilitation, at any rate—of Christiern the Second, King of Denmark in the earlier years of the sixteenth century, who, the author would have us think, was the friend of the people against the exactions and oppressions of the nobles and the clergy, which last class revenged itself on him by dubbing him "the Wicked." Perhaps for the literary merits of the tale there is not very much to be said, but as a picture of the period treated of it may be read with attention by persons who do not shrink from a novel which involves a little trouble. Should a second edition of the work be called for, we should recommend the author to preface it with an introductory chapter, giving some brief outline of Danish history during the Middle Ages, and a general view of the condition of the country and its relations with other States at the opening of the sixteenth century. He seems to believe English readers much better "posted up" as to such matters than in fact they are, and hence not a little in his book is scarcely intelligible.

"By-Ways," by Mary W. Paxton (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley).—The present demand for novels being apparently insatiable, this book may perhaps, meet it as well as many another that we come across, though, as far as we have examined it, it is without merit of any kind. Its dramatis personæ are supremely uninteresting, and some of them very vulgar besides. We do not think, however, that there is anything mostly unwholesome in the story, and this may count for something in its favour.

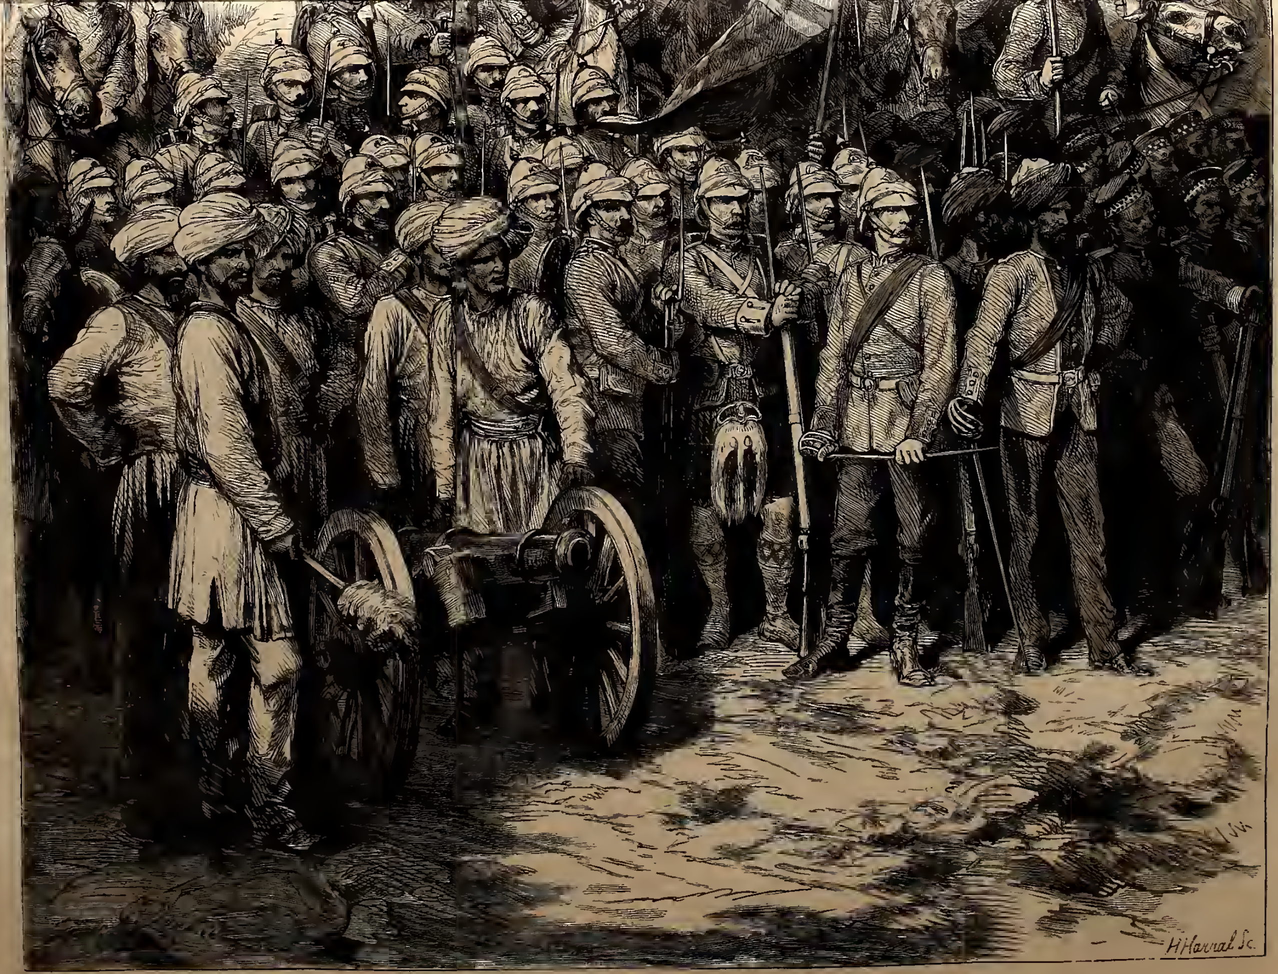
The Oldest House in the United States is shortly to be pulled down, and a house-warming, got up in the olden style, was lately given as a farewell to the ancient walls. The house stands at Southold, Long Island, and was built by one of a colony of thirteen English settlers who landed in the harbour in 1639, while it has remained in the possession of the descendants of its original owner, Barnabas Horton, until within the last five years. It was enlarged in 1665, and another wing built in 1835. For the house-warming the rooms were arranged in accordance with the habits of two centuries ago, the ancient furniture was brought out, and family relics exhibited, while the guests wore costumes to match, many of them being veritable old dresses which had been preserved as heirlooms.



AWAITING THE ORDER TO ADVANCE

THE IMPENDING AFGHAN WAR—THE GATHERING OF THE CLANS

CHRISTMAS BOOKS

I.

THE "good cheer" which Christmas brings for mind as well as body in the shape of many-pictured, gaily-bound books to replenish the childish library, does not display any striking native talent this year. Indeed, those contributions showing most novelty and originality are mainly due to Gallic or Transatlantic pens. Thus the quaint autobiography from the insect world, "The Curious Adventures of a Field Cricket" (Sampson Low), is translated from the French of Dr. E. Candèze by Mr. N. d'Anvers, and is both amusing in text and spirituel in illustrations. Queer peeps are given into the underground life of many a tiny insect, and all kinds of entomological lore are welded into a highly entertaining story. M. d'Anvers' work bears little trace of translation, and M. Renard's clever drawings are as true to Nature as they are ingenious and humorous.—The difference between natural and laboured humour is palpably illustrated by the species of geographical alphabet, "Funny Foreigners and Eccentric English" (same publishers), wherein Clifford Merton has unhappily allied doggrel rhymes and absurd and garish caricatures.

Another French contribution is M. Biart's "Two Friends" (S. Low), translated by Mary de Hauteville. United by a common bond of suffering, two French lads become a very Damon and Pythias, and their existence, thanks to brutal parents, is a daily round of misery. The story, therefore, is far from cheerful, although justice is done in the end.—From this atmosphere of sentimentality in Parisian back slums it is a refreshing change to the wild open American prairie, the scene of Mr. W. H. G. Kingston's "With Axe and Rifle" (same publishers). Here are an energetic family seeking home and fortune in the far West, and passing happily through the many perils besetting travellers of olden days in the regions then only familiar to the trapper and the Redskin.—Mr. Kingston appears again in "The Rival Crusoes" (Griffith and Farran), founded on an old story composed by Agnes Strickland, and now enlarged and rewritten to suit modern taste. The levelling power of misfortune is herein forcibly demonstrated, as a haughty young lord, wrecked on a desert island, is compelled to fraternise with a humble shipmate, the only other survivor of the wreck, and whom he has severely persecuted both on land and sea.—There is another haughty aristocrat snubbing his inferiors in "Buttons," by A. R. Hope (same publishers), with a similar finale of reformation, but this character is considerably exaggerated. The punishment devised by Geoffrey's father is also most improbable, and the tale—intended to inculcate kindness to inferiors—is more likely to impress the reader with its absurdity than to point a moral.—Boys, however, are not the only disagreeable personages in fiction, for the young damsels in "The New Girl," by "M. E. B." (same publishers), are most unlovely specimens of the feminine element. Jealousy, dishonest cribbing, and spitefulness in general, are freely illustrated by these pages of school life, although honest, upright Rose pleasantly relieves the monotony.

Schooling of a different character is depicted by "Root and Flower," by J. Palmer (Griffith and Farran), which details the successful efforts of a band of mission workers in a wretched London parish. Mr. Palmer's little story is well told in its simplicity, and rests on fact.—A still higher interest, however, attaches to "Our Blue Jackets" (Hodder and Stoughton), a plain account of the noble work done by Miss Agnes Weston among sailors. Miss Weston is the originator of the valuable Sailors' Rest at Devonport, and of the "blue-backs" or monthly letters sent to British crews in all parts of the globe. Springing from a simple letter to a soldier ten years ago, this marine correspondence now averages 4,000 copies monthly, while the precious "blue-backs" even accompanied the Arctic ships.—And as the last volume deals with Jack ashore, "Our Redcoats and Blue Jackets," by H. Stewart (J. Hogg), testifies to the value of Jack afloat. Soldiers share the glory here, however, for Mr. Stewart furnishes a brief history of British military and naval actions, from the opening of the war with France in 1793 down to the present time. Young people may learn a good deal from this history as a prelude to the study of more important works.

The independent helpful American girl who strikes out her own path in life is shown at her best in "Theodora Cameron," by P. J. M'Keen (Hodder and Stoughton), which introduces a genial family in the heated times of the struggle between North and South. Notwithstanding the frequent odd Americanisms, the story will charm from its fresh descriptions of country life, and the more sober pictures in hospital. Theodora also is neither so priggish nor affected as to prove a dangerous model for girlish readers.—Peculiarly Transatlantic, too, in that semi-humorous treatment of sacred things which often jars upon English sentiments is "That Boy, Who shall have Him?" by the Rev. W. H. Daniels (same publishers), delineating the struggles of a lad who is vowed by his mother to the Ministry, and who by every means seeks to elude his vocation. Mr. Daniels has worked out his subject with undoubted vigour, while the subordinate characters are ably drawn, and the book altogether is one decidedly out of the ordinary track.

Children of years ago used to delight in the productions of "Silverpen," and the readers of "The Children's Isle" (Hodder and Stoughton) will find that Miss Meteyard has lost none of her old power. This large family do not encounter any stereotyped adventures, but travel in odd byways amongst the wild coast scenery and strange characters of Western Ireland, while the mystery of the misshapen Lord Donore is unusually well kept up. Miss Meteyard's finished style and the excellent illustrations combine to form a charming gift-book.—Four volumes of Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's Shilling Series are of a distinctly religious tone. "The White Rose of Deerham," by Marie Hall, is a sad and graceful tale of the time of James II., when Roman Catholics had turned the tables on the Puritans, and were repaying the debts of their forefathers; but the same authoress's "Gabriella, or the Spirit of Song," is undeniably prosy. Working lads might profitably copy industrious Jim in "The Little Printer's Boy," by the Vicomtesse de Kerkadec; while as to "The Gate and Glory Beyond it," a tale of the Franco-Prussian War, it is clear that Onyx understands neither her subject nor knows the scene of her story.

The Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge also furnishes four fresh story books. Thoroughly honest and childish is "Left in Charge," by Austin Clare, and the mistakes of the simple little maiden, acting as guardian to her brother, form amusing and profitable reading.—True heroism and the errors of selfishness are the lessons of "The Wilford Family," by Eadgyth—nice pleasant children, neither painfully good nor abnormally naughty.—"Harvey Compton's Holiday" is another Confirmation story intended for older children, and setting forth the virtues of obedience; while "Hidden Workings," by H. Rutherfurd Russell, owns a very sulky and insipid heroine, who is rewarded beyond her deserts by a capital husband.

The persecution of the Lollards, which furnished Miss E. Holt with the effective "Mistress Margery," now supplies fresh material to trace the fortunes of martyred Margery's Geoffrey, "Margery's Son" (J. F. Shaw). Geoffrey, too, lives in stirring days, he goes with Henry V. to France to fetch his bride, accompanies the luckless James I. of Scotland through his brief reign, and finally dies in the Wars of the Roses. Miss Holt is successful in maintaining consistency in the language and action of her characters with the times in which they move, and her story is heartily interesting.

An attempt to popularise Chaucer with children was made by Mrs. Haweis two Christmases since, and now a selection from the "Canterbury Tales" has been turned into prose by Messrs. F. Storr and Hawes Turner as "Canterbury Chimes" (C. Kegan Paul). The paraphrases are fairly done, the introduction having suffered less from the alteration than the tales themselves, and the antique illustrations from the Ellesmere MSS. greatly enliven the book.—With a similar desire to afford children necessary information without hard study, Mrs. Beesly furnishes some "Stories from the History of Rome" (Macmillan), which are curtly narrated in plain language, and include outlines of the chief episodes of interest connected with the Empire.

The Scriptures and the poets have been tolerably worn in birthday books, so compilers have now attacked prose authors. The "George Eliot Birthday Book" (Blackwood) embraces numerous pithy observations from the novelist's works which, though they lose much of their native force by separation from the context, are in the main judiciously chosen.

There is a delightful flavour of the briny about "Odd Folks at Home" (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), wherein C. L. Matéaux gives bright, cheery talks about the inhabitants and connections of old ocean, from the fish and the seabirds to the shells and the seaweeds. The useful information is most pleasantly veiled, and the illustrations are plentiful and first-rate, while the book is further adorned by a very novel fly-leaf.—A tale of the sea, too, is the same author's "Wee Willie Winkie" (Cassell), the hero being a waif from a wreck adopted by an old fisherman, and finally found by rich relations in a way dear to fiction, but rare in reality.—Food for restless eyes and ears on Sunday afternoons is provides by the same publishers, "Bright Sundays," which combined numerous pictures with brief descriptions.—Sunday literature for those of maturer years is the excellent annual volume of the Quiver (same publishers), containing high-class religious articles, pleasant miscellaneous papers, Scriptural treatises, hymn tunes and poems, with a brief supply of fiction. The illustrations are decidedly above the average of those in similar periodicals.

The illustrated edition of Canon Farrar's "Life of Christ" (Cassell) appears as a highly appropriate gift-book for the season which commemorates the birth of its Divine subject. Dr. Farrar's valuable work is now still further enhanced by the highly-finished engravings of Eastern scenes and personages which stud nearly every page—the fruit of a special visit made by Mr. F. Mason Good to the Holy Land to obtain photographs, while copies of coins, gems, and other antiquities have also been added. The lovely views on the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan, the rugged mountain scenery, the stately buildings of Jerusalem, and the other cities of Palestine, the varied national habits and customs, and the graceful Eastern plants and fruits, are alike reproduced with rare faithfulness and delicacy, forming invaluable aids towards realising the eventful scenes described by the text.

The half-forgotten spots of Old England, mouldering ruins, choked-up harbours, and decayed towns, are favourite resorts of the antiquarian, and rambles in such deserted scenes have produced Mr. E. Walford's "Pleasant Days in Pleasant Places" (Hardwicke and Bogue), sketches collected from Once a Week of ten years since. Mr. Walford discourses lovingly on the history and departed glory of his subjects, and capital drawings accompany his remarks.

While Mr. Walford commemorates our native land, the Rev. S. G. Green enumerates the beauties of Fair France in "French Pictures Drawn with Pen and Pencil" (Religious Tract Society). Varying the attractions of the soft sunny South with the wild coast scenery of the North, the mountain glories of the Pyrenees with the forest glades of the Ardennes, the author lightly outlines some delightful Gallic tours, never stopping to weary the reader with lengthy descriptions. Auvergne and the Cévennes, however, as less known to English travellers, obtain a more lengthened notice, which, indeed, forms one of the most interesting chapters, while the plentiful illustrations are artistic and carefully executed.—From the same Society come a tasteful collection of small Bible pictures, Christmas and New Year's cards, and reward cards for Sunday scholars, together with a handy "People's Almanac."—Pictures intended to educate the infantile eye are generally more remarkable for brilliant colour than truth, but Mr. Harrison Weir's "Pictures of Animals" (same publishers) stand alone in their correct drawing and good taste, each animal showing clearly the hand of the thorough artist.—The same praise cannot be awarded to the "Town and Country Toy-Book" (same publishers), which rejoices in so painfully liberal a supply of colour as to fairly weary the eye.—Mr. Caldecott's witty treatment of the good old tales of "John Gilpin" and "The House that Jack Built" (Routledge), afford a marked contrast to the foregoing. The illustrations are thoroughly dainty and picturesque, and are replete with humour, while the quaint expression of the various animals is particularly well portrayed.—For the little ones, too, appears the annual volume of "Peep Show" (Strahan), with its goodly supply of amusing stories, poems, and pictures, and some salutary instruction hidden away among the sugar-plums.

Returning to the elders, there are some amusing sketches of the hunting-field, the brook, and the stable, in "Yoicks" (Judy Office); while a handy little pocket-card for whist players has been published by Messrs. Trübner, containing twelve short rules, extracted from the Quarterly Review, of January, 1871, some of which, however, are decidedly open to argument.

ON SOME LIVING AND LATE AUTHORS

"Tempus edax Auctorum."

"In literature, as in the playthings of schoolboys and the fribbery of women, there are the ins and outs of fashion."—SOUTHEY.

SOUTHEY has a remark in one of his letters upon temporary and permanent reputation, which, if not of striking novelty, is at all events excellently put, and ought to have its consoling influence on those authors whose works are not cried up "in the top of the compass," till the vital pulse has done throbbing at booksellers' commissions and critical decrees.

What Southey says we all know well enough to be a truism—that the very elements of popularity are, as a rule, fatal to its endurance, that the characteristics, which a man's own age thinks fit to stamp as beauties, the next calls by a different name. Where, for instance, are the poems by Mrs. Opie and George Dyer—Elia's absent George, of New River fame—which were considered in sane circles the gems of the annuals half a century or so ago? Is it the world that has altered its mind, or was this

> The brazen trump of iron-wingèd Fame,
> That mingleth faithful truth with forgèd lies?

In the "Memoirs of Thomas Holcroft," the dramatist, there is the following: "'Anna St. Ives,' a novel in 7 volumes, appeared in 1792. It was much read at the time, and excited considerable attention, both from the force with which it is written, and from the singularity of the characters and sentiments."

What strikes us here is the complete death which has befallen this highly commended and widely-read publication. It probably ceased to be much asked for after '93. "The "singularity of the characters and sentiments" must have strangled it; for how can we tell, not having seen the work (and who has?) that "singularity" was not at the time a charitable euphemism, an indulgent paraphrase?

Still, that a man should write books seven-volume strong, that those books should have utterly vanished from the sight of the world, and that the author should scarcely be recollected, while children of his yet live, by anything but one play and one anecdote, shows, if nothing else does, that Time the vindicator may give us what odds he chooses, and beat us still by a very long head! Look again at Hayley, whose "Triumph of Temper" saw edition upon edition as surely as the years followed one another, just in the same manner as Mr. Tupper's "Philosophy" does at present; he is now less read and more unreadable than if he had lived a thousand years ago. Of all those persons who make up the bulk and volume of Johnson's "Lives," how large a proportion has, long before this time, "suffered a change," a metamorphosis more complete than any which Ovid sings! How small a compass, according to the existing standard of taste, would the poetical literature of the eighteenth century occupy? Perhaps it may happen that, by and bye, a writer will rise up and pass a like judgment on the carpet-poets of our day!

There are writers among us now whose reputation froths and bubbles on the surface of literature, and whose names will sink into oblivion when they are dead, if indeed they are not so unfortunate as to live long enough to be forgotten before, as it happened the other day with the author of the "Imaginary Conversations."

Nobody can surely pretend that Mr. Landor did not survive his fame as he survived his friends. He was ultimus Romanorum, the last of the literary generation which fought duels and wrote Latin verse.

The proverb instructs us that "he hath not lived, who liveth not after he is dead," and accordingly it is usual to find authors, as they see themselves drawing nigh to the "narrow house," making their fame fast to some magnum opus, some splendid creation of the brain as to an anchorage.

Southey complains somewhere that his "History of Brazil" did not bring him in much more than the Preface he supplied to a reprint of the "Morte Arthure," but then it was the rock on which his name was built, the water-tight bark, in which his renown would sail as securely down the stream of time as an Indian's canoe stems Canadian torrents.

Unless we are very much mistaken, Southey was wise when he calculated his future station in reckoning for nothing his contributions to the Quarterly, for which King John paid him so handsomely; but we are afraid that he formed in his own mind a somewhat fallacious estimate of his future rank among the verse-writers of Great Britain. We think we are right when we say that "Madoc," "Thalaba," "Kehama," and the rest of his poems do not hold the place in modern English literature which their author anticipated that they would and even must hold.

Perhaps his rapidity of composition has told against him in the long run. He tells us that he once wrote twelve hundred verses in a single week, but that, later on, he was not equal to such a feat. It has been said that easy writing is hard reading.

It is curious to observe the difference between a writer like Hobbes and a writer like Southey; it is the difference between the abstract and the concrete. While the author of "Leviathan" occupied himself in working out a theory, or analysing an argument, the author of "The Doctor" could write 3,650 pages of letterpress by the clock. It is one thing to build a house with bricks, and another to be able to tell how a brick is made.

Southey's name and his writings, nevertheless, will live for a very long time to come, and they will do so for several reasons which this is no place to discuss, even if it were not idle to discuss such a question at all. He is (to say nothing more) the Moral Man of Letters of our century, and there is that delightful correspondence of his, second only to Lamb's, nor second to this in sound essentials.

Authors are not, perhaps, the best judges of their own pretensions and weight in the scale, and certainly they have not been very happy, as a rule, in selecting the particular work by which they would choose to stand. But the latter circumstance may be owing to the general incredulity of the literary profession as to the fact that few of them are remembered by more than one thing of their doing.

Smollett, no doubt, thought that "Peregrine Pickle" and "Roderick Random" were "not so bad," but that the "History of England" was his masterpiece and the keystone. The public at present thinks not, however, and Mr. Mudie has no inquiries after "Hume's Continuation." It is as much as the booksellers care to do to reprint the work from the old plates once in a dozen years for the benefit of gentlemen forming libraries.

Gray used to devour with avidity the romances of the Duke de Rochefoucauld and the Duke de Nemours. The generation which went before had run mad upon Mdlle. E. Scudery and Honoré Dusfé. Hazlitt, who died in 1830, by no means an old man, was an enthusiastic admirer of Mrs. Inchbald and Mrs. Barbauld. Both he and Lamb speak eulogistically of "Nature and Art" by the first, and few nowadays know whether it was a novel or an illustrated magazine.

Miss Burney's "Evelina" was once in everybody's mouth. It is now where "Denis Donne," "Eleanor's Victory," et hoc genus omne, will be before they are half so old.

The public taste is more ephemeral than the most ephemeral publication it patronises, and then abandons; for almost the same may be said of Hook and Jerrold. Do the booksellers find "Gilbert Gurney" and "Sayings and Doings" worth reprinting? Jerrold seems to have died but yesterday, and his works are as little asked for at the libraries as "Vathek" and the "Castle of Otranto." Causa latet, res ipsa notissima.

People, by which we intend people in Mr. Mudie's or Mr. Hookham's sense, judge of the antiquity of books and of the antiquity, say of furniture, rather differently. A book which is as old as our dining-table is an old book. Chaucer is but ancient. For all practical purposes, Miss Burney's novels are as out of date as the "Faery Queen," and of the two we do not know whether Spenser is not the less neglected!

There must be plenty of us living who recollect well when Mr. Plumer Ward was ranked with Dickens, and Bulwer, and Scott. We are afraid we should be disbelieved if we mentioned the sum which Mr. Colburn gave for "Tremaine;" but it was about eight times as much as "Vanity Fair" brought to William Makepeace Thackeray.

Sir Walter Scott's obligations to the anonymous appearance of "Waverley" have not been generally appreciated, we take it. The booksellers would have had a very different story to tell if the Waverley Novels had only been Scott's Novels.

Never was such a case known before (or since) of books standing by each other. Why, if we admire "Ivanhoe," which is natural, we must admire "Redgauntlet," which is not natural, or, at least, buy it, for that seems to say "I, too, am a Waverley Novel!" "The Heart of Midlothian" is not perfect without "The Black Dwarf" for the same reason; and "Quentin Durward" pairs off with "Castle Dangerous." It is "Love me, love my dog."

It is a fiction to assert that each is sold separate, and is complete in itself. It is no such thing. They are a serried phalanx, locking their shields together, clan-like. If you have one, you must have all, or you break a set. You might as well buy an odd lot of the "Percy Anecdotes," or Volume XIX. of the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Any one who desires to possess the Waverley Novels must order his bookseller to send the complete set to him with the backs lettered. He must not pick and choose.

Sir Walter's mistake, after all, was that he ever wrote anything but novels—Waverley Novels. If he had been wise, he would have ended as he began, and then every gentleman's bookcase would have had to groan under something like an hundredweight of Scott's prose.

As it is, we get out of buying "Marmion" and the "Lady of the Lake," and we know not how much more besides, if we like, and still do not spoil our series. The question arises, Why have we not the Pickwick Novels and the Knebworth Novels? That is a slip of judgment for which the authors will be sorry by-and-bye, or, at least, of which their representatives will feel the consequences.

It may be said, however, that the Waverley Novels, or the best of them, are almost the only things of the sort that are worth reading. They are always fresh, because nature is always so. They are free from the twaddle and bombast which usually taint this class of writing. They carry us back far enough, but not too far. They are old enough, but not too old.

"Ivanhoe," "The Talisman," and one or two more, are exceptions; but with what a masterly hand they are done, not repelling us by their remoteness, scarcely letting us suspect, till we have laid the volume down, and can think about it more at leisure, that we have been following our romancist into what are, popularly speaking, prehistoric times.

It is a ticklish matter for an author to cast his story too far back in antiquity. The only tale which belongs to the classical age, and which is not insipid or ridiculous, is "The Last Days of Pompeii." Posterity, we are sure, will take care of Nydia, the blind slave.

Other books there are that have been wrought of late days, which the world has a mind and a will to cherish. It will always keep "Adam Bede" with it, and the weaver of Raveloe. It will not part with "Eugene Aram," nor with "Paul Clifford." "David Copperfield" and Colonel Newcome will not be forgotten, or fall out of their places. "Tom Jones" and My Uncle Toby will continue to the end to fill their old corners in our libraries, and, which is better, in our hearts.

We will not swear that there are not half-a-dozen more names on our lips ready to be pronounced, if these are not enough.

As for Fielding and that school, we have a fancy for reading them in the old editions, as Lamb had a fancy for Sir Thomas Browne in folio. The stiff crackling paper, the elderly-faced type, the short paragraphs, and the well-thumbed old calf bindings, seem proper to the subject and to the author, if not part of them both.

Somebody has lately advertised "Tom Jones" in one foolscap book at a couple of shillings. We would rather not see it. It is in our eyes an abominable desecration. This is not Fielding's "Tom Jones."

It is enough to imagine the thin damp paper, the close-packed page, the blurred cramped printing, the cropped edges, and the act-drop cover! We cannot think this is our Parson Adams. Our "Tom Jones" is too good to be reprinted at a steam-press, and sold at railway-stations.

Day, we venture to say, had no idea that his "Sandford and Merton" would never die. If he had intended it to be immortal, it would not have been! A book of a similar stamp, only not so enduring, we should fancy, by one-half, has been produced in our own time. "Tom Brown's School-Days" will live to be old, because its matter and manner are not temporary.

But our children will not know Aurora Floyd and Lady Audley, that vulgarest of she-villains, and they will perhaps, into the bargain, wonder at the taste of their fathers and mothers in fostering such monstrosities, as we wonder at the old relish for the Minerva Press novels. Both, we suppose, come within the category of a passing distemper.

Jack Hinton and Tom Burke are floating down with the tide, and Davenport Dunn, "The Man of Our Day," will be ready to follow at the next flow, taking with him, perhaps, "Luttrell of Arran." They have enjoyed the full sunshine of public favour; they have taken out all their fame in hard cash; and now they have nothing more to look for. But in the case of this author it does not signify so greatly: for he has the art of perpetuating his types: his characters are all "utility" people.

> And many a Jakk of Dover hastow sold,
> That hath be twyes hoot and twys cold.

The "Tower of London" is a pretty taking thing, which we read with delight in our youth, and would not venture to take up again for fear of disappointment; but then the writer should not have given us "Old St. Paul's" and the "Constable de Bourbon." He set about the last, it appears, at the suggestion of a friend. This must have been a friend's malice! Alsatia was delicate ground to tread upon, when a master had pre-occupied it, and made it his own; and "Whitefriars" follows lamely in the trail of the "Fortunes of Nigel."

"OUR VILLAGE," BY MISS MITFORD

As most of our readers are probably aware, "Our Village" is a series of rural tales and descriptions of country life and scenery, written some forty years ago, the idea having being suggested to the accomplished authoress by the immense popularity of Washington Irving's "Sketch Book." It is not a little singular that Miss Mitford's charming productions were rejected by editor after editor, before they appeared in the Lady's Magazine. The merits of the work were, however, speedily recognised by the reading public, as is testified by the success of the five series of "Our Village" which were subsequently published. The work is a simple and charming record of the writer's every-day life in a pleasant Berkshire village; and in these days of high-pressure existence, when nearly all literature belongs either to the cold, hard, unromantic, utilitarian school, or to that of lurid sensationalism, it is inexpressibly soothing and refreshing to spend an hour or so with such a charming and delightful writer, whose wonderful facility for describing the beauties of nature has seldom been rivalled, and certainly never excelled. Her style, so simple and unpretentious, and yet so powerful and so fascinating, begets in the mind of the reader an enthusiasm akin to that with which she herself was inspired. Her minute word-painting enables us not only to see the things which she describes, but almost to see them with her eyes. Now we are filled with awe and rapture by the glory and grandeur of a picture of earth's loveliness which her glowing words conjure up in our mind's eye, presently the tender pathos with which she relates some incident of village life, excites our sympathy, and anon a delicate touch of humour forces us to smile through our tears. Little need to tell us, in the preface, that she "has a hearty love for her subject, and a personal familiarity with all that she describes." No imaginative genius, however fertile, could invent such scenes and such characters. We feel their truthfulness and their reality, and revel in their beauty with almost as much enjoyment as the authoress herself must have done. Who among her readers does not remember, and remembering, dote on, her little companion, "Lizzy," the carpenter's daughter, "the Plaything and Queen of the Village, a child, three years old according to the register, but six in size and strength and intellect, in power and self-will. She manages everybody in the place, her schoolmistress included; turns the wheeler's children out of their own little cart, and makes them draw her; seduces cakes and lollypops from the very shop-window; makes the lazy carry her, the silent talk to her, the grave romp with her; does anything she pleases; is absolute and irresistible. Her chief attraction lies in her exceeding power of loving and her firm reliance on the love and indulgence of others. She has but one rival in her dominions, a certain white greyhound, called 'Mayflower,' much her friend, who resembles her in beauty and strength, in playfulness, and almost in sagacity, and reigns over the animal world as she over the human."

Strong as is the temptation to quote other passages, we must not yield to it, for every page and almost every line has an intrinsic beauty of its own, which full transcription alone can do justice to. We will, therefore, only add that our engravings are taken from an edition de luxe, just published by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington, a volume which consists principally of those portions specified in the original editions of 1824 as "Walks in the Country," and is profusely illustrated by Messrs. C. O. Murray and W. H. J. Boot, whose drawings have been engraved by J. D. Cooper, and of whose skill our readers can themselves judge from the specimens which we have reproduced. A more charming volume for the drawing-room or the boudoir would be very difficult to produce.

WINTER EXHIBITIONS

MESSRS. A. TOOTH'S AND GOUPIL'S GALLERIES

LIKE most of our Winter Exhibitions now, Mr. Tooth's Gallery includes both foreign and English pictures. Nothing but good can come of the juxtaposition. If we wish to carry our study of foreign schools further than we can here or at Messrs. Wallis's, we can do so at M. Goupil's Gallery in Bedford Street, or at the Belgian Gallery in Bond Street. There is no need for student or purchaser of foreign art to go beyond London in these days, so long, at least, as he will be content with cabinet pictures.

Among the English masters, Mr. Burgess fills a conspicuous place in Mr. Tooth's Gallery, where his group of a Spanish girl and her old dueña or guardian mother ("The Saint's Day,") is on his largest scale—the girl piquante and provocative in her Spanish gravity and her large lustrous eyes, the dueña old and brown, sour and wrinkled, as fits the respective functions of inspiring love and keeping it at arm's length. His señora in white blonde mantilla is another pretty and attractive half-length. Mr. Burgess has evidently mastered the lesson that for sure command of a ready market there is nothing like painting pretty faces. M. Tissot, as he has often shown us, has his own views of what is pretty, and probably considers that his Japanese belle (4), with her natural eyebrows replaced by two black smudges high up on her forehead, comes within the description. If he has not found a real Japanese model, he has given an excellent embodiment of what may be conceived the living lady at the bottom of the changeless Japanese ideal of fan, and picture-book, screen, and porcelain. She wears an unmistakeable Japanese robe, gaily embroidered with bright flowers, and holds up with a smile two blue and white pots for admiration or comparison; for the background we have the metallic leafage of a conservatory filled with tropical plants very carefully painted. Nothing in art can be in more curious contrast than the Scotch and Italian pictures here hung side by side. Conspicuous among the former is J. Pettie's strong, even coarsely-vigorous, head (46), of a bull-necked, grey-haired warrior, who might have led a troop under Gustavus Adolphus, christened "The Leader," an excellent example of this painter's very effective use of the costumed model—resorted to as a way of escaping from the commonplace ugliness of modern male attire. Then we have, besides, a batch of Scotch landscapes, distinguished by the common features of wet or stormy grey skies overhead, stony or heathery ground under foot, ragged foliage, and a certain looseness of handling and grimness of colour, which seems common to the school. A "Twilight," by Peter Graham, A.R.A., and another by J. MacWhirter; a "Scene in Argyllshire," with ragged trees overhanging a "clutter" of rock, by George Aikman; the "Timber Waggon" (71), by C. E. Johnson; and a group of Scotch kyloes, by H. Garland, all exemplify the characteristics of a school which at least carries the impress of its own nature. Nor less distinctly marked is the Scotch school of sea-painters, here exemplified in Hamilton Macallum, whose two pictures, "Fishing in a Scotch Mist" and "Ashore for Fresh Water," have the common qualities of light, air, space, lift of tide and life of water, all fruits of strong sympathetic feeling, and close study of Scottish frith and fiord, east and west.

It seems at first difficult to understand how two schools of art could come to modes of representation so strangely unlike as these Scottish painters' and the Italians', whose work we have here in Galofre and Guzzone's "Throwing the Dagger," exquisite young gallants in the fashion of Henry II. of France, practising with their poignards at a mark, under the eye of a group of richly-dressed older signors, decidedly of the swash-buckler order; or, Galofre's "Race-Course at Rome, with its group of ladies in the most ultra-fashionable polonaises and tie-backs, watching the exchange of salutes between their children, little dressed-up dolls in the height of the fashion, as artificial as their mammas; or, "The Promenade at Nice," with the same types of ultra-fashionable womankind—infinitely more suggestive of the milliner's work than the Creator's—lounging on the seats, or leaning over the railings to gaze languidly over the blue sea. In all we find the same clayey ground and sky; the same predominance of earthy and clayey tones in the dresses, diversified in the "Dagger Throwing" with the most positive pinks and mauves, about as unpleasant a gamut of colour to my eye as could be combined, but with this an extraordinary cleverness of touch and execution, and above all an ultra-French chic. With more exquisiteness in costuming and drawing, there is a far more agreeable scheme of colour in L. Rossi's "Lesson in Phrenology," a professor in black velvet lecturing on a skull to two dainty little ladies in the costume of 1789, a good thirty years, if I am not mistaken, before the doctrine of Gall or Spurzheim had been heard of. But as a coquettish picture of a French Revolutionary interior nothing can be better. This sort of thing seems the fitting application of this very clever art of the young Italian school, which finds its most attractive expression in Rossi and Palmaroli, and which has sprung into such productive life from the fertilising seed sown at Rome by Fortuny.

Those who wish to seek may find more clever examples of it in Messrs. Goupil's Galleries, in particular a "Return from the Races" and other Neapolitan subjects, by Campriani, D'Albono, and others.

J. de Nittis, who first secured a position among his Italian contemporaries by his remarkable realisation of heat and dust in "The Road to Brindisi," and who has since found subjects for his singularly diligent and facile pencil in street views from Paris and London, in the latter of which the gloom and fog of our northern air have been turned to far better pictorial uses by this son of the South than they have ever been by any of our native contemporaries, has painted for this Gallery the Thames about Henley, in full blaze of summer sun, with a boating party of two ladies, sculled by a stalwart oarsman through a flotilla of swans.

It is very interesting to see how far the painter's determined study and close observation have carried him in dealing with so highly technical a subject. It is evident at a glance that while he has made most careful studies for his oarsman, he himself knows nothing of rowing. He dips his oars far too deep, and gives us no sense of a pull in progress. His rower is merely a figure carefully set and studied, but not in action. Then his swans are as bad as they can be. One measure of their badness, by a comparison almost forced on one, is a little picture of Haywood Hardy's hung close by, in which a pair of swans sail up to interrupt some children fishing.

On the other hand, Mr. de Nittis has expressed what I do not remember to have seen expressed before, the reflection of the moving ripple of the water on the curving sides of the boat, which materially helps to give the idea of motion. As to the truth of colour in the water, and the general colour of the picture, opinions will, no doubt, differ. To me there seems to be a purplish tone all through the picture, which is not more true than it is agreeable.

J. W. Nicol's "No Admittance," a burly cavalier flinging the whole weight of his lusty person against a door assailed from without by eager enemies, will sustain the reputation of this clever and rising young painter; as will "Anticipation"—a domestic clown looking with interest at an unopened letter, better than its companion, "Retrospect," a trooper contemplating a petronel. Holl's "Five Minutes' Rest" is a pretty study of a child-model before the studio fire. A. Savile Lumley's "Coquette at her Looking-glass," is a graceful figure; Beavis's "Mounted Duke of Marlborough in Flanders," has a gallant soldierly air. A pretty half-length of "A Girl at the Brook," by H. Le Jeune, A.R.A.; a pretty group about a sundial, by J. L. Pott; "Spring in the Pas de Calais," by J. Davis, R.A.; pictures of sheep and cattle, by that most popular of sheep and cattle painters, T. S. Cooper, R.A.; winter scenes by Munthe and Kaemmerer; Scotch cattle pictures by Garland and Luker; landscapes by B. W. Leader, W. Jay, T. Syer, Peel, F. W. Hulme, and S. R. Percy; sea-views by Hayes, and coast subjects by J. Webb; examples of the clever Anglo-German Otto Weber (Maple Durham); and of the Bavarian landscape-painter, Windmaier; and the German figure-painters in miniature—Sell, Breling, Hintze, and others, are among the other pictures that will have attractions for very different tastes, in Mr. Tooth's well-hung and well-filled little Gallery.

There are two or three pictures among the many that will repay examination in Messrs. Goupil's room, which deserve particular attention. Prominent among these is a large new Israels, a poor, careworn woman with her child in her arms, waiting on the leisure of her lord and master who is playing at cards in a cabaret. I have seen nothing in all Israels' long catalogue of painfully pathetic pictures more really pathetic than this—of a more irresistible, though undefinable sentiment of sadness, telling, as it does, a story of unrewarded and all but hopeless sacrifice and suffering in the wife, and of unconscious selfishness and insensibility of wrong in the card-player and his companions. The technical qualities of the picture, accepting Israels' loose handling and low scale of colour, are as noticeable as the expressional. Here are also two Mesdags, of quite uncommon colour as well as quality, one—a blue picture, the only blue picture by the painter I have ever seen—of a barque, just hoisting sail as she prepares to cast off her tug; the other Scheveningen pinks, just dipping and dancing in the open sea, after making their way through the tumbling inshore surf, which for force of hand and feeling of truth surpasses all I have seen of the master. Well worthy of notice, too, in the same Gallery, is the very clever picture by De Lort—a "Hallali" in a market-place, with the stag hotly pursued by hounds, dashing amongst vegetable stalls, upsetting egg-baskets, and leaping over terror-stricken market-women and traffickers, followed not only by the hounds, but the hunters in full blast. It is full of humour, clever painting, and merits of character, composition, and action—the sort of picture that would make an English painter's reputation, but which passes little regarded among scores as clever in a French salon.

A TELEGRAPHIC MUSEUM was inaugurated at Berlin on the 1st inst. The collection is intended for the instruction of the people, and includes over two hundred objects connected with telegraphy, and some historic instruments, while submarine and military telegraphy are specially well represented.

A VERY GOOD MAP OF AFGHANISTAN and the adjoining countries has been published by Mr. E. Stanford, of Charing Cross. The respective boundaries are clearly delineated, the names are plainly printed, and the various roads and Passes are distinctly marked. Such a map will be exceedingly useful to any one wishing to follow out the forthcoming military operations.

"THE VINTAGE FESTIVAL."——Although this admirable picture of Mr. Alma Tadema's has not been much before the public, the subject is nevertheless well-known through the steel engraving published about two years ago. Mr. Gladwell has obtained permission to exhibit the picture on its way back from the Paris Exhibition. It is now in his Gallery at Gracechurch Street, where it will remain for some days. The picture is painted with that marvellous accuracy of detail which is always so noticeable in Mr. Tadema's works. As its name implies, it depicts a festival in the days of Rome given in the honour of Bacchus. A procession of damsels, musicians, and priests, headed by a young priestess, wend their way along the marble floors of the temple amid the acclamations of the crowd. Those of Mr. Tadema's many admirers who have not seen the picture should pay a visit to the City before it returns to the gallery of its proprietor.

Even at this season of splendid gift-books, it is rarely that we come across a volume of such genuine artistic excellence as "Brittany: a Series of Thirty-five descriptive Sketches," by Birket Foster (published by the artist). Even the fine work of those clever etchers who have so often delighted us of recent years with studies of the river-scenes and the old towns of France would look hard and dry in comparison with these sketches, so faithfully "transferred to stone by the delicate process of Messrs. Maclure and Macdonald" that each print might almost be taken for an actual replica of the original drawing. The accompanying letter-press, though rarely exceeding half-a-dozen lines, is no less tasteful and complete, telling us just the simple facts we require to know in order fully to appreciate the merits of the sketch—the difficulties that beset the artist's path, as when at Morlaix he tries to show us the old town without bringing in the monstrous railway viaduct; the details that throw clearer light on the quaintness, the humour, or the beauty of the scenes and groups that catch his eye as he wanders through the old Armorica. The sketches, nearly all of which are taken in and around Morlaix, Dinan, and Quimper, are almost evenly divided between views of Breton places and of Breton folk, between the stately towers and shady streams of the towns upon the Ode and the Rance, and the graceful costumes and not unpleasing features—these last, we fear, a little idealised by the artist—of the groups that cluster round cathedral doors, before the shops, and in the market-places. And of the two, while not forgetting the delightful sketches of the woman asleep in church, of the market-cart, and of the girls of Pont l'Abbé, we are inclined to prize the former most. But such comparisons are a little ungracious. The collection is no mere volume for the drawing-room, but a work of art in which a master of the pencil has freely displayed his highest power.

We must lay it to the charge of the great excellence of the authors' earlier writings about Western France if we fail to speak of "Pictures and Legends from Normandy and Brittany" (Chatto and Windus), by T. and K. S. Macquoid, as cordially as we could wish. Compared to these, the present volume is as a little stew of fragmentary odds and ends to the noble pièce de resistance which had been previously offered for our repast. The thread of descriptive narrative on which the legends are strung is of the flimsiest, and the legends themselves are not particularly good. One half, indeed, are not legends at all, but novelettes of modern French life, which have, we think, appeared before in print. The other half, the legends proper, are chiefly interesting to those who like to trace the wonderful sameness of these popular tales—a sameness which in certain cases, as where the beggar of Quimper relates the tale of "the Miller and the Lord" to the "gentleman and lady who were so fond of hearing stories" reaches a point that demands remonstrance from the listener. Altogether this is a jaunty little volume, and fair reading for boys and girls at Christmas time, but it will not add to its authors' reputations.

A new edition—that of 1871 having been for some time exhausted—of "Bewick's Select Fables of Æsop and Others, fathfully reprinted from the rare Newcastle Edition, published by T. Saint in 1874" (Longmans and Co.), needs no commendation to the connoisseur in wood-engraving beyond the simple recapitulation of its title. Interesting at once in a literary and an artistic point of view—the letterpress springing largely from the pen of Goldsmith, the engravings forming the best work of Bewick's middle period, when his powers, if not quite ripened to the high standard of his "British Birds," had reached their full development in point of richness, and quite outgrown the early stiffness of his "Children's Books" and "Story-tellers"—a perfect copy of the original edition would fetch metaphorically its weight in gold. In the present reprint we have chiefly to remark the wonderful clearness and strength of the impressions that can still be taken from the old blocks on which Bewick worked nearly a century ago. The illustrated preface, by Edwin Pearson, with the full account of Bewick's earlier works which formed a conspicuous feature in the edition of '71, has been revised by the author for the present volume.

From Scott to Hugh Miller the depopulation of the Highlands has called forth wailing from eloquent lips on reasons half of sentiment half of policy. The glens that but a century ago sent regiment after regiment to European battle fields, and now are left to the solitary shepherd or the hybrid being (part game-watcher, part man-of-all-work) who alone represents the ancient clansman, are certainly not a satisfactory sight; even though political economists remind us that the descendants of the ancient tenants are winning good pay in Glasgow factories or lands of their own in far-off Canada. In his temperate and able "Highland Crofters" (2nd Edition. The Author, 61, Hugh Street, S.W.), Dr. D. G. F. Macdonald, deals with the vexed question on grounds that in the main are strictly economical—showing, we think, with considerable success, that the "crofter" or peasant farmer, if only given a fair start and a liberal lease for a term neither too long nor too short, e.g., from twenty-one to twenty-five years, will not only pay the highest rent but will do this upon lands which the capitalist farmer would decline to cultivate at all. That this is the case in many districts and that the landlords' objections to a "crofter" tenantry arises rather from the inability of many to make any advances for improvements, from the fear (in crises like the potato disease) of having a pauper population thrown upon the rates, and from the greater convenience of receiving rents from one or two large tenants, instead of collecting them from some hundreds of small occupiers, we entertain very little doubt. "Improving" landlords in the Scottish Highlands—and, perhaps, in other districts, too—would do well to study Dr. Macdonald's pamphlet.

Under the title of "Folk Lore; or, Superstitious Beliefs in the West of Scotland within the Century" (Alex. Gardner, Paisley), Mr. J. Napier gives us a really valuable collection of beliefs and practices in connection with births, deaths, marriages, domestic animals, &c., not gathered like those Mr. Thistleton Dyer presented to us the other day from the prosaic flats of Mercia and Wessex, but from the more romantic region of the mountain and the mist, from a country where Yule, Beltane, and Halloween, those semi-Christianised survivals of former Sun and Fire worship, are even yet familiar institutions, and second sight and demoniac possession are to this hour half believed in. Always curious, often highly picturesque, the legends Mr. Napier has thus brought together will interest far more fastidious readers than the somewhat easily amused student of ordinary folk-lore, and as a volume form a praiseworthy addition to the many works on Scottish customs and antiquities for which we have had occasion to thank their publisher.

New editions of three useful guide-books (A. and C. Black, Edinburgh), "Paris, with Excursions from Paris," "South of France Summer Resorts: the Pyrenees," and "South of France: Winter Resorts on the Mediterranean," may be heartily commended to all in need of cheap and clearly-arranged guides to some of the loveliest spots in the Republic across the Channel, including, in the case of the first-mentioned, all that is noteworthy around the capital, from Beauvais to Orleans, from Rheims to Le Mans; in the case of the two last, the entire Bay coast from Bordeaux to Bayonne, and the Mediterranean health resorts as far as Florence. Each volume is arranged in routes, and tells all the ordinary traveller requires without bewildering him with too much knowledge.

A new edition—the sixth—of Mr. A. Sullivan's "New Ireland" (S. Low and Co.), will be welcomed by all who care to study at first hand the turbid, aggravating, amusing flow of Irish local politics. But is not even this "New Ireland" already passing into newer forms?

A LAWYER'S EXPERIENCES

I.

An attorney is defined to be, "one who acts for another." But we scarcely ever hear of an attorney nowadays, that vulgar chrysalis form having been abandoned for the higher pretensions of a Solicitor of the High Court of Justice who acts for himself. In my early days articled clerks worked hard; did not consider it at all infra dig. to engross a deed; were on their stools punctually at eight A.M., and read hard and long, though the examinations were not so difficult then as now. But in these days of progress the whole duty of the great body of articled clerks appears to consist in wearing knickerbockers which display their brown worsted ribbed stockings to advantage; riding on bicycles; affecting eye-glasses and suffering continual torments in their efforts to screw them into the sockets of their organs of vision; visiting the hairdresser twice a week, lest by any mischance anything like an ordinary crop of hair should appear on their heads; and, in the fourth year of their articles going up to town to "cram." After all I prefer the old-fashioned attorney to the new-fangled solicitor. In these brief chapters I will record my reminiscences of the former and the class of clients for whom he labours. As I perhaps belong to the old fogies can I do better than record the process of my own progression from office-boy to attorney-at-law?

I was early sent to occupy a high stool in a lawyer's office. I remember it was a particularly high stool, with a shining slippery seat polished by a long line of my predecessors. That seat inclined forwards at an angle of about forty degrees, so that I could not steady my poor little body upon it without an excruciating pressure on the spinal bone. My duties were to copy the letters, answer with alacrity to four strokes upon a brazen gong struck by the "firm," rub sheets of parchment with "pounce"—so suggestive in its connection with sheepskin of wolfish tricks—and generally to be "sharp." I remember there was an engrossing clerk in that office who used to pay frequent visits to the stamp-office, a fact with which he always took care to impress me before going out. Sometimes the task of purchasing an indenture stamp occupied the entire afternoon, and I often wondered how it was that parchment smelt so strongly of rum, and whether the dipping of sheep had anything to do with it. That was before I was sharp. As my sharpness increased I began, as most young clerks do, to take a keen interest in my master's business, perusing his letters without leave or license, and prying into drawers and pigeon-holes in such a persevering way that I became acquainted with the history of every client. Perhaps I saw what was never intended for a boy's eyes, but, candidly speaking, I cannot say that the knowledge has proved injurious to me. I learnt to look upon the world as a stage, and on men and women as merely players, before other boys had ceased to be amused by the glories of a Punch and Judy show. My sharpness increased so rapidly that I was soon promoted to the dignity of copying drafts, and then to the honour of engrossing deeds. Happy days! How lovingly did I look upon the grand flourishes of the texting-pen! How I rode post from the last "and whereas" of the recitals to that glorious halt-house, "Now this Indenture Witnesseth." The sweep of the tail of the "I" was superb. By degrees my precocity wore off, or I grew up to the level of it, and a sober love of law began to formulate in my mind. I did not, like Uriah Heep, study Tidd's Practice, but I approached my future studies through the pleasant gate of antiquarian lore. I had always been fond of history, and when, rummaging one day in the large law library in the office I stumbled across an old ponderous calf-bound black-letter copy of the Statutes at Large, my delight was indescribable. King John and Runnymede! What a treasure! I learnt more of history from those volumes than from Hume and Smollett, Mrs. Markham, and all other male and female English historians put together. Then what should I seize hold of next but an edition of Blackstone, and with that weapon I began to shape my crude and fashionless ideas. In those days the office hours were from eight to eight, with one hour for dinner and half-an-hour for tea. Night-work under the circumstances then existing was no joke. The office was reached by steps down instead of steps up, was more than a trifle damp, and redolent of mouldy parchment, mice, worm-eaten desks, and decaying horsehair. For illumination one had only a sputtering candle of vile wax, or more frequently of infamous tallow. Ten hours and a half per day of close application in such a place reduced one's energies to the lowest ebb, yet after that, if the clerk had an ambition to rise, he must needs pore still more. And yet the old fogies were by no means unhealthy specimens. The rubicund face of an old employer and friend beams upon me through the hazes of memory. He did not turn his face to the wall until he was seventy-five, although he drank an astonishing quantity of crusted port. The youth of such men was not wasted. Long hours of work and study are by no means so injurious as youthful dissipation, and although those men would be voted "slow" nowadays, the extent and solidity of their acquirements was considerable. I am digressing. I became a lawyer. I first became managing clerk in an office in a Yorkshire town. In that office we did a great deal of conveyancing business, and as the land was nearly all copyhold we had full work for our bill-clerk in making out fat accounts to be duly rendered on the completion of purchases. The copyhold tenure is one of the heritages of a lawyer. All those who may chance to read these notes may not be acquainted with the nature of the different tenures of land, and, therefore, I may perhaps be pardoned if I briefly describe what copyhold means. In doing this I must crave pardon if I become too prolix. Know all men that the ancient Britons inhabited the land subject to no law, but roamed about as suited their convenience. After the Roman and subsequently the Saxon invasions land was held merely by right of conquest, and for two or three centuries only those who were powerful enough to defy their neighbours were able to secure their possessions. Gradually a system of order began to prevail, which was mainly brought about by the wise Alfred, and what is now termed common-law—really the law of the conscience—became the basis of men's actions. A man who held land was acknowledged to be the legitimate possessor of it, and was deemed to have a right to transmit it to his descendants. After the Norman conquest the position of affairs was entirely altered, and what is known as the feudal or military tenure came into operation. By this system all land was held to belong to the king, and he bestowed it upon his lieges on certain conditions of servitude. In process of time many of the manors so bestowed came back again into the hands of the sovereign, and gradually as the Government became constitutional the feudal idea was extinguished. Crown lands were sold to the highest bidders, and a large portion of the land was thus transformed into freehold. In other cases the old feudal manors continued, and although sold in parcels to various persons, were only sold according to the custom prevailing in each manor. What had been done in the good old days of Richard II. must be done for all time unless Parliament shall intervene and sweep away the cobwebs. For instance, if in the reign of Edward III. Geoffrey de Champnie sold to John of the Hob a piece of land on the condition that John should ever afterwards pay a rent of 6d. a year and present two sucking pigs annually to the aristocrat's table, plain John Hobbs in the reign of Victoria can only continue to hold that land on paying to Sir George Champney the said 6d. a year and contributing the two sucking pigs. Perhaps Sir George will not ask for the pigs, but he would be entitled to them if he did. In late years, however, an Act of Parliament has been passed by which copyhold lands can be converted into freehold on certain conditions. And the time may come when lawyers will not be able to grow fat upon surrenders and admittances. In my next jottings I will relate a few of the curious old customs of various manors which have come under my own observation.

FRESHWATER FISHERMEN

Those who know least about it are loudest in their denunciations of the angler's art as bespeaking a pastime essentially selfish and unsocial, and as being deficient in those elements which constitute the healthful basis of almost every other British sport,—especially excluding neighbourly sympathy and good-fellowship. There are those who have gone as far even as to stigmatise the gentle craft as cold-blooded and barbarous, and who liken the peaceful fisherman setting out for the scene of his soul's enjoyment to the solitude-loving savage, slinking forth from his wigwam on a hunting prowl. It is certain, at all events, that these libel-loving folk could never have been present at a jovial gathering of freshwater fishers at any one of the four or five-score of angling clubs established in London and its suburbs.

Possibly it may surprise many to hear that within an area so limited there can be found so many people of piscatorial proclivities that they require for their accommodation nearly a hundred recognised rallying-places. And not mere rallying-places, but formally constituted clubs, each with its appointed officers, and its rules and regulations, and its prize fund, its glorious trophies, its periodical meetings, and its annual banquet; why, the United London Anglers alone have, besides their head-quarters, nearly sixty society houses, spread over the metropolis, and its members number over seventeen hundred. It is computed by those who are in a position to get at accurate statistics, that there are, in and about London, nearly two thousand five hundred "enrolled" fishermen, and at least another thousand habitual practitioners who do not belong to any club.

It might be supposed that with a host of sportsmen waging perpetual war against the finny tribes of our streams, lakes, and rivers, that the scaly innocents would soon become extinct. But the man worthy to wield a rod angles for fame, not for fish. The denizens of the sparkling waters receive fair play at his hands. He would no more demean himself by violating a fish's close time than a good Catholic would disregard the obligations of Lent, and he has as tender a regard for small fry as a Sister of Charity for her orphan charges. Moreover, as a rule, all is not fish that comes to his net, in a manner of speaking. Anglers one and all—especially club men—may be inspired with the same ambition which, of course, is to figure as the champion of the year, but they seek it by different water-ways. The fisher for jack is not himself a Jack of all the branches embraced by angling craft. It is the high-class freshwater fisherman's maxim, that a lifetime is not long enough to enable a man so to master the arts and mysteries of rod and line, that he should eventually become, as it were, an universal genius. It is deemed to be quite enough for an angler to fix on his particular fish, and stick to and study him. Thus, in a club-room, it is easy enough to tell each man's "fancy." Flushed with joyful anticipation, and confident of a good weighing, a just-returned fisherman enters the room with the tray of jack of his catching, and one and all gather round the table. But one and all do not stay there. There are trout men, and roach men, and perch men, and though they of course have sincere respect for the jack man, they have a supreme contempt for his jack; and after the common courtesy of compliment, they saunter back to their seats and group themselves in congenial threes and fours, and give free flow to their praising of the fish of their hearts.

"But what," the uninitiated and very probably prejudiced reader may exclaim, "but what, in the name of all that is eccentric, can they find to talk about?" From a natural-history point of view,—the haunts, habits, and customs of the barbel, for example,—since all barbel exist on one plan of existence, and have had since the Flood, the material afforded for discussion must be limited, and it must be hard work to keep up a warm argument on the subject for many hours,—or at all events for many weeks or months together. Or again, is it as to how hooks are baited, and how barbel are taken, that yields matter for enthusiastic discussion? Surely not, since what can be tamer or less prolific of anecdotal lore than to stand on a bank grasping a stick with a string dangling at the end of it, and wait and wait—a sort of mild improvement, minus the fun, on the childish game of "shut your eyes and open your mouth and see what luck will send you." But, oh benighted unbeliever! well may the angler—the man who has the craft well to heart—laugh and wink to his fellows when he hears such foolishness talked, or reads it written. Yes, after all, and from one point of view, the true angler is a selfish individual. His rod has unlocked for him the joys, the marvels, the thrilling excitements, the disappointments that but spur him to renewed efforts, the delightful surprises, the soul-stirring triumphs, that belong to a world known only to the elect—to those who have the gift of freshwater fish craft. He is selfish, inasmuch as while he is patient under the jeers and sneers of those who know nothing of the charm that enthrals him, he hugs himself with the knowledge that he and his fellows are privileged beings, and he chuckles at the good work the scoffers do in deterring those who have no particular mind, one way or the other, from trespassing on his sacred domains. This doubtless is the main reason that, with a hundred fishing clubs and several thousand fishermen in our midst, the general public seldom know anything of their exploits and achievements. It is the chattering bird that betrays the whereabouts of its nest. Within the club-room and amongst themselves the delights of angling is the standard topic, and speech is free. But as soon as the outer threshold is crossed by the leagued brotherhood, "mum" is the word, and fishless is the flavour of their conversation until their next meeting.

As to the sport of angling being tame and spiritless, and angling club life dull and flavourless! Is it insipid or wearisome to hear some veteran of the craft recount how he circumvented, and in the end captured, a particularly cunning jack or trout, that through a whole season had defied the stratagem and cunning of every fisherman who had had a try for it? How that, confident of the monstrous fellow haunting a certain spot, but at uncertain times, the angler, whose professional reputation was at stake—he having rashly derided the futile efforts of his brother sportsmen—regularly laid himself out for the capture, and spent three entire weeks, never missing a single day, in reconnoitring and watching, in lying wait at the holes, and where the knowing old jack was known to retire for a snooze after feeding—in endeavours to tempt him when he was hungry, and to beguile him with some precious tit-bit when he had dined, and his appetite was fastidious, with at last the bite; and he followed, alas! by an immediate break away. The chagrin and despair, the stern determination to conquer yet, the break-of-day visit next morning, and the victory! There is not a member of the club, of any experience to speak of, but has a dozen such stories to tell, and by the thorough fisherman they are as keenly relished as are the lion and tiger-hunting narratives related by more ambitious sportsmen around the jungle camp-fire.

New Music

Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.—Worthy of its predecessor is "A Second Set of Sixty Voluntaries, arranged for the Harmonium," by J. W. Elliott. Harmonium-players of limited capability will find this volume a most useful companion. It contains many well-known works of foreign and English composers, for the most part well, and always simply arranged, amongst which may be mentioned Mendelssohn's "Andante con Moto" (First Symphony), Handel's Funeral March (Samson), and Gounod's "Come unto Him."—The two latest numbers of "Novello, Ewer, and Co.'s Music Primers" are "Musical Forms" and "Instrumentation." The former is by Ernst Pauer, who in his preface says:—"It is a common remark that musical amateurs talk of different musical forms with a very vague and uncertain notion of their meaning." The same reproach may be brought against professional musicians in a great measure. Henceforth, all who patiently study the above-named work will glean a large amount of information, and probably learn when to speak and when prudently to be silent.—"Instrumentation," by E. Prout, B.A., is intended for advanced students who have acquired the knowledge of score-reading, and are well up in the theory of music as well as its practice; to them this ably written work will be of great assistance and value, whilst the amateur pur sang, who has no idea of writing a symphony, will find much interesting matter therein.—Few there are amongst English people who do not know and admire Dr. W. C. Bennett's "Songs for Sailors," they are sure of a welcome in whatever form they appear. Some of these poems are narratives of even fifteen eight-lined verses in length—complete poetical yarns, such as our sailors love—others are brief and sentimental love ditties. To meet the requirements of our vocally disposed tars, J. L. Hatton set these poems to appropriate tunes with marked success; they are published in a neat volume together with a very good portrait of our sailor Duke of Edinburgh.—Written for "The Commemoration Festival at the Church of St. Michael's, Manchester," "I am well pleased" (116th Psalm), "A Song of Thanksgiving for Tenor, Solo, and Chorus," by Henry Hiles, Mus. Doc., Oxon., will surely take a good position amongst church music; it bears the stamp of a genuine musician's hand, and does not lack a certain amount of melodious originality.

Messrs. Boosey and Co.——From the time of its publication, forty-six years ago, to the present day, Louis Spohr's "Violin School" has been a standard work and an often quoted authority, not only in German, but in all musical schools and circles. From the author's preface, addressed to parents and teachers—in itself a lesson—to the last page of this clever and comprehensive work, not one line is superfluous. Arranged in three parts, and sub-divided into sections, Part I. is devoted to the construction and constituent parts of the instrument, with the means to be adopted for its due care and preservation; Part II., which contains twelve sections, concerns the manner in which the violin should be diligently studied and mastered; Part III. is on "Style and Delivery." The present edition is revised and edited, with additional text, by Henry Holmes, the translation from the German is by Florence A. Marshall, the two illustrations by Henry Holiday. The editor has executed his somewhat perilous task of revision and addition in a highly creditable manner. Both translator and illustrator have done their part well and skilfully. Would-be violinists should follow the sound advice given by Spohr in his preface to this work—to secure the services of a thoroughly efficient master before commencing the study of this most difficult instrument, as faults and bad habits when once acquired can only be eradicated with much difficulty.—A complete and elegantly got-up volume is "The Contralto Album," edited by J. Pitman, a collection of fifty celebrated songs (in their original keys) selected from the most famous operas, with Italian and English words. This compact and portable Album will be found a most useful companion to the drawing and concert-rooms, not only for contralti, but also for mezzo-soprani singers.

Messrs. A. Hammond and Co.——It is to be regretted that Signor Arditi fritters away his time in composing, or we should say rearranging, vocal waltzes all from the same model, his famous "Il Bacio." A change of key and a fresh title seem to be all he desires. "Parla," a valse brillante for the voice, contains nothing new excepting the words, by F. Rigelli, which are fairly poetical.—"Sleigh Bells," a song of medium compass, written and composed by T. C. Harman and Gordon Saunders, is brisk and pleasing. Both words and music are good.—Six pianoforte pieces of average merit, which will meet the requirements of musical teachers for the coming Christmas holidays, are "Orage sur le Lac" and "Vieux et Jeunes," by A. L. Desanges. The former is the more original and prettier of the two. "Première Valse de Salon" and "Valse Caprice," by H. Nuyens; the one showy and useful for practice, the other of a very ordinary type. Best and most original of the group is "La Prière d'un Enfant," by Alfred Sergent, a charming song without words. "Souvenir de Briens," by Paul Bernard, will also find favour with many who admire a smoothly-written nocturne.—Playable and danceable are "The Review Lancers," by Charles Coote, although they are void of novelty of ideas.—From such prolific dance-music writers as G. Lamothe and J. Gung'l we must expect more quantity than quality. Of a brace of waltzes by G. Lamothe, "Pastorale" and "Toujours et Encore," the former is far more pleasing than the latter; whilst J. Gung'l has but seldom brought out so common-place a set as "Epigrammae Waltzes."

W. Czerny.——A song of no ordinary type is "Judith's Invocation," by J. Concone, the words translated from the French by Dr. S. Kahleuberg. A mezzo-soprano, with cultivated taste and declamatory powers, will surely produce a favourable effect with this song.—W. Czerny has transcribed for the pianoforte "Trillo del Satanasco," Tartini's quaint and well-known morceau for the violin. The frontispiece is adorned with a copy of the original drawing of "Satan Playing the Trillo," as he appeared to Tartini in his dream.—Of the same quaint and ancient type is "Gavotte from the Temple of Glory," by J. P. Rameau, transcribed for the pianoforte by G. J. Van Eyken, both these pieces are well arranged, and possess the charm of novelty.—Five fairly good pianoforte pieces of ordinary difficulty adapted for drawing-room after-dinner execution are "Un Souvenir du Temps de Louis XV. (a sarabande and bravura, by J. M. Leclair), arranged by Victor Moret; a "Gavotte en Sol," by M. Roeder; "Shepherd's Lay," a pastorale by W. A. Mozart; a bright and cheerful morceau—"Bon Voyage;" a galop de salon, by A. Buhl—all the more welcome as coming in the form of a duet—and, best of the group, "Herne the Hunter," a sketch by Max-Schroeter.

Messrs. Wood and Co.——Correct fingering is very important for the due execution of all instrumental works; hence No. II. of "Perles Classiques," a well-arranged edition of Mendelssohn's "Andante" and "Rondo Capriccioso" (Op. 14), edited and fingered by Carlo Tiesset, will be a valuable addition to the schoolroom repertoire.—From Immanuel Liebich we are sure of something worth listening to, however simple it may be. "La Petite Espiègle," a graceful trifle for the pianoforte, does not disappoint our expectations.—"The Banjo Polka," by Arthur Nicholson, has already made its mark at the Promenade Concerts, Covent Garden. A very ear-catching tune and a very funny frontispiece will ensure for this spirited polka a foremost place amongst the Christmas favourites.

Miscellaneous.——A vocal waltz song of an ultra-ordinary type is "Heart of my Heart," music by J. Meissler, words, which deserve a far better setting, by L. A. Johnstone (Messrs. W. Marshall and Co.).—A very feeble specimen of its kind is "Comme il Faut Polka," by J. H. Young, who will no doubt do better when he has studied composition, and can rely on his own more than the ideas of other composers (Messrs. J. R. Lafleur and Son).—A melodious "Barcarole," one of Rossini's posthumous works for the pianoforte, has been rescued from oblivion, edited, and fingered by J. W. Lawson, who deserves thanks for his trouvaille (Messrs. H. D'Alcorn and Co.).

BOARDING-HOUSES

That peculiar part of the social system known as boarding-houses appears to be susceptible of all kinds of varieties and sub-varieties. And yet a common likeness necessarily runs through the whole. Their numbers were never more multiplied, their uses more extended, than at the present time. At the one end of the scale we have those gorgeous West End mansions which form the latest experiments in social life, where vast common rooms extend luxury and social enjoyment, and at the other end of a scale, wherever human beings board in common under a responsible head, there, in however rudimentary a type, we have the boarding-house. There is one common principle which prevails in every variety of this great London institution. The principle is simply that by the force of combination people of a certain income should obtain the larger rooms, the better table, the more extended society than they would be likely to have in places of their own. At the present day, owing to the increased urgency of the servant difficulty, the rising prices of all things, and the desire to abridge responsibilities and labour, the boarding system is receiving a considerable expansion. From the same reason, more or less, we have the rapid development of clubs and the growing habit of living at hotels. At first sight it would appear that the boarding-house admits every variety of English human kind. This, however, is by no means the case. A young married couple, for instance, are very rarely found in a boarding-house; they are making their own nest, and are content with their own society. Still less is a family man found in a boarding-house; he is not likely to be popular there, and children and dogs, unless in special instances, are tabooed. Of course we speak of permanent town residents; there is many a professional man from the country who delights in a week's residence in a London boarding-house. As a rule it is young men and maidens, or the same people when life is wearing fast towards its close, who come to the boarding-house. Then the boarding-house mainly depends upon its connection. Its name its not advertised in the newspaper or trumpeted at the railway stations. Its means of obtaining publicity are mainly through the influence of its clientèle. It is in this way that boarding-houses are susceptible of an easy classification. There are commercial boarding-houses; we all recollect how Dickens made Mrs. Todgers' commercial boarding-house immortal. Then there are boarding-houses where the clerical element is so predominant among other elements that they may be distinctly called clerical boarding-houses. The run upon these houses in the month of May is great, and they must have a serious character all the year round. Some boarding-houses have a character for being all other than serious, where the life is of a somewhat free and easy description. Then there is a great run of sea-captains and shipping-people in one house; another has a connection among doctors or lawyers. If the widow of a professional man sets up a boarding-house, of course her connection lies among her husband's friends and associates. Then there are some houses which have a foreign connection; especially we have American boarding-houses. Then there are some boarding-houses which are not even as other boarding-houses are, which are linked with fashionable neighbourhoods, and flatter themselves that they are fashionable themselves.

It would be easy to put boarding-houses in a ridiculous light. Dickens, Thackeray, Sala, and others have all done so. They have salient points very clearly defined. They readily yield themselves to the Comedy of Manners. The most objective and the most objectionable feature is a certain pretentiousness. In a society of this kind each is likely to esteem another as inferior to himself. They all seem self-asserting and on the defence. Then if you have people who are not of a clubbable nature, and are therefore quite unfitted for a boarding-house, such people are alternately the causes of great annoyance or great amusement. We have little heart to make fun of the people who keep boarding-houses. It is an anxious and uncertain business. If they have a run of business at one time they have empty rooms and a thin table at other times. Mrs. Todgers' great difficulty about the gravy is always turning up in one form or another. In offering board and lodging to others they think themselves happy if they can secure board and lodging for themselves. Their policy, financially, is of a contrasted kind. They either minimise expenses and make small savings out of a few, or they seek to attract numbers by a lavish style of living. What may be the peculiar attraction of a boarding-house we are at a loss to imagine. The slavery of having to return to the house at definite hours must be intolerable. We suspect that most Londoners would practically pay for their board twice over. But nevertheless there is a peculiar and original feature about boarding-houses which perhaps makes up the chief part of the attractions to those who are attracted. There is no other way in the world by which a man, whoever he may be or whatever may be his antecedents, can be placed on family terms and sudden intimacy with those who, up to yesterday, were perfect strangers. It is supposed that the landlady asks for references, but in these days a reference does not go for very much, and there is a pestilent doctrine to the effect that a payment in advance is as good as a reference. The result is that there is a certain element of romance and mystery about a boarding-house, which is attractive in one way, but ought to be suspicious in another. It may be recollected that Dr. Smethurst contrived his bigamous marriage in a boarding-house with the lady whom he was afterwards condemned for murdering, although the verdict and sentence were oddly cancelled afterwards. There are many boarding-houses in fashionable watering-places, which are confessedly hunting-grounds for prospective wives. Young ladies go there, suitably protected, under "the plea of the necessity of a little change and air." "Boarding-house marriages" is a phrase which has a considerable meaning and currency. Indeed it is only fair that we should mention a true and affecting story of a worthy couple who, having made a very happy marriage at a boarding-house, being childless, resolved to spend their days under the wing of the happy institution which had brought them together.

GRANDMAMMA'S MIRROR

In this mirror,—years ago,—
May be, sixty-five or so,
Peeped a maid,
Who was young and very fair,
Summer eyes, and sunny hair,—
It is said.

She's a little altered now,
There are wrinkles on her brow,
And her hair
Is more silvery in hue,
But her eyes are kind and true,
As they were.

Only think, she saw herself
Years ago, a pretty elf, Mirrored here!
'Twould be very nice to know,
Where the pretty faces go
Year by year.

What a treasure there must be
Hidden somewhere, secretly,
In this glass:
For I know that pretty girls
Always trifle with their curls
As they pass.

And I sometimes seem to trace
There the shadow of a face
Not my own;
But no sooner do I strive
To regard it as alive,—
It has flown.

Then I fancy I have seen
Grandmamma, at seventeen,
A deceit!
Yet it builds me up a dream
Of the blue eyes, that seem Mine to meet.

Though I know it is ideal,
There is something very real
In the face;
Heaven bless me! there it is,
Coming here with Cousin Liz;
"Cousin Grace!"

DEPARTURE OF THE MARQUIS OF LORNE AND THE PRINCESS LOUISE FOR CANADA—"GOOD-BYE!" THE "SARMATIAN" OFF NEW BRIGHTON

Topics of the Week

Lord Cranbrook's Despatch.——This important official document, although formally addressed to Lord Lytton, is of course put forth for the purpose of justifying the present action of the Government in the eyes of the British public, and not for the enlightenment of the Viceroy, who is necessarily already fully informed of all the matters treated of therein. Whatever opinion may be entertained by our countrymen as to the wisdom of the policy determined upon by Lord Beaconsfield's Cabinet, that is to say, their resolution to deal with Shere Ali in one only of two characters, namely, either as a firm friend and ally, or as a declared and open enemy—the choice being left to himself, and unhappily now decided against us—it is plain that Her Majesty's present advisers are not solely responsible for the critical state of our relations with Afghanistan which has so long existed, and which is now about to be terminated by actual hostilities. The refusal of the Ameer to receive the Mission which was recently sent to him is only one link in a chain of occurrences which had their origin in days long antecedent to the accession of our present Government to power. The Ameer, it would appear, alarmed by the Russian seizure of Khiva, sent a special Envoy to Simla to ask Lord Northbrook how far he might rely on England to protect him from Russia. Lord Northbrook, in reply, assured the Ameer that under certain conditions the Indian Government would assist him to repel unprovoked aggression. But, after making this offer of aid—and this is the important point to note—Lord Northbrook was not supported in his proposals by Mr. Gladstone and his fellow-Ministers at home. These gentlemen decided that they "did not share his Highness's apprehensions" that Russia would advance, and so Lord Northbrook had to retract his offer of aid. Mr. Gladstone may have been right or he may have been wrong, and no doubt he will endeavour to justify the decision at which he then arrived, but as Shere Ali's sullenness, and his desire to throw himself into the arms of Russia, date from the period of that rebuff, it seems plain that, in spite of their violent attacks on Lord Beaconsfield, the late Government are chiefly responsible for this, the third war against Afghanistan, which is now imminent, if it has not actually begun.

Afghanistan and England.——Lord Beaconsfield has been blamed for the sarcastic tone of his reply to Lord Lawrence, but it must be admitted that he received considerable provocation. It can hardly be supposed that the Government have entered upon a great and far-reaching policy without what seems to them adequate consideration of the facts with which they have to deal. Yet, at the last moment, an irresponsible body comes forward, and dogmatically informs them that they have been wholly wrong, that they know nothing of the difficulties they are creating, and that they must immediately strike out an altogether different course. The wonder is, not that Lord Beaconsfield sent a rather stinging answer, but that he made so moderate a use of his powers of retort. More arrogant pretensions could hardly be asserted, since they amount to a demand on the part of the Afghan Committee to rule the British Empire. The difficulty is that if this particular Committee were allowed to have its way others would claim to determine the national policy in an exactly opposite direction. On the whole, until we receive new light on the matter, it would seem to be best that the government of the Empire should continue as heretofore to be carried on by the Ministry of the day, subject to the approval of Parliament and the country. We may rest assured that no Cabinet will venture to execute a resolution opposed to the will of the people. When Englishmen are genuinely aroused, they know how to express their sentiments; and even the Government of Lord Beaconsfield, strong as it has hitherto been, would become powerless if it were confronted by a really national agitation. The fact that the nation is unmoved by the arguments of so great an authority as Lord Lawrence ought to give him and his friends food for profitable meditation. The truth is that they exclude from the discussion the only point which is of genuine importance. All the world admits that to go to war merely to make our frontier "scientific" would be unjust; but the contention of those who side with the Government is that we are in presence of a serious peril. In consequence of the very policy for which Lord Lawrence argues Cabul is now under the domination of the Russians, and England has been haughtily warned off the ground they have occupied. We thus not only lay ourselves open to invasion, but we convey to our Indian subjects an impression of our strength—or rather of our weakness—which must tend to undermine our authority. What is there unjust in the demand that the Ameer shall not ally himself with our enemies, or in the resolve that if he does we shall make our Empire safe against both him and them? The injustice is in the policy of those who would recklessly endanger a system of rule which is essential to the happiness of more than a fifth of the human race.

Retaliatory Tariffs.——Mr. Maciver's proposals in favour of protective, not necessarily prohibitory, tariffs will be read by many British producers during these hard times with sympathising eyes. It is not that Englishmen have ceased to believe in the advantages of Free Trade; on the contrary, their complaint is that there is not enough of it. It is such a nice game that everybody ought to play at it, they think; but unfortunately, though for years they have piped to foreign countries, foreign countries will not dance, and Englishmen still remain almost the only free-traders in the civilised world. This mattered little so long as the Continent was a hundred years behind us in almost every kind of industrial enterprise, and when Mr. Cobden hoped, by the aid of cheap food, to make our island the workshop of the world. To some extent his scheme succeeded; but now the tide has begun to turn—several Continental countries are pretty nearly, if not quite, abreast of us, and the United States, with unrivalled natural resources and a rapidly-increasing population (the element in which formerly the Republic was weak), is visibly threatening our manufacturing supremacy. And while we send fewer goods abroad, we are yearly becoming more dependent on foreign imports. Before the Free Trade era, we produced nearly everything at home, with the exception of exotics, such as wine, tea, and sugar. Now, setting aside the enormous foreign food bill—rendered unavoidable, perhaps, by the vast population crowded into so small an area until improved Land Laws increase our farm produce—we have only to look into the shop windows to see how many of our other wants are supplied from abroad. And when we add to this that most of our bakers are Germans, our confectioners Swiss, our eating-house keepers of every Continental variety, and that there is a large polyglot element among our sailors and our domestic servants, one begins to wonder what are the pursuits followed by English producers of the working class. There can be little doubt that the facility of foreign import has killed off numerous small native industries which formerly flourished, thus causing a lessened variety of employment, and so aggravating distress at a time when numerous channels of enterprise are closed by the dulness of trade.

Kings and Assassins.——The present year will be memorable as a year of trial for kings. First the German Emperor was twice shot at; then came the attempt to assassinate the King of Spain; now the Italian King has had his turn. It is usual to speak of these attempts as merely the result of a restless craving for notoriety, or at worst as the expression of the envy of an ill-conditioned nature; and it is true that these form large elements in nearly every case of the kind. But something more must also be taken into account. If the would-be murderers were not in the habit of hearing the existing institutions of society talked of with hatred and contempt, we may be tolerably sure that they would adopt less perilous methods of thrusting themselves before the world. The truth is that all over the Continent—we say nothing of our own country, where the conditions are different—there are elements of profound discontent. Everywhere we see signs that the old order of society is to some extent breaking up. The mass of European workmen are satisfied that they do not get a fair share of the good things of the world. They do all the work, they say; and the wealth created by them is consumed by a comparatively small, but utterly selfish, minority. This may be a very foolish view, and opposed to the elementary doctrines of political economy; but it is well to face the fact that it is extensively held, and that to it are more or less due these hideous efforts to kill the men supposed to represent the abuses of ages. If Continental statesmen were wise, they would set to work at once, not to cope with the evil by means of soldiers and police, but to remove its causes. Let society be so organised that every man would have a chance of making his life tolerable, and we should see an end of revolutionary agitation. Unfortunately the first step towards this remote ideal must be the setting aside of the military systems which now crush the energies of the Western world. Europe will never have half or a quarter the prosperity to which it is entitled until vast standing armies are abolished. But what hope is there of Governments moving in this direction? France and Germany, notwithstanding their fair professions, are ready to spring at each other's throats; Italy is bowed to the earth by the burden of her army and her navy; Austria is in a like position; and Russia pursues so mad a military career that so thoroughly peaceful a country as England is compelled to make ready for her own defence. We fear it will not be to-morrow or next day that dynasties will begin to protect themselves by the only methods which can really secure their safety.

Farmers and Foxes.——In the case of the Vale of Taunton Hunt, Lord Coleridge has decided that fox-hunters have no legal right to enter upon a man's land in pursuit of their prey. Non-sporting townsfolk may be inclined to wonder that such a solemn, carefully-weighed decision should be deemed necessary. They would be inclined to decide off-hand in favour of the protesting farmer. Paper-chasing is a favourite suburban sport during the autumn months, but what a monstrous piece of impudence it would appear to be, if the youthful paper-chasers held that they were privileged to enter any brewery or other factory which chanced to lie in their line of route, and rush helter-skelter up and down its staircases, regardless of any damage they might do? Nor is it easy to see wherein, as far as any benefit conferred upon the person trespassed upon is concerned, there is any essential difference between modern fox-hunting and paper-chasing. It is of just as much and no more advantage to the supposed brewer whose premises are invaded that the "hare" should be caught by his brother-runners, as it was to Mr. Summerhayes that the fox should be captured by the bold riders of the Vale of Taunton Hunt. Of course there was a time when matters, as regards fox-hunting, were far otherwise; and, as often happens in England, a custom has survived when the cause which gave it birth has ceased to exist. There was a time in this country when human beings were scarce and foxes were plentiful; when Reynard was really and not merely theoretically regarded as vermin; when farmers felt no compunction at putting him to death in any fashion, sportsmanlike or otherwise; and when a land-occupier would have viewed an injury done to his hedges in the pursuit of one of these mischievous quadrupeds with the same equanimity with which a suburban householder would regard the damage done to a flower-bed during the capture of a burglar. All this is altered now. The fox is an artificial creature, solely cherished for sporting purposes; he is hunted, not merely by the farmer and his neighbours, but by strangers from distant cities; is it then a matter of surprise that farmers, suffering under the combined afflictions of Free Trade, high rents, and Labourer's Unions, should occasionally "cut up rusty" at an inroad of gentlemen "in pink"? We should be sorry to see fox-hunting extinguished, but, unless it is practised with the utmost consideration for the rights of others, there is no small risk of its becoming an impossibility in a crowded country such as England is at the present time.

"The Quality of Mercy."——It is feared that the failure which recently shook the commercial prosperity of Scotland to its foundations will prove even worse than has for some time been expected. The first call on the shareholders is likely to bring forth about a third of the sum on which the creditors calculated. If this be so, there is not a shareholder who will not be ruined in the event of the claims of the creditors being pushed to their utmost limits. For the next call will rise in amount, and so the horrible process will advance until every shareholder has been deprived of his last shilling. Such a calamity as this is too vast to be fully realised. Few imaginations are vivid enough to call up anything like an adequate vision of the misery which will be inflicted on multitudes of homes, to say nothing of the hardships which the shock must indirectly occasion to thousands outside its direct range. Rarely has there been a more sharp revelation of the inevitable issue of that contempt for "the veracities" which in these materialistic days has become too marked a characteristic of the commercial world; and it may be hoped that the lesson will not be lost on a nation whose moral feeling is so radically sound as that of the Scottish people. In the mean time, however, the most urgent question is whether something cannot be done to break the force of the stroke in the case of those who have in no way deserved it. The appeal on behalf of the sufferers has been thus far liberally responded to by the public; and it is expected that the Scotch banks will unite to offer substantial aid. As, however, the distress will even then be but slightly relieved, the time seems to have come for the creditors to decide whether they also should not bear some portion of the disaster. They will be within their legal right in making every shareholder a bankrupt in order to secure their due; but that would be a close approach to Shylock's conception of justice. It will be to the honour of the depositors if they display a temper not quite so pitiless.

Drunk or Dying?——The sad case of Edward Harris, who was convicted of drunkenness, but whose apparently drunken symptoms resulted from a fracture of the skull caused by a fall from a vehicle, has attracted a large amount of popular sympathy, and the funeral was attended by thousands of persons, his brethren of the whip mustering with especial strength. It is very easy to blame the police for these unfortunate mistakes, but people who speak thus are apt to forget the rarity of such occurrences compared with the number of drunken persons who are daily taken into custody. When a constable sees a man or woman lying in the roadway late at night, his immediate surmise is that the prostrate person is drunk, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred his surmise is correct. The question then arises, Is the constable fairly blameworthy for not arriving at a correct conclusion in the hundredth case, where the patient is not drunk, but is either ill, or (like poor Harris) dying of a mortal injury? We can scarcely blame him for disregarding superficial cuts or bruises, for these are commonly found on drunken people when they have been tumbling about, nor are we aware of any symptoms distinguishing intoxication from other ailments which are so palpable as to be perceptible to an unscientific observer. We believe, therefore, that in most of these cases of error the policeman may fairly be exonerated. But is there no remedy against such accidents? We think there is, and a very efficient one. Why should there not be at every police-station during the night a qualified medical man, whose business it shall be specially to examine all the cases of drunkenness which are brought in? Independent of the chief object of his attendance—namely, to diagnose cases of disease or accident—his presence would ensure a more humane and rational treatment of drunkards than often obtains now. A man who is overtaken in liquor, and "run in" by the police, may be by no means an habitual toper, for such gentry generally have somewhat less tipsy friends to see them home, and yet, perhaps, he never recovers his health after confinement in a damp police cell. But how is the doctor to be paid for his services? Why, very simply, by raising the scale of the present absurdly lenient fines.

"A FALSEHOOD."——It was with sincere regret that many Englishmen read the report of the scene in which M. Gambetta denounced a statement of M. Fourtou as "a falsehood." It is true that M. Fourtou was provoking; we know of few politicians whose speeches are more likely to excite violent hostility. But M. Gambetta should regard himself as too great a man to give way to feeling is this vehement manner. The worst aspect of the affair is that it shows how deep are the elements of disunion even yet in France. The Bonapartists have been for the moment overcome; the nation as a whole rejects them, and they appear to be fully conscious of their defeat. But they have not ceased to loathe the Republicans, and such outbursts as that of M. Gambetta indicate that the loathing is returned with interest. The danger to the Republic is that the country may be made suspicious of the ultimate intentions of the Republican leaders. Every one knows that they owe their present position wholly to the moderation and self-control they have for some time displayed. Republican institutions used to be denounced as certain to lead to social anarchy, but by slow degrees it has been made plain that their tendencies may be as Conservative in one direction as they are progressive in another. There has always, however, been a party which has maintained that if a favourable time came, the mask would be thrown off, and the Republic revealed in its true character as the most despotic of all forms of Government. Every true lover of France must hope that M. Gambetta and his friends will do nothing to encourage this foolish opinion. They may be quite certain that, if they are willing to indulge in angry recriminations, the Bonapartists will give them plenty of opportunities. There is nothing M. Fourtou and men of his class would like so much as to be made the object of vehement and unjust abuse by their opponents. The Republicans can afford to baffle them by exhibiting the calmness which alone befits their strength.

MARWOOD'S LEVÉE.——The Llangibby murder, or rather series of murders, was just such a crime as would cause the most intense horror in a quiet rural district, and no doubt the detestation of the murderer was enhanced by the fact of his being a stranger and an alien. Hence we may easily excuse those simple-minded Welsh folk, who after the execution crowded into the waiting-room at Usk, and compelled the dread administrator of the extreme penalty of the law to hold a kind of improvised levée there, shaking hands with him, cheering him, and making quite a hero of him. It is to be hoped that the precedent will not be followed, for the same good reason which forbids applause in Courts of Law. The crowd which applauds one day may yell and hiss on another day, so that the officers of justice run the risk of being intimidated in the performance of their functions; and if the Usk example be imitated elsewhere, the execution of a popular criminal may endanger the hangman's own life. In these days of private executions, there is no necessity for the person of Jack Ketch to become familiar to the populace (Calcraft, we believe, used occasionally to wear a disguise on the scaffold), and we should recommend Mr. Marwood, if only for his own sake, to preserve as close an incognito as he can.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

DEPARTURE OF THE NEW GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA

AT midnight on Wednesday last week the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise, accompanied by the Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold, left London for Liverpool in a special train, the Pullman cars of which were handsomely decorated with festoons of choice flowers, intermingled with Scotch heather. Many distinguished persons were assembled on the platform, and with several of them Lord Lorne and the Princess cordially shook hands before entering the train. The Royal party were heartily cheered as the train moved out of the station, the Princess and her husband bowing their acknowledgments at the door of the car. Stoppages were made at Leicester, Derby, Warrington, and Stockport, at which last-mentioned place the Mayor was waiting on the platform in his robes of office, but the distinguished travellers were asleep. Liverpool was reached punctually at six A.M., and, in spite of the early hour, and a sharp frost, a large crowd was waiting at the station. The Royal party were received by the Mayor and other local notabilities, and drove off to the Adelphi Hotel, where they breakfasted, and the Princess graciously accepted a bouquet from Mr. Allan, one of the firm to which the Sarmatian belongs. At ten o'clock they drove to the Town Hall, where in the great Ball-room, and in the presence of a large and brilliant assemblage, addresses were presented from the Mayor and Corporation, and the Chamber of Commerce, to both of which the Marquis of Lorne replied in appreciative terms. Their Royal Highnesses and Lord Lorne then showed themselves for a few moments on the balcony overlooking the Exchange Flags, where a great crowd had gathered, and their appearance was greeted with a succession of hearty cheers. After this the Princess Louise was presented with a copy of the Liverpool Daily Post, specially printed on white satin, and then the Royal party drove off, amid the renewed cheers of the spectators, to the Landing Stage, where they were received with a Royal salute from the guard of honour, and the National Anthem was played. They then went on board the special tender, Storm Cock, which soon transferred them to the Sarmatian, although her movements were somewhat impeded by the fleet of steam-tugs and other small craft loaded with spectators which crowded around her. Soon after the Royal party were on board, the Sarmatian weighed anchor, and moved slowly down the river close to the Liverpool shore, the Royal Standard flying from the mainmast and the Dominion flag of Canada from the foretop, the military band on the Landing Stage playing "Friends far from Home," "Scots, wha hae," "Highland Laddie," "John Anderson, my Joe," and "Will ye no come back again?" The Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold remained on board until the Sarmatian was off New Brighton, when they returned in the tender, and the vessel steamed on to Moville, where it anchored for the night, and where, next morning (Friday), the Mayor and Corporation of Derry were received on board and presented an address. When the Sarmatian finally left the shores of Ireland the weather was somewhat threatening; but the Princess and Lord Lorne looked well—and, in fact, the only person on board who seemed at all out of sorts was his Excellency's piper. Perhaps the Islay whisky did it.

PESHAWUR AND THE KHYBER PASS

HERE we have one of the most extensive views of the Khyber Pass and Range which can be obtained. It is taken from the city of Peshawur, which is situated on a slightly rising ground, and consequently overlooks the wide intervening plain, and commands an admirable prospect of the Khyber Hills—the defile itself being about twelve miles distant—and of the snowy peaks of the Hindoo Koosh. The valley immediately beneath is exceedingly fertile; but, having formerly been the bed of a vast inland lake, it also abounds with large marshes, which render the locality terribly unhealthy, more particularly for European troops. Indeed, the forces under General Sir Samuel Browne are already suffering severely from the Peshawur fever, as the present is the most feverish season, and the corps of Guides is especially weakened by the prevalent disease. It is in this valley and at Peshawur that the main body of the expeditionary force has been collected together, and it is there that Sir Frederick Haines, the commander-in-chief, has gone to take the chief command, as, should hostilities break out, it will be from this point that the principal attack will be made in order to secure the fortress of Ali Musjid and the Khyber Pass. Already reconnaissances have been made by the Guides, while Sir Samuel Browne's advanced detachment at Jumrood is carefully watching the Pass, ready to prevent any of those formidable breastworks which, in 1842, delayed the advance of General Pollock's columns. Indeed, it seems to be assumed, by those supposed to be well versed in the plans of the Government, that our troops cannot afford to remain in so pestilential a district throughout the winter, but that a bold push on through the Pass to Kandahar must be made at once should the Ameer's reply prove unfavourable, although the ultimate advance upon Cabul will probably be delayed until the spring. Thus The Times' correspondent, telegraphing on Monday, states that "the necessary military and commissariat preparations are almost completed at Peshawur for an immediate advance. Many indications seem to warrant the belief that an early attack on Ali Musjid is intended. Military authorities at Peshawur have issued orders forbidding telegraph officials from despatching messages regarding the movements of troops, and, unless an early advance is contemplated, these orders would be unnecessary and unmeaning." We may add that the organisation of Sir Samuel Browne's column appears admirably adapted for mountain warfare, as it comprises one cavalry, one artillery, and four infantry brigades. These latter are composed of one British and two native infantry

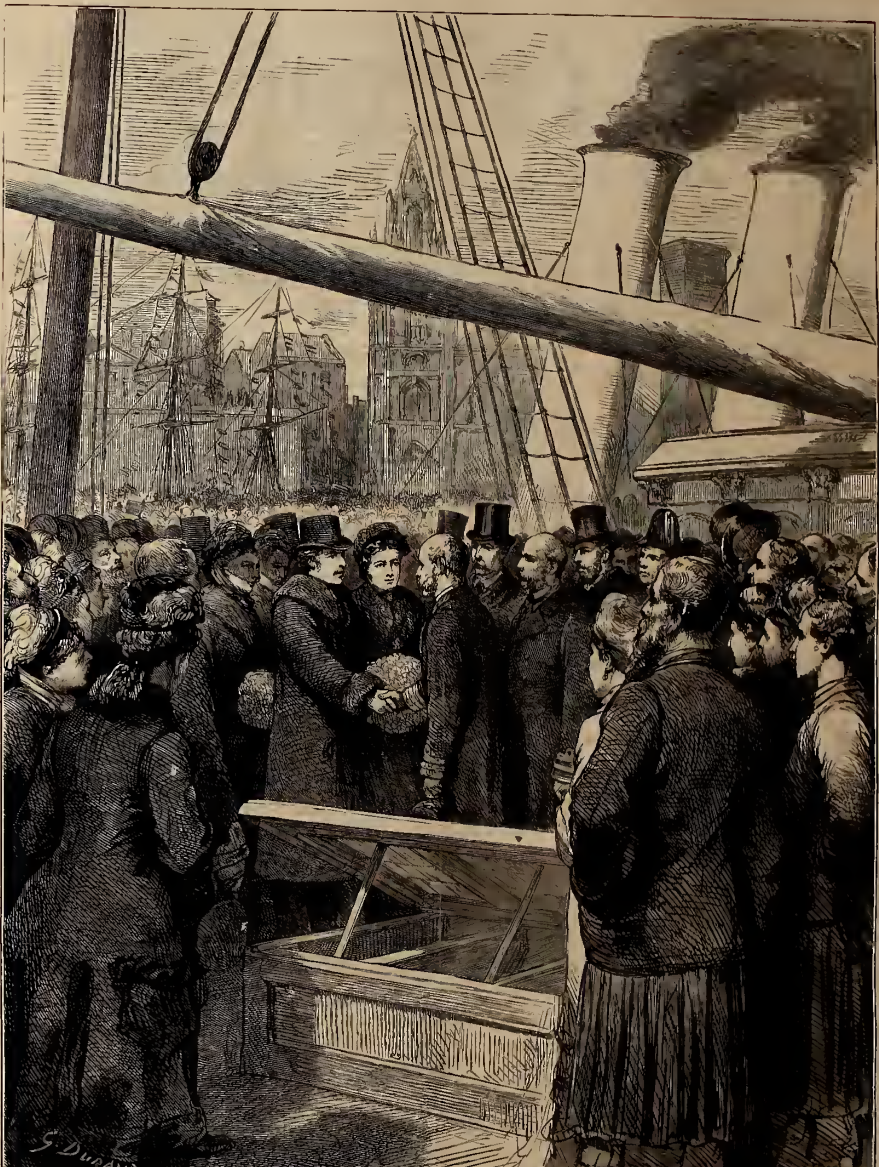
DEPARTURE OF THE MARQUIS OF LORNE AND THE PRINCESS LOUISE FOR CANADA



DEPARTURE OF THE MARQUIS OF LORNE AND THE PRINCESS LOUISE FOR CANADA—THE RECEPTION ON BOARD THE "SARMATIAN" battalions, and a battery of artillery. Thus each brigadier is in command, as it were, of a separate column of his own, able to act independently in any position, and not liable to any interruption in its operations owing to an absence of that most important tactical unit in hill fighting, a battery of guns. The moral effect of cavalry on the Afghans is very great, but as they are manifestly unfitted for mountain warfare, their chief duty in the Khyber will be to escort the baggage and to reconnoitre. To return to our illustration, a description of Peshawur was given in our Supplement last week, while we have previously (No. 454, Nov. 9) given a full description of the chief features of the Khyber Pass.

SNOW-PLOUGH AT NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE

The weather in the North of England during the past fortnight has been remarkable for its severity and its boisterousness, and great inconvenience and delay have resulted from the interruption thus caused to traffic. At Newcastle-on-Tyne, in particular, there has been one of the heaviest snow-storms on record in that district. On the evening of Monday, Nov. 11th, the weather was clear and bright, but between eleven and twelve o'clock snow began to fall, increasing in intensity until 2 A.M. on Tuesday, when, the Newcastle Daily Chronicle tells us, the showers were literally blinding in their severity, and a violent hurricane which raged simultaneously greatly added to the force and fierceness with which they beat on the ground. At 4 A.M. there was a lull which, however, was succeeded by a violent thunderstorm. When daylight came, notwithstanding the short time over which the storm extended, the streets, on its cessation, were covered by an extraordinary depth of snow. In ordinary cases, it lay to a thickness of two feet, while in places where it had been drifted up a depth of almost six feet had been reached. As may be imagined, during the early morning traffic was at a standstill, and considerable bodies of workmen were engaged in clearing the principal thoroughfares of the accumulated snow, in many cases, as our illustration depicts, the snow-plough being for the first time for many years brought into requisition. This useful machine, which is far more familiar to our cousins across the Atlantic than to ourselves—denizens of a milder climate—is a very simple contrivance, consisting of a huge wedge-like triangular projection made of wood, and bound with iron, which is either drawn or pushed through the drift, forcing the snow up in heaps on either side, and thus leaving a comparatively clear roadway for the traffic. On the Pacific Railway, where snow-ploughs are extensively used to clear the lines, it is now a common thing for eight powerful locomotives to be used to propel one of these machines. In our sketch, however, the plough is being drawn by a team of six sturdy North Country horses.

LIFE IN THE INDEPENDENT STATES OF TRAVANCORE AND COCHIN

GOING TO A STATE DINNER IN COCHIN

Cochin and Travancore are traversed by a long line of backwaters, or lagoons connected by rivers and canals. The water communication being so perfect, almost all traffic and travel is carried on by boats of various kinds, from the primitive "dug out" made from the trunk of a single tree, and poled along by one native, to the twenty-oared cabin boat, with its yelling crew of half-naked men. No. 1 of our illustrations represents one of the latter. During a visit made by us to Cochin we, in common with all the European residents in the town, received invitations for a State dinner given by the Rajah of Cochin in the Large Hall of the High School at Enarcolum. This necessitated our crossing the backwater which lies between that place and British Cochin. It was a beautiful moonlight night, and it would have been difficult to conceive anything more lovely than the scene around us as we sat on the roof of the cabin of the boat, the long dark line of cocoanut-trees in the distance intensifying the silvery reflection on the calm sheet of water. A soft cool wind was blowing straight from the sea, and now and then brought snatches of boat-songs, rendered melodious by distance, from other boats going in the same direction as ourselves. As the men pulled their short splashing stroke, phosphorescent flame seemed to spring from the blade of each oar, and go swirling away into the long shining trail we left behind us, while in the distance we could see the glittering rows of lights, all rendered double by reflection in the water, which illuminated the landing-stage, and the road and buildings towards which we were steering.

The three figures in white with pumpkin-like heads in the middle of our illustration are the servants who accompanied us, it being the custom in India for each guest to take his private attendant with him when going out to dinner. The interior of the cabin shows the sleeping accommodation provided for ordinary night travelling—a narrow bed or berth on each side, with space enough for luggage underneath. The natives are capital oarsmen, and will pull unceasingly for twenty-four hours at once, even in the hottest weather, stopping only to eat one scanty meal of rice on the way, which they take ready cooked with them. This, in our opinion, is one of the pleasantest ways of travelling in this part of India.

ON THE ROAD TO PEER MERDE, TRAVANCORE HILLS

"Bandy" travelling is not the most delightful means of locomotion in the world. The "bandies," or bullock-carts, are of the rudest manufacture, and quite innocent of springs of any kind. The bullocks are generally troublesome, and the roads bad, and many and hard are the bumps the traveller experiences, in spite of mattress and pillows laid on a thick bed of straw, inside the "bandy."

It being impossible to travel by day, on account of the great heat, we start by night, a man provided with rather a small amount of clothing leading the way with a lantern. Had one nerves of cast-iron one might sleep, as it is the unceasing jolt, jolt, which keeps one wide-awake, in spite of the intense longing to go to sleep. We say to ourselves that nothing could be more uncomfortable, when thump goes something, and feeling that we are rapidly going head downwards, we clutch madly at the bamboo supports at the side of the bandy, and wildly inquire what has happened. "My Golden Mother," replies the bandy-man out of the darkness, "one of the bullocks has fallen down." The Golden Mother (by which poetic title our miserable self is intended) devoutly wishes the bullock would manage to keep itself the right way up. When the scantily-robed gentleman before mentioned brings up the lantern, one bullock is discovered all in a heap in the dust, and the other with its head where its tail ought to be, while the bandy is in a recumbent state on the bank, having altogether gone off the road.

Note.——In our last issue we omitted to mention that our portrait of Sir Lewis Pelly was engraved from a photograph by Mr. A. E. Fradelle, 246, Regent Street.—The Christian name of Captain Troup, one of the British prisoners in Cabul (1842), is Colin, not John, as given in our Afghan Supplement last week.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——The most notable event of the week has been the formation of the Afghan Committee under the Chairmanship of Lord Lawrence, and the circulation of their memorial to Government praying that Lord Lytton might at once be instructed by telegraph to suspend hostilities against the Ameer, until his reply to our ultimatum had been made public in England, and other State papers bearing on the question had been produced; and also that Parliament might be immediately summoned to discuss the crisis. The document, which in a few days received many influential signatures, was to have been presented to Lord Beaconsfield by a deputation headed by Lord Lawrence, but the Premier declined to receive the deputation on the ground that he is at a loss to perceive what useful purpose would be served by a more extended expression of those opinions which have already so frequently and so recently been copiously explained. With regard to the early assembling of Parliament, he promises that in the event of war being declared "such communication will be made to Parliament as the letter and spirit of the Act of 1858 would seem to require." As to the demand for papers he promises that they will be ready before the end of the month, and suggestively declares that they relate to events much earlier than April, 1876. The Committee held a meeting on Tuesday, and adopted resolutions condemning the Premier's apparent resolve "not to consult Parliament until after hostilities had been commenced," and to keep the memorial still open for signatures as a protest against the refusal of the Government to summon Parliament before war is declared.—A Cabinet Council was held on Wednesday afternoon, at which all the members were present. Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury were loudly cheered by the wayfarers in Downing Street, and one person called out, "Lord Lawrence to the Tower!"—Lord Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury, in passing through Lynn the other day on their return from visiting the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sandringham, were presented with a congratulatory address from the inhabitants.—Col. Stanley and Mr. W. H. Smith arrived in London on Monday from their Mediterranean voyage.—Lord H. Lennox, M.P., speaking at a banquet at Chichester on Monday, said that no country could dare to risk an encounter with England with her present resources. He believed we should get no reply at all from the Ameer, and then our troops would march forward with little or no bloodshed. Our North-West frontier would be no longer a haphazard one, but it would set back for generations to come those who were always trying to disturb the peace of the world.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, speaking the other day at Carlisle, said that although impeachment had gone out of fashion, yet, if the Government did plunge the country into this guilty war without consulting the national representatives, he hoped that they would be visited by the lasting reprobation of all honest men.—Mr. Dobson, M.P., addressing his constituents at Chester, last week, said that the Eastern policy of the Government was a "ghastly failure." In Western Asia we had undertaken what Lord Salisbury himself called an "onerous obligation," and the cloud of war was lowering over the frontier of India. To attain this the Constitution had been strained, the prerogative exalted, the jealousy of other Powers raised, the fair fame of our diplomacy jeopardised, and our finances heavily burdened.

Miscellaneous.——Lord Rosebery has been elected Lord Rector of Aberdeen University, defeating Mr. Cross by 302 votes to 298. He had a majority in three of the four "Nations" into which students are divided; but in the "Angus Nation" Mr. Cross had a majority of 28. Some of the Liberal newspapers claim a political victory, whilst the Conservative organs attribute the result to national bias.—Some well-intentioned ladies and gentlemen have formed themselves into a society called the "Social Purity Alliance." The first name on the list of the Executive Committee is that of Professor Sheldon Amos, Folly House, New Barnet.—It seems that 500*l.* was spent on the ceremonial of laying the first stone of the Gloucester Gate Bridge over the Regent's Canal, and that the Vestry are now quarrelling about the "wasteful expenditure." We certainly think that it might have been done a little cheaper.—A deputation of London citizens waited on the Home Secretary on Tuesday to complain of the removal of the Watling Street and Farringdon Street Fire Stations, and the consequent unprotected state of the City. Mr. Cross replied that he had already communicated with the Board of Works on the subject, which he believed would shortly be settled to their satisfaction.—The foul state of the river Liffey at Dublin has at last become so unbearable that Government has been asked to interfere. A deputation of influential citizens, including several medical men, on Wednesday, waited on the Chief Secretary, who promised to recommend the subject to the consideration of the Government. It was incidentally stated that the average death rate in the city was over thirty per 1,000, exceeding that of any other town in the kingdom.—The distress at Sheffield is almost unparalleled. The iron trade is completely depressed. The colliery owners are compelled to stack hard coals, and merely proceed with sales of house coal. The men employed at the Denaby Main have struck work on the ground that the proprietors have no right to accumulate coal at the mouth of the pit, and one of the colliery managers has received the following threatening letter, accompanied by a sketch of a coffin: "Death without law to tyrants.—To the Managers of Denaby Main Colliery.—This is to give notice, that if they do not cleare from that place there will be vengence taken very quickley. It will come very suddently, it will come like a thunder-clap. There are five persons marked out for vengence—that is, Warburton, the maniger, Blewit, Wilson, Rothery, Cramp. There is only six days allowed them to clear away from the district. We are determined this time to clear all fouriguers out."—Subject to the approval of the Charity Commissioners, the Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital have determined to set apart one of the blocks of buildings for the accommodation of "paying patients." There is room for about sixty or seventy "cases," the charges will range from two guineas to four, and the expected amount of profit exceeds 3,000*l.*, which will be devoted to the poor in the hospital.—At a meeting held in the Town Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, and attended by delegates from the principal mining districts in the kingdom, the establishment of a Miners' General Permanent Relief Fund was determined upon. It was stated that there was fully 100,000*l.* now lying idle, and a hope was expressed that this might be obtained to form the nucleus of a permanent fund.—The roof of the Colosseum Music Hall at Liverpool has been condemned as dangerous by the official engineer, and on Wednesday the stipendiary magistrate ordered the lessee to substitute a new one, and forbade performances in the building. The hall was, however, opened at night and largely attended, the announcement being made that there was no danger, and that the magistrate had no power to close it.—Dreadful floods and gales have been experienced in various parts of the country, many wrecks and casualties by land have occurred, and several lives have been lost. In some counties whole districts are under water, and the destruction of property is immense.

RURAL NOTES

The Dispute between Farmers and their Labourers.——It is a great pity that farmers in some districts should have determined to lock-out such of their labourers as belong to a Union. Farm labourers have quite as much right to unite as any other body of men engaged in a common pursuit. The following is a sample of one of the letters from a farmer to his labourers according to Mr. Simmons, who spoke at Maidstone on Monday night:—"I have decided that after the 22nd day of November not to employ any labourer who subscribes to the funds of the Kent and Sussex Labourers' Union." There was a cry of "Shame" at the reading of this letter, and we can hardly wonder at the reprobation. Unless Union men are bad workmen they ought not to be dismissed on the simple ground that they have banded together to demand what they consider justice. They have on all grounds of prudence, morality, and economy as much right to dictate terms as the farmers have, providing they are in a position to do so, and that they are well advised in doing so. They are not well advised in the present crisis. The farmers have for the next two or three months little need of their services, all that is required on the farm being easy of accomplishment by labourers who are not Unionists. There are plenty of idle hands in the rural districts ready "to step into the shoes" of those who leave their places under such insidious stimulants as Mr. Potter supplied down at Maidstone on Monday night. Mr. Potter declared himself an "outsider," and yet he confidently gave it as his opinion that the farmers had taken "an unfair advantage of their men." Then, with many a sneer at the want of pluck in farmers not going in against the Game Laws, Tithes, &c., and commendation of the great pluck of labourers in striking, this improvised orator on rural affairs declared that, if the farmer did not give in, "the labourers would have the advantage entirely in their own hands next season." The Agricultural Gazette's opinion is that it is not a lock-out at all on the part of the farmers, but purely a strike on the part of the employed. The men will not accept the reduction of twopence to fourpence per day. "They will not go to work upon the farmers' terms, therefore the farmers have said that they must leave their cottages, in order that they may get other labourers to carry on the work of the farms." It is sad, very sad, that the agricultural labourers should be led by the nose by interested outsiders, whose real motive, if Hodge only knew it, is, as a rule, political gain for themselves rather than good for him. He is really not half so badly off as many labourers in towns. A Faversham farmer writes in the Standard of Tuesday that, on looking over the wage-books of the farmers in his neighbourhood, he found that the highest amount paid for the labourer and his family for a year was 82*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*, or an average of 31*s.* 9*d.* per week, and the lowest, 59*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, or an average of 22*s.* 8*d.* per week. Not very high wages, perhaps, but just about a third more than the "agitators" put them at, and, considering that there is no broken time, more than many skilled workmen earn in cities. The worst feature of the Agricultural Union—it is a blot on all Unions to a certain extent—as well pointed out by a special correspondent of the Standard: "is the lumping of all together, for where one man is hardly worth his salt, another is a good workman. It is strange that such men as these should choose to throw in their lot with so many who are idle—whom they must know to be idle—thus jeopardising their own position for the sake of those who are not worth one-fifth the sacrifice the agricultural cottager must be called upon to make in a strike." It is pitiful that lack of patience and excess of passion should have been mixed up in the struggle of labour against not very large capital; and in the interest of contending parties we should recommend compromise before the breach between tenants and labourers grows wider.—The meeting at Maidstone on Monday was followed by one at Woolwich on Tuesday, and on Wednesday some 500 or 600 of the labourers, after marching through the streets in procession, assembled at Exeter Hall, which was crowded with sympathisers. Mr. Auberon Herbert presided. Speeches were made by Miss Helen Taylor, Mr. O'Donnell, M.P., Mr. Shipton, of the London Trades Council, Mr. Simmons, Secretary of the Kent and Sussex Labourers' Union, and by one or two of the working men themselves. Resolutions were adopted condemning the action of the farmers and the Land Laws, and expressing sympathy with the men, and a determination to support them in their endeavours to uphold the Union.

The Season.——The weather has been very severe in many parts of the country, and little labour has been done in the fields for the last fortnight, even where strikes or locks-out have not existed. Frost and snow have prevailed in many localities, to the interruption of ploughing and the lifting of Swedes, where that operation had not been accomplished. Still the cultural and seeding operations of the farm are generally further forward than they usually are in the middle of November.

Miscellaneous.——The Weights and Measures Act has been the occasion of much discussion and no little dissension in all parts of the country. It appears to be more of a miller's and corn dealer's question than a farmer's, at least the latter do not seem to trouble their heads much about it, and tacitly would prefer their old bushel, their windle, or their coombe. The weight of feeling is in favour of the cental of 100 lb.—Colonel Kingscote is going to do a noble thing, one that will be more to the advantage of the farmers than the necessary reduction upon the labourer's wages. He is going to advise his brother landlords to "grant the utmost freedom of cropping." We trust they will accept his advice.—Willows are a very profitable agricultural commodity in this country; M. Charles D. Van Lennep recommends their cultivation in Cyprus for three reasons. Their bark is a febrifuge, they are cheaply cultivated on marshy soil, and their wood affords excellent fuel for agricultural machines, which will, no doubt, ere long be wanted on the island.—A proposal is on foot to reclaim a large acreage of land in Morecambe Bay and Duddon Estuary. It is a feasible one, and would pay for corn growing.—The French Government have taken a fancy to the gazelle-like Jersey cattle, and have bought half a score of the finest for the Jardin d'Acclimatation in Paris.—The Birmingham and Smithfield Club Cattle Shows will be the best we have had for years. It is understood that some Canadian cattle will be present at the latter.—Pleuro-pneumonia unfortunately is prevalent in various localities north and south, but the strict measures taken in stamping it out have prevented it from spreading to such an injurious extent as it did two years ago. There is not so much foot-and-mouth disease in the country as there was this time twelve months.

THEATRES

THE revival of the elder Colman's Jealous Wife at DRURY Lane Theatre is seen under the disadvantage of a version so mutilated that the story which it tells is hardly to be unravelled without some previous acquaintance with the play. When a five-act comedy, in fact, is so reduced that the three acts into which it is compressed can be acted in an hour and a quarter, it is easy to understand that something must have been taken away which is necessary to the full development of the plot. In spite of this drawback, however, the play, now more than a century old, affords great amusement. Mrs. Vezin's performance of the incorrigibly jealous lady is wonderfully animated, and all the scenes in which she appears, well supported as she is by Mr. Cowper as Mr. Oakley, and Mr. Ryder as the Major, awaken frequent outbursts of laughter. Shakespeare appears now to have been definitively banished from the Drury Lane playbill; for the comedy which is converted by the process we have explained into a mere lever de rideau is followed by a revival of Belphegor, a version of the famous melodrama, entitled Paillasse, in which Mr. Charles Dillon sustains with no abatement of his picturesque force and pathetic power the part of the mountebank whose wife is tempted to desert him by her newly-discovered rich and proud relations. This is a romantic drama, and as such its incidents must not, of course, be subjected to any severe test on the score of probability; but it interests and moves an audience, and is always worth seeing by those who are not yet acquainted with the play. It is very well acted, Miss Wallis playing the part of Madeline, the stroller's wife, with many truthful and tender touches. There is also to be seen nightly at Drury Lane a comic ballet called The Plantation, in which the clever Laurl family appear.

Mr. Byron has written a new burlesque version of Fra Diavolo, which was brought out with success at the GAIETY on Monday night. Mr. Terry and Mr. Royce in this piece make much fun out of the eccentric proceedings of the two brigands, and there is a trio between this pair and Miss E. Farren in the second act on the old catch-lines of "I love my love with an A," and so forth, which is very quaint and clever. The amusement, however, which this trifle affords is due rather to the dances and songs, the picturesque scenery, and the gay costumes with which it is furnished, than to the rhymed lines (though they are not without happy allusions and ingenious verbal quibbles), or generally to the element of burlesque exaggeration. Miss Farren's pink costume of a page of the days of Louis Quatorze, and her Fra Diavolo dress, with its brigand suggestions, in the last act, approach sufficiently to the character of works of art to deserve mention; and this young lady and Miss Kate Vaughan, who is not less charming and vivacious, contribute not a little to the favour with which the piece was received. The whole strength of the Gaiety company—so efficient for the performance of pieces of this kind—including, besides the performers named, Miss Amalia, Mr. Soutar, Mr. Fawcett, Miss Gilchrist, and others—is engaged in this performance, which has also the advantage of the services of Herr Meyer Lutz in selecting, arranging, and harmonising the music. The extravaganza is preceded by Paul Pry, in which Mr. Terry and Miss Lawler appear.

Mr. Albery's adaptation of Les Fourchambault is to be called The Crisis. It will be produced at the HAYMARKET Theatre.—The new romantic drama, originally entitled The Shadow of a Crime, which will be brought out at the PRINCESS'S Theatre on Saturday next, is now to be known as No. 20; or, the Bastille of Calvados—another dramatist having claimed a right to the former title. The authors are Mr. Hatton and Mr. Albery.—There will be a complete change of programme, this evening, at the FOLLY Theatre, consisting of a revival of Mr. Gilbert's Wedding March, and a comedietta, entitled Retiring, by Mr. H. W. Williamson.

ROYAL AMPHITHEATRE, HOLBORN.——As Christmas time draws near, and mighty posters concerning pantomimes and other entertaining features of the season are displayed to public view, Paterfamilias will begin to consider where to take the little ones for their expected treat. It may help him to a decision to know that Hamilton's popular entertainment has taken up a permanent residence at this Amphitheatre, where he and his family can take a tour through the United States in a couple of hours, hear some pleasant songs, behold the strange doings of certain niggers, and see an interesting "panstereorama" of passing events.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——Having dragged its slow length along since the present "dark and dreary" month began, the flat-racing season closes this week. The "back end," as it is called, of the legitimate Turf business since the Houghton Meeting at Newmarket has shown nothing like the vitality of many former years, Liverpool and Shrewsbury in particular having been unusually dull meetings. During the present week neither the Warwick gathering, which used to finish up the season, nor that at Manchester have shown much improvement on the sport of last week; but it is not by any means improbable that the Thursday, Friday, and Saturday next at Kempton Park will afford a fair supply of good racing. However this may be, we fancy there is a general and growing impression that the Turf season might be advantageously curtailed, and that all flat-racing should cease with the last of the series of Newmarket meetings. Such a reversion to the old state of things would cause much more satisfaction than many persons might suppose. The whole business is now sadly overdone, and if a number of meetings throughout the year were put down, it would be all the better for the Turf. At Warwick the sport contained a large element of steeple-chasing and hurdle-racing, but did not bring out any new animals in these lines likely to make a name. As usual, too, in the hurdle and hunters' contests, the results were for the most part anticipated, these contests being substantially flat races for thoroughbreds, and hardly what their titles would imply. For once in a way Suffolk Lad took it into his head to run honestly, and won the Guy Welter, and on the second day he would have secured the Budbrook Handicap, but for the slipping of his jockey's saddle. Acrobat took the Selling Welter, but had to knuckle under to Citoyenne in the Avon Plate, the winner having also been credited with the Selling Two Year Old Plate. The Great Autumn Welter Cup, which is considered one of the chief features of the meeting, only produced four runners, of whom Avontes, on the strength of the Shrewsbury running, was made a hot favourite at nearly 2 to 1 on him; and he justified his favouritism by winning easily enough from Singleton. Mr. Crawfurd has thus continued his autumn luck, and throughout the season he has had a fair share of Fortune's favours, which as a good sportsman no one will grudge him. Spectators of the sport at Manchester had to put up with a good deal of fog, which in many races prevented the horses being seen till they were near the winning post. Mr. Drake's Quits, who has now earned the title of the "Champion" hunter, continued his victorious career, and his opponents in the Open Hunters' race might as well have remained in their stables. Tribute, who keeps running on and picking up the emolus, beat seven others in the Flying Welter, but failed to get placed to Woodland in the Wilton Handicap. Savoir Faire made another winning mark in a Selling Stakes, and old Agglethorpe won the Oldham Hurdle Race. The Lancashire Cup of 500 sovs. in specie, brought out a very good field, nine runners including Belphœbe, Placida, Flotsam, and Kineton, contending. The first-named was spotted as favourite, but she could only get second to Lord Zetland's Flotsam, who has done yeoman's service for the Aske colours since the summer.

FOOTBALL.——A few more of the games in the first round of the Association Challenge Cup have been played off. On the Beeston Cricket Ground, near Nottingham, Nottingham Forest beat the County Eleven by three goals to one; and the last game of the round, with the exception of that drawn between the Panthers and Runnymede, was played between Sheffield and Grantham, the former winning by three goals. For the second round there will be twenty-three clubs left in.—The ball has been kept moving at the Universities, Oxford beating the Royal Naval Academy (Greenwich) in a Rugby Union Game, and the Old Etonians in an Association; but at Cambridge the University has been beaten by the Gipsies under Rugby Union rules. Eton and Sandhurst have played an Association game, but neither side could score. The Charterhouse boys were too strong for a fair eleven of Old Harrovians who visited them, but the Clapham Rovers were more than a match for the Westminster boys in Vincent Square. At Sheffield, a very tough game between the Natives and London was played on Saturday, but so even were the sides that it resulted in a draw.

AQUATICS.——Considerable interest will be felt in the fact that a match has been arranged between Hawdon, of Delaval, and Hanlon, of Toronto, to be rowed on the Tyne on May the 5th next.—At both Oxford and Cambridge, particularly at the former, the training of the Trial Eights has been much interfered with. The Cambridge men are especially well spoken of.

PEDESTRIANISM.——The Fifty Miles Walking Competition at the Agricultural Hall resulted in an easy victory for A. Hancock, who did the distance in 8 h. 26 min. 20 sec., his brother, O. Hancock, being second, three miles behind him. The winner's time was not particularly good, but it must be remembered that practically he was not pressed to do his best. It may be noted, in reference to recent pedestrian struggles, that those who took a strong lead in the earlier stages for the most part were the leaders at the finish. A strong lead has a wonderful effect in keeping up a man's spirits.—"Blower" Brown, who was second in the recent six days' trudge, has challenged O'Leary for the Long-distance Championship of the World and the Astley belt.

MR. TENNYSON'S NEW DRAMA is founded on the history of Thomas à Beckett, so says the Daily News.

CREMATION IN ITALY is slowly gaining ground. From January, 1876, until May last, twenty-three dead bodies—including one only of a woman—were consumed in the Milan Crematorium. Of these bodies four, weighing 63, 62, 41, and 59 kilogrammes, produced ashes weighing from two to three kilogrammes.

A NUMBER OF JOHN LEECH'S ORIGINAL SKETCHES have been offered to the Charter House School, and some old Carthusians are trying to raise money enough to purchase the collection. Leech was himself a Carthusian, and it is thought especially fitting that these sketches, which include the original drawings of the Comic Histories of England and Rome should be placed in the library of the School where Leech received his first lessons in history.

HORSES ARE ABSURDLY CHEAP IN RUSSIA just now, for, owing to the demobilisation of the army, the surplus cavalry horses are being sold off by auction at ridiculous prices. Thus the Live Stock Journal tells us that a party of Prussian Jews recently attended the sales and recrossed the frontier with a thousand horses they had purchased for 285 roubles, or rather less than a shilling each. These worthy children of Israel would make an excellent speculation, the lowest price at which a fair animal could be obtained on the Prussian side of the frontier being twenty guineas.

LONDON MORTALITY still further increased last week, and 1,665 deaths were registered against 1,590 during the previous seven days, being an increase of 75. There were 64 deaths from scarlet fever (an increase of 4, but being 33 below the average), 22 from measles (an increase of 4), 13 from diphtheria (an increase of 2), 37 from different forms of fever (5 below the average), 16 from small-pox (an increase of 7), 431 from diseases of the respiratory organs (a decline of 4), of which 269 resulted from bronchitis, 43 from whooping-cough, and 11 from diarrhœa. There were 2,448 births registered (a decline of 159). The mean temperature was 39·8 deg., or 2·9 deg. below the average. The duration of bright sunshine during the week was 4·8 hours, the sun being 62·5 hours above the horizon.

NEARLY TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND POUNDS have already been spent by the authorities of the Paris Lottery in providing prizes for the twelve million subscribers. The money is chiefly divided as follows: Grand prizes 15,000*l.*; French art objects, 34,000*l.*; books, musical instruments, &c., 21,000*l.*; furniture, bronzes, and ceramic articles, 54,000*l.*; dresses, silks, jewels, 35,000*l.*; raw material, useful articles, &c., 19,000*l.*; machines, tools, carriages 16,000*l.*; articles of food, preserves, wine, and liquors, 11,000*l.*; agriculture and horticulture 12,000*l.*; miscellaneous objects bought from foreign exhibitors, 30,000*l.* A sum of 60,000*l.* still remains in hand, part of which will go to defray Custom House dues, carriage, expenses, &c., and the remainder will be spent in minor prizes.

THE PARIS SALON is to be reorganised, and a scheme for the complete alteration of the existing regulations is now being considered by the Fine Art Council. It is proposed that two juries should be formed, one to choose the pictures for admission, the other to decide the rewards and medals, and that every artist who has exhibited three times at the Salon should be exempt from the decision of the jury of admission, and exhibit at will. Further it is suggested to establish officially an annual "Salon des Refusés," and to get up a lottery similar to the Exhibition lottery at the close of each Salon, in order to provide funds for the acquisition of tableaux de genre, the Government purchases being limited to high art subjects. The number of free admissions would be curtailed, but art pupils, soldiers, and art workmen would be admitted gratis.

A PRIZE ESSAY ON SERVANTS' CLUBS is announced by the editor of Social Notes, who writes:—"A lady authorises us to state that she will give a prize of ten guineas for an essay on the subject of Servants' Clubs, considered in relation to domestic service—viz., the effects of such clubs, as at present constituted, in producing many of the evils complained of with reference to the undue independence of servants, and the difficulties experienced by employers in maintaining good order and efficiency in their households. The authors should also consider whether the evil influences of such clubs would be more effectually met and corrected by legal enactments, or by some combined action on the part of employers of domestic servants. The essays, which should be of moderate length, must be sent to the office of Social Notes (Southampton Street, Strand), on or before January 1st, with a signature, and in a sealed envelope the real name and address of the writer with the signature."

THE BELGIAN GALLERY IN BOND STREET has reopened with its usual small but well selected show of pictures. The landscapes, which are unmistakeably of the foreign school, both in the subjects chosen and in the manner in which they are treated, are on the whole more worthy of remark than the figure subjects. There are several capital sunsets and snow-scenes, among which may be mentioned "Marshes in the Campine," by J. Cossemans—a dreary subject certainly, but one in which the artist has succeeded in putting upon canvas that which he was looking at. He has succeeded in getting that bleak or damp look which a low-lying country has at sunset in the evening of a short autumn or wintry day. No. 17, another sunset, although a more wintry one than the former, is well painted, the snow in particular being very conscientiously done. C. Helfner has a pair of pretty and carefully painted landscapes, entitled "Spring" and "Winter," the subjects of which it is unnecessary to explain. No. 71, a group of soldiers, entitled "On Active Service," by H. Breling, is worthy of notice, although on looking at it one cannot help thinking of Meissonier, to the detriment of the picture itself. No. 40, "The Dancing Lesson," by Dinucci, is a pretty but well-worn subject. Professor Gussow, whose works we have already admired in former exhibitions at this Gallery, has a capital study, entitled "A Beggar." Among others, "Somewhat Fresh," by Maurice Courant, "Rue des Chaises," by H. Schaefels," "Cattle in Pasture," by Victor Weishaupt, and "The Dinner Call," by P. Baudouin, may be mentioned as worthy of notice. A quantity of pictures already exhibited in Messrs. Gammon and Vaughan's Old Belgian Gallery in Old Bond Street, the lease of which has expired, will be sold by auction on Saturday, the 23rd, including works of many of the present exhibitors at the Belgian Gallery.

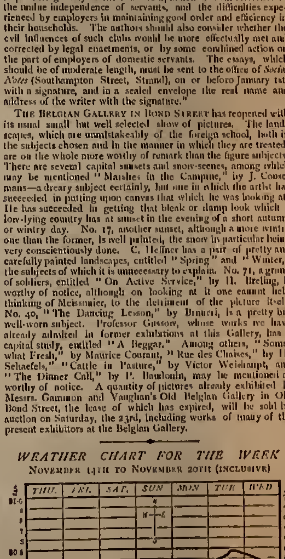
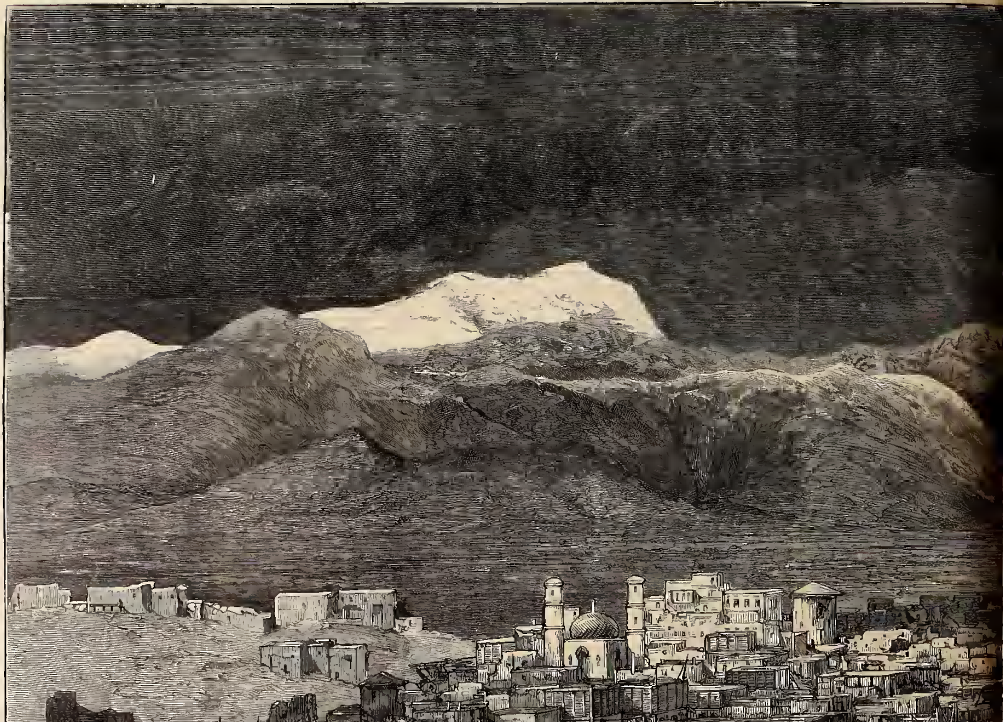
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

NOVEMBER 14TH TO NOVEMBER 20TH (INCLUSIVE)

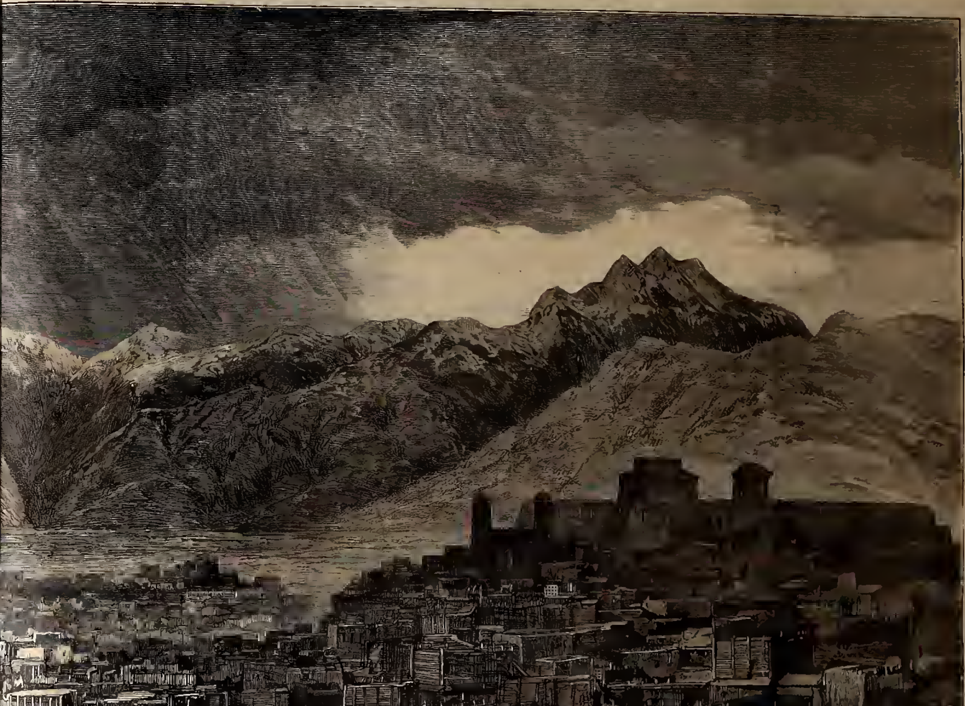


EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather was very unsettled during all the latter part of last week, and in fact, until early on Monday morning, the 18th instant. Cold rains have been very general, with some snow, and gusty north-westerly winds blew over the whole of our south-eastern counties. In Cambridge and Norfolk the falls of rain have been very heavy, and disastrous floods have resulted. Over our north eastern counties violent storms from north-east and north were experienced, and even on our western coasts fresh northerly gales were of daily occurrence for some time. Tuesday, the 19th instant, and Wednesday, the 20th instant, were much quieter, and light easterly breezes were felt at the southern stations, while light south-westerly winds appeared in the north. The weather in London was dry, though gloomy, up to Wednesday, the 20th instant, and fog prevailed. The barometer was highest (30·47 inches) on Tuesday, the 19th instant; lowest (29·30 inches) on Friday, the 15th instant; range, 1·17 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (49°) on Tuesday, the 19th instant; lowest (36°) on Wednesday, the 20th instant; range, 13°. On the grass the thermometer fell to 27° on Tuesday, the 19th instant, and 28° on Wednesday, the 20th instant. Rainfall The total fall in the week was 0·60 inches, on five days; greatest fall in one day, 0·23 inches, on Friday, the 15th instant. On Thursday morning, the 21st instant, the barometer again fell briskly, with a freshening north-easterly wind and gloomy weather.



THE IMPENDING AFGHAN WAR—PE



SHAWUR AND THE KHYBER PASS

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Russians are continuing their assurances that they mean to carry out the stipulations of the Berlin Treaty faithfully and conscientiously, and Prince Dondoukoff-Korsakoff, the Governor of Bulgaria, has been summoned by the Czar to Livadia, in order, it is rumoured, to be recommended to modify his utterances to the Bulgarians that the Treaty is a dead letter, and that there shall be a one and undivided Bulgaria, the Congress of Berlin notwithstanding. It is said that he still frankly declares the execution of the Berlin Treaty to be an impossibility, so that another Governor may possibly be appointed. In Bulgaria itself all appears to be quiet, with the exception of the recruiting for the Macedonian insurrection; while in Eastern Roumelia the International Commission continues its deliberations, although the Bulgarians in Philippopolis have held a meeting, and resolved to throw every possible hindrance in the way of the Commission, and if possible force the members to leave the town. There is little actual news from the other parts of Turkey, save that the Russians, while not exceeding the prescribed limit of 50,000 men in Bulgaria proper, still continue to add to the very formidable army which they keep south of the Balkans. The Greek question has been mainly uppermost in men's minds this week, and Russia has declared her willingness to co-operate with France in urging the Hellenic claims upon the Porte. The Turkish Ministers have however been discussing the matter, and have recommended the Sultan to agree to a modification of the plan of frontier rectification proposed by the Congress, namely, that the suggested delimitation should be curtailed, but that an equivalent should be given in the direction of Volo. Indeed, like Russia, Turkey is adopting a conciliatory attitude, and the negotiations for a Convention with Austria have been resumed, while the modifications made by the International Roumelian Commission in the Turkish projects for organic reforms in that province have also been accepted by the Porte. Prominent among these modifications is the appointment of a Permanent Committee of seven, to be elected by the Roumelian National Assembly. In Constantinople the vexed question of finance is the great topic of the day, and the Financial Commission has proposed that a loan of 23,000,000*l.* should be raised for the redemption of the Caimés and the payment of the floating debt, the interest—4 per cent.—to be guaranteed by England on the surplus revenues of Cyprus and Syria and the Egyptian tribute.

ROUMANIA is looking forward to the occupation of the Dobrudscha, which is announced to begin to-day (Saturday), notwithstanding that the Russians are said to decline to hand over the possession of the province until the Roumanians consent to sign a convention allowing the Russian troops to pass through their territory for an indefinite time, together with various other stipulations for the right of maintaining certain garrisons and embarking troops at Mangalia and Kustendjie. With these demands Prince Charles is stated to have declined to comply, but it is not thought likely that the Russians will forcibly oppose the entrance of the troops into the Dobrudscha, as the Roumanians have fulfilled all the legal terms of the original compact by handing over Bessarabia.

FRANCE.——Electoral matters are once more wholly absorbing popular attention. The three life-vacancies in the Senate were last week all filled up by Conservative members, as the various shades of the majority, feeling that this was the last chance they will have for some time of putting their own partisans into the House, coalesced, and kept out the Republican candidates. The Republicans, however, will amply revenge themselves during the coming election of Senators by the municipal delegates, and, as might have been expected, have determined not to show the slightest quarter. In the Lower House the election of M. de Fourtou, the Minister of the Interior under the Duc de Broglie's régime, has been annulled, M. de Fourtou taking the opportunity to utter a long justification of his five months' Ministry and a violent attack upon the present Cabinet, and in answer to the accusation of intimidation, telling the Left that had he "done his duty they would not be where they were." He even brought M. Dufaure to his feet by declaring that the present Cabinet's existence was conditional on obedience to the majority, while his assertion that in a "southern province" "war had been declared against all Frenchmen not animated by an Old Republican Faith," called forth an exclamation of "You lie" from M. Gambetta, who forgot his usual caution in his irritation; but who ultimately withdrew the expression, after using some very plain language to the ex-Minister. It was said that M. de Fourtou subsequently challenged M. Gambetta, but this has since been denied. The election of the young Legitimist, the Comte de Mun, had been previously annulled, and the report revealed some extraordinary measures the priests had taken to secure his return, promising the simple Breton peasants eternal paradise if they voted for the Count, and consigning his adversaries to the bottomless pit, one curé even declaring that if the Republicans were successful, Christ on the crucifix would be replaced by a naked woman, while the Sisters of Charity refused to nurse the sick who voted on "the side of the devil." The debate, however, had one result; it showed how utterly hopeless a task it is for the various Conservative factions to aim at homogeneity, for when the Count, in his defence, abused universal suffrage, the Bonapartists at once strongly protested, and have since continued to protest, against the vox populi being considered anything but beneficial to the State, M. Robert Mitchell even proclaiming it the "safeguard of Conservatism."

In Paris, the Exhibition is being rapidly emptied of its contents, and in a very few days only the mere skeleton of the World's Fair of 1878 will remain on the Champ de Mars. There is little gossip proper in Paris. M. Taine has been almost unanimously elected to the Académie in place of the late M. de Loménie, the ex-Empress Eugénie's claim to the Chinese Museum at Fontainebleau is now being tried, and the exhibition of the prizes for the National Lottery is being rapidly organised, and tickets possessing certain numbers which are supposed to be more than unusually lucky fetch a high premium. The chief theatrical event of the week is the revival at the Vaudeville of Octave Feuillet's Montjoye, one of Lafont's most famous characters, and one which no other actor has ventured to play. M. Adolphe Dupuis, however, has undertaken the part in Russia with considerable success, and was accordingly asked to play the rôle in Paris—a request with which he reluctantly complied. The revival is in every way satisfactory, and M. Dupuis portrays the character admirably.

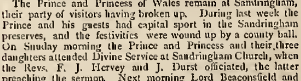
ITALY.——Yet another attempt at a Royal assassination—this time on popular King Humbert on his entry into Naples on Sunday. The King, together with the Queen, their son, and the Prime Minister, Signor Cairoli, was driving in an open carriage, when a man advanced out of the crowd, and, as some people were presenting petitions, aimed a blow at the King with a poniard. The King eluded the blow, and struck the man with his sheathed sword, while Signor Cairoli threw himself before the King and received a second thrust in his thigh—holding on, however, to the man until he was secured. The cortége then proceeded on its way, but on reaching the Palace Signor Cairoli was at once put to bed, and ice and leeches applied to his wound. The would-be assassin is a cook named Giovanni Passanante, and is only twenty-nine years of age. He had the dagger hidden in the folds of a small red flag, on which was inscribed "Viva la Repubblica Universale," and it is stated that letters from Internationalists were found upon him and at his lodgings. Passanante himself denies absolutely that he belongs to any society, but makes no secret of his crime, stating that he had no personal feeling against King Humbert, but that he detested Monarchies, and had sought to kill the King as a means towards an end—the attainment of a Universal Republic—his profession of faith being that inscribed on his flag. He has already been imprisoned, in 1870, for affixing placards bearing the words, "Death to all Kings and Sovereigns." He only regrets one thing—that he had not sufficient money to buy a revolver, in which case he declares "he would not have failed," and displays complete unconcern and self-assurance. The utmost sympathy has been expressed on every side with King Humbert, all the European Sovereigns telegraphing their congratulations at his escape, Queen Victoria especially expressing her horror at the attempt, while the Italians themselves have been showing the most loyal enthusiasm, monster demonstrations being organised in every town, that in Rome being composed of some fifty thousand persons. During a procession at Florence, however, which formed part of a loyal demonstration, a bomb was thrown into the corps of Veterans, and exploding killed several persons. The Pope also has sent a special message of sympathy to the King, and in all the principal churches the deed has been ardently denounced by the clergy. In fact, the general indignation throughout the kingdom is most intense, and the event certainly serves to show how universally popular the ruling House of Savoy is at the present time.

Rome has been inundated by an overflow of the Tiber, which has caused great distress amongst the population of the Ghetto and other low-lying districts. The force of the rain was such as to cause landslips and floods upon all the railway lines, and to throw down the whole network of telegraph wires. In Rome the rain swept down in sheets, driven by the force of the wind into great wavelike curves, which dashed up spray from the pavement as the sea does from a rock. In ninety minutes the fall measured one and a-half inches, and in eleven hours it had reached the extraordinary amount of six inches. The city is said to have presented a most picturesque sight at night, the barges gliding through the streets with torches, or cruising out into the Campagna to carry bread to the isolated dwellings of the peasants of the plain.

INDIA.——The Ameer has not vouchsafed a reply to the Viceroy's ultimatum, and Viscount Cranbrook has addressed a despatch to Lord Lytton, briefly recapitulating the events which have led to the present crisis, approving of his action in determining to send an envoy to the Ameer, and assuring him of "the cordial support of her Majesty's Government in the onerous circumstances" in which he is placed. Viscount Cranbrook begins his letter by stating that it has always been the consistent aim of the British Government to establish on its north-western border a strong, friendly, and independent State, with interests in unison with those of the Indian Government—a fact testified by Lord Dalhousie's Treaty of 1855 with Afghanistan. After the transfer of India to the Crown, this question became of still greater interest; but notwithstanding the internal disorders in 1863, after the accession of the present Ameer, the Indian Government under Lord Lawrence did not think it politic to take part with either faction, the outposts of Russia being then distant from the borders of Afghanistan, and no danger being apprehended in that direction from Russia. When, however, Shere Ali had subdued his rival, Lord Mayo, then Viceroy, recognised the Ameer de jure as well as de facto, and in a letter to him promised him his support, and in 1869 the British Government, by negotiations at St. Petersburg, brought about a complete understanding between the Czar and the Ameer respecting the exact limits of the Ameer's territory. When, however, in 1873, the Russians subdued and occupied the Khanate of Khiva, Shere Ali, alarmed at the Russian advance, asked Lord Northbrook how far he might rely upon British assistance if his territories were threatened by Russia. Lord Northbrook was at first prepared to tell him that under certain conditions the Indian Government were prepared to assist him to repel aggression. Mr. Gladstone's Government, however, did not share this opinion, and the Viceroy ultimately informed the Ameer that the question had better be postponed to a more convenient season. This answer deeply offended the Ameer, who took no notice of Lord Northbrook's desire to send a British officer to examine the northern frontier of Afghanistan, and declined to allow Sir Douglas Forsyth's Mission from Kashgar to pass through his dominions. In 1874 the present Government came into office, and at once saw the necessity of resuming friendly relations with the Ameer. Lord Lytton accordingly, on becoming Viceroy, at once opened negotiations which, however, were received in a surly spirit, the Ameer declining to receive a British Envoy; but after a long time consented to send Syud Mahomed Khan to Peshawur, to confer with Sir Lewis Pelly. Unfortunately, the Afghan Envoy died, and the Ameer refused to continue the negotiations. While showing this unfriendly spirit towards England, however, the Ameer, in the early part of this year, entertained a Russian Mission with great pomp at a time when friendly relations between Russia and England were seriously threatened. Lord Lytton accordingly informed the Ameer that the British Government had also determined to despatch to Cabul an important Mission, headed by Sir Neville Chamberlain. This the Ameer declined to receive, in an evasive letter, and as has been recently told, instructed his officers at Ali Musjid to oppose by force any attempted entry into his dominions. Upon this, Lord Lytton urged instant action; but the Home Government, wishing to give the Ameer one more chance of peace, requested the Viceroy to send an Ultimatum, demanding an apology and the reception of the Mission. To this no reply has been received, so that Lord Lytton has now been authorised to take what action he may think fit, and hostilities are expected to begin without delay.

In the mean time everything is ready for an immediate advance. The commander-in-chief, Sir Frederick Haines, has gone to Peshawur, whence it is presumed Sir Samuel Browne will speedily push forward, seize Ali Musjid, and, by occupying Kandahar, thus secure a basis of operations for an early advance on Cabul in the spring. Further details of the Peshawur force will be found under the head of "Our Illustrations," but we may mention that it is thought probable that the main body of the troops will proceed straight up the Khyber; that a separate force, following the course of the Cabul River, will make for Lalpura, while the smaller passes on either side will at the same time be seized and held by additional troops. The native princes continue to manifest their loyalty, the whole Bhopal contingent has volunteered its services, while a contingent will shortly be formed from the Sikh feudatory States, consisting of 3,000 infantry, 1,000 cavalry, and 13 guns. No precaution is being neglected to secure success; stringent orders have been issued from head-quarters authorising the military supervision of all Press telegrams, and warning both military men and civilians against making indiscreet revelations in their correspondence. Maps have been liberally supplied to officers, and a useful guide-book containing full directions and information as to the Kuram Valley and the passes leading to Cabul has been circulated by the Quartermaster-Generals amongst them. According to some detailed statistics forwarded by the correspondent of the Daily News, the grand total of the expeditionary force decided upon at the time he was writing will amount to 34,000 men, of whom 12,740 are Europeans. The force will thus be divided:—The Peshawur army, under Sir Samuel Browne, which numbers 16,364; the Kurom Valley force, under Sir Donald Stewart, 5,776; and the Quettah army, under General Biddulph, 12,590.

UNITED STATES.——The Fishery Question continues to be the chief theme of discussion, but the United States' Government have determined to pay the award to-day. Lord Salisbury's reply to Mr. Evarts, while disclaiming any intention of laying down by inference any principles of international law, asserts the right of a British authority to pass a law binding Americans fishing in the British waters. He at the same time admits that such right is limited by England's Treaty-engagements which municipal legislation cannot effect.—President Hayes has fixed next Thursday, the 28th inst., for Thanksgiving Day.



THE COURT

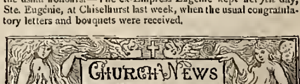
THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice return to the south this week. They were to leave Balmoral after luncheon on Thursday, and travel from Ballater to Perth, where they would stay for dinner. The Royal party were to take tea at Carlisle, and were expected to reach Windsor Castle in time for breakfast yesterday (Friday) morning. Meanwhile, Her Majesty has received few visitors at Balmoral, a gloom having been cast over the Royal circle by the death of the Queen's little granddaughter, Princess Mary of Hesse. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon and Earl Dufferin have however dined with Her Majesty, and the Queen has received Captain Forbes Gordon and Lieuts. Norman Chalmers and Gordon Money of the 79th (Cameron) Highlanders. On Sunday morning Divine Service was performed at Balmoral before Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice, when the Rev. A. Campbell officiated.

The Prince and Princess of Wales remain at Sandringham, their party of visitors having broken up. During last week the Prince and his guests had capital sport in the Sandringham preserves, and the festivities were wound up by a county ball. On Sunday morning the Prince and Princess and their three daughters attended Divine Service at Sandringham Church, when the Revs. F. J. Hervey and J. Durst officiated, the latter preaching the sermon. Next morning Lord Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury left Sandringham for town, and the Prince of Wales received the Rev. J. B. Slight, head master of the King's Lynn Grammar School, and Mr. E. A. Fitch, in order to present to Mr. Fitch the gold medal annually given by the Prince to the most proficient pupil of the school.

The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne were delayed in their departure from Ireland last week by a violent gale which obliged the Sarmatian to take shelter at Loch Foyle, county Londonderry. The vessel sailed definitively however on the evening of the 15th inst. for Halifax, where she is expected to-morrow (Sunday). She will be met at some distance from the port by the British squadron, including the Black Prince under the Duke of Edinburgh. The Duke and his vessel arrived at Halifax on Sunday, and the people gave him a hearty welcome when he landed on the following day. As the Princess Louise will be unable to give away the prizes to the schools of Savoy Chapel this Christmas, according to her promise, the Duchess of Teck has promised to take her place early in May.—The Duke of Connaught is to have a national present from Ireland as a wedding gift, and a Committee has been formed in Dublin to carry out the scheme. No sum above 1*l.* will be received, but subscriptions as small as 1*s.* will be accepted, so that the testimonial may be eminently a popular gift.

A serious outbreak of diphtheria has occurred amongst the Royal family of Hesse at Darmstadt, the disease having attacked the Grand Duke and five of the children, the Hereditary Grand Duke and the Princesses Victoria, Irene, Alix, and Mary. The Princess Mary's illness was of a most malignant type, and the little Princess died somewhat suddenly on Saturday, aged four years. Thus the Grand Duke and Duchess have now lost two of their children, their second boy, Prince Frederick William, having been killed by a fall from a window some five years since. The Grand Duke and his son and third daughter, Princess Irene, are going on favourably, while the Princesses Victoria and Alix are nearly convalescent. The Grand Duchess and her second daughter, Princess Ella, have hitherto escaped.

The Duke of Cumberland is now in Denmark on a visit to his fiancée, Princess Thyra, and the betrothal was formally announced at a Court dinner at the Castle of Fredensborg. After the marriage the Duke and his bride will reside chiefly in England.—Thursday was the 38th birthday of the Imperial Princess of Germany, which was commemorated at Windsor with the usual honours.—The ex-Empress Eugénie kept her fête day, Ste. Eugénie, at Chiselhurst last week, when the usual congratulatory letters and bouquets were received.



CHURCH NEWS

THE AFGHAN DIFFICULTY.——At St. Paul's Cathedral, on Sunday last, the Rev. Dr. Plumptre preached a trenchant sermon from the text, "Shall we smite with the sword?" He referred to Colet's sermon before Henry VIII., when that monarch was preparing to make war upon France, and said that the time had come when it was once again the duty of the ministers of Christ in this country to urge the first principles of the Divine laws on a people who seemed in danger of forgetting them. The ministers of a National Church would be untrue to their calling if at such a crisis they were to confine their work to what were called the "eternal interests" of individual souls, and to shrink through fear of man from testifying to the Divine laws, which worked out sooner or later a terrible retribution on all who slighted them. Whilst maintaining the lawfulness of a just and defensive war, it was their duty to proclaim, with no faltering voice, when the issues of good or evil were trembling in the scales, that they who "sow the wind" of an aggressive ambition should "reap the whirlwind" of a disastrous failure.—On the same day, the Rev. Paxton Hood preaching at Manchester on "The Last Great Blunder of Lord Beaconsfield," asked what would be thought of him if he were to hold his tongue because some pews in his church might be given up, or because he might endanger his interests there by the avowal of opinions adverse to those of some around him? He had heard some remonstrances respecting the subject of his sermon, and he missed some faces that night. But he stood by his Master. He stood by Christ's gospel and Christ's doctrine, and he denounced the expected war in the name of Christ's cross, in the name of the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel, and in the name of Christianity and humanity.

VARIOUS.——The Bishop of Rochester has issued a long Pastoral, in which he asks his clergy for justice and sympathy, and to be slow to accuse the Bishops of a change of front or levity of principle, because they mean to be fair all round. He says that the first great function of his office is to continue the transmission of the Apostolic doctrine and fellowship by ordaining an efficient clergy—to confirm, to preach, and to sustain the continual administration of the diocese. He is expected to be a leader bold and elastic enough to initiate new schemes for ever-changing times, yet prudent enough not to lead his followers into a quicksand. After an interesting résumé of the work effected in the diocese during the first year of his episcopate, the Bishop lays down the lines of "work in front," including plans for the organisation of lay helpers, evangelists, readers, workers, a diocesan temperance society, the encouragement of theological study amongst the younger clergy by offering prizes of books (he himself giving a prize of ten guineas), diocesan bursaries to help candidates for the ministry (he offering one of 50*l.* a-year for four years), a system of book colportage, and a charitable donation fund. His lordship deals plainly with those who oppose themselves to authority, and sets forth "our duty to check the bitter party spirit, to be quiet, firm, and wise, to see the difference between what is merely Anglican and more than Anglican—to bear with those who differ from us;" while he urges the younger clergy especially to seek diligence, patience, and humility, and deprecates their belonging to the Society of the Holy Cross, or the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament, which, quite apart from their doctrinal specialities, tend to separate the Church into little sections, instead of compacting its unity.—A Church Mission, which is to last a week, began at York on Sunday, under the sanction and control of the Archbishop. Among the missioners are two London clergymen, the Hon. and Rev. E. Carr Glyn, Vicar of Kensington, and the Rev. Arthur Williamson, Vicar of St. James's, Notting Hill. The Rev. George Body is another of the missioners, and the York Herald states that some of Mr. Sankey's hymns are contained in the special hymnal used at the church where Mr. Body is working.—Mr. W. C. Jones, who five years ago gave the Church of England Missionary Society 200,000*l.* as a capital fund for the support of native evangelists in foreign missions, has now given a further sum of 35,000*l.* to be employed for the extension of evangelistic work by the native church in India.

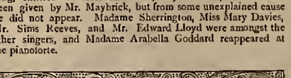
MUSIC

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——The generally favourable impression created by the new prima donna who made her first appearance on Saturday in Verdi's Traviata was fully justified by her impersonation of the erring and unhappy heroine. With the birthplace, descent, and antecedents of Mdlle. Emilie Ambre we have nothing to do, her artistic career being all that concerns the public. Enough, then, that she pursued her early studies in the Conservatory of Marseilles; that, some years ago, she first trod the boards in Holland, at the Royal Opera of the Hague—where, as singer and actress, she found many warm admirers; and that, not long since, she was engaged at the Paris Opéra Italien, making her début in La Traviata, with such success that, subsequently, the part of the heroine in Verdi's Aida was entrusted to her, with equally happy results. These are sufficient credentials to warrant her appearance before a London audience. Among the many representatives of Violetta we have seen, Mdlle. Ambre can fairly take rank with some of the best. To imagine any absolutely new conception of the character is out of the question. Some give more prominence than others to certain characteristics, vocal and dramatic; but all considered, the interpretation remains much the same—Violetta Valery is still the "Lady of the Camellias" to whom we have long been accustomed. Mdlle. Ambre's performance in no way disappointed the expectations raised by the eulogies of Continental critics. On the contrary, it upheld them. In the first act her spirited delivery of the bacchanalian, "Libiamo, libiamo," and the genuine expression she threw into the pathetic soliloquy, "Ah fors' è lui," at once gained unanimous approval. The second act brought out her talent as an actress in still greater prominence; and the last, which shows the penitent and despairing Violetta in her dying moments, established the position of Mdlle. Ambre, the audience bearing willing and ample testimony to her merits, as a lyric comedian of the highest promise. That she has yet something to acquire before reaching the point which should be the object of every aspiring artist is intelligible enough; but she possesses the indispensable qualifications—youth, a voice both flexible, and of sympathetic quality, an agreeable personal appearance, and before all an earnestness apparent in everything she does, the surest guarantee for continued progress. She already proves herself a musician born, and the fairest hopes may be reasonably entertained of her. About the impression produced on Saturday there can hardly, we think, be two opinions. Mdlle. Ambre made "a palpable hit." The parts of Alfredo and Georges were respectively sustained by Signors Runcio and Mendioroz. A word will suffice to say that Il Flauto Magico was given on Monday, and that "repetitions" have been the order of the week, the irrepressible Carmen, of course figuring conspicuously among them.

POPULAR CONCERTS.——The concerts of Mr. Arthur Chappell, held on Saturday afternoons, are, as they merit, just as successful and well attended as those on the long-established Monday evenings. Take, for instance, the last: the programme included Mozart's admirable quintet in D, for stringed instruments, given to perfection by Madame Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, Hann, and Piatti; Beethoven's pianoforte sonata in A, Op. 101, first of the five completing the undying series of "32," performed by Mr. Charles Hallé, who has long proved that he knows them all by memory, and, without any attempt at extraneous display, can render them no less accurately in a mechanical sense than with clear insight into their poetical significance; and Schubert's famous E flat trio, in which the distinguished pianist was happily associated with Madame Néruda and Signor Piatti—a combination leaving nothing to wish. On Monday evening the pianoforte (this time a "Bechstein"—not a "Broadwood") had to pass through a different ordeal. Dr. Hans von Bülow, again among us, selected for his solo exhibition Schubert's long spun-out Fantasia in C, Op. 17—an early work, the somewhat vague diffuseness of which takes much from the impression that might otherwise be created by certain indisputable beauties. Dr. von Bülow gave the whole with manifest enthusiasm. He also took part with Madame Néruda in Schubert's Rondeau Brillant for pianoforte and violin, originally introduced at these concerts by Mr. Charles Hallé and Herr Joseph Joachim, near the close of the first season (May 1, 1859), and lastly, with the same lady and Signor Piatti, played a trio in G minor composed by Herr Hans von Bronsart. Herr von Bronsart at one period studied under Liszt, through whose influence, most probably, he became a staunch apostle of what is (ironically?) termed "the advanced school," the cause of which he advocates, not only by his musical but by his literary talent. The trio in G minor, however, only shows traces here and there of this peculiar tendency. It is clever, no doubt; but, considering the intrinsic value of its leading themes, might have been made shorter with advantage, and is, on the whole, rather dry than interesting. Being dedicated to Dr. Bülow, we need hardly say the impetuous pianist gave all his well-known energy to its adequate interpretation. The doctor was powerfully aided (when allowing his two confederates to be on equal terms with himself) by the charming Scandinavian violinist and the gifted Italian violoncellist. The audience, nevertheless, did not seem profoundly moved by the work—at which we confess not to be greatly surprised. The most beautiful piece in the programme, and the most perfectly executed, however, was Beethoven's truly Mozartean quartet in D (Op. 18), in which the playing of Madame Néruda was nothing less than exquisite. The singer was Mrs. Davison, an American lady, with a charming voice and expressive style, both of which were favourably exhibited in songs by Arthur Sullivan and Rubinstein—"Orpheus and His Lute" and "Du bist wie eine Blume," the former, though from the pen of an English musician, by far the better of the two. At to-day's concert Madame Montigny Rémaury is to be the pianist. She will be welcome for more reasons than one.

DR. VON BÜLOW'S RECITALS.——At the first of two announced Pianoforte Recitals, on Wednesday afternoon, in St. James's Hall, Dr. Von Bülow played, without book, the last five Sonatas of Beethoven—Ops. 101, 106, 109, 110, and 111. These made up the entire programme. Though unquestionably a remarkable exhibition of "virtuosity," the effect was somewhat prolix. One of the sonatas, for instance—Op. 106—is enormously long, while none of them are exceptionally brief. The performance, therefore, though interesting, was as great a stretch upon the attention of the audience as upon the physical and mental powers of the artist—who, it will be easy to understand, in the circumstances, was by no means invariably up to the requisite mark. The example thus set is not one we should conscientiously advise other pianists to follow, notwithstanding the fact, of which connoisseurs are aware, that there exist some few able to accomplish the task just as readily as Dr. Von Bülow. The audience sat patiently enough till the fourth sonata came to an end; but very many retired before the magnificent C minor began. Beethoven himself would not have tolerated such a proceeding. Each of the last five sonatas has a marked distinctive individual physiognomy of its own; and to hear them all played in uninterrupted succession must distract the ear of the most earnest and contemplative amateur. What would Beethoven have said had it been proposed to give his last five symphonies, one after another, under the same conditions? He would have raved at the mere notion. This comes from the pride of exceptional "virtuosity," which places the executant above the composer. A single sonata of Beethoven's is enough for one programme—that is, supposing it be listened to with proper attention.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.——Of the new songs produced on Wednesday evening, we may specially mention "Darby and Joan," by Molloy, charmingly interpreted by Madame Antoinette Sterling, and the "Wandering Minstrel," by Mazzoni, capitally sung by Mr. Santley. The former is a simple but very graceful melody, is admirably suited to the words, and should become popular in the drawing-room; the latter is a much more ambitious composition, and would, we think, probably prove somewhat trying to most amateurs, but it met with ample justice at the hands of Mr. Santley, and was enthusiastically encored, a similar compliment being paid to "Darby and Joan."—A new song, entitled "Dearer than Life," by Roeckel, was to have been given by Mr. Maybrick, but from some unexplained cause he did not appear. Madame Sherrington, Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Edward Lloyd were amongst the other singers, and Madame Arabella Goddard reappeared at the pianoforte.



LEGAL

THE BLACKHEATH BURGLARY.——On Tuesday John Ward, alias Charles Peace, who was described as "a sailor, aged sixty," was indicted at the Central Criminal Court on the double charge of burglary and felonious shooting. The last-mentioned charge only was proceeded with, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty, at the same time expressing their admiration of the courageous conduct of the constable, and a hope that he would be ordered some reward. The prisoner made an abject appeal for mercy, confessing that he was neither fit to live nor prepared to die, but declaring that his career had been made to appear much worse than it really was. He said also that the first shots were only fired with the intention of frightening the policeman so that he might effect his escape, and that after they had closed with each other the weapon had accidentally gone off. Mr. Justice Hawkins, however, said that he did not believe this. The fifth shot was fired deliberately at the officer's head, and both had to thank God that his life was spared. Notwithstanding his age, he felt it his duty to sentence him to penal servitude for life. The prisoner appeared quite staggered at the sentence, and fell into the arms of the warders, by whom he was carried out of court. Mr. Justice Hawkins then directed that the prosecutor, Edwin Robinson, should stand forward and after complimenting him in high terms upon his bravery, presented to him the paper which the jury had signed, and ordered a reward of 25*l.* to be paid to him for his gallant conduct. The statement that "Mrs. Thompson" and Mrs. Dyson were one and the same person is now contradicted, and it is said that Mrs. Dyson is known to be in America. The trial of the convict for the Sheffield murder, therefore, depends upon whether she can be found, and her willingness to give evidence, as she cannot be forced to do so, being beyond the jurisdiction of the British Courts.—Mrs. Peace is still in custody at Sheffield, and a gentleman resident in the town has received a letter from Peace, written in a very illiterate style (which is supposed to be feigned), declaring her innocence, and begging that legal assistance might be engaged for her.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——The trial of Mr. Bandmann for the alleged assault upon Mrs. Rousby during a rehearsal at the Queen's Theatre in April last, occupied the Court of Queen's Bench for two whole days. The evidence was of the most perplexing character, scarcely any two witnesses agreeing in their accounts of what really took place on the occasion, and some of the statements being diametrically opposed to each other. The jury found that the injuries to Mrs. Rousby's arm had been unintentionally caused by Mr. Bandmann, and this the Lord Chief Justice held to be a verdict of Not Guilty. An attempt at cheering in court elicited a sharp rebuke from the judge, and Mr. and Mrs. Bandmann were loudly cheered as they drove off in a cab.—Mr. Yates, of the World, and Mr. E. Ray, of Touchstone, have been at loggerheads for some time past, and in a recent number of the last-mentioned journal some uncomplimentary mention was made of Mr. Yates, who thereupon armed himself with a big stick, called at the Touchstone office, and threatened to break the editor's back if he wrote "any more such lies" about him. This led to a summons, which was heard on Monday before Mr. Flowers, who bound him over to keep the peace.—A case of a somewhat similar character has just been made the subject of an appeal to the Queen's Bench Division. It appears that on the occasion of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Exeter, in July last, the Rev. J. Ingle, of St. Olave's, Exeter, while making his way through the crowd at the railway station, was stopped by Captain Bent, the chief of the police. This so exasperated the rev. gentleman that he said to the official, "If ever you dare to put hand on me again, I will knock you down, trample upon you, and after that I will bring an action against you for an assault. You are a jackanapes, a dog in office." A summons of course followed, and though Captain Bent admitted that he did not go in any personal fear, the local justices bound Mr. Ingle in 100*l.* to be of good behaviour. Mr. Ingle has now obtained a rule to have the case re-heard in the Queen's Bench Division, in the hope of getting the order quashed.—The Edinburgh High Court of Justiciary has decided that the Glasgow Bank directors are not to be admitted to bail. The Lord Justice-General and all his colleagues, with the exception of Lord Young, were of opinion that the prisoners had no claim as of right to be admitted to bail, and that, though it was within the discretion of the Court to grant it, it would be inexpedient and inconsistent with their practice to override the decision of the Lord Advocate. Lord Young, while agreeing that the discretion of the Court would, if it existed, be properly exercised to dismiss the application, was of opinion that no such discretion existed, and that the prisoners were entitled to bail as a matter of right. The offence with which they are charged does not, he holds, amount to theft; nor, if it did, would it therefore come under the category of those "crimes inferring capital punishment," which, under the law of Scotland, are the only ones not bailable.—Mr. J. D. Fletcher, one of the Middlesex magistrates, has decided that under the Matrimonial Causes Act he has no jurisdiction to grant an order of judicial separation to a wife whose husband has been convicted of assaulting her. The opinion of a superior Court is to be taken, but if the Judge's view should turn out to be correct, it follows that in all cases where the assault is of so serious a character that the magistrate feels it is his duty to send the case for trial, the wives will be deprived of the advantages of the Act, although it was specially passed for their protection, and that husbands will find it to their pecuniary advantage to make the assaults they commit as brutal as possible.—Something very like a miscarriage of justice took place at the Middlesex Sessions on Monday, when a ruffian who with some brutal companions had knocked down and kicked a woman, and stabbed her with a knife, was allowed to go unpunished on payment of 2*l.* as "compensation." This arrangement was suggested by Mr. Montagu Williams, the prisoner's counsel, and consented to by Mr. Stewart White, the counsel for the prosecution. It is sufficiently astonishing that Mr. Serjeant Cox, who heard the case, should have countenanced the suggestion, but what are we to think of the subsequent conduct of the learned judge, who when the woman afterwards came into court declaring that she had never been consulted in the matter, that she would not touch the money, and that she wanted "simple justice," coolly told her that if the man again assaulted her he would be severely punished!—A gang of burglars are very busy at Rugby, where a large number of robberies have been committed within the past few days.—At Doncaster a woman named Whiteside has been arrested on suspicion of having poisoned her husband and two children for the sake of the burial fees from an Insurance Society. She is also accused of forging the certificate of the death of her sister for the same purpose.—The charge against the manager and directors of the Lombard Deposit Bank of making false entries in the books has collapsed. When the case was called on at the Central Criminal Court the prosecution offered no evidence, and Mr. Justice Hawkins said that, having already had opportunities of making himself acquainted with the facts, he had come to the conclusion that, although there had been gross irregularity in the management, the specific charge made against the defendants could not be supported. He therefore directed the jury to return a verdict of "Not Guilty," and this being done the prisoners were discharged.—Stafford, the bank clerk, who absconded from Liverpool with 15,000*l.*, has been sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. He said that he had been induced to commit the offence by the witness Macbeth.—A singular defence was the other day made on behalf of a man who pleaded guilty to having stolen a quantity of jewellery from his employer. It was urged that he had a great love for military service and music, and that he was in the bands of no fewer than four Volunteer regiments, the expenses of which were more than he could afford. He was sentenced to six months' hard labour.—At Manchester, a man accused of stealing his wife's gold watch (part of property secured for her sole use by the marriage settlement) has escaped punishment, because, in the opinion of the magistrate, the Married Women's Property Act does not give to a woman the right of prosecuting her husband for felony.

MR. RASSAM'S ASSYRIAN DISCOVERIES AT KALAKH—FAC-SIMILES OF TWO OF THE BRONZE PLATES FROM THE GREAT TROPHY

THE RAPIEFF ELECTRIC LIGHT

We may surmise, from the number of patents for electric illumination which have been registered during the past few weeks, that the public will shortly be in the difficult position of having to judge between the merits of some dozens of rival inventions. Of course many of the plans so registered will never get beyond the provisional stage. Another large proportion will probably turn out to be accidental reproductions of systems patented and forgotten in bygone times, while the remainder, still representing a large number, will furnish work for the law-courts as they gradually reach their proper level, and represent successful processes or the reverse. Among the former we must certainly include the invention of M. Rapieff, for it has passed the experimental stage, and is actually employed in the printing-office and composing-rooms of The Times newspaper.

M. Rapieff's improvements in electric lighting are at present confined to the regulator or lamp which holds the carbon points, but we understand that his patent includes a dynamo-electric machine which will, when finished, enable him to depend entirely upon his own apparatus. The current for the lights is at present furnished by one of the well-known Gmmme machines.

The chief novelty of the system consists in the use of four carbons, instead of the two which in nearly every other arrangement form the points between which the luminous arc is produced. These carbon rods, instead of being placed pamllel with one another, are so inclined that their points meet. Or to put the matter more clearly, the two upper carbons form the letter V, while the two others, forming the same letter upside down, Λ, are placed so that the combination represents an X. But the lower pair are set at a right angle to the upper. In plan, therefore, the four rods would form a cross.

In the Werdermann lamp, which we described last week, it will be remembered that the long stick of carbon forming the positive electrode was pressed up to its proper position by means of a heavy weight. By the same means, and with the help of cords and guide pulley-wheels, M. Rapieff keeps his rods so adjusted that fresh surfaces of carbon are constantly presented to the arc as the ends are gradually consumed. We must remind our readers that the voltaic arc is not produced until a certain distance separates the electrodes, nor in the case of accidental extinction can it be re-established until they are made to touch one another. By an ingenious plan these difficulties are met and overcome. Directly the light is extinguished the current flows to a magnet concealed in the stand of the lamp. This magnet immediately attracts a keeper, or armature, which pushes up a rod connected with one pair of carbons, and causes them to make momentary contact with the other pair. By this means the light is re-established so quickly that its momentary absence could only be described as a wink.

One great advantage in M. Rapieff's system is that a nearly burnt out carbon can be replaced by a fresh one without any stoppage of the light. This operation can, too, be performed without the intervention of a skilled worker. In the annexed illustration the attendant—protected from the glare of the naked light by a small screen of coloured glass—is in the act of replacing one of the negative carbons. The right hand lamp is shown as commonly used—with the light softened by a globe. The screw S in both lamps is the means whereby the distance between the two pairs of carbons is regulated and kept constant. Indeed, we understand that the size of the arc can be so adapted to the current supplied, that a lamp can be made to represent the value of 100 gas flames, or of merely 10.

The Rapieff system, unlike the Jablochkoff candle, which is dependent upon a machine giving alternating currents—can be used with a magneto-electric machine of any pattern. The lights have each an independent existence, that is to say, one or two can be extinguished without affecting others in the same circuit. And the system offers the advantage of satisfactory subdivision without very great loss in the individual intensity of each light. We have not space to dwell upon the many admirable qualities of M. Rapieff's invention, but those of our readers who wish to become acquainted with its various details should apply at the office of the National Electric Light Corporation, Abchurch Lane, a company which has been formed to work the patent. Like every other system of electric lighting, that of M. Rapieff requires the test of prolonged practical working. From what we have said, it will be seen that it is now undergoing this trial—and so far most satisfactorily—in the buildings at Printing House Square.

THE READER

Under the title of "Yakoob Bey of Kashgar" (A. H. Allen and Co.) Mr. D. C. Boulger tells at much length the story of a man who, more than any celebrity of our time, might have been characterised as a hero born too late. Five centuries ago, and he whom all Central Asia delighted to call Atalik Ghazi, the "Fortunate" Ameer of Kashgar, might have proved—at least, so many think—a milder Genghis or Timur. Only a hundred years ago he might have founded as vast an empire as Nadir Shah. Mr. Boulger, it is true, is inclined to place him on a much lower level than this, albeit fully acknowledging his dauntless courage, his administrative skill in matters both of war and of police, his sincere if narrow patriotism, and the great success which he achieved with absurdly scanty means. Yet if the Atalik Ghazi may not be ranked with the great Mongol conquerors of olden story, the fault perhaps was less with the man than with the time. Even the unchanging East has changed so far that there exists no longer scope or material for the careers that used to appal the world. The lust of conquest has been exchanged for the hungry struggle for existence; the shadow of the Cross—of the arms, the organisation, the seeming omnipresence of Christendom—has chilled, as though with a sense of doom, the sparse descendants of the ancient Khans and Begs. But Mr. Boulger's chief object in this volume is not so much to define the Atalik Ghazi's true place in history, while bringing together all that is known of his career, as to call attention to that third factor in the Central Asian question which most of us have hitherto overlooked—the power of China and the Chinese. He holds, in fact, a brief for the Celestial Empire, of whose high qualities he can scarcely say too much, whether as evidenced in the prosperity of Kashgar during the brief century or so of "Khitay" domination, in the antique heroism of those Viceroys who, when surrounded by infuriated rebels, smoked their last pipes in the circle of their families, then dropped the embers into the powder magazine below; or lastly, in the patriotic enthusiasm of that ever victorious army which, fresh from the extermination of the Panthays, was marched away over thousands of miles of unknown country to reconquer first Jungaria and then Kashgar, and which is waiting now, the hand upon the hilt, for the surrender of Kuldja by its Russian guardians. All this, we confess, is somewhat new to us—this Spartan valour, this splendid army with its "Berdan rifles, its telescopes, and its Krupp guns," and its manœuvres "according to the teachings of Moltke and Manteuffel," are elements of power which visitors to China have curiously failed to see, and which even appear (from Sir D. Forsyth's latest correspondence) to be by no means universally believed in Kashgar itself, and we can only hope that Mr. Boulger has other authority for the picture he presents to us than the back numbers of the Pekin Gazette. Still his volume, though a little cumbrous, is quite worth studying, for China, beyond doubt, has men enough—and very many of them brave men, too—to become a menace all along the line from Illi to Mandalay, if she ever assimilates to any such extent as this the methods and the inventions of the European soldier.

Vol. II. of the fine "History of the United States" (S. Low and Co.), by W. C. Bryant and H. S. Gay, fully maintains its special claim to be thoroughly popular in style and treatment, while at the same time it is based throughout on a rigid examination of original documents and authorities. It traverses the period of the great Indian Wars, the religious persecutions in New England, the "witchcraft delusion" in Massachusetts, the surrender of the New Netherlands to the English by stout old Peter Stuyvesant, &c.—a period during which British power extends barely from the Carolinas to New Hampshire, and the great South is a land apart, to be disposed of in separate chapters, by the Rev. E. E. Hale, upon the French and Spanish colonies there. The stern old Puritans "down-east," with their wild out-bursts of religious zeal, their iron discipline and vigorous resenting of any State encroachments, even to the extent (as in the case of New Hampshire Wiggins) of throwing an obnoxious Under-Governor into the fire and then sitting on him, supply matter for many interesting chapters. The handsome illustrations and the more valuable copies of ancient documents and portraits form, as before, a prominent feature in the work.

Although it seems a little out of fashion, there is undoubtedly a grain of truth in "England's Language," by the late Walter Marshall (Longmans and Co.). The more frequent use of good old Saxon words such as our poets choose instinctively, the more careful avoidance of the temptation to introduce new foreign words and compounds, the possibility of recovering some at least of those home-bred compounds and derivatives which the Germans have never lost, are points for which a good deal may be said. But when the author takes us back to Ælfric, and replies to the ancient jest about "rendering impenetrability of matter" by "un-go-through someness of stuff" with the avowal that he himself should prefer "unthurlicnes of an-work" or of "an-timber," it is like broaching a scheme for the revival of the Heptarchy.

"Stories from Virgil" (Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday), by the Rev. A J. Church—with its pretty illustrations from designs by Pinelli, a Roman artist all too little known—is simply a delightful little volume. To take from Virgil his stately verse, his exquisite polish, and curiosa felicitas of diction, and so serve up the naked skeleton of his great epic in the quaint prose of the old chroniclers, as Arnold did with the stories of the Roman Kings, might seem at first a hopeless task. It is surprising to find how successfully it has been accomplished, and how completely the unadorned myth of Turnus and Æneas can take rank with the best Norse or Teuton tale of Dietrich, Hagen, or Walther of Aquitaine. A volume this to please scholars, old and young, and none the less because the Æneid is rarely read, as a whole, except by candidates for honours.

"Among the Welsh Hills," by M. C. Halifax (Groombridge and Sons), is a story of a young Welsh squire, who inherits an estate which should have been left to some one else. Of course he is too high-minded to take it, and equally determined is the fair unknown, in whose favour he abdicates, not to accept the sacrifice. All ends, we need not say, in the old ballad fashion—"and she shall still be lady of Leigh"—and without keeping the reader on tenter-hooks even for the allowable quarter of an hour. But it is a pretty story with a pleasant ending, and "Guy" and "Gwenny" are healthy, likeable personages—slight sketches of a type which Mrs. Oliphant has made familiar to us in more highly-finished portraits.

The often-quoted prediction of Franz Liszt has for a good many years been so far realised that none would stare at the musician now who put many of Robert Schumann's compositions on the same level with Beethoven's. Among, indeed, our later "tone-poets"—to borrow a phrase from æsthetic slang—there are few that have more attractions for the art-student than the strange son of the bookseller of Zwickau—not for a weird picturesqueness like Chopin's, or a career broken in midway like Franz Liszt's, for a life, indeed, beneath whose veil of romance and phantasy was a fair layer of stout German prose, but which was every way memorable for a force of genius that broke its way through every obstacle, and that alike in criticism and composition opened up new possibilities in the domain of Art. In the "Life and Letters of Robert Schumann (A. Reeves), translated by A. Alger from the German of the musician's friend, Von Wasielewski, the story of this gifted melancholy life is told with equal fulness and precision by one who knew the Master well in the period of his greatest honour, and whose estimate of his works is as genuinely appreciative as it is free from idolatry or hero-worship. The "letters" more especially are charming photographs of Schumann's inner life.

Those who would learn how painting on glass progressed from the early examples of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries to the full splendour of the fifteenth, and thence again through the decadence of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to the revival of the art in our own day, or who would follow it through all its phases as the handmaid of architecture and painting—most strong when most subservient to the former, most weak when the picture becomes the chief thing and the mechanic details of glass-making and colouring are disregarded or forgotten—cannot do better than turn at once to an "Introduction to the Study of Painted Glass," by A. A. (Rivington and Co.)—a little volume not intended to supersede the larger works on the same subject in great art libraries, but as a brief historical introduction decidedly most valuable.

Mr. J. N. Shoolbred has opportunely reprinted (Hardwicke and Bogue) the lecture which he read before the British Association last August on "The Present State of Electric Lighting," with additions and corrections up to the present time. Here the general reader will find, told in as clear language as the subject admits of, a succinct history of Electric Lighting from the time of Sir Humphrey Davy's discoveries, early in the century, down to the latest improvements of Werdermann and Rapieff. Mr. Shoolbred's concluding remarks may be perused with comfort by gas shareholders. For the illumination of large cities, and perhaps for street-lighting, electricity will be found available; "but, in its present form, electricity cannot pretend to enter into the special domain of gas-lighting, the illumination of private houses." Of course the wonderful Edison may change all this; however, those who live will see.

"Household Economics" (Arthur H. Moxon).—This is a second series of the "Food and Family" papers compiled by Mr. S. Phillips Day, and comprises a vast amount of interesting information on a variety of subjects, such as candles and soap, lamps, pianofortes, sewing-machines, tobacco, fish-books, steel-pens, pins and needles, &c. It is dedicated, we observe, to "Heads of Households," and they certainly may profit by its perusal.

A very useful little manual is "The Student's Guide to the Medical Profession," by C. B. Keetley, F.R.S. (Macmillan). Those students who are the sons of medical men can generally obtain, either from their fathers or their fathers' friends, much of the information here furnished; but those who have no such connection will find this book extremely valuable, as it tells them just what they want to know, namely, the various methods of beginning medical study, the choice of a medical school, the several degrees attainable, and the justifiable expenses likely to be incurred before the student develops into a full-fledged licensed healer of the sick. Nor are lady students forgotten, a special chapter being devoted to their particular requirements.

Communication by submarine wires between countries divided from each other by vast and deep oceans now appears such a matter of course, that it is difficult to believe how recent is its application. The story of the Transatlantic Submarine Telegraph has been written by the late Mr. George Saward, Secretary to the Atlantic Telegraph Company, and has lately been printed for private circulation by his widow. It seems a pity that such an interesting little volume should not be rendered more accessible to the general public, containing as it does a narrative which, in spite of the dry technical details with which it is necessarily accompanied, nevertheless exercises a fascinating influence upon the reader on account of the patience and perseverance displayed under constantly-recurring failures until success was at last attained. We seem carried back to mediæval times, instead of the year 1854, when we read of the first attempts to utilise the electric telegraph in connection with the steamers plying between Europe and America. Watertight canisters containing the messages were thrown overboard off Cape Race, picked up by a small intercepting steamer, which carried them to St. John's, whence their contents were telegraphically transmitted to New York. On the homeward voyage the process was of course reversed. In 1857 and 1858 the first two attempts to lay a continuous cable between Ireland and the American coast took place, and both resulted in failure, a large portion of the cable being lost. The originators of the scheme, nothing daunted, renewed their efforts in 1865, the Great Eastern being employed to pay out the cable. Again their hopes were doomed to disappointment, and new capital had to be raised. In the following year the lost cable was recovered, and communication by submarine telegraph was effected between the two Continents. In connection with this great undertaking, the name of Sir Curtis M. Lampson deserves especial mention. For his services he was made a Baronet by Her Majesty. "His earnest labours," observes Mr. Saward, "had from the earliest period been of great importance to the undertaking, and he displayed a remarkable pluck and tenacity when everybody else had lost heart."

Last on our list, an "Analytical Vocabulary of Greek Testament Words," arranged according to their gramatical form by the Rev. C. H. Waller (S. Low and Co.), may be mentioned as a manual that will be often useful, not only to the beginner who knows little Greek, but to the more advanced student, who may find such a list extremely handy for purposes of higher criticism.

A LAWYER'S EXPERIENCES

II.

I UNDERTOOK in my last article to refer to some of the customs of manors as illustrating the copyhold tenure of land. I am almost appalled at the extent of the field I have entered, and how to prevent becoming tedious is my great care.

The people of England are becoming so enlightened that some day there will be no work for lawyers, at least with regard to the transference of land. The modern enmity is shown to ancient institutions from which the lawyer derives his best fees. But wherein differs it from the colloquy on Blackheath between Dick the Butcher and Jack Cade?—

> DICK: The first thing we do, let's kill the lawyers.
> CADE: Nay, that I mean to do. Is not this a lamentable thing that of the skin of an innocent lamb should be made parchment? That parchment being scribbled o'er should undo a man?

By the way, one comes across a scathing bit of sarcasm occasionally in the musty tomes of legal authors, where one would hardly expect to find it. Speaking of the "people of England" reminds me that that grave authority, the great Blackstone, says "the popular leaders always imagined themselves to be the people."

While copyholds continue the manners and customs of lawyers will remain pretty much the same as they have long been. When customs are abolished there will be no need for lawyers. Utopia will be reached, and a gallon of beer sold for a penny. Alas! visions of Utopia have turned many a man's head, and Sir Thomas More lost his for his dreaming.

I love to think of the meshes in which this free England of ours was involved by William the Conqueror. How the holding of land—which before had descended from the father to all his children equally, in gavelkind, as it was called, which literally means "give all equally"—became entangled in tenures of Grand Sergeanty, of Knight's Service, of Homage, of Fealty, of Villenage, of Copy, &c., with all their concurrent pomp of circumstance. These relics of ancient grandeur are swept away now along with the Star Chamber and the High Commission, the only remnant of the feudal times being the tenure by copy of the manor Court Rolls, otherwise copyhold. John Holland, a friend of Jack Cade, by the way, said, "It wes never merry world in England since gentlemen came up." Well, certainly the "gentlemen who came over with William the Conqueror" did play havoc with the simple Saxon constitution. Now, gentlemen, at least the gentlemen John Holland referred to, have gone down, yet is it merry world now? The world has gone into hotchpot, I fear. Let me hasten to make myself understood. Hotchpot was an old-fashioned English pudding somewhat of the nature of a sea-pie, composed of various ingredients, say of venison, beef, mutton, and swinesflesh. As, according to Sam Weller, it was "all in the seasoning" as to whether a cat should furnish a veal or mutton-pie, so it is to be feared that the Saxon matrons sometimes put more of pig than of deer into their hotchpot. Seest thou, reader, the interpretation thereof? Why a wayfaring man, &c., might understand.

One of the manors which yielded plenty of clients to the firm with whom I was first engaged exists to this day, unshorn of many of its prerogatives. The pageantry has disappeared, but still its Court Leet and Court Baron are regarded as dread tribunals—by the bailiff and constable. There fraudulent shopkeepers are still "amerced" for dealing with light weights, and there still the "affeerers" settle the amount of the "amerciament." Will it be flippant to say that nobody is "afeard" of the "affeerers" now-a-days? The "affeerers" are "honest and lawful men of the vicinage," who settle the amount of fine, which differs from the fine imposed by magistrates to this extent, that, in case of non-payment, the offender's goods only, and not his person, can be seized.

I shall not readily forget the snuffy old steward of that manor, whose clothes were black, except where they were specked with rappee, whose ruffles were like the head-gear of chanticleer, whose great purple face was always scrupulously shaved, whose voice was slow and pompous. He was an attorney-at-law, and a fine old specimen. I fancy I see any copyholder daring to clap him on the back, and say, "Look here, Rigmarole, old fellow." If he had not died of apoplexy there and then, he would, yes, he would have—struck that copyholder off the rolls, if he could, or have made him do homage, instead of fealty—on paper—in his next admittance. And let me tell you, young man, you who respect not the traditions of your elders, no light matter that. In doing homage a tenant had to kneel to his lord, and say, "I become your man from this day forward, of life and limb and earthly worship;" whereas, when a man swore fealty, he merely had to stand upright, with his hand on the book, and declare that he would be "faithful and true," which need hurt no man's dignity.

The lord of the manor, who was seldom seen, was a scion of a noble house, and of an austere demeanour. To him the steward became as supple as a willow-wand; and though his face was resplendent with the glories of Comet port, shone only as a pale moon while the sun limped—for the lord of the manor wes decidedly gouty—in the firmament. Yet wherein differs the lord of a manor from other men? Is not every man merely a "forked radish with a head fantastically carved upon it?"

Of course, in effect, the customs of a manor are now mainly on parchment. The letter remains, though the spirit is dead. Successive stewards of manors have, however, taken their revenge out of King Charles II.—who, whatever his vices, struck the death-blow of feudalism—by heaping up piles of phraseology, at one shilling per seventy-two words. What humble pie they make the copyholder eat in his "admittance"! Fancy the New Zealander poring over a nineteenth-century copyhold surrender and admittance, the two documents necessary when a piece of copyhold land changes hands! Why, he will think that we were a most slavish people, doing homage and making obeisance. But they are mere bumptious phrases, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

It must have been some virtuous King—Edward II., perhaps—who discovered that it was highly improper for an unmarried female, in doing homage, to swear to the lord of the manor that she would be his woman. At any rate, I have the authority of Sir Edward Coke, the contemporary and rival of Lord Bacon, in that romantic, spirit-stirring work, "Coke upon Littleton," that it was discovered "not to be fitting" for a woman to make any such latitudinarian remark. Perhaps it will be discovered some day that it is not fitting that intelligent property owners should "hold of their lord and fealty, and a pound of pepper," as they do in some manors.

There are modern Jack Cades who, with regard to lords of every sort, would "give it them hot," if they could; but whether the stimulating ingredient would be pepper I know not.

Copyholders, bear your burdens lightly. Pay to your lords-paramount the cloves, gilly-flowers, golden spears, bushels of roses, pairs of gloves, bushels of corn, horses, fat capons, hens, or whatever the wisdom of your elders, who ought know better than you, have decreed. Murmur not at heriots, snarl not at terriers: the first has nothing to do with haricot beans, nor the latter with dogs.

I heard a good story once of an intelligent copyholder, who was asked if there was a terrier in his manor. "Wha," said he, "oive wun; but it's a ——" well, never mind what it was, it was not a dog. The poor man did not know Latin, you see; and, therefore, was not aware that "terrier" is the Anglicised version of "Catalogus terrarum," which means a roll containing the quantity of acres and the tenants' names in the manor.

A "heriot" is defined to be the best beast, goods, or piece of plate, due to the lord of the manor on the death of a tenant. Originally this charge was a kind of thank-offering offered by the tenant to his lord, who had, perhaps, enfranchised him. And so it passed into a custom. Now it is generally compounded for by a money payment.

No doubt Justice Shallow was the lord of a manor, with obedient copyholders bringing their tithes into his storehouse, else that order of his for lunch would not have been so profuse:—"Some pigeons, Davy, a couple of short-legged hens, a joint of mutton, and any pretty little tiny kickshaws."

It is very rare now that the services due by a copyholder to the lord of a manor are enforced. In some cases they are commuted for a fixed rent, and in others they have lapsed until the custom of the manor now is not to render them. In fact many districts have ceased to be copyhold from the falling away of the anciently-observed customs. The old socage tenure was, perhaps, of all late existing tenures the most slavish, for by it tenants were bound to help their lord with soke—i.e., plough. The only real uses of the copyhold tenure are to provide remunerative work for lawyers.

I could extend instances of quaint customs, but I have, perhaps, said enough to give a general idea of what copyhold means to those who do not know. To the wise, what I have said may be more than enough. My next jottings shall deal with magisterial business.

THE EARL AND COUNTESS OF DUFFERIN

LORD DUFFERIN did not speak altogether in jest when he observed that the chief defect of his successor, Lord Lorne, was that he was not an Irishman, for Irishmen—at all events, those of the mixed Anglo-Irish or Scoto-Irish breed—have played the rôle of Colonial Governors with remarkable success, and Lord Dufferin has proved himself one of the most brilliant of the series. It is no easy task to act as Governor of one of these great communities, which in everything but name are independent nations, and which, nevertheless, are content to receive a succession of rulers from the mother country. It is especially difficult to exercise a proper influence in the Colonial Councils without at the same time overstepping the limits of constitutional vicegerency. Judging from a survey of his Canadian career, and of the fervent regrets which accompanied his departure, Lord Dufferin achieved a signal success. "He carries with him," wrote the Montreal correspondent of The Times, in chronicling his departure, "the respect and admiration of all Canada, and that to a degree and with a unanimity which folks at home may hardly realise. Popular he was from the first, as what Governor-General would not be who dispensed princely hospitalities, and entered with zest and appreciation into whatever occupied and interested the people over whom he was sent to preside? But Lord Dufferin has achieved more than popularity; he has won a high place in the estimation of an intelligent people, and will henceforth be associated in the Canadian mind with Lords Durham and Elgin—Governors-General of revered memory."

Speaking at Derry on the 15th inst., the Marquis of Lorne said:—"The Dominion of Canada owes much to Ireland. Who does not recal, with gratitude to the country that gave him birth, the rule of Lord Dufferin? Canada will never forget him, or fail to remember that it was an Irish noble whose career has given so bright a page in her history."

Lord Dufferin was most warmly received on his return to Ireland. All sectarian differences were merged in a spontaneous desire to do him honour. With rare unanimity, Protestant and Roman Catholic, Conservative and Liberal, Orangeman and Home Ruler, came forward to give him a hearty welcome home.

With regard to Lady Dufferin, we cannot do better than quote the following paragraph from the Belfast address:—"It did not surprise us to hear how irresistibly your accomplished and much-beloved Countess won the Canadian heart, and we can well understand that her warm Irish affection, her gracious and winning manner, her kindly and generous sympathy, and, above all, her loyal devotion to the interests of her husband's work, proved themselves to be influences of inestimable value in furthering the success of your Lordship's Government."

We add a few biographical items. Lord Dufferin is the great-grandson of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and has inherited no small share of his ancestor's genius and humour. He was born in 1826, and was educated at Eton and Oxford, accompanied Lord John Russell on his mission to Vienna in 1855, and was sent in 1860 as Special Commissioner to Syria to inquire into the massacres there. He afterwards served in the Indian and War Departments, as well as in other Government posts, and was in 1872 appointed Governor-General of the Dominion of Canada. Besides some graver works, he has written a humorous account of a voyage to Iceland, under the title of "Letters from High Latitudes."

In 1862 Lord Dufferin married Harriot, eldest daughter of the late Captain Archibald Rowan Hamilton, of Killyleagh Castle, County Down, by whom he has four sons and three daughters.—Our portraits are from photographs:—that of Lord Dufferin by Notman and Fraser, Toronto; Lady Dufferin, by Topley, 104, Sparks Street, Ottawa.

HUMOROUS INDIAN TYPES

THE sketches from which these engravings are taken were originally intended to form a rhyming alphabet after the fashion of "A was an Archer who shot at a frog," but, as we decided not to use the whole of the series, we abandoned the alphabetical arrangement. To Anglo-Indians—especially to those from the Bombay side of the peninsula—these "types" need no explanation, but we may venture to say a few words for the benefit of those persons who have not had the pleasure of being grilled under the sun of our Eastern Empire.—The Ayah is a familiar personage even to home-staying Britishers. She may often be seen in the quieter streets of the West End, with her young charges in her arms or toddling at her side, and it is reported that during her sojourn in these chilly latitudes she is apt to develop a fondness for bottled stout, and to think no food nicer than a pound of "rumpy-steaky."—Water in the Indian towns is not "laid on" by means of pipes, and so the Bheestie is a well-known personage. He fills his goat-skin at the tank, and discharges its contents into the big water-jars which are such indispensable appendages to an Indian household.—The Dhobee is the washerwoman (of the masculine gender), common to the East. His muscular efforts are apt to make buttons fly off, but perhaps they are not more injurious than the chemicals used in our British laundries.—The Eurasian is a good deal to be pitied, especially nowadays. He is despised by the pure white on account of his swarthy skin, and by the Hindoos and Mahomedans on account of his Christian religion. Formerly, too, he was eligible for many Government posts, out of which he is now elbowed by the keen-witted Bengalees.—The Garee-wallah possesses many of the characteristics of coachmen all over the world. As in India the roadway swarms with foot passengers, he has to exercise his lungs considerably in shouting to people to get out of the way.—The Barber, the Fisherman, and the Kennel-Keeper need no description.—The Jemadar, or sergeant, is usually a brave, excellent, and trustworthy fellow, except when, as during the terrible year 1857, fanaticism sends him mad.—The Munshi, in our younger days, before the new-fangled spelling came up, wes written "Moonshee," and it was he who ground us up in our Hindostani, or Tamul, or Teloogoo, or whatever the dialect might be.—Noker, or Nowker, is simply a generic name for servant. The worthy in our sketch is doing just what his British brother often does.—The Camel-rider needs no description.—The Parsees, as every one knows, are the cleverest and most energetic of all the inhabitants of India. In Bombay especially a large part of trade is in the hands of these descendants of the Fire-worshippers.—Of the Ramoussie (Watchman) and Tapal-wallah (Postman) we need not speak.—The Ustad, or Schoolmaster, often carries on his vocation in a very primitive manner, under an open shed, and the children may be seen learning to write on plantain leaves.—The Vakeel, or lawyer, is by no means unlike his British prototype. The natives of India are very tenacious of their supposed rights, and are very fond of going to law.—Lastly comes the Wuzeer, or counsellor, reading a lengthy petition, which looks about as formidable as the portentous address in Geneviève de Brabant, which the Burgomaster is always ineffectually trying to deliver.

TEN YEARS AFTER

"Nous avons changé tout cela"

TEN years ago, when she was ten,
  I used to tease and scold her;
I liked her, and she loved me then,
  A boy some five years older.

I liked her, she would fetch my book,
  Bring lunch to stream or thicket;
Would oil my gun, or bait my hook,
  And field for hours at cricket.

She'd mend my cap, or find my whip.
  Ah! but boys' heart are stony!
I liked her rather less than "Gyp,"
  And far less than my pony.

She loved me then, though Heaven knows why,
  Small wonder had she hated,
For scores of dolls she's had to cry,
  Whom I decapitated.

I tore her frocks, I pulled her hair,
  Called "red" the sheen upon it;
Out fishing I would even dare
  Catch tadpoles in her bonnet.

Well, now I expiate my crime:
  The Nemesis of fables
Came after years,—To-day Old Time
  On me has turned the tables.

I'm twenty-five, she's twenty now,
  Dark-eyed, pink-cheeked, and bonny,
The curls are golden round her brow;
  She smiles, and calls me "Johnny."

Of yore I used her Christian name,
  But now, through fate or malice,
When she is by my lips can't frame
  Five letters to make "Alice."

I who could joke with her, and tease,
  Stand silent now before her;
Dumb, through the very wish to please,
  A speechless shy adorer.

Or if she turns to me to speak,
  I'm dazzled by her graces;
The hot blood rushes to my cheek,
  I babble common places.

She's kind and cool—ah! Heaven knows how
  I wish she blushed and faltered:
She likes me, and I love her now;
  Dear, dear! how things have altered!

ASSYRIAN BRONZE

During his expedition to Assyria, extending over the winter of 1877 and the spring of the present year, Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, the well-known Assyrian explorer, was fortunately enabled to recover from the oblivion of a Mesopotamian sand-heap the splendid bronze gates, of which we now furnish an illustration. These gates were twenty-two feet in height, and each gate-way was nine feet wide, including the post portion, which, like the face of the door, was covered with rich bronze bas-reliefs.

THIS IS A ROUGH SKETCH OF WHAT WAS PROBABLY THE FORM OF THE GATES TO WHICH THE BRONZE PLATES NOW IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM WERE ATTACHED. THE NUMEROUS FIGURES RECORD THE VARIOUS HISTORICAL EVENTS IN THE REIGN OF ASSUR-NAZIR-PAL, B.C. 880.

The plates which form our illustration are perhaps the most interesting of the series, as they relate to the great campaign of Shalmaneser III. against the Syrian Confederation.

The chief members of the powerful league of Syrian States which long opposed the advance of the Assyrian armies to the great sea were Ahab, King of Israel; Benhadad, King of Damascus; and Urkhilini, King of Hamath.

In the spring of the year 854 B.C. the Assyrian monarch started upon his great expedition against the combined forces of the Syrians; and the plates we have reproduced form an interesting panorama of this campaign.

In the lower tier of rilivi we see vividly depicted the capitulation of the Hittite city of Qarqura, or Aroer, on the Orontes, in the neighbourhood of which the King encountered the army of the Syrian allies. In the camp from which the army has started we see the Commissariat Corps busily engaged in preparing bread for the soldiers. A woman is kneading the flour in a tub, whilst another superintends the baking in a round field-oven, while a third neatly stores the loaves in a pyramid, ready for the coming meal.

A selected detachment of charioteers has gone forth to act as guard of honour to the King, who, seated in his tent, receives the tribute and homage of the nobles of Qarqura. Seated upon a "portable throne," and wearing all the insignia of royalty, the King receives the envoys, who are brought before him by the Court officials. Gold, silver, copper, rich woven robes, horses, and a chariot, form the "tribute to his royalty."

In the rear of the procession come the inhabitants of the city, men, women, and children. Two eunuchs of the royal body guard, mounted upon richly-harnessed horses, guard the rear of the procession. Behind the procession is depicted the burning city of Qarqura (Aroer). Above this scene there is inscribed in neatly cut cuneiform characters, "The city of Qarquara, of Urkhilini, of the land of the Hamathites, I captured."

The upper tier represents the siege of the two Syrian cities of Parga and Ada. Here we see vividly all the details of the siege operations as carried on by the Assyrian hosts more than twenty centuries ago. From the arrangement of the scenes to the right and left of the camp it would appear that the sieges were simultaneous events. Parga, the larger of the two cities, is besieged by the Assyrian host with all the engines of war. A battering ram of a novel form is forced up an inclined plain against the walls of the city, and a picked body of royal archers advance under cover of the screen or shield. A battle appears to have taken place previous to the siege. In the siege of the smaller city Ada, Shalmaneser himself is represented as taking part. Riding in his chariot, we see the "heroic warrior king" advancing to the attack, drawing his bow against the fated city. In the camp which forms the centre of this scroll we see two soldiers with hand mills grinding corn, while a third stores the flour in a sack ready for use. In the royal portion of the camp some officers are represented preparing the royal meal.

The rich work of these gates indicate the high state of art which bronze workers had reached in the ninth century before the Christian era, and many of the scenes here depicted call to mind the famous Shield of Achilles.

When the work of cleaning and repairing these plates is completed the scrolls will form valuable additions to our knowledge of the manners and customs of the Assyrians as well as one of the most ancient panoramas of the "pastime of kings."

The mound of Ballawalin, where these gates were discovered, is situated about nine miles north-east of Nimroud, and marks the site of the town of Imgur Bel, a suburban residence of the Kings of the Middle Assyrian Empire.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS

II.

Memories of holidays in all seasons of the year—spring amid Italian lakes and towns, summer on Swiss mountains and German rivers, autumn on the French coast, and winter in the Riviera—awake by a glance at the third volume of "Picturesque Europe" (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin). National beauties have been honourably chronicled in the two former volumes, and now British views give place to Continental scenes, most of them very familiar, but all very charming. The brief section allotted to Spain, although it merely glances at the North and Old Castille, is, perhaps, the most novel, but the Venetian views are particularly beautiful, and less stereotyped than the corresponding Roman pictures. Indeed the illustrations show no sign of inferiority to their predecessors, either in execution or selection, while divers writers contribute an agreeable literary accompaniment, chatty and entertaining, without being diffuse.

Turning from celebrated scenes to celebrated people, faces well-known to public life look out from the pages of "Men of Mark" (Sampson Low), now in its third series. Science and philosophy, politics, literature and art, music, medicine, and exploration are illustrated by some of their most famous representatives, and form a valuable gallery of thirty-six photographs from life, clearly reproduced by the Woodbury process, and explained by terse biographies from Mr. Thompson Cooper.—Celebrities of a minor degree—the notorieties of the nursery—are collected in "The Prince of Nursery Playmates" (same publishers), a perfect juvenile storehouse, containing seventy-four good old childish tales and rhymes, and plentiful pictures, often more brilliant than natural.

American stories are plentiful this year, and three more books hail from across the Atlantic. Many a spoony youth might envy the over-wrought journalist in "Six to One" (Sampson Low, Rose Library), who spends his holiday on breezy Nantucket Island, with six fascinating damsels, bound by a solemn compact not to permit him to make love to either of them.—Miss L. Alcott's latest production is for younger readers than usual. "Under the Lilacs" (Sampson Low), tells of a circus lad and his poodle, who escape from hard taskmasters and fall amongst good Samaritans. The story will prove amusing both for boys and girls.—There is a trace of Miss Alcott's style in "Cloverly," by M. A. Higham (F. Warne), a lively record of family life on the American seaboard, saddened by the death of one of the four happy heroines—an episode told with simple and not overdone pathos.—Death, too, is active in "Straight Paths and Crooked Ways" (same publishers), wherein Mrs. H. B. Paull kills off four of her chief personages with much unction, and produces a dull narrative for girls with an involved plot.—Nor is the same authoress's "Englefield Grange" (F. Warne) much more lively in depicting a stern father convinced, after much tribulation, of the superiority of mind over riches.—Equally endowed with a good moral, "Worth Doing," by J. Brockman (same publishers), is much more likely to impress by the plain relation of the successful efforts of a childish circle to grow better in a given year, the charred remains of a Yule log acting as their memorial talisman.

Children, this year, seem chiefly fed on improving stories, and fairy tales are few and far between. Thus there will be a hearty welcome for "Kaspar and the Summer Fairies," by Julia Goddard (Marcus Ward), as all who remember the adventures of the German lad with the wonderful Würzburg pigeons will like the fairy chronicles which Kaspar learnt at a quiet country "Bad."—Boys too old for fairy tales will appreciate "The Boy's Walton," by U. J. Burke (same publisher), which furnishes useful hints for next year's fishing, gleaned from ancient Izaak, and embodied as a story, brightened with piscatorial illustrations.—Meanwhile, the sisters are provided by Miss Yonge with a perfect girlish story in another of Messrs. Ward's Bluebell Series—"The Disturbing Element." Here is a "rosebud garden of girls," all bent on study and improvement, but scattered by the appearance of the disturbing element—man; after which each lady is duly paired off in the orthodox manner, the bursting of a reservoir aiding the dénouement.—There are some charming girls, too, in "The Bairns," by the author of "Christie Redfern's Troubles" (Hodder and Stoughton), another chronicle of family life in America. As "The Bairns" has reached an eighth edition, it is unnecessary to do more than commend it as natural and attractive, if a trifle lengthy.

The annual volumes of the religious magazines are already appearing. "The Mother's Friend" (Hodder and Stoughton) contains the usual supply of stories, poems, and good advice; while "Young Days" (Sunday School Association) is of a similar type for juvenile readers.—"Home Words" and "The Day of Days" (Hand and Heart Office) are of a more serious and important character, and further include religious papers and Bible studies.—"Hand and Heart" (1, Paternoster Buildings) also forms an interesting volume, combining many of the features of the newspaper with those of a magazine.

In these days of higher education it may be hoped that few girls marry with only vague ideas of their domestic duties. Still many may obtain valuable instructions how to choose and manage their house, food, servants, and dress, from Mrs. Johnson's "The Bride Elect" (Hand and Heart Office).—This domestic knowledge is also instilled by "The Way it is Done" (Houlston), wherein Mrs. Warren puts into the mouth of an ideal lecturer much salutary information respecting health, sanitary laws, and food, as well as practical lessons for the sterner sex on strikes and the labour question.—Taught utility by the foregoing, ladies may well turn to the ornamental in "Pretty Arts for Leisure Hours" (Chapman and Hall). Here Ellis A. Davidson lucidly describes various pleasant and useful occupations for feminine fingers, such as wood-carving, engraving, etching, modelling, and even toy-making.

In readiness for the approaching time of merriment, when quips and cranks are the order of the day, "Mirth" (Tinsley) surely comes in season. The witty periodical edited by H. J. Byron now appears in its first volume, and occupies a place of its own distinct from the ordinary comic journals. Full of humorous stories, of sprightly verse, and of odd scraps of fun, and impregnated with a decided theatrical flavour, "Mirth" is just the book to keep handy, and to dip into for a hearty laugh.

Georges Sand's romantic "Mauprat," with its brutal half-brigand hero, and forcible pictures of country life in Berri, when the peasants were ground down by the nobles, and the great Revolution was just dawning, has been added to Messrs. Weldon's collection of translations. Although the story is perhaps hardly suited to English taste, it will be acceptable to those unable to read the original.—Country life, too, is the theme of Mrs. Marshall's "Job Singleton's Heir" (Seeley), three short tales of a pure and simple tone; while French and English existence are also illustrated by Vol. VII. of "Tales from Blackwood" (Blackwood), comprising "The Romance of Ladybank" and "Metamorphoses."

Historical stories often induce children to hunt up the subject of their reading, and such is the purpose of "Queen Elfrida" (Hatchards). Miss Williams has, however, chosen an unpleasant episode of treachery, and has adopted a flippant style of conversation, totally unsuited to her characters.—A pretty and fanciful plan of teaching music to children is illustrated by a story of the late Lady Kay Shuttleworth, "The Ladder of Cowslips" (Nisbet), and the authoress's suggestion might tempt imaginative children, to whom dry details are distasteful.—Cowper's poems are heard little of nowadays, but old-fashioned people may like to give their young relatives the tasteful edition of "The Task" illustrated by Birket Foster (same publisher), with its good clear text, artistic engravings, and graceful binding.—A book for recording weddings is a variety on the old birthday book. "The Wedding Ring," by C. H. Parish (Nisbet), contains appropriate poetic extracts on matrimonial matters, with the usual spaces for names.—Friends' autographs, too, are to be collected in "The Querist's Album" (D. Bryce), a "Confession Book," with some remarkably silly questions.

The ancient legend of the youthful porkers gone out shopping is rather harshly treated in "The Tragic, but Strictly Moral, Story of the Three Little Pigs that Went to Market" (Waterston and Stewart), but Mr. Doyle's drawings are merry and spirited, and the poem is set to an easy and haunting tune.—Another delight for the members of a rising family is "Aunt Louisa's Favourite Toy Book" (F. Warne), a collection of old friends of our childhood, such as "Cinderella," "Mother Hubbard," &c., appropriately illustrated with bold and highly-coloured pictures.—Further, the youngsters who enjoyed the 9th of November will hail the gorgeous comic panorama of "The Lord Mayor's Show," published by Messrs. Moxon.

"The Bubble Reputation," by Katharine King, author of "The Queen of the Regiment," &c. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—Whilst writing with her wonted vivacity and ease, Miss King has, we think, in this story struck deeper chords than in any of her previous productions. Its interest centres chiefly on Owen Bourke, a young Irishman of very humble origin, who has enlisted in a cavalry regiment to escape the tyranny of a brutal stepfather, and, as the reward of a long course of good conduct and attention to his duties, crowned at last by a feat of heroic gallantry in the Mutiny, receives the Queen's commission, and is thus promoted to be the equal and daily associate of his former officers. How it fares with Bourke in this honourable, but somewhat difficult and embarrassing, position, the author tells very effectively, the scenes from regimental life here being quite as good as those by which she has already won reputation in earlier stories. Ultimately Bourke shows signs of high promise as a military inventor, and, forced to leave the army through the malicious machinations of certain inveterate foes, who cannot forgive him for having been "a Ranker," he rises in the Prussian service to title, wealth, and high renown for his discoveries in gunnery. The fate at last in store for this gifted and high-minded, but sorely-tried and far from faultless, hero, it is for the reader to learn. In styling him "sorely-tried," we refer principally to his love troubles, for in all his relations with women he is singularly unfortunate. Miss King's heroines are, perhaps, hardly as clearly drawn or as interesting as her hero, but the whole group, it may be said—with one honourable exception—show a tendency to inconstancy in affairs of the heart which is rather a curious feature in a work emanating from a lady novelist.

"Colonel Fougas' Mistake," by Edmond About, translated by J. E. Maitland (2 vols.: Remington and Co.).—M. About's tale is a contribution to the literature of the marvellous, in its combination of extravagance with the most accurate realism, reminding us not a little of some of Poe's wild freaks of fancy. Colonel Victor Fougas is a soldier of the First Empire, who—from the most benevolent motives—has been carefully desiccated, whilst in a state of congelation from exposure to cold, by a learned German savant, firmly convinced that a man can be made to undergo this process with as little danger to life or inconvenience as an eel or a tartigrade. From the close of 1813, the date of his drying up, he has lain in his case in a state of suspended animation for forty-six years; till, at last, in 1859, he is sold as a mummy, case and all, for twenty-five louis to a young Frenchman, who brings him back from Berlin as an interesting present for his scientific father. At the instance of this young Léon Renault's betrothed, who experiences the most unaccountable attraction towards this dessicated colonel, it is determined to attempt the experiment of bringing him back to life, by gradually restoring the supply of moisture which has been substracted from the system. The attempt prospers; and Colonel Fougas, restored to the world, twenty-four years of age in fact, though seventy by the calendar, proceeds at once to take the Clementina Sambuco, Léon's betrothed, for the Clementina Pichon, the bride he had parted from on the eve of the Russian War. The mistakes which the gallant warrior piles upon this initial error during the brief period of his second life are endless, and furnish most amusing reading; one inconceivable situation after another being related by M. About with the utmost gravity and carefulness as to detail. In fact a cleverer or more effective jeu d'esprit of its kind we should have to go far to discover.

"His Last Stake," by Shirley Smith, author of "All For Herself" (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—There can be no question that this is a book much above the average in ability, but it is more powerful than pleasant. Indeed, the pessimism of the author's views as to human affairs will, we imagine, prove too strongly flavoured for the taste of the majority of readers. We have seldom met with a story in which the canons of poetical justice were more defiantly set at naught than in the fates here assigned respectively to Cecil Marlowe and Maurice Dormer. This trait in the book is the more noticeable, as there are not wanting indications in it—though we do not profess to feel certain on the point—that "Shirley Smith" belongs to the gentler sex. The tale is one that may be followed with interest, and the principal character is drawn with much care, and is probably true to nature, though the type is peculiar and the reverse of attractive.

"The Cossacks; a Tale of the Caucasus in 1852," by Count Leo Tolstoy. Translated from the Russian by Eugene Schuyler (2 vols.: Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.).—Count Tolstoy, we are told in a preface by Mr. Schuyler—well known as the author of "Turkestan"—is "now, perhaps, the most popular novelist in Russia, and, after Turguenief, he is incontestably the best." He adds that Turguenief once told him that he considered this story, "The Cossacks," "the finest and most perfect production of Russian literature." One would incline to believe the great novelist was guilty of false modesty, as we should certainly rate those of his own stories which have fallen in our way decidedly higher. It is true, however, that to a Russian the tale may have a flavour which a foreigner fails to catch. It is, as the title intimates, a story of life among the Grebna Cossacks of the Caucasus—who seem a tribe distinct from the Cossacks of the Don—and has, at any rate, this claim to attention, that it takes the reader on entirely new ground, and is, in style and character, altogether unlike the novel to which we are accustomed. But we can hardly say that it takes much hold on the interest.

"Will is the Cause of Woe," by the author of "Dacia Singleton," &c. (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley).—At page 8 of the first volume of this novel we come upon a sentence which we really think, for its almost hopeless complexity of construction, may fairly rival anything in Thucydides. We should like to quote it, but as it fills a clear half-page it is too long for our space. No common mind could have created such ingenious confusion. Nothing farther occurs to us to say concerning a story which is long-winded and silly to an unusual extent, and full of reflections so utterly tame and commonplace that it affects us with mild surprise to meet with them even in a bad novel.

We have also received "Once! Twice! Thrice! and Away!" by May Probyn (Remington and Co.), and "Agatha Chicveley," by Fanny D. Dickins, author of "Unstable as Water" (Charing Cross Publishing Company), two far from unpleasant little love-stories, which have not a few characteristics in common. In both

Lady Helps

I.

I AM Julia, I am Mary,
  English girls of English nation;
But we've left our father's mansion
  For domestic situation;
Oh! our father's out at elbows,
  He has run through all his "tin,"
And we're forced to earn our living,—
  Madam, Madam, take us in!

II.

First, though, let us ask some questions:
  Are your daughters "in" or "out?"
Is your eldest son good-looking,
  Tall and slender, short or stout?
Should the sweeps come up some morning
  At the early hour of four,
Would the master of the household
  Let us sleep, and ope the door?

III.

Should we say we've been to college,
  Perhaps you'll think us rather "blue,"
Yet we're up in mathematics,
  Logic's lore, and classics too.
Give us any phrase, we'll put it
  In a Ciceronian dress;
Horace we can beat in terseness,
  Sophocles in loveliness.

IV.

Talk of painting! Spread the canvas;
  Turner would enraptured cry,
"Why, these girls can beat us hollow
  In depicting earth and sky!"
We have gained no end of prizes,
  And a Girton first-class too;
Listen to us reading Shakespeare,
  You'll think nothing of Bellew.

V.

Yet with this we blend a science
  You may prize far more than knowledge,—
We can broil a chop or beefsteak,
  Mix a pudding called the "College,"
Wash your dishes, if required,
  Make all sorts of savoury messes;
But there's one thing, mark, my lady,
  In the article of dresses:

VI.

Do not think that we resemble
  Betsy Jane or Mary Ann,
Women born in lowly cottage,
  Bred for broom or frying-pan.
We will have our morning dresses
  Made in fashionable style,
Do not think your sons and daughters
  At our homeliness shall smile.

VII.

Might we ask what games you play?—Lawn-
  Tennis now is all the rage,
It is known to us as well as Handel's or Beethoven's page.
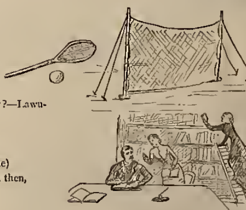
Should your eldest son (if handsome)
  Want some "coaching" now and then,
You may see us in his study,
  For we like all reading men.



VIII.

As for dinner invitations,
  Mind you tell your lady friends
That a little dissipation
  For our hard work makes amends,
And that, when we've washed the dishes,
  And put everything to rights,
We do love the valse à trois temps
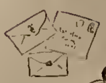
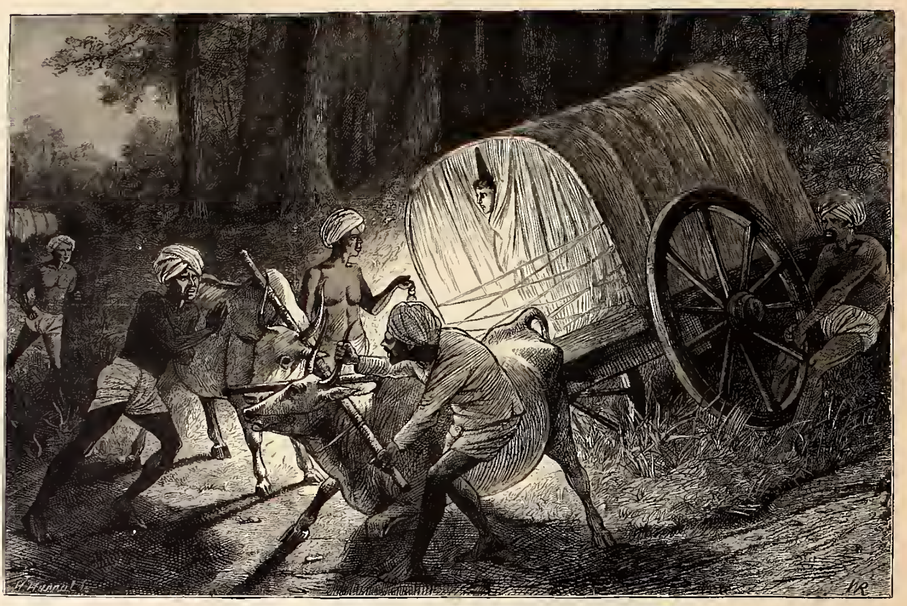
  On your cold bleak wintry nights.



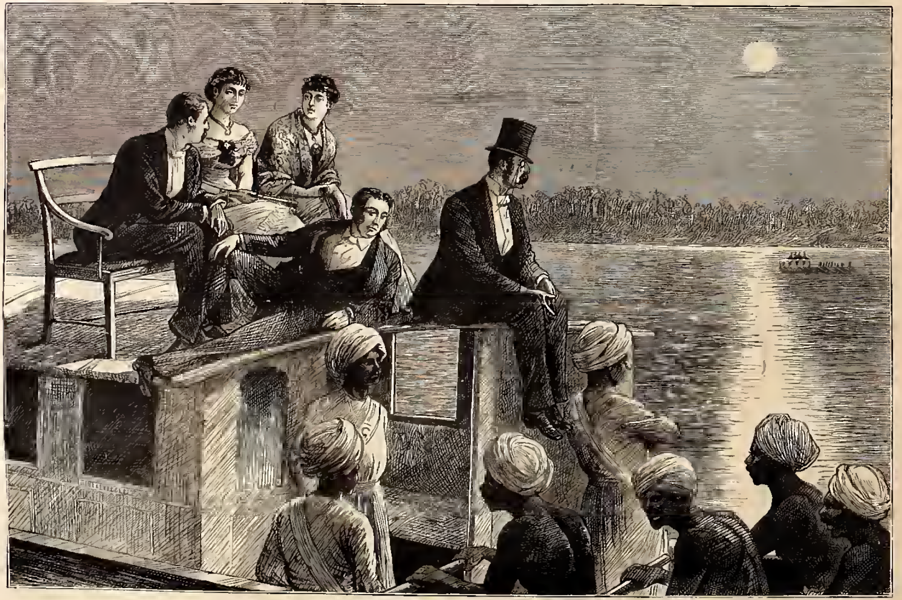
IX.

Oh! There's one thing we've forgotten;
  If you take us, you must say
To your vulgar "Jeames" and Susan,
  Coachman, cook, and page, "Good day."

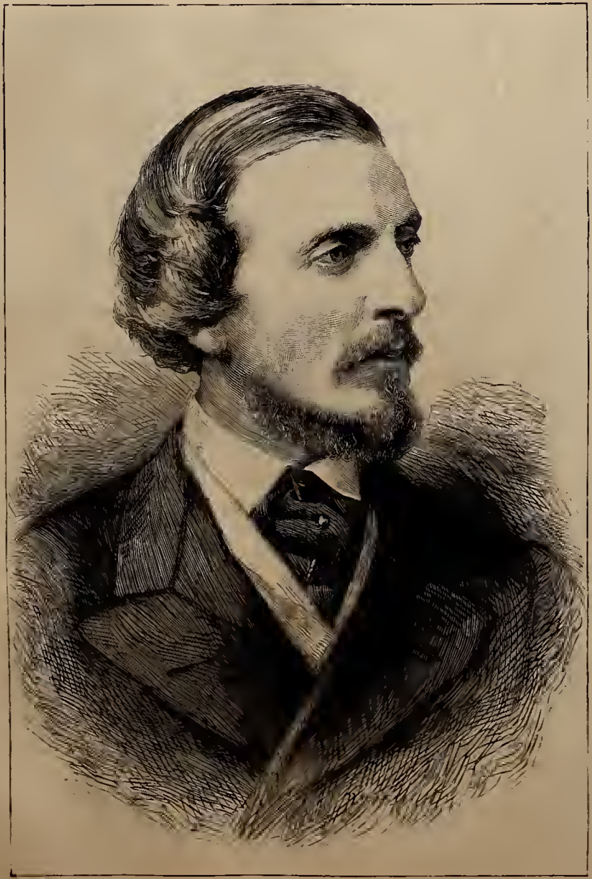
Think you we can sit at table,
  Hear the talk of Jane and Sue?—
Oh! I see, Ma'am, you won't take us,
  So we take our leave.—Adieu!—C. G. D.



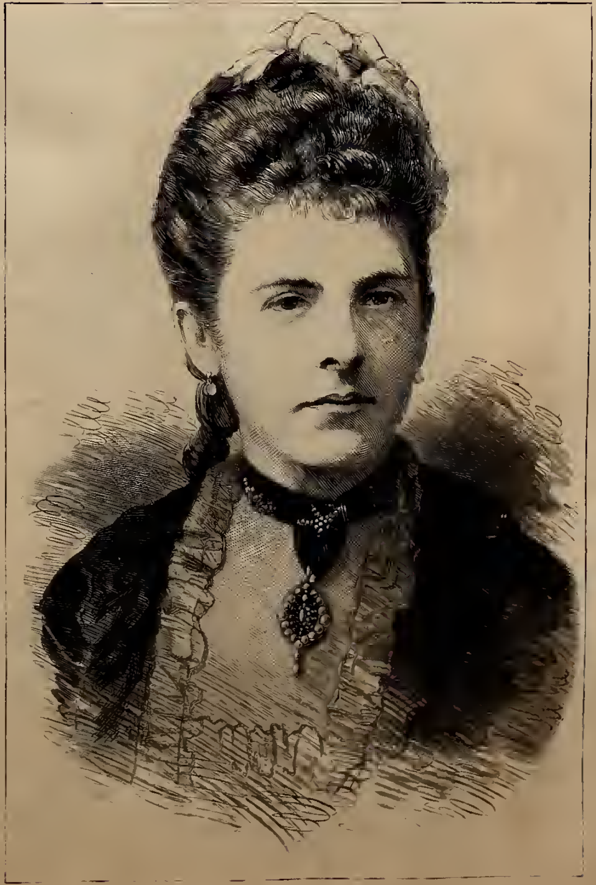
INDIAN SKETCHES—ON THE PEER MERDE ROAD, TRAVANCORE



INDIAN SKETCHES—GOING TO A STATE DINNER IN COCHIN



THE EARL OF DUFFERIN, LATE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA



THE COUNTESS OF DUFFERIN

the heroine is very young, very beautiful, and given to being original and having her own way, and in both she has a pet dog very much en évidence throughout. They are both readable enough, but too slight for criticism.

Two of the books in Mr. Bentley's "Empire Library" Series are one-volume novelettes by the authoress of "Comin' thro' the Rye." The first of these, entitled "The Land o' the Leal" (we are unable to perceive any special relevance in the name), tells a very tragical, but nevertheless fascinating, story with considerable picturesqueness and power. The keynote of the composition is jealousy. A man has given his apparent affection to (in plain English, has flirted with) two women, both of whom are passionately devoted to him. He remains loyally true to the one he marries, but the wife is led to believe that he is unfaithful, and, though she still loves him, she despises him. When, however, he is taken ill, and after a few weeks dies, apparently of rapid consumption, she becomes convinced that she has misjudged him. The tragical character of the story may be inferred from the fact that it is related by the widow from the condemned cell of the prison where she lies under sentence of death for poisoning her husband and her rival as well.—"As He Comes up the Stair" is of inferior quality compared with the foregoing. Here also jealousy is the mainspring of the action. A bridegroom on his wedding night hears, from a rejected lover of his wife's, words which imply that her reputation is compromised. In real life he would probably have taken pains to investigate patiently a matter of such gravity, but, as is the way in novels, he rushes off and joins a coastguard expedition against smugglers, and is supposed to have been drowned. His wife, however, always believes that he will again "come up the stair," refuses to put on mourning, and is finally rewarded by his reappearance. There is an uncommon freshness and reality about Miss Mathers' descriptions of Nature, and an intensity in her love passages, which rivets the reader's interest, but we should be glad if for the future she would select pleasanter and healthier themes. It is probably because of their actual want of familiarity with such scenes that lady novelists are so much fonder than their male rivals of disagreeable subjects.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

THIS Company is formed to carry out a concession granted by the Provincial Government of Pernambuco, confirmed by Decree of the Imperial Government of Brazil, for constructing and working a Railway from the Sea-port City of Pernambuco to Limoeiro, a distance of about fifty miles, with a Branch to Nazareth, in all about sixty miles.

The City of Pernambuco has, including Olinda suburbs, a population of about 135,000, and about thirty steamers call at Pernambuco each month, including those belonging to the Royal Mail Company, Pacific Steam Navigation Company, Lamport and Holt, Messageries Maritimes, American Line, &c.

The Railway will traverse the rich and productive Capibaribe Valley, embracing the best cultivated and most prolific Districts of the Province, and convey to Pernambuco for shipment a large proportion of what forms the total exports of the Province, such as sugar, cotton, and other valuable products, besides farinha, beans, Indian corn, rum, molasses, hides, &c., for home consumption, and for export. There being no navigable rivers, the bulk of this valuable traffic, as well as large return traffic, now carried chiefly by pack horses, will be conveyed by the Railway.

Sir John Hawkshaw, in his Report to the Government upon the Harbour of Pernambuco and Railways of the Province, says, "The Limoeiro line will no doubt get more traffic, as it runs straight into the interior at right angles to the coast, and there is no water communication to compete with it. The ground conceded near Fort Brum for its terminus is an excellent situation."

The Works are to be proceeded with at once, and are to be completed to Limoeiro by end of 1881, and to Nazareth by end of 1882.

When no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned without deduction. Should a less number of Shares be allotted than is applied for, the surplus paid upon application will be applied towards the amount due on allotment.

Subscribers will have the option of paying up their Shares in full on allotment, or at the time of payment of any subsequent call, and the full interest of 7 per cent. will accrue upon the amounts from time to time paid up.

Applications in the form attached to the Prospectus, accompanied by a deposit of £1 on each Share applied for, should be forwarded to the Bankers of the Company.

Particulars as to the Contract for the construction of the Works, Estimates of Revenue, Statistics as to Traffic, and further information, will be found in the Detailed Prospectus, which, with Forms of Application, can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, and of the Brokers above named.

The Original Government Decrees with Notarial Translations, the Agreement for the Contract for the Construction of the Works, and other Documents can be seen at the Offices of the Solicitor to the Company.

THE AFGHAN WAR—SHERE ALI, AMEER OF AFGHANISTAN

Topics of the Week

THE WAR.——Englishmen could hardly have hoped that the war which has been forced upon them would begin so well. As yet there has been no hitch; and already the taking of Ali Musjid has produced excellent results. So happy a stroke, the effect of well-planned military operations, could not but impress the native princes, but, what is even more important, it has evidently won over to our side many of the Hill tribes. Although it would be rash to predict that some of these wild people will not yet give us trouble, we have reason to be highly gratified that they have allowed us to pass without resistance through the Khyber. And it is, of course, possible that the exhibition of strength we have been able at once to make may have a favourable influence in districts far beyond those we have now reached. Whether this be so or not, the Ameer probably understands by this time that he has called down upon him an irresistible force. We know not what promises he may have received from Russia; but whatever they were, he can hardly hope at so late a stage as this that they will be fulfilled. He may even have begun to question whether, if his Russian friends came to his aid, they could cope with the Power whose enmity he has rashly provoked. Solemn counsels are being addressed to the Government that, however successful it may be, it must not adopt on a large scale a policy of annexation. But it is incredible that the Government should have the least desire to adopt the course against which it is thus warned. Avowedly and really it has gone to war in order to ward off a special peril; and it will, of course, annex not a rood more than is necessary for this purpose. So much, however,—and the exact lines to be drawn must be left mainly to military judgment—it will unquestionably exact. True friends of India, while regretting the necessity of war, are necessarily pleased at the prospect, since, if it is seen to be a decree of fate that the country must be ours, the natives are likely to reconcile themselves much more readily to our rule, and our military expenditure may be steadily reduced. Even for the sake of Russia it will be better that all chance of her conquering India should be obviously removed. She may thus be led to devote rather less attention to ambitious schemes and a good deal more to the task of governing justly her own population.

THE LOSS OF THE "POMMERANIA."——Modern discoveries have probably lessened the risk of ordinary shipwreck. All other things being equal, a steamer will weather a gale which would send ashore a ship provided only with sail-power. But as traffic has increased, the risk of collision has undeniably also increased, and no previous year has been so fatal in this respect as the year which is now drawing to a close. The foundering of the Pommerania was attended with circumstances of an especially melancholy character, inasmuch as these poor homeward-bound German colonists were within a few hours' sail of the beloved Fatherland, and had been merry-making on deck in anticipation of the joyous arrival only a short time before the disaster took place. That the loss of life was not far greater may be attributed, not so much to life-saving precautions on board the ship itself as to the "happy accident" of there being a steamer at hand able and willing to lend aid. As usual, the ship's boats proved a partial failure when the critical moment arrived, no less than three out of the eight being damaged and rendered useless. Numerous schemes have been contrived for the more rapid and efficient lowering of ships' boats, but hitherto, either steamboat proprietors disregard these improvements, or else they are found to be wanting in some essential particular when the terrible test of mortal peril is applied. Probably, however, the most effectual method of preventing these lamentable collisions would be to enforce some special rules of navigation in the narrow seas between England and the Continent. The Straits of Dover, the recent scene of several of these disasters, constitute the most crowded maritime thoroughfare in the world. On our main railway lines, engine-drivers, when they draw nigh to London, are forbidden to exceed a certain rate of speed. Would it be impossible to enforce a similar regulation between the coasts of Kent and Picardy, at all events during the hours of darkness? And as the electric light is used for lighthouses, why should not ships be compelled to use it while in these narrow seas? A strict rule of the road, such as is maintained by the Cunard Company's boats, even out in the practically boundless Atlantic, would considerably lessen the risk of collision. If all long-voyage vessels (the rule could scarcely be applied to coasting craft) were compelled to keep to the right or left of a line drawn equi-distant between the two coasts, according as they were proceeding up or down Channel, a few hours of time might sometimes be lost, but such a collision as that between the Pommerania and the Moel Eilian would be rendered simply impossible.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.——It is too much to hope that when Parliament assembles we shall be spared tedious debates on the past policy of England in regard to Afghanistan. Grave charges have been made against the Gladstone Government, and the late Premier is not the man to let any kind of accusation pass without challenge. The general feeling of the nation on the subject is unmistakable. It may be, as Sir Henry Rawlinson asserts, that the hostility of the Ameer dates from the beginning of his reign; but if so, there was all the more reason why England should have seized the opportunity in 1873 of permanently overcoming his dislike and securing his alliance. That such an opportunity did then offer itself is beyond doubt. Even from the Duke of Argyll's statement of the case we should conclude that had we definitely offered to guarantee Shere Ali against Russia, and to grant him reasonable support at home, he would have been satisfied with these results. The truth is that Mr. Gladstone, who had notoriously given very little attention to foreign politics, did not realise the magnitude of the danger against which it was his duty to provide, and so he put the matter off, thus making the present war inevitable. We by no means think that so great an error should be allowed to pass uncondemned; but at the same time the past is now of secondary importance, and the nation will be disappointed and indignant if the chief attention of Parliament is not given to the present and the future. And there will be general indignation and disappointment if from mere partisan motives the Opposition hampers the Government. We are now actually at war, and no one who has impartially studied the question pretends that we are at war without good reason. In these circumstances it is the plain duty even of those who regret many things in our recent policy to lay aside their hostility, and to associate themselves with the national flag. The duty is not one which may be neglected without evil consequences. All the world knows that although we are fighting the Afghans we are doing so not because of any fear of them, but because there is behind them a great and aggressive Power which, we have reason to believe, cherishes an evil design against our Indian Empire. Russia never watched more closely than she is now doing the course of events in England. Let her be convinced that the nation is virtually unanimous, and she will take good care not to advance a single step on her career without careful consideration. But if an outcry from the Liberal leaders suggests that opinion is seriously divided, we may soon have upon our hands a war compared with which the struggle in Afghanistan will be the poorest trifle. Unfortunately Mr. Gladstone seems to be no longer sensitive to considerations of this kind, but we may hope that Lord Hartington and the younger men of the Liberal party will manifest a genuinely patriotic temper. Continental Liberals are looking with astonishment on the support given by Mr. Gladstone to a country which is not only the rival of England, but is, at the same time, the most despotic Power in the world.

ANOTHER LANCASHIRE STRIKE.——Cotton workers, we admit, ought to be better judges of their own interests than outsiders, and we also fully admit that the loss of a shilling in the pound in his income is a far more serious matter to a working man than to a person who receives a thousand a year. Nevertheless, it is most difficult to believe that the Oldham men are acting wisely in striking at the present time. Surely, nineteen-twentieths of a loaf is better than the dole of bread awarded to them from the earnings of their fellow-workmen elsewhere. And then they have the experience of the spring against them. The Blackburn strike was acknowledged by the men's own advocates to be a complete failure, and yet they are prepared to repeat that disastrous experiment when trade is worse than it was in the early part of the year, and when winter (always a pincher of the poor man) is just beginning. Masters and men are still at issue on the old question. The masters say, "If by reducing wages we can lessen the cost of production, we may be able to hold our own against foreigners." The men say, "Not so, it is the amount produced which wants to be lessened." If they could persuade foreign spinners and weavers to adopt this view, if they could enforce short time in the cotton trade all over the world, no doubt this artificially-engendered dearth of production would be followed by a brisk demand for cotton goods. But unfortunately foreigners will not act thus, they rejoice to see these Lancashire disputes, because while Lancashire is disputing they are working, and the longer our quarrels last the smaller is likely to be our future share of the world's cotton trade.

HENRY THE FIFTH.——There is something extremely attractive in the letter the Comte de Chambord has addressed to M. de Mun. In every line it breathes a genuine love for France, and it expresses an inflexible devotion to principle that must command the admiration of his most vehement enemies. The Comte de Chambord believes that he alone can save France; he sees that the Republic is for the time triumphant; but he will not depart by a hair's breadth from what he considers vital truth. France must go to him, he will not go to France.

While, however, this is the spirit of a true man, it is also a spirit which must obviously prevent the Comte de Chambord from ever again being a serious candidate for power. For the State he wishes to establish is not such as could be tolerated in these days. Occasionally he uses the language of our time; but beneath his phrases we detect a feeling and a conviction directly opposed to its deepest tendencies. Upon the Revolution he looks with hatred and contempt; yet it is certain that in one form or another the principles of the Revolution lie at the basis of modern society. Freedom and equality—we say nothing of "fraternity," which touches a greater ideal than the world has yet reached—are essential conditions, in the present state of Europe, of a stable Government. We may dislike the fact or not, but, at any rate, it is a fact, that even in monarchical countries democracy is everywhere becoming supreme. It is because this has been recognised in England that monarchy is so strong; it is because the principle is ignored in Germany that monarchy there watches with incessant jealousy every popular movement. We question whether, even if the Comte de Chambord reconciled himself to modern ideas, he could ever now have a chance of the throne. The Republic is in possession, and certainly will not meekly make way for a rival. With his ardent faith in a virtually absolute crown he is simply outside the range of "practical politics." He is a highly interesting survival of an epoch that can never be recalled.

SAVINGS' BANKS.——It is in hard times rather than in good times that people learn the virtues of thrift, and therefore the present is a good opportunity to advise people to begin the habit of saving money. Working people do not need to be preached to in this respect a bit more than those whose annual incomes are higher, for in all classes a large number of people live up to their incomes, and a good many (if they can persuade any one to trust them) beyond it. The French do not act thus, and yet they get as much happiness and pleasure out of life as the English. If the Battle of Dorking should ever be fought, and be followed by its predicted consequences, it is very doubtful whether we could pay a fine of two hundred millions sterling as easily as the French did. That they paid it so easily is partly due to Thiers, but still more to Thrift. Then in France all the business of small investments is rendered by the Government as easy and agreeable as possible, so that every sempstress has her little roll of coupons. Here the Government do little to encourage the habit of saving, and while it is easy enough to entrust money to bubble companies, the securities which are really worth having are difficult of access to small and unlearned capitalists. Of course, we do not forget the Post Office Savings' Banks, which have already done much good, but might, under more sensible management, become thrift-creators of a still higher value. Why should they not be opened on Saturday nights, just when the shillings and pennies are in poor people's pockets: why should not the amount depositable in them be unlimited, for no person in their senses would leave large sums with the Post Office at 2½ per cent., when they could get more with equal safety in State securities; and, lastly, though here we speak with considerable diffidence, might it not be worth while to try the experiment of giving no interest on small sums, and, after a certain amount of deposit had been reached, raising the present rate of interest to (say) 2¾ per cent.? Mr. Littlewood's experience at Bath shows that very small depositors care more about having their money in a safe place (an aim often unattainable in their crowded homes) than for interest; and as the keeping of these small accounts entails a vast amount of labour on the Post Office officials, it might be advisable to make the payment of interest dependent on a more continuous course of thrift than is now deemed necessary.

"PROVINCIALITY."——Whether the jury arrived at the right decision or not, it is pretty generally agreed that Mr. Whistler would have acted wisely if he had kept out of Court. An artist who exhibits pictures must make up his mind to have tolerably hard things said about them. Not one man in ten can put himself in another's place, so as to realise the effect of injurious words; hence nearly all work that challenges public criticism is likely to call forth from somebody a violent explosion of indignation. What indignities, for instance, have not our leading statesmen to endure! It can scarcely be supposed that Mr. Gladstone likes to be called a traitor, or that Lord Beaconsfield enjoys the title of charlatan; yet both men are called nearly every day by one or other name, if even more offensive words are not sometimes used. Yet everybody would despise them if they condescended, as another great statesman, Prince Bismarck, does, to prosecute even the most virulent of their assailants. An artist is likely to be of rather more sensitive temperament than a politician; but surely the same principle applies to both. At the same time we sincerely hope that the sort of language used by Mr. Ruskin will not be extensively imitated. We have the highest respect for Mr. Ruskin; he has done more than any other writer to kindle in England a true appreciation of Art, and if he often says extravagant things, there is also in his writings a nobly chivalrous tone that is peculiarly refreshing in these hard, practical times. But all this does not justify him in charging an artist with "ill-educated conceit that nearly approaches the aspect of wilful imposture," or in talking of "a coxcomb who asks 200 guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face." That is "vigorous," no doubt; but it has what Mr. Arnold calls "the note of provinciality." No French critic of Mr. Ruskin's standing would condescend so far. A Frenchman might be equally severe, but he would have too much respect for himself and for literature to pick up the sort of weapons that are brandished about by irate cabmen. We fear the fault is not altogether Mr. Ruskin's; it is, at least partly, that of his public. A highly-cultivated community, with a delicate sense of what is right and fitting in criticism, would be in no danger of having this kind of abuse submitted for its approval.

Employers and Employed.——During the investigation before the magistrate of an alleged case of arson, it was incidentally stated in evidence that the prisoner—who had been twenty-eight years in the prosecutors' service, against whom they had (until this charge was brought) no cause of complaint, and who occupied a position of trust, inasmuch as to him was confided the duty of locking up the premises—was paid at the rate of twenty-four shillings a week. Possibly, he had some other source of income which was not mentioned in Court; otherwise, to any one who knows the expenses of life in London, where, unlike the country, everything must be bought with money, twenty-four shillings a week seems a very small wage after so many years' service. We make no reflection on this man's employers in particular, we would rather use the incident as a text for preaching a little sermon to employers in general. Employers are wont to give liberal pay to those of their servants who possess some special qualification not easily found elsewhere; whereas the employés whose places could be filled up at a week's notice are often allowed to vegetate year after year upon a very slender pittance. The laws of political economy may justify such conduct, but, where the master is prospering, it is not humane, nor is it even prudent. The classes to whom we refer are too isolated and powerless to indulge in strikes, but discontent often rankles in their hearts, and indifference to their employers' interests is apt, if opportunity offers, to develop into dishonesty. If employers made it a rule that their servants should participate in their prosperity, they would be served more zealously and faithfully than they often are now, and the unnatural antagonism at present existing between Capital and Labour would gradually disappear.

THE INUNDATIONS IN ROME

The recent overflow of the Tiber, caused by rain-storms of almost unprecedented force and duration, did immense damage throughout a very wide tract of country. Railways were made impassable, the metals being completely submerged, and landslips occurring in several places. Telegraph poles were washed out of the ground, or broken by the force of the flood. The streets of Rome, in all the low-lying parts of the city, were so deeply flooded that the boats and barges were used as a means of communication, and the city was transformed into a kind of temporary Venice—a condition of things which continued for several days, and caused much inconvenience and distress to the inhabitants. The event, though sad enough from one point of view, had its picturesque and humorous side, as may be seen by reference to our sketches, which need no detailed explanation.

"UNDER ONE ROOF"

Mr. James Payn's New Story begins on page 567.

BUSH LIFE IN WESTERN QUEENSLAND

These engravings depict familiar scenes in Western Queensland, and are from sketches taken at a place called Tambo, in the "Never Never" country. As in all thinly-peopled regions, the "general store" is a favourite gathering-ground. Here is to be seen the stock-rider on horseback, conversing with a man who carries his "swag" on his back, ready for a tramp in search of odd jobs at the various farms or stations which he may chance to pass during his wayfarings. The "swag" comprises such indispensable articles as a pair of blankets, a "billy" (for making tea in), a tin pannikin, an axe, a canvas bag for "prog," a water-bottle, and, if the traveller be a bit of a dandy, a comb for the hair. Coats, collars, and neckties are comparatively rare in the bush, woollen socks, flannel shirts, moleskin pants, and jack-boots forming the usual costume. In the foreground appears an aboriginal and his lady, the former in the cast-off dress of some European "swell." Behind the horseman a member of the constabulary is visible.

The next sketch shows a quartet of bushmen playing cards by fire-light outside their hut, while the "billy" is boiling for tea.

After this we are introduced to the bush tavern, a terribly fascinating spot to the shepherd or stockman. For many months together these men lead a solitary life, and drink nothing stronger than tea. Their teetotalism is not a matter of choice, but is due to the simple reason that spirits are never included in the regulation rations. At last the shepherd's wages are paid him, usually in the form of a cheque. He probably has a tramp of many weary miles before he reaches the nearest bush-tavern. He places the cheque in the proprietor's hands, and too often does not quit the establishment till every halfpenny of his earnings has disappeared. This is called "doing his pile," and during the orgies all comers are invited to drink at his expense. A "general shout," translated into mother-country English, means standing drinks all round. In the last sketch we see him outside the tempter's door, lying in the moonlight penniless, and perhaps temporarily penitent, the three dogs and the black fellow who are looking on probably wondering in their simple heads how it is that a being, in many respects so superior to themselves, can be such a consummate fool.—Our engravings are from sketches by Mr. P. P. Agnew, Terrantin, Queensland.

THE AFGHAN WAR

The time allowed to the Ameer of Afghanistan to reply to the ultimatum of the Indian Government having expired at midnight on the 20th inst., the Viceroy issued a Proclamation tantamount to a declaration of war, and the columns of the British expeditionary forces which have been mustering on the frontier made a simultaneous advance early on the morning of the 21st. We have already fully detailed the preparations which have been made for the invasion of the Ameer's territory; but we may recapitulate here that the expeditionary forces are divided into six columns or divisions. Of these the principal was ordered to seize the Khyber Pass and push on to Jellalabad, under General Sir Samuel Browne, who is supported by a second column under General Maude. A third column, under General Roberts, is intended to hold the Kuram Valley; while a fourth, under General Biddulph, is advancing from Quetta, in Beloochistan, upon Candahar. A fifth, under General Donald Stewart, has been organised at Mooltan to reinforce the Quetta column; while a sixth column is now being collected, under General Primrose, as a reserve division on the Lower Indus. The whole army numbers about 34,000 men, exclusive of camp-followers, and is under the supreme control of the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Frederick P. Haines, who is now with the Viceroy at Lahore. The contingent furnished by the Native States will be commanded by Major-General Watson. We begin our chronicle of the war with a description of the

which, after a short contest, fell into our hands on the 22nd inst. This fort, which is the key to the Khyber Pass, is situated about eight miles from its entrance, and twenty-six from Peshawur, stands on a conical hill about 600 feet high, and consists practically of two small forts connected by walls. The Pass here is about 150 yards wide, and the position is one of considerable strength, the steepness of the incline almost effectively protecting it from the attacks of a storming party, although, in 1839, Colonel Wade took it by assault. In these days of long-range artillery, however, the position possesses one great drawback, as it is commanded by two heights of considerable elevation on the south and west. In fact, it was mainly owing to these heights that our comparatively easy capture of Ali Musjid is due. Early on the morning of the 21st, General Browne despatched his first

THE AFGHAN WAR — THE GENERALS COMMANDING THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCES and second brigades, under the command of Colonels Macpherson and Tytler, by a circuitous route to the right, with the object of out-flanking the enemy by occupying the Rhotas Hills, and thus cutting off his retreat. Shortly afterwards General Browne himself, with the third and part of the fourth division, advanced directly upon the fort, and establishing his batteries of 40-pounders upon the Shagai range, opened fire upon the fort, which, by the way, had already fired the first shot. Skirmishers were sent forward to clear the villages, and at one o'clock the elephant batteries of 40-pounders arrived, which notwithstanding some exceedingly good practice on the part of the Afghans, succeeded in dismounting the enemy's guns, the third brigade, under Colonel Appleyard, having in the mean time advanced almost within storming distance of the fort. This column, formed of the 27th Punjaub N.I., and detachments of the 14th Sikhs and the 81st Queen's Regiment, mostly bore the brunt of the enemy's fire, and were warmly peppered by the Afghan entrenchments, losing two British officers, Major Birch, commanding the Sikhs, and Lieutenant Fitzgerald, who were killed close to the Afghan guns. As, however, night was coming on, and nothing had been heard of Colonel Macpherson's column, although Colonel Tytler's column had secured the Rhotas heights, the advanced skirmishers were ordered to retire, and the troops bivouacked for the night on the positions they had taken, a general attack being expected in the morning. During the night, however, the Afghans, alarmed at the advance of the out-flanking columns, abandoned the fort, leaving behind them guns, tents, and mules, and in a few hours our troops were in complete possession of this important position, with a loss of about forty men and three officers killed and wounded, the third officer being Captain Maclean, of the 14th Sikhs, who, however, is only wounded. In the mean time the retreat of the garrison had been cut off by Colonel Tytler, and a portion captured, while the friendly Afridis also intercepted five hundred of the Ameer's troops, seizing their arms and clothing. Our troops numbered 6,500, with about 21,000 camp followers and thirty guns, of which several were elephant batteries of 40-pounders, and the rest mainly mule batteries of 9-pounders. Having carefully secured his positions, and taken possession of the enemy's guns and camp, in which everything had been precipitately abandoned, General Browne remained in the fort all the night of the 22nd, and on Saturday advanced to Lundi Khana, whence on Sunday he pushed on to Dakka, which had been evacuated by the Afghans, and from which the march to Jellalabad, a distance of forty-two miles, is comparatively easy, the only difficult or dangerous portion being the Kurd-Khyber Pass, an extremely narrow defile of some three-quarters of a mile long. The headmen of the Kurd-Khyber villages have, however, already offered their services. At Jellalabad, which is reported to have been evacuated by the Afghans, it is expected that the column will winter; though should, as it is rumoured, the Ameer fly to Herat, an immediate advance might be made on Kabul. The various tribes throughout the march to Dakka as yet appear to have been very friendly. A large number of prisoners have been brought into Peshawur. Of these the privates will probably be sent back to their homes, and the officers detained on parole.

THE KURAM AND QUETTA COLUMNS

GENERAL ROBERTS crossed the frontier on the 21st, advancing from Thall and meeting with no resistance, occupied Kapuyan Fort, which had been deserted by its garrison, and then pushed on to Ahmadshama, where he occupied another fort, and summoned the hill tribes to supply forage and fuel. He subsequently occupied Mohammed Azim, and then advanced upon the Kuram fort, where he will probably spend the winter.

The column at Quetta, under General Biddulph, also met with no resistance in its advance, and appears to have occupied Peshin without any difficulty. The troops are, however, suffering severely from the intense cold, and a very large percentage of the force are on the sick list. Should, however, they succeed in reaching Candahar, they will be able to winter in a warmer climate and in far more comfortable quarters.

OUR PORTRAITS

WE have already given a biography of the Ameer Shere Ali, so that we need here only say a few words respecting his personal character, as recently painted by a writer in The Times:—

"Personally, Shere Ali is of no pleasing appearance. In countenance he bears a striking resemblance to his nephew Abderrahman, both having the heaviest type of Afghan features, in which are equally mingled expressions of fear, ferocity, and cunning. The desperate adventures which marked his earlier years during the long rule of his father, Dost Mahomed, and which continued during his own nominal tenure of power down to a very few years ago, have not been without an adverse effect in making a character, naturally imperious and tyrannical, harsher by the calamities from which he has suffered, even while he has triumphed over them. There can be no doubt that he possesses abilities of a very high order, and that if he could add a little sincerity to his other qualities of tact and perseverance he would not only be a more agreeable neighbour to ourselves, but would also thereby advance his country to a higher pitch of prosperity."

SIR FREDERICK PAUL HAINES, G.C.B., C.I.E., Commander-in-Chief of the Army in India, is an exceedingly distinguished Indian officer, and for some years previous to his present command he commanded the Madras Army. He was born in 1817, and was the son of Mr. Gregory Haines, of Dublin, Commissary General of the Forces, his mother being a daughter of Mr. John Eldridge, of Kerkford, Sussex. He entered the army as an ensign in 1839, and in 1846 obtained his Captaincy, becoming a Lieut.-Colonel in 1850, and a full Colonel in 1851, and three years later a Major-General. In 1845, on the formation of the Army of the Sutlej, he was appointed Military Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief, was present at Moodkee and Ferozeshah, when he was severely wounded. During the Crimean War he served with the 21st Fusiliers up to the siege of Sebastopol, receiving the Crimean and Turkish medals. In 1873 he became a Lieutenant-General, and, as we have said, from 1871 to 1874 was Commander-in-Chief of the Madras Army.

LIEUT.-GENERAL SIR SAMUEL BROWNE, V.C., C.B., K.C.S.I., is one of the best known officers in the Indian Service, being the son of a medical officer of the East India Company's Service, and having been born at Barrackpore in 1824. He first served with the 46th Bengal Native Infantry, and by his active enthusiasm generally attracted the attention of his superiors, and, after accepting an appointment upon the organisation of the Punjaub Irregular force, subsequently succeeded to the command, which he held until 1864, when, upon the retirement of Sir Neville Chamberlain from the command of the Frontier Force, Colonel Browne was nominated to the command of the Guides. Space will not permit us to more than briefly mention the numerous affairs in which General Browne has been engaged, and which number among them the Bozdar Expedition, under Sir Neville Chamberlain, the sieges of Delhi and of Lucknow, and a brilliant attack, planned and executed by himself, with a small field force, upon the rebels at Sirpoorah, on August 31st, 1858. This action gained for Major Browne the Victoria Cross, the Companionship of the Bath, and a Lieut.-Coloneley, owing to the great courage with which he advanced with one orderly sowar upon a 9-pounder gun, and attacked the gunners. A personal conflict ensued, in which Major Browne received two severe sword cuts, one on the left knee and the other severing the left arm from his shoulder. In 1869 Colonel Browne succeeded General Donald Stewart in the command of the Peshawur Division, being promoted to a Major-General two years afterwards, and in 1875 was selected to accompany the Prince of Wales in his tour through India. General Browne, who has since been "Director of Remount Operations," and has occupied the post of Military Member of the Viceroy's Council in the absence of Sir Edwin Johnson, is extremely popular with the various regiments with which he has served. "In the ranks of the 2nd Punjaub Cavalry and Guides," states The Times, "the name of 'Sham Broon' is worshipped, and his fame as a daring cavalry leader, as a warm-hearted, kind commanding officer, as a marvellous shot, has spread from the Indus to the Sutlej, from the Khyber to the Burman."

MAJOR-GENERAL BIDDULPH, C.B., who commands the Quetlah Column, is also an officer gifted with exceptional talents, though hardly possessing such an Indian reputation as General Browne. He first came into notice at Woolwich for saving the life of a brother cadet, and served in the Crimean War with great distinction. He has held many high positions on the Head-quarter Staff in India, and, besides being a popular Brigadier, possesses the confidence of all who have served under him.

LIEUT.-GENERAL DONALD STEWART, C.B., who commands the Reserve Forces at Mooltan, is an Indian officer, who served with great distinction in many border skirmishes under Sir Colin Campbell prior to the Mutiny, in which campaign he acted in the Adjutant-General's Department. He was repeatedly mentioned in despatches, and finally rose to the post of Deputy Adjutant-General of the Indian Army. He commanded the Bengal Brigade in the Abyssinian War, and subsequently was Chief Commissioner of the Andaman Islands. For some time he has been in command of a Division in Bengal, and left England in September to take up his present appointment.

MAJOR-GENERAL ROBERTS, V.C., C.B., who commands the Kuram Valley Column, is an officer of curiously varied experience, having served twenty years in the Quartermaster-General's Department, of which, indeed, he is the actual head. Moreover, he has the advantage of having served through many campaigns, in all and each of which he has earned distinction. At the siege of Delhi he earned the Victoria Cross, for sabring a standard-bearer and capturing his flag. The various operations connected with the relief of Lucknow, and its subsequent siege and capture, saw him acting as Assistant Adjutant-General. For this campaign he received the brevet of Major, besides a medal and three clasps, and was frequently mentioned in despatches. At the Umballah Expedition, in 1863, also, he was present, and again mentioned in despatches. In the Abyssinian War he served throughout as Quartermaster-General of the Bengal Brigade, and was given a Lieutenant-Colonelcy for his meritorious services. As senior staff officer he accompanied the Looshai Expedition of 1872, for which he received the Companionship of the Bath.

PATHAN TROOPS SKIRMISHING BEFORE PESHAWUR

Our sketch represents a couple of those troops who, during the Indian Mutiny, were raised from the Pathan tribes, or men from the hill-country, where India borders on Afghanistan. "The deeds of these men," writes a correspondent of the Daily News, "I have often heard spoken of by the officers who commanded them as being sometimes magnificent from their daring and brilliancy." It was one of Lord Lawrence's principles, which was acted upon more strictly after the Mutiny was suppressed, that there should not be above a certain per-centage of Pathans in the irregular regiments, as it was considered that, if a mutiny should take place among such men, it might be highly dangerous, and quite another matter to suppress in comparison to that of the old Pandy regiments.

SIGNALLING WITH THE HELIOGRAPH—BRITISH TROOPS IN THE NARU KULA PASS

THE first of these sketches represents the signalling party attached to the British column which operated against the Afridis in the spring of this year on the Peshawur frontier. The heliograph was used on this occasion for the first time in war, and proved to be a complete success. It consists of a circular mirror on a hinge, which reflects the rays of the sun to the points signalled to. The different signals are distinguished by long and short flashes, representing letters of the "Morse" alphabet. In some cases signals were transmitted to a distance of twenty-five miles. The party consisted of Captain Wynne, of the 51st Light Infantry, in command, who is represented signalling; Captain Barrington Kennett, of the same regiment, and a small staff of men. In the foreground is a foghorn for signalling in misty weather, also the signal-lantern which is used at night by means of long and short flashes, and the ordinary signalling flags. Thus in all weather and at all times communication could be kept up. Sometimes the party had extremely difficult and dangerous work in climbing the mountains to obtain a commanding position from which they could observe the enemy, and signal to the advancing column, as represented in this sketch.

The second sketch depicts the British column issuing from the Naru Kula Pass, with Jummo in the distance. That town, as also the heights on each side of the mouth of the Pass, were occupied by the Afridis, who were, however, soon dislodged by our artillery fire. The signalling party on this day had a rough time of it. They may be observed half-way up the mountain, on the right of the sketch, a position which they reached with great difficulty. From here they managed to get sufficient room to work the heliograph and flags, and thus keep up communication with the other end of the Pass. This method of signalling will be extensively used in the present Afghan expedition.

SIMLA IN WINTER

The seat of Government migrates from Calcutta to Simla as soon as the hot weather commences. The houses are built over a ridge and round a mountain, called Jacko, at elevations varying from 7,000 to 7,500 feet above the sea. The climate from April to the end of June is simply perfect, resembling that of England in early summer. After that succeed two months of rain, and Simla is enveloped in clouds. Heads of departments return to Calcutta in October, leaving the place comparatively deserted; a few wives and families remain the year round, and experience a winter like that of Edinburgh. At such time the scenes in the hills, such as we now present, are often of great beauty, the singularly graceful foliage of the deodar, when snow-laden, forming an object worthy of any artist's pencil.

"DINNER TIME"—INDIAN CAVALRY ON BOARD A TRANSPORT SHIP

The subject of this sketch is the deck of a cavalry transport-ship, which recently reconveyed the Indian troops from Malta to Bombay at the time for feeding the horses. The grooming and cleaning is over, and the trumpeter sounds the call for "Tobras," i.e., the native word for the nose-bag containing the horses' feed. The horses know the welcome sound, and their eager eyes and straining necks evince their anxiety for their dinner, which the syces lose no time in giving them.

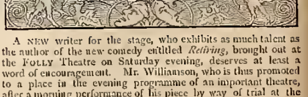
HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——The war with Shere Ali has been commenced, and next week Parliament is to meet to discuss the propriety of the step which the Government has taken. The members are summoned to attend on Thursday next, and the Session, which will probably be sufficiently stormy, is expected to last about a fortnight. Meantime the members of the Ministry have been holding frequent councils to arrange a programme. The Liberal leaders, too, are said to have met for preliminary consultation; but up to the time of writing no announcement has been made of any formal amendment to the Address. Possibly Mr. Gladstone may say something about the tactics of his party in the speech which he is to deliver at Woolwich to-day.—The plans of the Home Rulers for a winter's campaign of agitation have been completely upset by this sudden summons to St. Stephen's, and the great Conference which was fixed for the 10th prox. is now announced for the 3rd.—At several Liberal meetings in different parts of the country, notably at Manchester, Bristol, and Huddersfield, the policy of the Government has been condemned in no measured terms, while on the other hand the Conservatives of several districts have signified their approval.—Mr. Roebuck has been claimed as a Conservative by the editor of the "Parliamentary Buff Book," and the fact has been brought to the notice of the hon. gentleman, who declines to give a categorical denial, as he thinks, and perhaps rightly, that if his long life will not convince his countrymen that he is and always has been an honest Liberal politician, no protestations this time of the day will have any influence.—Mr. Butt has issued his second manifesto to his constituents. He reviews the progress of the Irish Party in Parliament since 1873, claims to have secured for Ireland a better hearing than she ever before enjoyed, and strongly denounces the violent language and writings of the Obstructionists. His next letter is to be devoted to suggestions as to the course which his party ought to adopt.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Lord Dufferin, the late Governor-General of Canada, was entertained at a banquet at Belfast on Tuesday. The Mayor presided, and the Countess of Dufferin was amongst the ladies in the gallery. The proceedings, which were intended as a welcome home, were of a non-political character, and his lordship in responding to the toast of his health spoke in high terms of the Canadian people, who were not only free but enamoured of their prospects.—Another dreadful collision took place in the Channel off Dungeness on Tuesday, the vessels being the German passenger steamer Pommerania and the Moel Eilian, a sailing ship of Carnarvon. Both were badly injured, and the first-named foundered almost immediately, fifty-eight persons being drowned out of the 220 who were on board, the remainder being picked up from the boats and wreckage by a passing vessel. The captain of the German steamer went down with his ship, but was subsequently picked up, and landed at Maassluys.—Another fatal disaster occurred on the same day on the Mersey, where, during a thick fog, a ferry-boat loaded with passengers collided with an outward-bound vessel. The shock was so great that a large number of persons were thrown overboard, and some of them drowned.—The jury who inquired into the loss of the Princess Alice met on Wednesday to sign their special verdict, it being agreed that it should apply only to the ten cases on which the inquiry was based, the verdict on the remaining 518 cases being simply one of "Found Drowned."—On the same day the Admiralty Court commenced the hearing of cross-actions for damages which have been brought by the respective owners of the Bywell Castle and the Princess Alice.—It has been decided to build a memorial church at Plumstead, on a site overlooking the spot where the Princess Alice was lost; and also to erect a national memorial on Plumstead Common, opposite Tripcock Point, as a warning to navigators and as a landmark.—On Saturday some members of the Board of Works went down the river in a steamer, and took specimens of the water at various points for examination and analysis. Some of them were bold enough to swallow large draughts of it, and though no very severe condemnation was expressed, we do not hear that any one arranged for a supply to be sent home for his private use.—The Thames watermen have held a meeting. They consider a knowledge of the compass is not needed by a navigator of the river, and are sure that qualified seamen cannot successfully compete with them. Still, to make assurance doubly sure, they have resolved to defend their vested interests against any possible encroachments by the Legislature.—There is a strike amongst the cotton operatives at Oldham.—The distress at Sheffield resulting from the great depression of trade still continues. On Monday the Mayor presided at a meeting, at which it was resolved to raise a relief fund, and to establish district committees for its distribution.—Much surprise and some alarm has been caused at Rochdale by the stoppage of the private banking firm of Messrs. John and James Fenton, which was established in 1819. The liabilities are stated at 500,000*l.*—It is announced that twenty-five railway companies have agreed to issue stamps of 4*d.* and 8*d.* each, which shall frank parcels of two pounds and four pounds weight respectively throughout the whole of their system. The South Western, London, Brighton, and South Coast, and South Eastern have not yet consented to the scheme, but it is hoped that they will do so, and that the Post Office authorities will also co-operate.



THEATRES

A NEW writer for the stage, who exhibits as much talent as the author of the new comedy entitled Retiring, brought out at the FOLLY Theatre on Saturday evening, deserves at least a word of encouragement. Mr. Williamson, who is thus promoted to a place in the evening programme of an important theatre, after a morning performance of his piece by way of trial at the Globe, has certainly much to learn in the way of dramatic art.

His main incident, a wrongful accusation of robbery brought against a worthy retired livery-stable keeper, has scarcely any connection with the root of his story, to which it stands somewhat in the relation of a flourishing bunch of mistletoe on a branch of a crab tree; and yet so far as there is any nodus and any dénouement this incident is all in all. Mr. Williamson's method is very simple—very primitive, we might almost say. For nearly two-thirds of the way between the first rising and the final fall of the curtain, he seems to be intent only on making his audience laugh at the "horsey" conversation of Sam Snaffles, and the innocent blunders made by the same good-natured vulgar person and his good-natured vulgar wife on finding themselves in the unaccustomed position of gentlefolks. For the purpose of developing these humorous elements there is a charming and accomplished daughter—pleasantly represented by Miss Rose Cullen—who is engaged to a most respectable young gentleman with a most respectable father, who tolerates but cannot feel quite at ease in the "horsey" atmosphere in which it is nevertheless worth his while to share. All this, thanks in great degree to Mr. Lionel Brough's strong sense of humorous character, and the spirit and drollery of Mrs. Carter, who plays the part of the wife, is highly amusing, though the effect is coarser and rougher than either truth or art requires, and on the part of the lady referred to the fun is accompanied by an incessant vehemence of tone and manner which fatigues the eye and ear. Still there is no plot; but only a sort of nest-egg of a plot, in the shape of a parcel, which is heard of from time to time as having been deposited with Sam Snaffles for safe keeping by a stranger who had once engaged his services. As will now be expected, however, this parcel contains stolen goods; and as this circumstance suddenly involves poor Sam in a prosecution for robbery, affairs henceforth take rather a serious turn. The author, however, may claim the merit, from this point at least, of conducting his plot in a business-like fashion, awakening real sympathy for Sam, and finally extricating him from his troubles in an ingenious and unexpected manner, which it would be unfair here to divulge. Retiring is decidedly a very amusing play, and, in addition to the performers before mentioned, its success is in no small measure due to Miss Lydia Thompson's excellent delineation of Mag, the faithful domestic of the Snaffles' household. The comedy is followed by a spirited revival of Mr. Gilbert's Wedding March (founded on Le Chapeau de Paille d'Italie), which is immensely droll, and is acted with abundant humour and spirit by Miss Thompson, Mr. Brough, Mr. Hill, Miss Cullen, Mr. Steyne, and numerous other members of the Folly company.

Miss Multon, an adaptation of a French drama of that name, which bears a close resemblance to Mrs. Wood's "East Lynne," has been revived at the DUKE'S Theatre, for the purpose it would seem of introducing to the English public Miss May Howard, an American actress. The play is familiar enough to audiences, and there is little in this performance—supported as it is by actors scarcely known to our stage—to give it any rank as a dramatic event. Miss Howard is a forcible actress, with an expressive countenance, and a fair voice; but her style is not remarkable for originality or—as far as we are yet able to judge—for any great power. Her first appearance here, however, has been well received; and as yet she can hardly be said to have enjoyed sufficient opportunity for the display of her talents. In the United States she is, we believe, a popular actress.

Mr. Bandmann bas been engaged by Mr. Chatterton, apparently to succeed Mr. Charles Dillon in Shakesperean parts. He will appear at DRURY LANE Theatre on the 9th of December in Hamlet.

The entire company of the Comédie Française, who, as is well known, have rarely quitted their famous home in the Rue Richelieu, have been engaged by Mr. Hollingshead for an extensive series of performances in June next. They will, with the Lord Chamberlain's permission, represent many famous comedies and tragedies both of the old classic and the modern romantic schools.

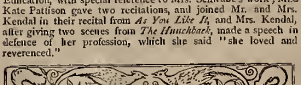
Mr. Albery's version of Les Fourchambault, entitled The Crisis will be produced at the HAYMARKET Theatre on Monday next.

This evening the PRINCESS'S Theatre reopens under the management of Mr. Walter Gooch, with an entirely new romantic drama, written by Mr. Hatton, jointly with Mr. Albery, and entitled, Number Twenty; or, The Bastille of Calvados.

Jack the Giant Killer is the subject of the elaborate Christmas pantomime preparing at the GAIETY. It will be brought out, contrary to custom, nearly a fortnight in advance of Christmas.

HENGLER'S Circus in Argyll Street has reopened for the season with a varied and extensive programme of equestrian and other kindred amusements.

A dramatic entertainment was given at Manchester on Tuesday in aid of Mrs. Salis Schwabe's Italian Schools, by which 75*l*. were realised. Miss Emily Faithfull delivered an address on Education, with special reference to Mrs. Schwabe's work; Miss Kate Pattison gave two recitations, and joined Mr. and Mrs. Kendal in their recital from As You Like It, and Mrs. Kendal, after giving two scenes from The Hunchback, made a speech in defence of her profession, which she said "she loved and reverenced."



SPORTING

THE TURF.——The three days' racing at Kempton Park, ending with the Saturday of last week, brought the legitimate Turf season to a conclusion; and it must be admitted on all hands that the meeting was a most successful one, showing considerable improvement on those which immediately preceded it. The fields with few exceptions were large, and the quality of the horses up to a high standard. The last of the new ventures in the way of establishing racecourses has more than fulfilled the anticipations formed, and there can be little doubt but that Kempton Park has made for itself a lasting reputation. Bugle March, an evergreen veteran, carried her 12st. to victory easily enough in the Park Hurdle Handicap, and Lady Ronald, strongly fancied with F. Archer up, landed the Halliford Welter; but a hot favourite in Romana was bowled over by Island King in the Garrick Two-year-old Plate, running second, as she has often done of late. It often happens that, when once a horse has run second, the bad luck of the famous Yellow Jack years ago seems to stick to it; and so it came to pass that the unfortunate Telephone, who since the Houghton Meeting had run into this heart-breaking place on two or three occasions, accomplished the same feat twice at Kempton Park in large fields, having to succumb to Groundbait in the Kempton Nursery, and to Rosalind in the Hanworth Park Nursery. Laird of Glenorchy, who seems always able to win a race when he is wanted, beat eleven others in the Wolsey Welter; and Drumhead once more showed how useful an animal he is by winning the Middlesex Handicap. But the last day of the fair was the best, and afforded as good a day's sport as the season has witnessed. Avontes, with his recent honours thick upon him, won in a canter the Kempton Park Handicap, thus proving himself one of best four-year-olds in training, and adding another good stake to Mr. Crawfurd's already large account. The talent were right in selecting Goshawk and King Sheppard for the Selling Nursery and Winding-up Welter, both beating a large number of competitors; but in the Richmond Nursery, for once in a way, F. Archer's mount, Breadfinder, was allowed to start at comparatively long odds, and only those who persistently back the fortunate jockey landed their sixes to one. The Shepperton Selling Plate was the last flat-race for the year, and was won by Captain Machell's Citoyenne, Lemaire, who has made a great advance in his profession this season, being in the saddle.

The Steeplechase season proper can hardly be said to have begun auspiciously at Croydon, as on the first day there was a continuous drizzle, and on the second a continuous downpour, and, as far as appearances go at the time of writing, the third day seems likely to be as wretched as its predecessors. Bonchurch, who took the Maiden Hurdle Race, is evidently destined to make his mark across country, and in Lord Fermoy's Lottery, the winner of the Stewards' Steeplechase, the Irish division have sent over a smart horse. Mr. Drake's Quits rubbed out his Kempton defeat by beating Roundhead and four others in the Hunters' Flat Race; and Bacchus credited the "Emerald Isle" with another victory in the Shirley Hurdles. The Grand National Hurdle Race, on the second day, produced a field of seven, of which Scamp was made favourite, with Boniface and English Archer next in demand. The winner turned up in the French mare Chimère.

AQUATICS.——A sculling race for 100*l*. a side, over the Thames Championship Course, on Tuesday, between Spencer of Chelsea and Bullman of Shadwell, created some interest. Bullman went away with a strong lead, and it was soon taken for granted that the race was virtually over; but Spencer began to overhaul his man when shooting from Craven Point to the Surrey side, and before long the odds veered round. Just below Hammersmith Spencer rowed into Bullman, who was evidently in the wrong, and, after clearing, the former had it all his own way to the finish.

FOOTBALL.——There are no Association Challenge Cup contests to note this week, and indeed there seems to have been rather a lull in the football world since our last, at least as far as important matches are concerned.—At Cambridge the University has beaten Manchester in a Rugby Union game by two goals and four tries to nothing, and Derby School in an Association game by eleven goals to one.—The Military Colleges of Woolwich and Sandhurst met at the Oval on Saturday last for their annual Rugby Union match, in which the former was successful by three tries to one.—The Old Harrovians, with an eleven not so strong as they usually play, have had to succumb to the Hertfordshire Rangers in an Association game; and South Norwood has beaten Barnes.—In noting from time to time the games in which Sheffield footballists take part, it appears from a communication received from the Hon. Sec. of the Sheffield Football-Association, which comprises thirty-nine distinct clubs, that we have not distinguished sufficiently clearly between "The Sheffield Eleven," which is the team picked from all the clubs collectively, and the eleven of "The Sheffield Club," which is only one of the thirty-nine clubs. We regret any injustice we may have done to any eleven in the matter, but at the same time we would venture to suggest that the title of "The Sheffield Club" must inevitably lead to confusion in reports of matches, and that if it could be altered for some other title this confusion would be avoided.—As on former occasions of its publication, we would recommend to all interested in football, and who wish to master the difference between the Rugby Union and Association games, "The Football Annual," by Messrs. A. G. Guillemard and C. W. Alcock, published by the Cricket Press, 6, Pilgrim Street, Ludgate Hill. It has now reached its eleventh year.

BICYCLING.——The six days' (of eighteen hours each) bicycling contest at the Agricultural Hall terminated on Saturday evening last, Cann of Sheffield winning the first prize of 100*l*. with 1,060 miles, and Ellin of Leicester the second of 25*l*. with 1,024 miles.

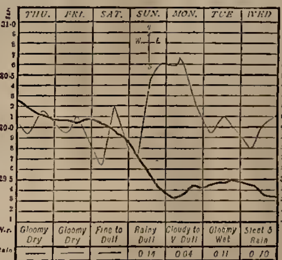
NOVEMBER 21ST TO NOVEMBER 27TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The weather during this period has been very dull. At the commencement of the week the barometer stood at rather above its average height, the winds were north-easterly, and the weather dry; but on Saturday and Sunday, the 23rd and 24th, the mercury fell very decidedly, and rain fell nearly all the latter day. Monday, the 25th, was rather finer; but during Tuesday and Wednesday, the 26th and 27th, rain fell almost continuously, and there did not seem to be much hope of any important change in the weather. The barometer on Wednesday, the 27th instant, was rather low, and barometrical disturbances were advancing towards our south-east coasts from the Bay of Biscay and France. The thermometer has been low generally; but rose quickly on Sunday, the 24th instant and reached its maximum on Monday, the 25th instant, since which time it has fallen to about its former level. The barometer was highest (30·26 inches) on Thursday, the 21st instant; lowest (29·32 inches) on Wednesday, the 27th instant; range, 0·94 inches. Temperature was highest (53°) on Monday, the 25th instant; lowest (33°) on Saturday, the 29th instant; range, 20°. Rain fell on four days; total amount, 0·99 inches; greatest fall on any one day, 0.70 inches, on Wednesday, the 27th instant.

SCRAPS

THE WESTMINSTER PLAY announced for this year is the Phormio of Terence, which will be performed as usual by the Queen's Scholars, in the Dormitory, on the evenings of December 12th, 17th, and 19th.

AN impresario in a French provincial town has obtained a subvention from the Municipality by adding a second title, in honour of M. Thiers, to a well-known opera. The Council have commanded that frequent representations should take place of William Tell; or, the Liberator of the Territory.

THE CENTENARY OF LORD BROUGHAM'S BIRTH is to be celebrated next spring at Cannes by a series of fêtes, from April 14th to 19th, in recognition of the late Lord Chancellor's efforts to develope the prosperity of the town. A statue is to be erected to his memory, and the first stone of the pedestal will be laid next month.

POPE LEO XIII., in addition to reforming the Vatican household, is benefiting the public at large by gradually removing the restrictions to study in the Art Galleries of his palace which were imposed at the end of 1870. From the beginning of December the Stanzie and Loggie of Raphael, in the Sixtine Chapel, will be open to visitors and students from 9 A.M. till 3 P.M., excepting fête days and Saturdays.

BARON MUNCHAUSEN'S HORSE, tied on a snowy night to a post, and discovered next morning by the melting of the snow to be hanging to the top of a high steeple, has been capped in real life by five cows at Pulaski, in the State of New York. The floor of a stable fell in during the night, and left the cows which were fastened to their stalls hanging by the neck. Endowed with less vitality than the Baron's horse, however, the cows were all dead when found next morning.

THE INTERNATIONAL ART EXHIBITION AT MUNICH, to be held next year, is being rapidly organised, and a committee has been formed to despatch invitations to artists in the divers European countries. The Exhibition will include paintings of all kinds, sculpture, architectural designs, and all objects in the province of the graphic arts, while gold medals will be given by the Bavarian Government, the awards being decided by a jury chosen from the best Munich artists.

PRIMA DONNAS IN MALTA would seem to have a hard time of it through national jealousy. Thus, the present reigning prima donna, says Mayfair, "is an Englishwoman, and the Maltese are jealous for the musical repute of their nationality. The consequence is that the opera is divided into two camps, the English on one side, the Maltese on the other. Whatever the English applaud their adversaries hiss, and when the Maltese condemn the English clap their hands the louder. There seems some fear of the rival factions coming to blows."

HERR WAGNER, abjuring his general dislike to the Italian style, has been entertaining at Bayreuth an Italian singer, who has an intense admiration for the German composer's works. Herr Wagner gave a soirée in honour of the singer, presented her with his photograph, and wrote in her album, "Long breath, charming soul." After supper he begged her to sing "some stupid little thing for the benefit of such of his friends who did not possess the sacred fire of genius," and on the lady giving Madame de Rothschild's "Si vous n'avez rien à me dire," he declared, "What your lips have sung, Madame, is no longer stupid," dismissing his visitor with a friendly kiss on the forehead.

FRENCH DUELLISTS are frequently obliged to cross the frontier into Belgium for the satisfaction of their honour, as the Bois de Boulogne has become rather too well known for such encounters, and zealous officials are apt to stop a pair of suspicious-looking carriages. An ingenious fencing-master, however, suggests an easy expedient for evading the eye of the law. He recommends duellists to hire a bride in full wedding costume, with two respectable elderly gentlemen, send the trio in front in a carriage, and let the two vehicles containing the principals and their seconds follow close behind. Not a soul will then interfere with the affair, as wedding parties taking an airing in the Bois may be daily seen by dozens.

LONDON MORTALITY decreased last week, and 1,547 deaths were registered against 1,667 during the previous seven days, being a decline of 118. There were 18 deaths from measles (a decrease of 4, and being 32 below the average), 11 from diphtheria (a decline of 2), 31 from whooping-cough, 24 from different forms of fever (a decline of 13), and 15 from diarrhœa. Deaths referring to diseases of the respiratory organs numbered 428 (a decline of 3, and 40 below the average), of which 277 resulted from bronchitis and 107 from pneumonia. There were 2,530 births registered against 2,448 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 40·6 deg., or 1·2 deg. below the average. The duration of bright sunshine was 11·8 hours, the sun being sixty hours above the horizon.

THE ISLAND OF TRISTAN D'ACUNHA, in the South Atlantic, which is rarely touched at by vessels, has been visited by the Government vessel Emerald, on her way to Western Australia. The little colony, consisting of the Governor, Peter Grant, and his ninety subjects, were well, and delighted to greet their visitors, and a supply of books and newspapers, but they were less enthusiastic at the present of a score of cats which the Government had sent out, hearing that the island was impoverished by swarms of mice. It appears that cats are as plentiful as mice in Tristan d'Acunha, and while the mice destroy every green blade on the island, the cats live on friendly terms with their hereditary enemies, and scorn to eat them, preferring to catch chickens and young sea-birds. The inhabitants are accordingly obliged to trap the cats by hundreds.

MR. ROBERT WALLIS.——The death is announced of this well-known landscape engraver. He was born in London on the 7th November, 1794, but spent the earlier years of his life in the country, returning to London about the year 1818, when he soon took a high position in the Art world, and was recognised as a worthy associate of Goodall, Miller, Cousins, Willmore, and others. Many of the best specimens of his talent will be found in Turner's "Southern Coast," "England and Wales," "Rogers' Poems," and in the expensively illustrated "Keepsakes," and other gift books of the period. Among his larger works reference may be made to "Lake Nemi," after Turner, an artist's proof of which realised ninety guineas under the hammer at Christie's about three years ago, and "The Approach to Venice," also after Turner. This was his last work of any importance, and it is perhaps the most successful rendering of a picture by the great Master that has appeared since his death. It was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1859. Shortly after this Mr. Wallis relinquished all professional engagements in consequence of advancing age, and retired to Brighton, where he died on the 23rd inst., aged eighty-five.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——Count Schouvaloff's visit to Vienna and Paris, on his way to London, does not appear to be fraught with such success as the Russians had hoped. Now that the Czar has definitively announced his intention to carry out the Berlin Treaty to the letter, Russia wishes for the co-operation of the other Powers to compel Turkey to fulfil her part of the bargain. The old argument that as soon as the Russians leave the country the Christians will once more rise in open rebellion against Mahomedan rule, and thus neutralise the benefits procured for them by the Berlin Treaty, is again put forward, together with a strongly urged opinion that without "material assistance" Turkey will not be able, in the face of the Albanian insurrection, to hand over the ceded territory to Servia and Montenegro. Thus Russia proposes a joint European Commission—similar to that proposed for Syria in 1861, to watch over the execution of the Treaty. Neither Austria nor France, however, appear to share her apprehensions, so that the scheme will probably fall to the ground. Indeed, the experiment of the Eastern Roumelian Commission is not so successful as to inspire any hope that another and more important Commission would work together in any degree of harmony, as we hear of nothing but bickerings between the Russian member and his colleagues, whose suggestions are either roundly negatived or either opposed by the argument that the Russian Government have issued no instructions on the subject. The Russians, however, continue to assure Europe that they will spare no pains to fulfil the Treaty of Berlin, General Todleben has addressed a significant warning to that effect to the Bulgarians, the Pan-Slavist Committee have become markedly moderate and guarded in their language and acts, while the surmise that Prince Dondoukoff had been summoned to Livadia in order to be "recommended" not to tell the Bulgarians that the Czar had determined to set aside the Treaty, is officially confirmed by a telegram from St. Petersburg, and that officer will now have to moderate the tone of those utterances which have attracted so much attention during the past few months.

The Roumanian difficulty also is at an end. Prince Charles (assisted, it is said, by Austria) resisted the demands of Russia that a convention allowing the passage of Russian troops across the Roumanian territory for an indefinite time should be signed before the Roumanians entered into possession of the Dobrudscha, and ultimately the Czar gave up the point. Accordingly on Tuesday afternoon the Roumanian troops crossed the Danube, and the Prince issued a proclamation announcing the incorporation of the province into Roumania, declaring that his troops were entering not as conquerors, but as maintainers of peace and order, and assuring the inhabitants, Mahomedans and Christians alike, that their lives, honour, and property will henceforward be protected by the "shield of a Constitution which is an object of envy to many foreign nationalities." Certain taxes are to be remitted for a year, others have been totally abolished, and others again are subject to important modifications. On Wednesday the Chamber re-assembled, when the course of events, and the improvement of the Roumanian position, were the chief themes of Prince Charles' address. There is little other news, save that negotiations are still going on for the final definitive treaty between Russia and Turkey, that the Austro-Turkish Convention is also being officially discussed, that the Bulgarian Assembly instituted by the Berlin Treaty, and consisting of bishops, public functionaries, and notables, is to meet at Tirnova on the 27th prox. to prepare the organic laws of Bulgaria, and that Sir Henry Layard has recommended Lord Salisbury to guarantee a loan of 23,000,000 pounds Turkish (the Turkish pound is 18*s.*).

FRANCE.——The Comte de Chambord has again broken silence, this time in a letter to M. de Mun, thanking him for his recent eloquent denunciation of the Revolution and staunch defence of Divine Right and the Church. Like his young follower, the Comte de Chambord frankly acknowledges the "deplorable abuses" which shipwrecked the old régime, but declares that it was "insensate" to have overturned the protecting bulwarks in order to reform them, and congratulates M. de Mun on not having feared to tell "the triumphant Revolution to its face what it is in its essence and spirit," and to tell the counter Revolution what it has to be in its work of reparation and pacification. M. de Mun had defined the Revolution as a "social doctrine, a political doctrine, which pretends to found society on the will of man instead of the will of God, on the supremacy of human reason in the place of Divine Law . . . . The counter Revolution is the opposite principle; it is this doctrine which bases Society on the Christian law." These definitions are endorsed by the Comte de Chambord, who declares that the Revolution pursuing its "ideal of a State without God—that is to say, against God"—has proscribed the "humbler educators of the children of the people and the admirable Sisters of Charity." After warning the working people against flattery, he tells them, as he has often told them before, that "for France to be raised, God must return as Master, that I may reign as King. Confidence, my dear De Mun! Never forget that the future is to the men of faith and courage." As may be imagined, this letter has practically put an end to the coalition between the Right for the Senatorial Elections, as most Orleanists and Bonapartists are too much concerned in the Revolution not to be included in the sweeping denunciation. The Comte de Chambord, who so strongly resembles Pius IX., must be admired for one thing—that staunch consistency to principle which will permit of no compromise—although to most men even of his party compromise would seem the only practicable means of attaining the wished-for end.

There is little going on in the Chamber, the only incident being the rejection of M. Bardoux's proposal to increase the salaries of aged parish curés from 36*l.* to 40*l.*, and to make a similar addition to the stipends of Protestant pastors and Jewish rabbis; and the chief topic has been the duel between MM. Gambetta and Fourtou in consequence of the scene in the House last week. M. de Fourtou requested M. Gambetta to apologise, and on his refusing challenged him. Accordingly the two Deputies met one foggy morning at Plessis-Piquet, exchanged shots from saloon pistols, at thirty-five paces, without any effect, raised their hats to each other, and walked away with their honour satisfied. Both have been severely handled for such puerile conduct, and M. Gambetta in particular has been severely blamed by his own party.

In Paris the lottery fever is raging more fiercely than ever, ordinary tickets are selling for double their legal price, those bearing an unusual collection of "sevens" or other lucky numbers are at a high premium, while complete collections of the same number of each series sell for forty francs. The prizes are rapidly being classified at the Palais de l'Industrie, and they will shortly be exposed to view. There is considerable apprehension abroad, however, that a very large number of forged tickets have been issued, more especially as they are very simple and exceedingly easy to imitate, so various journals have been reassuring the public by relating stories where the State has been compelled to pay twice over in the event of the same number being presented twice. At present the only means of identification appears to be the manner in which they fit to the counterfoil which the Government retains, a particular pattern printed on the paper, different in each ticket, being cut in two when the ticket is purchased.—There have been two first representations this week, MM. V. Sardou and De Narjac's Noces de Fernande, at the Opera Comique, of which the plot is similar to that of the Petit Duc, the music, by M. Deffès, of course being of a different nature, and a new opera-bouffe by M. Lecocq at the Renaissance, entitled La Camargo, which, neither from a musical nor a literary point of view, is equal to ordinary French opera, as may be judged from the following verse of one of the principal songs:—

> La Camargo
> Est à la mode,
> La Camargo
> J'en accommode
> C'est une rage, un vertigo,
> On fait tout à la Camargo.

No wonder M. Bardoux has written to the Paris theatrical managers complaining that "For some time past the public mind has been disquieted by the sensible decadence observable in certain manifestations of dramatic and lyrical arts."

ITALY.——The attempt on the life of King Humbert continues to absorb public attention, and all Italy has been heartily rejoicing over the King's escape, thousands of addresses being forwarded to the Quirinal, and popular demonstrations being held in all the principal towns. Signor Cairoli's wound appears to have been more serious than had at first been thought, and he is still confined to his bed. The King visited him several times before leaving for Rome, and has rewarded him with the gold Military Medal. On Sunday the King and Queen returned to Rome, where they were received with tremendous enthusiasm, the streets throughout the route to the Quirinal being densely thronged, the cortège being literally pelted with bouquets, and the most tremendous shouts of "Evviva il Rè" ringing from every house. One result of the attempt has been a decision by the Government to suppress secret revolutionary societies, and as the Internationale is credited with having organised the attempt, together with the explosions of the bombs at Florence and Pisa, numerous Internationalists have been arrested and raids made upon their dwellings, where important papers are said to have been discovered.

CANADA.——The Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise arrived at Halifax on Saturday after an exceedingly stormy passage, during which the Princess suffered very severely from sea-sickness, never putting in an appearance on deck until the day of the arrival. Some heavy seas seem to have been shipped during the voyage, one of which stove in the smoking saloon on deck. On the arrival of the Sarmatian the Duke of Edinburgh at once went on board to welcome the new Governor-General and the Princess, and on Sunday the Marquis and the Princess landed incognito, and subsequently lunched with the Duke on board the Black Prince. On Monday the Sarmatian, having steamed outside the harbour, made her formal entry amid the customary salutes from the vessels of war and the forts, and a great display of bunting, and the Marquis and Princess landed, escorted by the Duke of Edinburgh, General Sir Patrick Macdougall, the Administrator, and Admiral Inglefield, and being received by Sir John Macdonald, the Premier. A procession was then formed, which was enthusiastically cheered by the crowd thronging the gaily-decorated streets, and the Provincial Building having been reached, the Marquis was duly sworn in as Governor-General by Judge Ritchie of the Supreme Court of Canada. The various officials then paid their respects, and an address from the city of Halifax was presented by the Mayor. In the evening the fleet was illuminated, and a general fête took place. On Wednesday the Governor-General and the Princess left for Montreal, receiving various addresses at the chief towns by the way. We shall publish a more detailed account of the proceedings when we receive the sketches from Mr. Sydney Hall, our special artist.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The news from INDIA and the AFGHAN WAR is treated of in another column.—In GERMANY the Emperor has written a letter to the Prussian Chamber, thanking the Deputies for their sympathy, and announcing his speedy return to public life.—The UNITED STATES has paid the award of 5,500,000 dols. to the British Government.—In AUSTRIA there is a serious political crisis, the Delegation having refused to vote the extra supply which the Ministry demand for the occupation of Bosnia until the Treaty of Berlin is officially communicated to the Reichsrath.—From SOUTH AFRICA the news still continues bad. Secocoeni holds out, and Cetewayo may commence hostilities at any moment.—From AUSTRALIA we hear that there is a sailors' strike, owing to the employment of Chinese on board ship.

THE COURT

THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice returned to Windsor at the end of last week. Immediately on Her Majesty's arrival Lord Beaconsfield came down from town, had an audience of the Queen, and dined and slept at the Castle, while Princess Christian visited Her Majesty, and the Queen and Princess Beatrice called on Lady Biddulph. On Saturday afternoon Her Majesty and the Princess went to Clewer Churchyard, where the late Sir Thomas Biddulph is buried, and placed three wreaths of moss and yellow and white immortelles on the grave. Later in the day the Duke of Connaught arrived at the Castle, and Viscount Bridport and Captain Fitzgerald dined with the Queen. Next day, Her Majesty, Princess Beatrice, and the Duke of Connaught attended Divine Service in the Chapel Royal, when Canon Duckworth officiated, and in the evening the Dean of Windsor and Mrs. Wellesley, Canon Duckworth, and Sir J. and Lady Cowell joined the Royal party at dinner, the Duke of Connaught leaving afterwards for town. On Monday, Mr. Frederick Leighton, R.A., and Mr. F. A. Eaton, Secretary of the Royal Academy, had audience of the Queen, when Mr. Eaton delivered up the Gold Medal and Chain of the office of President of the Royal Academy, which Her Majesty presented to Mr. Leighton, and subsequently knighted the new President. Prince and Princess Christian dined with the Queen in the evening. On Tuesday the Queen and Princess came up to town and visited the Duchess of Cambridge. On Wednesday Her Majesty held a Council. The Queen and Princess Beatrice will remain at Windsor Castle for about a fortnight or three weeks, and will then go to Osborne for Christmas.—Her Majesty will not open Parliament in person.—The Court is now in mourning for the little Princess Marie of Hesse, and the mourning will be laid aside on Monday next.

The Prince and Princess of Wales remain at Sandringham, where they are entertaining a party of visitors. The Prince and the Princess and their three daughters attended Divine Service on Sunday morning at St. Mary Magdalene's, when the Rev. H. Smith preached, and next day the Duke and Duchess of Teck arrived at Sandringham. Tuesday was the ninth birthday of Princess Maud, youngest daughter of the Prince and Princess of Wales.

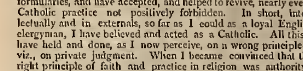
The Duke of Edinburgh returns to England in the Black Prince at the conclusion of the festivities in honour of the arrival at Halifax of the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne. He was to start for home on Wednesday. The Duchess and her children are also to return from Coburg in January.—The Duke of Connaught has gone to Germany on a visit to his fiancée, Princess Louise Margaret. He left London on Monday night, crossed to Calais in the Maid of Kent, and reached Berlin late on Tuesday evening.

The Grand Duke of Hesse and his family are recovering satisfactorily from their attack of diphtheria. The Hereditary Grand Duke has been seriously ill, but is now out of danger. It is officially stated from Darmstadt that the late Princess Marie was completely isolated from the rest of the family immediately on the appearance of the disease on Nov. 6th, and that from the time of the appearance of the symptoms in the subsequent cases it is evident that the disease had already infected those who afterwards fell ill before the little Princess herself required medical advice.

CHURCH NEWS

PREACHERS AND THE AFGHAN WAR.——At a meeting held in Manchester last week, the Mayor read a letter from the Bishop, in which he asked "can any Englishman in his conscience think that the 'rectification of an unscientific frontier,' or the desire to avenge an insult, if insult was offered, of which we have no evidence, to our Envoy, is a sufficient reason in the sight of God and of mankind for plunging into the unspeakable horror and incalculable consequences of war? I, at least, as a minister of Him who came to preach goodwill among men, cannot think so, and I desire thus to liberate my conscience in the matter."—On Sunday last the Rev. Paxton Hood, preaching at Manchester, condemned the war policy of the Government in the strongest terms, and said that the nation should with one voice demand of the Queen the removal of Lord Beaconsfield from office.—According to a letter from "One of the Congregation," published in the Sheffield Telegraph on Monday, the officiating minister at Zion Chapel, Attercliffe, on Sunday, "took occasion to pray that our armies in Afghanistan might not be successful."—The Rev. Baldwin Brown, on Sunday, preaching at Brixton Congregational Church on "Scientific Frontiers," said that the war was unpopular because it was radically unjust. When the report that our Envoy had been grossly insulted, which had struck all Englishmen with frenzy, and made all parties shout their war cry, had turned out to be absolutely and shamefully false, the Government fell back upon "Russian designs" and the necessity of punishing the Ameer into friendship, pleas which had been overwhelmingly answered by Lord Lawrence, supported as he was by the emphatic opinions of Sir Herbert Edwardes, Lord Northbrook, and many other eminent Indian authorities. Then Lord Beaconsfield introduced a new pretext—the necessity for a "scientific frontier"—more unfortunate than any of the others, for it had been proved that our present frontier was the best. So loud was the public indignation respecting this plea, that Lord Cranbrook set up another in his despatch, and we had gone to war to beat the Ameer into friendship. It was the most shameful act that the nation had been guilty of for a long time. We might make peace and retain some strong positions, but behind that there was the curse on the man that removes his neighbour's landmark. If a frontier was extended by fraud or force, by tricks or lies, by the cunning tongue, or by the strong hand, then the God of nations was against it; and every step taken was a step towards sorrow, dismay, and loss. France found it so in the harassing of the German fatherland; Germany would find it so; Austria, at the Brenner Pass, would find it so; and Russia, in Poland—the most inglorious act of the whole in history, in seeking for a scientific frontier—would find it so. It was to be hoped when Parliament met that petitions would be sent in large numbers, and that we might find pacification before the land was dipped too deeply in blood, shame, and sorrow.

VARIOUS.——To-day (Saturday) is the day of Intercession for Foreign Missions. The report of the total income of the sixty-seven societies for foreign mission shows an increase of 52,000*l.* on that of the preceding year. Of this increase the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel received 9,818*l.*, the London Missionary Society 11,588*l.*, and the Church Missionary Society 32,931*l.* more in 1877 than in 1876.—A number of laymen in the diocese of Oxford are signing an address to the Bishop respecting Cuddesdon Theological College, of which his lordship is visitor. The memorialists state that they cannot regard as satisfactory the teaching staff of the college, which consists of members of the English Church Union, which has avowedly been identified with the extreme party of the Church commonly known as Ritualists, from whom the Church of Rome has of late made her proselytes. They, therefore, feel no surprise that many of the Cuddesdon students have become Romanists, and they feel sure that his lordship, recognising the importance of the matter to the laity, will find some means of remedying the serious evil.—Money being wanted for the building of the proposed Cathedral at Truro, a correspondent of a contemporary has suggested that every Church man and woman in England should contribute one shilling to a fund for the erection of the "first English cathedral since the Reformation." He estimates that the number of Church people is between 12,000,000 and 13,000,000, and that as at least 3,000,000 of these are adults, the sum raised would be 150,000*l.*, besides which, many parents would like to give a shilling for each of their children.—Talking of Truro, Canon Thynne, of that diocese, has been publicly depreciating the ability of the local Nonconformist preachers, and has thereby roused the spirit of a Wesleyan minister, who, in a letter to the Cornish Telegraph, says that he cannot stoop to argue on the subject with the Canon, but challenges him to a trial of skill, the Canon to select a text, from which each shall write a sermon, and the question of superiority to be decided by some competent theologian who is a stranger to both parties. The Wesleyan engages to pay 5*l.* to any Cornish charity if he loses, if the Canon will agree to pay 1*l.* should the verdict go the other way. Nothing is said as to the length of the sermon; but it is to be hoped that, if the challenge is accepted, it will be on the condition that the match shall in no way resemble the "endurance contests" which are now so fashionable in the sporting world.—The Court of Appeal have decided the Agar-Ellis case in favour of the father, who is therefore to have the control of his children's education. Lord Justice James, in delivering judgment, however, said that he ought to discard all thought of personal dignity, supremacy, or triumph, and to adopt such a course as he conscientiously believed to be for the temporal and spiritual welfare of his children.—The Times publishes a long letter from Mr. Orby Shipley, who has just joined the Church of Rome. In it he says that his "Catholic instinct" has led him to leave the Church of England, and that "the result has arisen mainly from a silent, gradual, and steady inner growth of many years in religion. I have long held, I have long taught, nearly every Catholic doctrine not actually denied by the Anglican formularies, and have accepted, and helped to revive, nearly every Catholic practice not positively forbidden. In short, intellectually and in externals, so far as I could as a loyal English clergyman, I have believed and acted as a Catholic. All this I have held and done, as I now perceive, on a wrong principle—viz., on private judgment. When I became convinced that the right principle of faith and practice in religion was authority; when I saw clearly that it is of less moment what one believes and does than why one accepts and practices, then I had no choice as to my course."—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, preaching last Sunday at St. James's, Bristol, on the subject of Eternal Punishment, said that it could not be denied that there were numerous passages, several parables, and very many individual texts of Scripture which, fairly and consistently interpreted, declared that the doom of the impenitent was eternal, and he knew of no hope put forward in Holy Writ for those who, having had the message of salvation offered to them, turned deliberately from it. The Bible made it perfectly plain that there were two realms—the one in the power of the spirit of darkness and of evil, and the other the blessed and lightsome kingdom of God. There was no indication of any intermediate realm in the remote and distant future. If they were on the right hand with the sheep, well; if not, they must be on the other with the goats.



Her Majesty's Theatre.——There has been nothing new at this establishment since our last. The favourable impression created by Mdlle. Ambre's début in La Traviata was confirmed, and even enhanced, by her second performance of Violetta Valery. On Thursday she undertook the character of Marguerite in Gounod's Faust. Here the young Algerian had to contend with as many formidable reminiscences as in the Traviata. About her performance, however, we must speak in our next. Last night the ever-popular Carmen was to be given, and for this evening we are promised the Huguenots, with Madame Pappenheim as Valentine, a character in which she earned merited approval during the summer ("regular"?) season. Meanwhile we hear nothing about La Forza del Destino, which, if managerial promises are worth anything, should have been out before now. If its postponement be on account of a difference of opinion as to whether one of two prima donnas should play the part of the heroine, we can only say that Verdi's most tragic of tragic operas had better, for the moment, be laid aside. The question between Madame Pappenheim and Madame Hélène Crosmond with reference to such a character is too preposterous for discussion.

Beethoven's Niece.——The King of Bavaria has given instructions that Caroline von Beethoven, the illustrious composer's niece, shall receive a gratuity for every performance of Fidelio that may take place in Munich. His Majesty (Wagner permitting) might have thrown in the Masses, Symphonies, Quartets, Sonatas, &c., so as to make the gratuity worth acceptance. How often is Fidelio given during a twelvemonth at Munich? Sometimes not more than twice or thrice in a year! Poor niece of Beethoven!

Madame Néruda.——We are requested to state, by "a personal friend," that Madame Norman Néruda, though she married a Swedish gentleman, is not a Swede. She was born at Brünn, in Moravia. Brünn, then, where Heinrich Ernst first saw the light, may be felicitated on having given birth to two of the greatest violinists of the time. We have always called Madame Néruda (in an artistic sense, be it understood) "the wife of Joachim." Henceforth (equal distinction) we must call her "the wife of Ernst."

The Late Mr. Wadmore.——A subscription is being raised for the widow and child of Mr. Wadmore, of the Royal Academy of Music, whose sudden death, very recently, has enlisted such general sympathy. Mr. Wadmore, who sang so well at the Worcester Festival two months since, was universally esteemed by his fellow artists, both for his talent and for his amiable social qualities. He was, moreover, our most rising baritone singer, and, though young, had a fairer chance than any other we can name of ultimately taking the place of the incomparable Mr. Santley. This appeal to the sympathy of the music-loving public is in every sense legitimate; otherwise we should not have called attention to it.

Popular Concerts.——The appearance of Madame Montigny-Rémaury at Mr. Chappell's concerts was, as might have been anticipated, a complete success. On Saturday afternoon she joined Signor Piatti in Beethoven's well-known third sonata (A major) for pianoforte and violoncello, the execution of which, on both sides, was simply perfect. She also took the pianoforte part in Schumann's popular quintet (Op. 44) with no less effect. On Monday night the accomplished French pianist played Beethoven's solo sonata in C sharp minor, the so-called (by every one except Beethoven) "Moonlight Sonata," besides taking part in the somewhat dry and laboured trio by M. Saint-Saëns (in F), introduced last summer by Mr. Charles Hallé at one of his interesting Recitals. The appearance of Madame Montigny among us has shown that a new and engaging individuality in pianoforte-playing is still possible.

London Ballad Concerts.——An attractive programme was provided on Wednesday evening, but no novelty was produced except a song by Cowen, "Make Believe," nicely rendered by Madame Sherrington, and fairly well received. Mr. Maybrick reappeared after his indisposition, and Mr. Sims Reeves was heard with great enthusiasm in "The White Squall." The second part of the programme consisted entirely of old favourites.

Saturday Evening Concerts.——Ballad concerts are all the rage now, and these entertainments (under the conduct of Mr. Ganz) are precisely of the same character as those so long associated with the name of Mr. Boosey, only with a somewhat different body of performers. We need merely mention the names of Madame Patey, Mrs. Osgood, Miss Marian Williams, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Signor Brocolini to indicate the admirable character of these entertainments.

Waifs.——The success of Adelina Patti at Brussels has been almost unprecedented. On the occasion of her first appearance as Rosina in the Barbiere di Siviglia, the receipts were over 21,000 francs.—Certain artistic unions suspected of Socialistic tendencies in Frankfort-on-the-Maine have been suppressed. Among these are the Cabinet-makers' Vocal Union, the Workmen's Sängerbund, the Alpine-Rose Vocal Union, the Friendly Confederation Vocal Union, the Sociability Vocal Union, and two or three others.—Anton Rubinstein's opera, Feramors (from which in England we have only heard some indifferent ballet music), has been produced, with tolerable success, at Königsberg.—Negotiations are still pending with Madame Adelina Patti to sing in Vienna at the Theater an der Wien, the management of the Imperial Opera House not being disposed to agree to her terms. Madame Pauline Lucca, however, is about to appear at the last-mentioned theatre, and begins by giving a performance for the benefit of the Pension Fund, after which she is to appear as Selika, in Meyerbeer's Africaine.—The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Jean Nepomuk Hummel, the famous pianist, was celebrated recently at Pressburg, his native town.

THE DUDLEY GALLERY

CABINET PICTURES IN OIL

The Dudley is the first of the Societies' Winter Exhibitions to open its doors. It will be followed in due course by the Water Colour Society and Institute, the Society of British Artists, the Grosvenor Gallery Exhibition of Drawings, and last not least by the Old Masters at the Royal Academy, which this year is to include drawings as well as pictures.

The Dudley takes the place of the old British Institution. It has not yet fallen into the abject pot-boiling ways which lowered the latter days of the venerable establishment in Pall Mall, begun in such high-reaching intentions for the advancement of British art, and ending in such an abject pandering to its lowest exigencies. The Dudley Winter Exhibition does not reach high. The bulk of the four hundred and fifty pictures exhibited (out of more than a thousand set aside) keep within the margin of the safely saleable, but they do it with a certain grace. They are for the most part not bad pictures but simple studies, very faithful as a rule to the familiar nature they aim at reproducing, of good influence as far as they go, inasmuch as an honest rendering of the truth of nature must be so, and by their frank avowal of modest pretensions disarming attack because their aim is not higher. Better honest painting of common things and familiar scenes, such as we see here, than high aspiration after unattainable aims, ending in morbid affectation, or solemn, stupid pretentiousness. The least satisfactory piece of work here, perhaps because its aim is highest, while the attainment seems to fall short of what may fairly be expected from even the slightest sketch or study, is Mr. Watts's illustration of the old saw that when poverty knocks at the door love flies out of the window. Remembering the painter's noble "Love and Death," originally exhibited here as a small study little larger than this, one may be pardoned for the disappointment with which one turns away from his "Love and Poverty." Perhaps the picture may reconcile us to the imperfections of the design.

Almost all that is best here is homely work in figures or outdoor nature.

There is a great deal of pleasing home-county landscape, chiefly in Surrey, some in Berks, by Frank Walton, Earnest Waterlow, R. W. Radcliffe (a new name), John White, Stuart Lloyd, J. Hetherington (a very sweet twilight, "Road to the Village"), and others.

A full-length cabinet portrait by H. S. Marks (happily christened "Peace with Honour"), of a grey-haired clergyman reading in his library, is painted with Dutch accuracy and feeling for colour and texture in the contents of the bookshelves, and with excellent appreciation of the grave, quiet old gentleman, the centre and crown of the picture. He has a landscape also—a quiet river on an August afternoon, flowing smoothly though a level country, with the swallows dipping and darting over its still surface, which is as admirable in its unpretending way as the portrait.

A sunny Highland sea loch, by Hamilton Macullum, with hay-boats and lassies landing their fragrant cargo, is admirable for its effect of light, air, and freshness. An equally noteworthy sea-picture of the same quality of sunny serenity and sweep of light and air, also Scotch, is Colin Hunter's "In Search of Sea Drift," full of accurate observation, however slight in seeming. Pictures cannot be truer and better in their way than two boat subjects of "Shrimping" and "Catching Smelts," by C. Napier Hemy, who paints the sea, its craft, and crafts, like a sailor. After J. Naish there is nobody can build, rig, and sail a boat better on canvass than C. N. Hemy. It seems to me that his pictures of these subjects, of which these are two first-rate examples, are worth immeasurably more than all the second-hand archaism he learnt from the teaching of Baron Leys.

Another sea-picture of very different charm is Henry Moore's "Yarmouth Jetty by Moonlight." Another is H. Woods' "English Colliers in the Lagune," the last place in which one would look for English colliers, but where their black hulls tell powerfully against the blue-green water, the pure sky, and the opaline domes of the Salute in the distance. W. H. Borrow is another young contributor of good sea-pieces, and F. A. Hopkins, in "Making Snug for the Night" (288), has a magical effect of moonlight on the Thames, which remains on my memory as the most charming thing in the Gallery, along with Kate Perugini's child's head "Sally," a pure and lovely subject, beautifully painted, in a clear, firm, simple style, which one has a difficulty in believing the work of an amateur. Mark Fisher's cattle pictures, Heywood Hardy's "Forced Company," a dashing young squire, on his gallant grey, ranging up alongside a broad-backed farm horse, which carries a pretty girl on a pillion behind her rustic swain; Leon L'Hermitte's two street views in Morlaix and St. Malo, though inferior in charm to his charcoal drawings of similar subjects; J. Knight's "In Conway Vale;" James Tissot's "Reverie;" W. Small's "Bleaching;" P. R. Morris's rustic idylls "Changing Pasture;" and "Storm in Harvest;" J. S. Hill's "Wind on a Tidal River," and "Rye," Sussex, both noticeable for subtle aerial quality; G. Clausen's two pretty little Dutch girls "By the Zuyder Zee"; C. Calcroft's "At Home," a graceful young lady in white, enjoying her book over the fire; Arthur Ditchfield's two well-composed Views of Hatfield House; Walter Field's very honest Portrait of Mrs. Lewis, and his study of Poppies and Meadow Sweet—on the chalk; George Leslie's faithful and unpretending study of the Angel Hotel at Henley; Joseph Clarke's "Chimney Corner" and "In the Bath," always making allowance for his woolly texture and tame uniformity of execution; J. E. Hodgson's little Moorish subjects; F. Dillon's "Corner in a Japanese Curio Shop;" F. E. Cox's "Last Look;" P. M. Feeney's "Her Last Haven," a stranded ship on a sand, under a pall of grey sky, and W. S. Stacey's "The Old House," an excellent study of a homely old dame, and his more picturesque "Weary Waiting," may be mentioned as some of the pictures which claim notice, out of a great many of little inferior merit. J. D. Watson's large group of a happy pair engaging hands (in their respective ball tablets) before engaging hearts, deserves some special notice for the courage with which it grapples with contemporary evening costume, a terrible ordeal for the gentleman, whatever it may be for the lady, in this case a brilliant blonde ardente, in white satin and swansdown. M. Weguelin's "Swing," a young, lightly-draped Greek girl, in a bath-room, and his "Priestess of Venus Feeding the Sacred Swallows," in a still more diaphanous drapery, are the solitary examples in the collection of any attempt at form, and are really graceful enough to deserve more notice than they are likely to claim for themselves in the uncongenial atmosphere of a gallery devoted to the humbler aspects of contemporary realism.

Art Criticism.——Mr. Whistler, who claimed 1,000*l.* damages from Mr. Ruskin, has been awarded one farthing—not a large price to pay for the luxury of calling a man a coxcomb, hinting that his ill-educated conceit was very much like wilful imposture, and blaming him for asking 200 guineas for throwing a pot of paint in the public's face. The trial, which lasted two days, was highly amusing, especially when some of Mr. Whistler's works were brought into Court for inspection, and the plaintiff was examined as to the meaning of his favourite terms, "nocturnes," "arrangements," "symphonies," and so forth. Each party will have to pay his own costs, and both will probably be more dissatisfied with each other than ever.

Miscellaneous.——The hearing of Mr. Wybrow Robertson's action against Mr. Labouchere, for speaking of him in Truth as "a manager who had been dismissed for dishonesty," was commenced in the Queen's Bench Division on Wednesday.—The evidence against Lady Gooch was completed on Friday last, and Sir Francis, who had supplied the funds for his wife's defence, asked permission to withdraw from the prosecution, the charge being fully admitted by the lady's counsel, who, however, urged that her motive was to regain her husband's affection, and not to divert the property from his rightful heirs. Mr. Newton said that the question was, whether the imposture ought not to be punished. He adjourned the case until Thursday, when both Lady Gooch and Mrs. Walker were committed for trial.—A breach of promise case, tried in the Common Pleas Division, has resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 75*l.* The defendant's counsel, however, contended that his client was entitled to a verdict, he having only given a "ratification" of a promise made during his minority, which was not legally binding. Execution was stayed for a week, in order that the point raised might be settled by the Court.—Miss Taylor, the daughter of one of the directors of the Glasgow City Bank, last week applied to the Lord Advocate to be allowed to take her father's place in prison until the trial. The request was of course refused. The Relief Fund continues to prosper, and an auxiliary committee has been formed in London. It is now stated that every one of the 1,300 shareholders, many of whom are ladies, will be completely ruined, and that, according to the price at which they bought their shares, they had been receiving not 12, but barely 5 per cent. on their investments.—The police are looking for the manager of the Ventnor branch of the Capital and Counties Bank, who has absconded. He is accused of conspiring, with a certain Captain Hunt and one David Attrill, both of whom are in custody, to defraud the bank of over 2,000*l.*—The man Sewell, whose case we referred to last week, has been sent to prison for three months for the assault committed on Mrs. Platt, at the end of which time he will have to find bail for his good behaviour. It seems that her counsel, Mr. Stewart White, had received the brief from Mr. Horry with the intimation that it was a case for compensation, and that Mr. Horry had given that instruction under the impression that he was acting for the best. Mr. Serjeant Cox explained that he had adopted the usual course, and had accepted the assurances of the counsel that it was a proper case for compensation.—Mr. Bailiff, one of the persons who complained of the conduct of the police in the neighbourhood of the Haymarket on the night of the 9th inst., appeared at Marlborough Street Police Court last week to prosecute a sergeant of the C Division, whom he accused of having kicked him. Several witnesses spoke to the fact of the police having behaved in a very rough manner, but Mr. De Rutzen, without hearing the witnesses for the defence, dismissed the summons, remarking that it would be utterly impossible for the police to do their duty if constables in a crowd were to be made liable for every injury caused, as that which was complained of had been, and that he could see nothing in the case which should lead the Police Commissioners to visit the defendant with any punishment.—At Exeter, last week, a woman committed suicide by hanging herself because, as she believed, she had been "overlooked" or bewitched by her husband.—At Southend, the other day, a jury, assembled to inquire into the death of a fisherman who had fallen down the hold of his vessel, declined to give a verdict, as they doubted whether the man was really dead. The foreman said he had seen the brother of the alleged deceased remain in a state of death-like torpor for hours together, and it was not until the inquest had been adjourned for an hour and a post-mortem examination had been held, that a verdict was returned. The surgeon found that death had probably been caused by congestion and inflammation of the brain, and this being so it is perhaps needless to inquire what would have been the result had the poor fellow been in a trance, and only temporarily revived by the pangs of evisceration.—Owen Jones, a farmer's son, who appears to be a lunatic, has been committed for trial for attempting to murder a young lady named Pritchard at Anglesey. He had escaped from a lunatic asylum, bought a double-barrelled gun, a revolver pistol, and ammunition, and gone straight to the house where the lady resided, firing at any one who appeared at door or window, until a gamekeeper disabled him by shooting at him with small shot.—A man, named Wyness, has been committed for trial for shooting at a Mr. Jefferies, whom he would probably have killed had not the bullet been turned aside by a button on his trowsers. Wyness appears to have cherished an insane passion for Mrs. Jefferies, whose first husband he shot in February last year, the wound proving fatal, although Wyness, when tried for murder, was acquitted

CHAPTER I.

THE TWO MASTERS

In Mother England, teeming with progeny as she is, and knowing, alas, often times no more what to do with them than the old woman who lived in her shoe, the population is nevertheless partial. She has probably more sheltered nooks, far from the madding crowd, and known only to neighbours, than any other civilised country; lone spots, visited indeed by man, but occupied only by one or two families in half a score of generations; "haunts of ancient Peace," where the echoes only of wars and tumults have penetrated, and those yielding no obedience to the laws of sound, but reaching the stolid ear—for all recluses are stolid—after a huge interval. Some of these spots are really distant (as we count miles in England) from towns and even villages: others again are not so far removed from human communities by space as by circumstance—they are merely out of the way; the road to them leads nowhere else, and therefore no one comes by it save those who have business in the place—a quite inconsiderable number. Now and then, in these secluded glens or plateaux (for they are of both kinds) the vagrant or mistaken traveller comes upon some stately dwelling quiet as a star, which seems, like a star, to have fallen there. He asks himself, for there is perhaps no one else to ask, How came this noble edifice in so retired a spot? It reminds him of some Charles V., in stone, that has embraced the cloister.

Such a spot, and containing such an ancestral mansion, is the hamlet of Halcombe in the north of Devon. You may roam over the purple moors to north and east and south of it for days and never dream of its existence, though it is always, so to speak, at hand; or you may travel along the high road—and it is very high—on a coach top, seeing, as you fancy, everything upon all sides, both on sea and land, and never catch a glimpse of the tall tower of Halcombe Hall, in so deep a glen are its foundations set. At one point, indeed, where a narrow road branches westward, you might ask, if you are by nature curious, "Whither does that lead?" and the coachman would reply, "Only to Halcombe," as though Halcombe were the grave—whither no one goes, with a few exceptions, however—unless compelled to do so.

Even from the west, which is the sea side of it, you can only see the spire of Halcombe Church, which is set on a little hill between the village and the ocean, a landmark to which mariners take care to give a wide berth, for the coast is cruel. True, there is a little harbour, where coal is brought by coasting vessels on calm days; but when the least sea is "on," the place is unapproachable; the little blue bay is lashed by the lightest breeze into frenzied foam, beneath which are jagged rocks and far stretching ridges of granite on which many a good ship has laid her bones. No passenger ever comes to land alive at Halcombe Point, as the place is fitly termed, for it would be irony indeed to call it Harbour, and there is little salvage for the honest villagers, for what the Atlantic hurls and grinds against that rock-bound coast in clouds of spume it mostly whirls away again; then, after some three days' fury, it will lap and smile about the rocks and ledges for a treacherous hour like some marine Macbeth with its "Thou canst not say I did it."

Nothing, however, but the church on the hill in Halcombe feels the fury of the gale. The village lies deep in a sheltered dell, where lofty elms and oaks grow to their full height, and never lose a limb or die from the buffets of the storm-fiend. In the centre of the hamlet, approached by a long grassy avenue, sentinelled by giant trees, stands the Hall, a composite mass of buildings, but so irregular in outline from the first that no addition has robbed it of its picturesque appearance. Its main features are Gothic, and doubtless architectural pedants would apply that term, in a deprecatory sense, to the whole mass; but the Poet and the Painter would admit its claim to beauty of a high order. Every room differs from its fellow not only in magnitude but form; here juts out an oriel window, and there a bay; here the long line of building fronts the level lawn without a break, and here again a modern conservatory, wherein the well-warmed air grows faint with alien fragrance, dazzles the eye with its white radiance.

To one who comes on Halcombe on a sudden from the lone moorland it seems as though the trees had been driven into it like sheep, from the country round, and all the flowers. It lies an oasis in the desert, fresh with foliage, and cool with verdure, and bright with blossom. There is nothing new or staring in the little village; even the billiard-room at the Hall, built out by its preceding tenant, has already put on a decent garb of ivy which hides its modernness; and for the most part all the houses are very old. There are no new comers, and consequently no accommodation for them is needed. When a family grows too large for its residence its surplus numbers go forth into the world without and make dwellings for themselves elsewhere.

A few hundred yards from the mansion there is the Manor Farm, almost coeval with it, and besides these two there is no house of any pretensions—the rest are cottages, all the property of the tenant of the Hall, Sir Robert Arden.

This gentleman has no ancestral connection with the place, having purchased the estate of its late tenant about four years before our story opens. It was whispered that the purchase money was no less than 90,000*l.*; if so, it must have been a fancy price, for the Halcombe land, where it is not absolutely barren, is poor, and there are no local industries—unless a saw mill near the Point can be so termed, and some occasional wrecking. Sir Robert, however, is a man who does not count the cost in matters where his sympathies are concerned, and Halcombe seemed in his eyes, when he became a widower, the very place wherein to bury himself and his great sorrow. He lost his young wife, with his only child, in her confinement, and sought this place of retirement as a stricken deer some solitary spot wherein to sob out its last hours. He did not, however, pass them altogether in this way, for within eighteen months of his bereavement he married again.

His second choice was a widow with four children, all of whom he took to his generous heart as though they were his own. The question, Why did he do so? often put by his neighbours, was like all other inquiries of a similar nature, either very easily answered, or quite inexplicable. Mrs. Nicoll, though not of course in her first youth, was still young, and very beautiful after her own fashion—plump of figure, gentle of speech, and with a complexion of cream. Perhaps he chose her out of delicate compliment to his first wife, who was her antipodes in every way. No. II. could never remind him of No. I., whose pure image remained in his heart as uninjured by Comparison as by Time. Such was the opinion of one who knew Sir Robert at least as well as he knew himself, though I am aware that it is open to ridicule. The second Lady Arden also entertained the same view. Before she married Sir Robert she may have entertained a secret hope that in time she would occupy the first place in his affection, though he had given her fair warning that that could never be; but she soon came to acknowledge that she had no power to oust from his bosom her dead rival. After all it was not a woman, but only the memory of one, which thus came between her and husband's love; and the subordination was not intolerable. Moreover, it must be considered, that though his dead Madeline thus remained his idol, enshrined in the very temple of his soul, his living Mary was in no way neglected; she had all that money could buy, and almost all that heart could wish. She saw her children possessed of a second father and herself the object of his tenderest care and regard. He made her as absolute mistress of Halcombe Hall as though he were dead, and had left it to her for use during her life. Notwithstanding that her four children found a permanent home in it, she had carte blanche to invite whom she pleased thither; she would ask permission just for form's sake, but his answer was invariable. "Well, my dear, there is surely room enough."

Everybody thought Lady Arden "a very lucky woman," and in saying so perhaps implied that she did not quite deserve it. Not that there was anything to find fault with in her ladyship, who, though she had some fashionable tastes, was both dutiful and simple; nay, though somewhat hypochondriacal, she was really genuine, so far as she went—but then she went but a very little way. What her neighbours meant to imply was that, though a deserving woman as women go, the widow herself had in her second marriage been rewarded above her deserts.

At the same time, even in her sunny lot there was a crumpled roseleaf. Being by nature more than tolerably just, it was only to be looked for that all friends of her husband would have been welcome under that roof. His nephew, and only blood relation, was, for example, as dear to her as one of her own family, indeed he was one day to become such, for his uncle had set his heart upon his marriage with Evelyn Nicoll, Lady Arden's eldest daughter, into which arrangement the young people had fallen without the least remonstrance; he had been prosecuting his studies on the Continent, after he took his degree at Cambridge, and was now expected home. But there was another person "on Sir Robert's side of the house," as the simple Halcombe folks termed it, who was not so agreeable to Lady Arden—notwithstanding that he did his best to make himself so. This was Ferdinand Walcot, the brother of Sir Robert's first wife, and who exercised a great and somewhat inexplicable influence over him. Perhaps, to begin with, Lady Arden resented the fact that this person, who was "neither kith nor kin" to Sir Robert, should in these latter days have been admitted to his confidence solely on the ground of the relationship to his dead wife. This intimacy of the two men dated, indeed, from after Sir Robert's second marriage, and perhaps her ladyship had a shrewd suspicion that had they come together earlier she would never have been Lady Arden at all.

There was nothing, however, in Mr. Walcot's conduct to suggest this; on the contrary, he was polite and deferential to her in a high degree; if he erred in behaviour, it was, if one may say so, in the other direction: on the very rare and trivial occasions when Sir Robert and his wife disagreed Mr. Walcot always took the side of the latter, and in so doing occasionally threw into his manner a touch of patronage. The feelings of some wives are very sensitive on a point of this kind; they do not wish to receive foreign aid in contending with their husbands, and especially to owe their victory to it. And it must be acknowledged that whatever Mr. Ferdinand Walcot took in hand was not only done, and effectually, but also suggested the idea that he could do twice or even ten times as much with equal ease: a state of things, which, when we ourselves have had some trouble with the same matters and have failed, it is not in human nature not to resent.

With the exception of this trifling and only occasional source of friction the relations of Mr. Walcot with the mistress of the Hall were amicable, if not cordial; while with the other inmates of the house he was on excellent terms. As these persons were of both sexes and of various characters, this must be surely put down to his credit. Nature, too, there was no doubt, had been friendly to Ferdinand Walcot. He was thirty-five years of age, but had still the figure and even the grace of youth. His dark hair, though it could not boast of a curl, was still fine and plentiful; his face was handsome, pale, and full of thought. At the first glance you would have said, "This is a student;" but there was too much mobility of feature, of the lively play of intelligence, for a lover of books. His eyes were large, soft, and gentle, but could on occasion suddenly become keen and penetrating. He claimed to have some mesmeric powers, of the commoner sort, and had certainly a very attractive manner and address; of this he was very conscious without being conceited about it. He used to say of himself quite simply, "People like to have me about them whether sick or well." This was certainly the case with his brother-in-law and host, Sir Robert, a gentleman of such highly nervous temperament that the good folks, his neighbours, while admitting his many virtues, scarcely knew at times "what to make of him," and who was never so much at ease as in Mr. Walcot's company.

And yet, as in most cases of intimate friendship, there was little similarity of character in these two men, except that they both wore the intellectual stamp. Walcot was a tall, strong, though somewhat lean figure, dark as a Spaniard, with a musical but decisive voice; Sir Robert a small grey man, frail of limb, somewhat weazened as to face, though comely, too, and like a gentleman in presence. He was the senior of his brother-in-law by at least ten years, and looked older yet: at times, when excited, his utterance was shrill and rapid, like a very old man's, but more generally it was hesitating, thoughtful, and with that sort of echo in it which may be noticed in the voices of those who concern themselves mainly with the past.

CHAPTER II.

A TÊTE-À-TÊTE

THE two men I have attempted to present to the mind's eye of the reader are sitting together in the great dining-room of the Hall on a certain September evening; the ladies, that is to say, Lady Arden and her eldest daughter, Evelyn (who, though she is eighteen, and has accordingly "come out," still retains her schoolroom name of Evy), have long retired from the dessert table; and their absence has been, as usual, the signal for producing the cigarette box which lies between the two gentlemen, and within easy reach of either's hand. The table, which is one adapted for a small party, has been laid in the great bay window, so that three fair scenes are presented to them at once; on one side the avenue, its two straight lines of oak appearing in the far distance to contradict Euclid's definition by meeting and enclosing a space; in the centre the bowling-green, of late years desecrated by croquet, but yet retaining—thanks to a grand back ground of "those green-robed senators, the trees"—most of its venerable air; and, on the third side, a portion of the garden proper, still ablaze with red geraniums with their blue borders of lobelias.

Sir Robert has his gaze dreamily fixed upon this spot, and Mr. Walcot's eyes, as is common with him, follow those of his companion. They are not engaged in conversation, nor have they spoken for some time, a circumstance which discomposes neither of them; they are much too intimate with one another not to be able to endure any amount of silence; but their reflections often run—to some distance at least—in the same groove. The beautiful description of the poet of two sympathetic minds, whose was only, however, in part applicable to them. Mr. Walcot often knew what his host and friend was thinking of, but the reverse of this was not the case. Nor was this to be wondered at, the elder living almost wholly in the past—a past with which the other was more or less acquainted, and the younger concerning himself mainly with the future.

> Thought leapt out to wed with thought
> Ere thought could wed itself with speech

It was curious, however, how very clearly Sir Robert's train of thought was sometimes followed by that of his companion—an instance of which occurred at this moment. Into the garden plot comes a young girl, with a pair of "La Crosse" sticks and a hoop in her hand; she stands sideways to the bay window, and proceeds, unconscious of spectators, to play the game with some one who stands nearer to the house, and is, therefore, not in sight. The effect is peculiar, since she appears to put herself into a hundred attitudes without any other object than to exhibit her grace and beauty. She is tall and fair, with little natural colour, save the rose tints which the exercise is now giving to her, but her complexion is exquisitely delicate; her long brown hair, tossed back from her face, with each quick movement of her shapely neck, flows well-nigh to her waist; and now and again her bright lips part and a merry laugh breaks out from them, evoked by some blunder of her unseen playmate.

> A vision fit to make an old man young.

Sir Robert gazes on it with serene content; Mr. Walcot with a deep-set pleasure that is seldom indeed permitted to reveal itself as at present, but his companion, always unobservant, is now utterly wrapped in his own thoughts. His eyes, however, being presently raised to the top of the tall cedar on the lawn, which sways and swerves as if under the influence of a tornado, though all lesser things in that sheltered spot are calm and well nigh motionless, he exclaims with anxiety, "There is a storm at sea."

"George does not start till Thursday," returns Mr. Walcot in his measured tones.

He understands at once the connection which has led his companion's thoughts from Miss Evy to his nephew, and the apprehension that has been aroused in his mind.

"He said he should pass through Paris, and might be a day or two late, or a day or two earlier," continued Sir Robert nervously.

"To-day is but Monday, however, Arden. Moreover, this storm would not affect ships upon that route—it is to the last degree unlikely he would come by Bristol."

"Why?" inquired the other quickly, yet without testiness; he was willing to be convinced.

"Because it is the cheap route."

Sir Robert laughed good-humouredly.

"Well, George is not very economical, that is true; but what does it matter?—when I am gone there will be enough for everybody, himself included. Did I ever tell you how the dog answered me at Heidelberg, when I rated him for his extravagance, and told him that at his age I should not have dreamt of running into such expenses. 'Ah,' he said, 'but you had no rich old uncle as I have.' One cannot help liking a frank lad like that—you allow he is frank, don't you?"

"I did not say anything to the contrary, did I?"

"No, but you did not speak, and with you Silence does not always mean Consent."

"It means, in this case, disinclination to differ, Arden," answered the other softly. "I like your nephew; you are as fortunate, it seems to me, in your one blood relation as any man can expect to be; but when you speak of him as though his chief virtue was frankness—there—well, I must be excused for remaining silent."

"Ferdinand, pray be more explicit," exclaimed Sir Robert. "How can you, with your eyes upon that pure girl destined for his bride, treat his hypocrisy—if he has been a hypocrite—so lightly? If he has deceived me, may he not deceive her——"

"He has certainly deceived you," put in the other, quietly; "but a young man need not be rendered an outcast for a mere venial crime. I should not even have thought of mentioning it had you not been so importunate for the proof of his guilt." Here Mr. Walcot's swift intelligence had a little forestalled matters; for there had been no importunity such as he had described as yet.

"Of course I require the proof," said Sir Robert, falling into the other's groove that had been thus cut for him. "I should not dream of condemning George unheard."

"It is not a question of condemnation, I hope, nor even of reprobation," answered Mr. Walcot. "But, since you speak of your nephew's frankness, I will tell you what I saw him do at Homburg, the very day before we left him. Do you remember finding him in the Saloon there, contrary to your express injunctions?"

"I remember forbidding him to play, but not, I think, to enter the gambling room. Otherwise I should have been annoyed to find him there as I did, standing by the trente et quarante table. I remember the circumstance, now you mention it, perfectly."

"You caused him to lose about forty pounds that morning."

"I? How could that be? He never played; and, besides, he came away with us."

"Yes: but he had been playing. He drew back from the table as you entered, and left his stake upon it; on the red. The red turned up four times, while you were speaking to him, yet he did not dare to take up his gains. At last, as was certain to be the case, he saw them swept away before his eyes. To see him listening, with apparent seriousness, to all your good advice against gaming, while his eyes were fixed upon the cards, and his thoughts occupied with the idea of how he was wasting his good luck, was as good as a comedy."

"It seems to me to have been a very bad piece of taste, to say the least of it, and nothing laughable about it," observed Sir Robert, gravely.

"You are too serious-minded, Arden; your own feelings of honour are too delicate; and, besides, you must remember George is but a boy."

"He is old enough to think of taking the responsibility of another's happiness upon his own shoulders," answered the other; "it is useless for you to make excuses for him, though I respect the motive which prompts you to do so. Still, even you may have been mistaken. I will tax the lad with it with my own lips, and see what he has to say for himself."

"No, Arden, you must not do that," answered Walcot, quietly. "The fact is, I have myself been guilty of a breach of confidence in the matter. I perceived George's error—for it was but that at most—and reproached him with it. He did not attempt to deny it, but he promised amendment for the future. Under these circumstances I am afraid it was tacitly understood between us that I should not mention the matter to your ears."

"Then I am very sorry you did," said Sir Robert, in tones of deep annoyance.

"And so am I, Arden. I have done amiss; my desire that your charity—I mean, of course, your kindness of heart—should not be imposed upon has carried me too far. Of course you can tax George with this peccadillo; he will confess to it without much remorse, if I am not mistaken in his character; but he will look upon me, and with reason, as having in a manner betrayed him—he will hold me henceforth as his enemy—"

"Nay, he shall not do that, Ferdinand," interrupted the other. "No one shall ever do that in my house. Let bygones be bygones. He shall never know that I know aught about it, although it gives me pain to think of George as otherwise than truthful. I had thought him as open-hearted as he certainly is open-handed."

"Without doubt he is that, Arden, though, having no money of his own, one can hardly put it down to his credit. He has other virtues, however, I make no question."

"You have saddened me, Ferdinand," said Sir Robert, after a pause.

Mr. Walcot raised his shoulders and smiled sadly. It was evident that he had said all he had to say, and was sorry it had been so much. There was a long silence. The baronet rose and went slowly to the window; the girl had left the garden, and the light of the moon was on the trees, the tops of which rocked and vibrated more than ever.

"There is a terrible storm at sea, I am sure, Walcot. Hush—is that thunder?"

"No, it is a minute gun." As he spoke the door opened, and in ran a fair-faced blue-eyed lad of about nine years old.

"Oh, Papa! oh, Mr. Walcot! There is a shipwreck off the Point!"

The boy's words were significant of much. He had called Sir Robert, who was but his step-father, Papa, as indeed he might well do in return for much loving treatment; and he had then addressed himself to Mr. Walcot, as being the master of the house de facto if not de jure, and the person to be appealed to in every emergency. The flushed face and glowing eyes of the speaker betrayed intense excitement.

"If there is shipwreck there is danger to some poor souls, Frank," said Sir Robert, reprovingly. "You should be sorry rather than pleased at such a catastrophe."

"Oh, but indeed, Papa, I am sorry, only——"

"Only we young people are a little thoughtless, eh," put in Mr. Walcot. "We are apt only to think of ourselves, even though what is fun to us (as in the case of the fable of the Frogs) may be death to others."

"Don't let us say 'Death,'" said Sir Robert, gently. "And if it be so how can the young picture it to themselves? We are not angry with you, my boy. If there was any one on board that unhappy ship in which you had any interest or connection you would feel sorry enough, I know—— You smile, Ferdinand. What is it?"

"Oh, nothing; I was only smiling at human nature. As it happens there is in all human probability on board this very ship some one connected with our young friend; but then it is not likely to be a pleasant connection. Lady Arden expects the new governess from Bristol to-morrow. She should arrive there from the Continent by sea to-night."

"Good heavens, I had forgotten that; but so, of course, had Frank; else his conduct would have been heartless indeed."

Again Mr. Walcot shrugged his shoulders, and smiled his pitying smile.

"You expect too much of poor Humanity," he said; "you have been taught to look for too much."

"That is true, indeed," said Sir Robert, with a deep sigh. "There was no one like my Madeline for thinking of others, nor ever will be." He sat down in his chair again, as though quite forgetful of his intention to go out, and covered his face in his hands. The thud of another storm-gun broke the silence, and once more roused him to a sense of the occasion. "Come," said he, "let us do what we can; it is well to remember the dead, but we must not forget the living."

CHAPTER III.

FROM THE QUAY

WHEN the two men entered the hall for their coats and wraps they found all the rest of the family about to start on the same exciting errand—that is, all the able-bodied ones, which did not include "Baba" Nicoll (aged three and a-half), nor Lady Arden herself, who never trusted herself to the tender mercies of the night air (in the country), and objected to all excitements (such as shipwrecks) which were not of a strictly fashionable kind. Notwitstanding her thick Ulster and hard cap, and the great fur scarf that was wound round her shapely neck, Evelyn looked distractingly lovely, as she would have equally done in the shovel hat of a Bishop or a coalheaver, for her beauty was such that attire did not so much become her as she it. Cousin George, as she called him (though, of course, they were not relations), used to admire her most in the rough costume that the wind and weather of Halcombe necessitated, and had dubbed her (almost everybody at the Hall had a nickname) "the Fair Smuggler."

Milly Nicoll, her real name of Millicent was absolutely forgotten—the only record of it being at the Register Office in Marylebone Church, where she had been christened—was two years junior to Evy, and therefore but one year beyond the age described by the poet as "bashful fifteen." But no one but a poet could have called her "bashful." She was about to become so, it is true—"Tomboys" always do so in due time—but for the present she was like an untamed colt, shaggy as to her hair, which was of a deeper brown than her sister's; wild, though tender, as to her hazel eyes; and as to her limbs a very tarantula. Yet, strange to say, in that perpetual motion of theirs, there was never a false concord—the least awkwardness.

She had equipped herself, on this occasion, in a pea-jacket of Cousin George's, and with her sailor hat, and ever twinkling legs, looked like that marine young person whose gallant conduct under fire was rewarded, as the bard informs us, by the First Lieutenantship of the gallant Thunderbomb. Curiously enough, that ballad was Milly's favourite poem (indeed the only one she cared about), and those stirring lines

> Which, when the Captain comed for to hear of it,
> Very much applauded what she'd done, were frequently on her lips.

Frank himself, with his delicate eager face, and large, soft, restless eyes, scarcely looked more like a sailor boy than his two sisters, which was the cause of much domestic "chaff." He had what others beside his mother termed a "heavenly temper," but the way to ruffle it was to "call him out of his name," to address him in place of Frank or Franky as Finella, or still worse, by its contraction "Nellie." He would bear it from the godfather who gave it him (Cousin George), but from no one else; though oddly enough the first syllable of it, euphonised to "Fifi," was an address to which the young fellow would answer with the greatest docility.

It is not to be seriously contended, of course, that these three young people were starting out upon a rescue expedition; but nevertheless each was provided with something or other—if it was but a flask of brandy—that might be of use to some half-drowned wretch if opportunity arose; and if their eagerness had something of delight in it all genuine students of human nature will forgive them. They were looking on no "sinking ship and praying hands," it must be remembered, but only going vaguely forth on an errand of high excitement, and of which, as it happened, they had had no previous experience. It was curious and very striking to mark the comparative calmness of the air while the little party crossed the lawn, and made their way up the terrace at the back of the Hall, and then to compare it with the fury of the blast that met them on the hill-top. It had blown in the door that led through the garden wall into the churchyard, and was streaming through the aperture like pent up waters through a suddenly discovered channel. "Fifi," who was first, went down before it, as though it had been a volley of musketry, and he the first stormer in the breach. The two girls only saved each other by an involuntary embrace and a flank movement (very hurried and confused) behind the sheltering wall. Then Sir Robert moved forward, throwing a word of raillery to the young ladies, upon their pusillanimous conduct. His fate would have been the worst of the four, for the wind whisked him off his legs, and would have laid him as prone as Frank, without that young gentleman's ability to pick himself up again, had not a strong arm linked itself with his at the critical moment.

THE FORT OF ALI MUSJID IN THE KHYBER PASS, CAPTURE

"Union is strength, and a twofold man is not easily withstood," said Walcot in his ear as he landed him on the right side of the wall, and with his back to it. It was characteristic of the man to imply that the other was giving him aid in return for his own, instead of being, as he really was, an additional burthen. Frank came after them with a rush, and was instantly flattened against the wall by his stepfather's side, like a small placard beside a large one.

Then Mr. Walcot went back for the ladies; Milly at once seized him by the coat tails and hung on, and with head depressed and body bent he charged the pass and brought her through triumphantly.

In view of its success Evelyn would, perhaps, have adopted the same simple plan, but Mr. Walcot did not give her the opportunity: doubtless, being a great stickler for the proprieties, he thought it indecorous; he took her left hand in his, and with his right arm round her waist, bore her steadily, if somewhat slowly, through the breach. This Thermopylæ of the winds being thus carried, progress, though very difficult, became possible; the church itself afforded the little party some oblique protection, as they made their way through its God's Acre. This spot to a stranger's eyes—who did not happen to have a tornado blowing into them—would have afforded a curious spectacle. There were but a few homely graves in it; but one corner of it was devoted to the reception of the bodies of poor shipwrecked souls who had been from time to time cast ashore on the rocks below. To these it could hardly have been expected that the parish should supply gravestones; but pious hands had done what they could. Large sea shells were laid on every swelling mound to mark the fate of him who lay beneath it; and in some cases the figure-heads of the lost vessels had been set up by way of monument. One of these, the bust of a young person without raiment, the Erin, of Bristol, stood out from the sacred soil in a manner which, by moonlight, had a very striking effect, and had once frightened a new curate almost out of his wits; his ideas (running in a Scriptural direction) having led him to imagine that she was anticipating the Resurrection Day.

It seemed wonderful, indeed, with that tempest howling and roaring over the long grasses of their graves, that the dead themselves could lie so quietly; for all the powers of the air were abroad that night and working their wild will on earth and sea and sky. The moon was at the full, but was only visible by fits, when the hurrying masses of grey clouds left her pale face clear at intervals of unequal duration. A great master of word-painting has described the wind as coming into "a rocking town and stabbing all things up and down;" but to no town-dweller can be conveyed an adequate conception of the force and fury of that element as it rages on such a coast as that which lies around Halcombe Point. The very land seemed to shudder as it swept across it; the sea grew livid under its ceaseless scourging. As far as the eye could reach, from the hill above the Point, was a world of wild white waters, the foam of which was dashed upwards in sheets fathoms high, and carried inland in sharp sleet.

On this white surface there was but one object, from which ever and anon there flashed a jet of flame, succeeded by a dull thud—a hoarse cry for help that it lay not in human power to give; it looked, and was, but a black, inert mass, a broken plaything, of which the storm had not yet tired; but it had been an hour ago a gallant steamship, prompt to obey its master, man. The wind was now the only power it acknowledged, and it was being driven before it at headlong speed towards the Point. The little party, huddled together for foothold, gazed on this spectacle with awestruck eyes.

"Poor souls, poor souls," cried Sir Robert. "Good God, can nothing be done?"

"Nothing," answered Walcot, gravely. "She will go to pieces when she touches the rocks."

"Thank Heaven, here is Mr. Dyneley, with some men," ejaculated Evy, looking back.

"Mr. Dyneley is a clergyman, Miss Evelyn," answered Walcot, with the least touch of scorn, "but he cannot work miracles."

"He has, however, brought the mortar apparatus," observed Milly naively.

And, indeed, as the tall, brown-bearded curate drew nigh, they could see that he was followed by half-a-dozen stalwart men, who dragged behind them the implement in question.

"A sad sight, Sir Robert," bawled the curate (for indeed every one spoke at the full stretch of their lungs); "but if the ladies can bear to look at it you had better bring them down to the mill."

This was the saw mill, of which we have already spoken, built upon the very edge of the harbour, and the only place for miles upon the coast in which on such a night shelter could be found.

"You are always right, Dyneley," said Sir Robert, approvingly, "do you take charge of one of the girls."

With a diffident, hesitating air that contrasted rather comically with his stature and proportions, the young curate was about to offer his arm to Evy, but Mr. Walcot, who stood beside her, was quicker in his movements, and took possession of that young lady, leaving her sister to fall to the other's share.

Thus they moved down the hill together to the mill, from the windows of which could be obtained almost as good a view of the driving ship as from the hill itself, but, nevertheless, such was the excitement of the little party, that they preferred to stand outside, sheltered only in a very moderate degree by the low stone wall of the quay.

The vessel, we have said, was approaching the point very rapidly, but not in a direct line; it was possible that she might just skirt it, and go ashore a few score yards beyond. In this case her destruction would not be so immediate, but, on the other hand, the life-lines could hardly be shot over her from the apparatus. The curate and his men, however, had everything in readiness; you would have said, to judge by their resolute and earnest faces as they stood beside the mortar, that they were about to defend their native soil against the attack of a foe. Mr. Walcot, too, faced the cruel blast with stern eyes and knitted brow, except when he dropped a word of exhortation to be of good courage to Evy; but Sir Robert and the young people wore looks of fear and pity, and more than one of them already repented that they had come out with a light heart to behold so sad a scene.

"Do you know the ship?" asked the curate of the man beside him. He himself had been on the coast for years, but to his landsman's eyes the shattered mass before him was but a black and shapeless hulk.

"It is the Rhineland," answered the other confidently; "the steamer that plies between Rotterdam and Bristol."

"You may say 'that used to ply,'" put in another—it was John Jenkins, parish clerk, who plumed himself on employing terms of accuracy—"for she will never make another voyage."

"Do you hear that, Mr. Walcot?" exclaimed Evelyn, in terrified accents, "it is the Rhineland; that is the boat that poor Miss Hurt is to come by."

"Was to come by," murmured Mr. Jenkins, fortunately beneath his ordinary ecclesiastical tones, so that the amendment was inaudible.

The huge hull came flying on, like some mighty sea-bird on a broken wing, for whose discordant screams the shrieking of the wind might easily have been taken; her mainmast and rigging could now be clearly seen standing out against the moonlight; without a rag of sail or puff of steam, her ghastly and spectral form was hurrying on, when her headlong course was suddenly arrested; the crash of rending timber was mingled for an instant with the roaring of the storm, and a white shroud of foam enveloped her and hid her from sight.

"God of Heaven, she has foundered," exclaimed Sir Robert. The two girls uttered a scream of anguish.

"Nay, I still see her," cried the curate, eagerly.

"She is on the Lancet, sir," said a coastguardsman. "The wind must have shifted a point to have took her there."

The Lancet was a long sharp line of rocks, about two hundred yards from shore, but quite disconnected with it, the waves always covered it, but at low tide—which was now the case—only a few inches.

The hull looked considerably higher now than she had been in the water, the wind and waves having probably carried her bodily on to the ledge; nevertheless, in her stationary position, the sea, climbing and raging about her at its will, seemed to devour her more completely even than before.

"Is the position altered for the better by this, Marley?" inquired the curate anxiously.

"She may hold together now for a few hours," answered the coastguardsman; "but she will go to pieces at the flow." He was an old sailor, and his mind was fixed on the fate of the ship rather than on those it carried.

"I mean as respects the poor souls on board, man," continued the curate, with some asperity.

"In my opinion nothing can save them, sir. If the men at Archester have already put out the lifeboat, it is possible they may be here in time; but not otherwise."

"But is it not probable they have done so?"

"No, sir; they must have known from its position (judging from the sound of the guns) that the ship would be ashore hours before they could reach her; and of course they did not take into account the chance of her grounding on the Lancet."

"A swift horse, even with this wind across him, would reach Archester in an hour," soliloquised the curate. "I am a heavy weight; but then I know how to ride, which these men don't. —Might I take your bay mare, Sir Robert?"

"Of course, my dear fellow; and don't spare her. Ten pounds a piece from me, mind, to every man who mans the lifeboat, but don't volunteer yourself, Dyneley; Halcombe can't spare you."

The compliment was lost on him for whom it was intended, for the curate was already on the slope of the hill.

"He's a rare good plucked one," observed Mr. Jenkins, approvingly, "and allus was."

"Especially at the University," muttered Mr. Walcot, not so low, however, but that Evy, who was still his close companion, could catch the sneer.

"I can now stand by myself quite well," said she, withdrawing her arm. The tone was as unmistakeable as the action, and signified not only mere disapproval, but disgust.

"A thousand pardons, Miss Evy; I did not intend my little joke to be overheard."

"I don't think this is a time for jokes, Mr. Walcot."

"Or rather, Miss Evy," returned the other, tartly, "do you not mean that Mr. Dyneley is not a fit subject for them? I had forgotten that a certain Divinity doth hedge a curate in some people's eyes."

"When he is doing God's work, I think it does so," answered Evelyn, sharply. "You are always trying to turn Mr. Dyneley into ridicule."

"I am very sorry; I had no idea he was under your particular protection; of course if it had been George, I should have known better than in your presence to have taken such a liberty with him. You are his natural defender; but in Dyneley's case I had no idea——"

She turned away from him with a face of scarlet, and fixed her eyes upon the wreck, as it could now in truth be called. Yet for the moment she was not thinking of the vessel, nor even of its unhappy crew. She was full of pity for them, but a still deeper feeling than pity had been stirred within her.

"I think I see figures upon the rigging," observed Sir Robert, anxiously. "Is it not so, Marley?"

"Yes, sir; the sea has found its way into the hull, and some poor souls have taken to the shrouds."

"To the shrouds?" murmured little Frank, trembling with awe. He knew that shrouds and death were somehow associated.

"Yes, my boy," said Sir Robert, kindly. "They will thus, for the time, be out of the reach of the waves, and let us trust that they will be able to hold on there till help arrives."

Mr. Marley shook his head with a grunt. It was his manner of expressing disagreement with the baronet's opinion. They might hold on indeed up in the cross-trees and elsewhere for an indefinite time, but it was not possible, he meant to imply, that the ship could hold together.

THE NICOLAIEFF DEPOSITING DOCK

Our principal illustration shows the new Russian Imperial Dock, carrying the circular ironclad, Vice-Admiral Popoff, in the harbour of Nicolaieff, South Russia.

This vessel, docked the last week in September, was the second of the circular ironclads lifted with the greatest ease, and without the slightest inconvenience or delay. The dimensions of the Vice-Admiral Popoff are: diameter 121 feet, draft 14 feet, and weight, at the time of docking, 3,850 tons. The dock, which is capable of raising nearly 5,000 tons, had consequently a reserve buoyancy of over 1,000 tons. During the past summer this dock has been in constant requisition, making good the damages that befel the Black Sea Fleet during the late war.

As an instance of its value, we may mention that the steamship Russia was hastily docked, cleaned, and some torpedo fittings added in a few hours, and a day or two after, having captured the Turkish steamer Mersina, off the coast of Anatolia, she returned to port with her valuable prize, which was reported to have been of sufficient worth to repay a large part of the cost of the dock.

Messrs. Clark and Standfield, of London, designed and constructed this particular dock, not only to lift ordinary sea-going craft, but especially these circular ships, whose great beam has hitherto prevented them from being docked since their construction. Admiral Popoff, the eminent Russian naval engineer, promptly recognised the great working capacity of their design; and it was on his recommendation that the Russian Government appreciated and boldly adopted this then novel and untried invention, which has proved so successful.

This class of dock opens out quite a new era in ship-building and repairs, and it will probably exert a great influence on the future of the Navy.

For years the battle has raged between the comparative merits of the long and short ironclads; the old school contending that the former lines were alone correct, whilst Mr. Reed, the late Chief Constructor of the Navy, and his followers, proved, by the construction of such ships as the Bellerophon and Hercules, that short thick ships were far handier and better sea-boats.

If we mistake not, Mr. Reed went farther than this, and pronounced the Russian Circular Ironclads to be of very high value, as their great beam insured great stability, even with a very low freeboard. Whether they are of high value remains to be proved; but this much can be asserted, that such a vast improvement in docks as to enable them to receive ships of unlimited beam is worthy the serious attention of the Government.

The size of the entrances to the existing graving-docks has had a serious and always a detrimental bearing on the design of our modern war ships, as may be gathered from the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into the stability of the Inflexible, which states that the beam of that vessel was limited by the necessity of having to accommodate her in existing dry docks, whilst it recommends a greater beam than that carried by the Inflexible in first-class vessels of the future.

The Depositing Dock at Nicolaieff meets the difficulty, and has at the same time another remarkable peculiarity, inasmuch as it can not only lift a vessel out of the water, but deposit it on fixed stages along the shore; the number of vessels lifted and deposited at the same time being limited only by the length of this staging.

Vessels can be raised, sighted, and lowered again, in about one hour and a half.

The fingers, or pontoons, which are connected with the side of the Dock are allowed to float in between fixed piling, erected at right angles to the line of shore the vessel is then transferred to the staging, as a pencil may be transferred from one hand to the other, by allowing the fingers to pass between each other.

The Dock, with or without a vessel, may be readily transported from place to place, for the purpose of raising or depositing vessels at different points. For instance, the Dock might place one vessel on the shore, at the Isle of Wight, in the forenoon, and the same Dock lift a second, say, in Portsmouth Harbour or the vicinity, later on in the day.

One of the Docks, with a sufficient length of staging, can dock some six or more vessels daily; and altogether the Dock seems to meet a great want, which is not accommodated by any other known system.

*"BJORN AND BERA"

Mr. Montgomerie Ranking, whose "Fair Rosamond" many of our readers will remember with pleasure, has now given us a very artistic setting of the picturesque story of "Bjorn and Bera"—one of the most interesting and poetic of the quaint Norse legends.

The verse is singularly melodious, the imagery delightful, and the beauties of the work so varied that, while at times we seem to note the perfume of wild flowers, the sough of the singing sea, and the changing light of that northern land, we come upon other passages of intense tragedy, or delicate songs of tender love-making.

The author's courageous adoption of the "Homeric repetition" has a very pleasing result: note the recurring lines, beginning—

> The dragons were manned, and with golden sheen,

The guilty "Snow-white" is a finely-drawn character, full of force, though readers will have a more sympathetic interest in the history of the unfortunate Bera; about Bjorn, Hring, and all the other men, there is an air of heroic manliness that is thoroughly refreshing after so much of the mawkish sentiment some would-be poets have of late inflicted upon us.

The "garden pleasaunce," where the Knights find for the old King a young Queen, is most charmingly described; we have space only for a short quotation:—

> All manner of delight was there
> Whereon the weary eye,
> That tires of branches black and bare,
> And sullen, snow-fraught sky,
> May rest with gazing, and grow fain
> To know that on the earth again
> The summer hath set noiseless foot.
> There bent the boughs with golden fruit,
> Half hidden by thick creamy buds
> That promised more; the bloom that rode
> The apple boughs at Easter-tide
> Vied with the apples at its side,
> Which could show redder; nothing lacked
> Of spring or summer—squirrels cracked
> And chattered in the hazel trees
> That bent with autumn store, the breeze
> Shed rose leaves all about the sward,
> And stirred the primrose 'neath its leaves;
> All seasons joined in quaint accord,
> The hours of bud, and bloom, and sheaves.

As a contrast to this we would commend some of the dramatic passages of the Third Book.

Altogether we have gone over the volume with true pleasure, and we hope soon to have another opportunity of studying—through the medium of Mr. Ranking's melodious song—more of these grand old Norse-folk—their land and lives and loves.

New Novels

"THE HAUNTED HOTEL: A MYSTERY OF MODERN VENICE," to which is added, "My Lady's Money," by Wilkie Collins (2 vols.: Chatto and Windus).—We shall give the best idea of the character of "The Haunted Hotel," by describing it as an admirably contrived and telling ghost-story, although "ghost-story," we admit, is somewhat of a misnomer for a tale which, though concerned with preternatural phenomena, contains no ghost, properly so called. Its merit and interest are thus altogether of the melodramatic and sensational order—we use these adjectives here in no invidious sense—and this being so, it is clear that our criticism of it had better be brief, as it would be difficult to dwell upon its excellence without more or less revealing its secret, a course on every ground undesirable. Mr. Wilkie Collins' strong natural genius for the Novel of Mystery has been improved by many years' practice, so that he may now be pronounced a perfect master in his special variety of art. Of the thousands of readers who will hurry through his tale, impatient to reach the dénouement, few, perhaps, will note as they deserve to be noted the wonderful skill and immense pains desplayed in the selection of details, and in combining them together to bring about the desired results. It would be difficult to praise too highly the ingenuity by which Mr. Collins, without actually putting his readers on a false scent, succeeds in putting them off the right one so completely that in guessing the secret of the Haunted Hotel it is probable that the keenest among them will only anticipate the dullest by a few pages. A novelist, again, of less resource and less imaginative grasp of his subject, would almost certainly have made all the members of the Westwick family affected by the mysterious influences of the room associated with their dead brother in a similar way; whereas, in Mr. Collins' narrative, the effect produced upon each occupant in succession of No. 14 in the Palace Hotel, though distressing in every case, is completely different in kind. Had the author the same power of delineating character that he has in manipulating the incidents of a plot, his place among novelists—and not novelists of our own country or our own day only—would indeed be high; but in this direction he seldom can be said to do more than suggest conceptions which he seems to want the strength to work out.—Of "My Lady's Money" it may be enough to say that, as the Christmas story which it originally was, it is no doubt above the ordinary mark, though it cannot be considered to exhibit its author at his best.

"You Play Me False," by Mortimer and Frances Collins (3 vols.: Bentley).—One would be inclined to think it unlikely that the late Mr. Mortimer Collins' share in this novel went beyond jotting down the merest rough outline of a tale to be filled in and worked up afterwards; but then it is true, as we think we said in noticing "A Village Comedy," that there was always so much sketchiness even in what he put forth as finished works that a little more sketchiness than usual is hardly of itself a sufficient reason for deciding that he had but little hand in the composition. That here and there in the book we come upon a scene which has the making of an effective situation, or upon a clever and pointed saying, is true enough; but, though reluctant to speak otherwise than kindly of a work which comes to us under the circumstances of this, truth compels us to say that it is of slender merit, and we can hardly think it well that it should have been rescued from oblivion.

"Arthur Jessieson," by Joseph Crawford Scott (2 vols.: Chapman and Hall).—Mr. Arthur Jessieson, who relates his own experiences, is good enough to anticipate any fears his readers may be disposed to entertain for him by assuring them, at the close of a brief prologue, that he is "still young, extremely handsome, and one of the wealthiest and most fortunate men in Europe." This is not a prosperous opening, and the striving after eccentricity which would seem to have prompted it is disagreeably conspicuous throughout Mr. Scott's story. During the first half of it the hero omits no means of inducing his readers to regard him as a prig and a coxcomb, and seems quite proud of the character. The book is certainly one that should never have been thrown into the autobiographical form. Nevertheless there are signs of some ability and originality in the tale, though it is not attractive, and the conclusion is much too hurried.

"My Polished Corner: Her Pleasures and Trials," by Alfred Snowdon Emmett (3 vols.: Tinsley).—The first of these three volumes is occupied with scenes of broad farce, and broad farce from the pen of a writer who mistakes the feeblest and silliest jocularity for humour soon becomes rather trying. And later on, when Ezra Bombshell and his "Polished Corner," as he is fond of styling his wife, become people of position through an accession of fortune, and we are introduced to a kind of life with which the author seems to have little personal acquaintance, we cannot say that there is much improvement. Still, though positive merits the book has few or none, it is, perhaps, less oppressively dull than some novels we have attempted to read, and we are almost inclined to think that if the author would confine himself to low life, and keep what he thinks his wit under stern restraint, he might do better.

"Rose and Josephine," translated from the French by Edith H. Owen (Samuel Tinsley).—This is a tale with a moral, reminding us rather of the stories which used to be thought improving reading for children in bygone days. The pretty and naughty heroine, Josephine, insults and snubs and persecutes the plain and virtuous heroine, Rose, and in the end is rescued from the direst distress and loaded with benefits by the girl she has scorned and ill-used. And, of course, everybody is brought to a right frame of mind, and left very good and very happy. As a specimen of a French "goody-goody" story, the book is not bad reading.

SCIENTIFIC NOTES

IN our account last week of the Rapieff electric light we had not sufficient space to describe a form of electric candle which is due to the same inventor. In the Jablochkoff candle we must remember that the essence of the invention lies in the use of an insulating strip of kaolin, or plaster, which separates the two electrodes. M. Rapieff's form of candle resembles the play of Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark, for the insulating substance is omitted. And, strange to say, the light given is all the better for its absence. The new arrangement is shown in Fig. 1. It will be seen that the two carbons incline towards one another—so that their upper ends meet. But an electro-magnet is concealed in the stand, which causes them to fly apart directly the electric arc is established between them. Should the light be from any cause extinguished the carbons again touch, and it is renewed. In the kaolin candle there is no provision of this kind, and should the light be blown out—as it very easily can be—nothing can restore it but the application of some conducting substance which will form a connecting link between its two carbons. The insulating substance is proved to rob the light of a good percentage of its illuminating power, hence the advantage of doing without it. The irregularities of burning and a certain unsteadiness in the light given are faults which cling to the new as well as the old arrangement. For this reason and others M. Rapieff puts forward the regulator, which we described last week, as the more perfect instrument. The candle arrangement, as we saw it lately in his laboratory, is covered with a cylindrical opal glass shade, which fits on the top of the stand.

According to the Scientific American, Mr. Edison's electric light consists of a spiral of platinum wire, which is rendered white hot by the passage of the electricity. It has a kind of automatic check attached which acts upon the current just before the fusing point is reached. Should this information be correct there is certainly no novelty about the invention, for light by incandescence has been patented and tried in every conceivable form. Some years ago in Russia two hundred lamps were exhibited, lighted by one circuit on this principle. The experiment at the time made a great sensation, and a good deal of money was subscribed towards the formation of the inevitable company to give it practical effect. But the scheme altogether failed, and the faith of the subscribers in the return of their money received a rude shock.

At Fig. 2 we give a diagram which explains the construction of a very clever little contrivance, which Mr. Edison has invented and christened the Phonomotor. Like the Phonograph it has a mouthpiece (A) and a vibrating diaphragm (B). Attached to the latter is a piece of rubber tubing, which forms a cushion for the spring (D). At the top of this spring is a little bar called a "pawl," which presses on the ratchet wheel (C), which is attached to the flywheel (E). On speaking or singing into the mouthpiece (A), the diaphragm is thrown into vibration, in consequence of which the pawl is able to push round the wheel (C) by a rapid succession of thrusts. In this way the flywheel is soon thrown into quick movement, its rapidity of rotation, of course, depending upon the number of vibrations peculiar to the pitch of the voice which actuates the diaphragm. This instrument suggests a new use for chatterboxes. Instead of interrupting the labours of others, as they most commonly do, they will be in positive request as motors.

Another instrument—also due to Mr. Edison's fertile brain—is the "Harmonic Engine" shown at Fig. 3. It is so called because a huge tuning-fork, 2½ feet long (A) forms its principal feature. This fork is fastened to a rigid support (not shown in the figure), and to its arms are affixed 35 lb. weights (CC). On each side of the fork is an electro-magnet (B), which serves to throw it into vibration. These vibrations have an amplitude of about one-eighth of an inch, but as they happen thirty-five times in every second, the total movement may be said to equal in that time more than four inches. To the ends of the magnet are fastened slender arms which are connected with a miniature pump concealed within the box (E). By means of this pump with its tiny stroke, and on the principle that "every little makes a mickle," an ordinary-sized house-cistern can be filled in a day. Mr. Edison proposes to apply this little engine to the compression of air, in order to gain power enough to work a sewing-machine. The battery power required is very small indeed, and would consist of not more than two or three cells. We trust that this scheme will be practicable, for a good sewing-machine motor is much wanted.

THE READER

OF the admirable "New Testament Commentary for English Readers," edited by Bishop Ellicott (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), we have already had occasion to speak highly. The second volume just published, containing the Acts and the Epistles to the Romans, the Corinthians, and the Galatians, annotated severally by Professor Plumptre, Dr. Sanday, and the Rev. Teignmouth Shore, is to the full as excellent as its predecessor. The introductions and the excursus to the different books contain all that the average student can desire, whether in the way of lucid exposition of the plan and purpose of the sacred writers, examination of questions of authenticity—rarely hazarded as to these special Scriptures by the boldest of German innovators—or of historical details of the times and circumstances amidst which they wrote—these latter sometimes leading again to very interesting disquisitions, as, for instance, in the excursus on the latter years and personal characteristics of St. Paul. The running commentary combines very happily devotional reflection with exegesis proper. But it is the distinctive excellence of this volume that it is no miscellaneous collection of pious dissertation, but that it fairly and consistently represents throughout the matured views of the learned but cautious school of English critics of which Lightfoot, Wordsworth, and Bishop Ellicott himself, may be esteemed the leaders, and which for pure scholarship and critical acumen can hold its own with the strongest literati of the Continent. This trustworthiness in the case of studies, where all but the most accomplished specialist must take so much on trust, is a merit not easily overrated.

We might be puzzled to say decisively why we like Mr. H. Hussey Vivian's "Notes of a Tour in America" (E. Stanford), but we have certainly skimmed them through with a fair sense of entertainment. It is by no means easy to find much that is novel in the "regular United States' round," and Mr. Vivian is probably the last man to attempt it. His mind, indeed, as to America, seems to have been somewhat in the state of a tabula rasa when he set out—not quite certain, for instance, whether the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada were two separate ranges or different sides of the same chain, and prepared to describe to old friends in Glamorganshire the Pullman cars, the Chinese immigrants, the manufactories where the pig goes in a live porker at the one end and comes out a ham, a saddle, and a hair-brush at the other, and all the other stock wonders of the West, as though such things had never been spoken of before. It is rather, we think, for this very ingenuousness, and because the simple narrative so much resembles the vivâ voce reminiscences of a personal acquaintance who has had a "high old time" at Saratoga, or amused himself by watching the Representatives at Washington, that Mr. Vivian gradually gains our friendship. Now and then, it is true, he lights on something not too generally known, as when he visits the Emma Mine—the first "disinterested expert" probably who has ever cast his eyes upon the spot where so many fortunes and reputations have been buried—though even here he only finds a man who can give him any information just ten minutes before he runs away, and has thus to leave its future productiveness as open a question as before, or when he is escorted through the Great Bonanza levels by the gentleman whose supposed income is nine hundred thousand pounds per annum—we must write this in full to avoid printers' errors; or when discussing the prospects of Sarnia and Toledo—two places we shall leave our reader to discover for himself on his pet map of "the States." Altogether, though not a book we should turn to as an authority, an hour may be not unpleasantly passed away over these "American Notes."

"Ethics and Æsthetics of Modern Poetry," by J. B. Selkirk (Smith, Elder, and Co.), bear ample evidence of refined and cultured, if not of highly original and incisive, thought. It is the Ethics, however, not the Æsthetics, of verse on which Mr. Selkirk chiefly dwells, or rather, perhaps, it is the moral side of poetry which he exalts far above all excellence of form or sound. The inspiration which would clothe the fleurs du mal with gorgeous, but unhealthy, colours will find no favour in his eyes; still less the wild idolatry of form which in one instance led a critic to declare a poem to be so musical that "it would not matter if it meant nothing." The ghostly mysticism of the Rossetti school of sonneteers, the obscurity of Browning's later style—an obscurity resulting, however, in his case from a fancy too creative and too richly fed to find expression easy, and thus rightly characterised by Mr. Selkirk as an obscurity of syntax, not of thought—the occasional slips of even a careful Tennyson or Arnold are matter for many good papers under the headings of "Scepticism in Poetry," "Mysticism in Poetry," &c. Throughout, in fact, the volume seems very successful in its attempt to distinguish that which is true and indestructible in poetry from that which is only a trick and fashion of the time.

The two-and-twenty years which have passed away since "A. K. H. B." introduced himself to the public have not deprived his right hand of its cunning or debarred his feet from tracing out new paths in the level pastures wherein his soul delights to feed. The old admirers of the "Recreations of a Country Parson" will find this "Third Series" (Longmans and Co.), as palatable as any that went before. In some respects, indeed, it appeals to an even wider circle, if we recollect rightly, than its predecessors, in so far as it is more pre-eminently Scottish, not only in tone but in its choice of subjects. In reminiscences of the General Assembly, in Glasgow stories of the late Norman Macleod or legends of Scotch worthies hardly known at all to Southern ears, like the late Professor Buchanan, "A. K. H. B." is at his best, and will please many who might turn away after the first two pages from such papers as "An Old Story Now."

Under the title of "A Housewife's Opinions" (Macmillan and Co.), Mrs. Webster has made a little collection of crisp, neat papers (with one exception upon social subjects) contributed by her as "middle articles" to the Examiner, and worthy certainly of a better fate than that which usually befalls these small-type causeries de Samedi, which the great public expect to see invariably for their sixpence, but do not always en revanche feel expected themselves to read. Though rather too much of such social stuff as in our fathers' simpler days made pleasant chat over a "dish of tea," ere any thought of "setting up" and paying for it arose, these papers often are very happy. One or two, indeed, are something more—notably a Polynesian Griselda, a most quaintly told version of a South Sea myth, and "a Transcript and a Transcription" (we protest against the title), a genuine bit of criticism on the two latest and contemporaneous translations of the terrible "Agamemnon," the one by the poet Browning, the other by Mr. Morshead.

A seventh edition of "Palestine Re-peopled" (J. Nisbet and Co.), by the Rev. James Neil, formerly incumbent of Christ Church, Jerusalem, attests the popularity with a certain class of minds of confident predictions based on difficult and uncertain prophecy. For some time a resident in Jerusalem, Mr. Neil has a good deal to say in his opening chapter on the new Jewish and Protestant Colonies in Palestine, the capacities of the land, and the gradual removal of all impediments in the way of the new settlers, which is fairly worth hearing. This, however, is the preface only. The main purpose of the book is to predict the restoration of the Jews to Palestine—not, however, as believers, but as still reprobate; the substitution of the Greek Church for the Papacy, as the last embodiment of Anti-Christ; the destruction of the "Two Witnesses"—i.e., of Eastern and Western Protestantism after an Œcumenical Council which is to last three years and a half at Jerusalem; the coming of the "third (and greatest) woe" in the person of Russia; the battle of Armageddon, and the salvation of the elect in the Millennium. It is possible that all this and much besides may be squeezed with a little ingenuity out of Revelations, but we should have preferred a tone of less absolute certainty.

"Science for All" (Vol. I., Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), a capital illustrated serial edited by Dr. Robert Brown—brings us once more into the domain of fact. Made up of brief, well-written papers—of good specimens, in a word, of the scientific "pot-boilers" with which our savants seem more and more disposed to vary the elevating but unremunerative pursuit of the higher research, it well fulfils the special aim of most of the Messrs. Cassell's publications—the furnishing out of an excellent volume for domestic reading.

SKETCHES IN SWABIA

ALTHOUGH Swabia is now reduced to a name, and its boundaries have for centuries ceased to be marked upon the map, yet what a host of romantic, poetical, and art recollections present themselves to the mind when we hear this almost indefinite region mentioned! Parcelled out between the two modern kingdoms of Bavaria and Wurtemburg, with little political importance and no great wealth to boast of, yet in the olden time it was the cradle of the mighty Ghibeline family, and its capital was the "Lombard Street" of Europe. Its artists were in request all over the world; and what crowned head in the sixteenth century was not anxious to be pourtrayed by Hans Holbein? Its architects not only covered Germany with stately and magnificent buildings, of which the Cathedrals of Strasbourg and Ulm alone would serve to immortalise them, but were sent for to erect the distant Cathedrals of Milan and Prague, and even portions of the great Monastery of Subiaco. Its national poetry and songs (Volkslieder) are still popular all over Europe, and their sad and plaintive melodies still soothe many an aching heart.

Although Swabia is regarded as the early home of the Reformation, and has become memorable for the "Augsburg Confession," yet it is curious how little change has taken place in the religious views of the people since the sixteenth century. The same towns and villages which then declared for the Augsburg Confession are still Protestant, and those which have upheld the ancient religion do so to this day; thus Ulm, Stutgard, and Esslingen are for the most part Protestant, while Augsburg, Rottenburg, and Gmünd are for the most part Roman Catholic.

There is, however, a curious feature about the Catholics of Swabia, and that is the absence of ritual and ceremonial from their church services. After being present at a High Mass in Belgium, and witnessing the elaborate ceremonial and very dramatic style of music there in vogue, or attending the same service in Cologne Cathedral, Aix-la-Chapelle, or, above all, Ratisbon, with their more simple and dignified ritual and noble ecclesiastical music, one is quite startled at the contrast here presented. It is true, the church is full of altars, statues, and pictures, and candles are lighted upon the altars; but all these will be found in the Protestant churches of Swabia as well. But what most astonishes one is to hear the whole congregation bawling endless hymns, in the German language, to the very same tunes as those used in the Methodist chapels in England, while sometimes a member of the congregation will read out each verse of the hymn before it is sung, as was the custom many years ago in very primitive village churches in England. In many towns in Swabia the Protestants and Catholics use the same churches at different hours of the day.

The Swabians have the reputation of being good musicians; but, to judge from what one hears of their performances, they are certainly not good executants—their bands, for instance, are greatly inferior to those of Bavaria Proper, or Austria.

There can be little doubt that the Swabians, as a race, have greatly degenerated since the Middle Ages, as they do not at the present day produce either distinguished artists or great men. Yet they are a good, honest, and industrious people, and rather serious. Like most Germans, they are quite incapable of either "making" or "taking" a joke. They are certainly not a handsome people. "Meine liebe Schwabele" is really a very uninteresting maiden, very inferior to her graceful Franconian or her lively Bavarian sister. She is swarthy and square built, but very serious and romantic, and does not in the least understand anything like a flirtation; she will believe all the flattering speeches which may be addressed to her, and take them all as positive declarations. We should advise all young Englishmen who get introduced into Swabian households to be very careful not to be too attentive to the young ladies without they really have "serious intentions," as "Herr Papa" will certainly be asking questions, and "Bruder Karl" is very ready with his broadsword. However, a man, especially if he has a limited income, may do worse than marry a Swabian girl, as she makes a most careful and attentive wife, brings up her children well, and is an excellent manager of a household. Domestic debt seems to be almost unknown in this part of Germany. Those nice little quarterly reminders of the existence of the butcher and the baker seems to have no place in the economy of a Swabian household. And as everything is paid for in "ready money," dinner parties entirely unknown, and ladies do not indulge in extravagant toilets, living is cheap. The detestable practice of making ceremonial visits obtains here, as elsewhere in Germany. Fancy baving to call upon people about four times a year at twelve o'clock in the morning dressed in black, with a tail coat and white cravat! But the Germans seem to be unable to live without perpetually going about in this hideous costume; it has been doubted whether a German does not make his first appearance in this world in a dress suit.

The dinner hour in Swabia is half-past twelve, and woe betide the poor wretch who is not in time for that meal, as he is like to fare badly until supper-time. As an example of this, the writer was once walking through a part of Swabia, when he arrived at a large village at about half-past two o'clock in the afternoon terribly hungry. Of course the first thing to be done was to find out an inn, which is not generally difficult in this part of the world. Having discovered the required establishment the following dialogue took place between the writer and the intelligent host:—

THE WRITER: "I am very hungry. Can I have some dinner?"

THE INTELLIGENT HOST: "Dinner!!!! Dinner!!!! Why, it's half-past two!!"

THE WRITER: "Yes, I know, but I have had nothing to eat all day. Can you not give me something to eat?"

THE I. H.: "Quite impossible. One never eats at half-past two, because one has dined at twelve. One can take a cup of coffee at such an hour, or a glass of beer, but it is not possible that one can be hungry at half-past two in the afternoon! One is not an ostrich, and cannot, therefore, be eating all day long. One dines at twelve and one, takes supper at eight. Good afternoon."

Much as the Swabians have degenerated as artists and musicians, it is nothing to the way in which they seem to have lost all taste and skill in architecture. It is difficult to conceive that a land which produced Erwin von Steinbach, the architect of Strasbourg cathedral, and Peter von Arber, could have so fallen away as to delight in such works as the new pulpit and organ in their cathedral of Ulm, the Episcopal Seminary at Gmünd, and most of the new buildings in Stutgard. And if St. John of Ulm could again visit his native land, and see the modern stained-glass windows made at Stutgard, he would repent that he ever had anything to do with the art of glass painting.

The scenery in Swabia is for the most part pretty and interesting, but in some places there are great bald tracts of land entirely without trees, very desolate and dreary. The ancient towns are exceedingly interesting. Ulm and Augsburg are the most important. The Cathedral of the former place is justly celebrated, not only for the grandeur of its architecture, but also for its magnificent stained glass and interesting furniture.

Augsburg is, perhaps, the most dignified looking of all the German towns. The Maximilian-Strasse, more than a mile in length, is lined on both sides with lofty ancient houses, decorated with fresco paintings of "Imperial Diets," great battles, and portraits of emperors, electors, bishops, &c. The grand appearance of the town is greatly increased by the number of lofty dome-capped towers, and vast churches rich in all the decoration of the Renaissance. What Nuremberg is to German Gothic, Augsburg is to German Renaissance. Yet it must not be supposed that Augsburg has no buildings of an earlier date than the Renaissance, for the cathedral possesses a nave of the very earliest Romanesque, entered by bronze doors, covered with bas-reliefs representing scenes from the Scriptures, executed in the year 1063, while it is lighted by windows retaining their ancient stained glass of the same date, undoubtedly the very earliest examples of this art now in existence. Although not a grand example of architecture, the Cathedral of Augsburg contains much that is interesting, and is very rich in pictures of the earlier Swabian school; fine works are to be seen over the altars by the elder Holbein, Burgkmeyer, Zeitbloom, and Martin Schoen.

Augsburg was celebrated for its bronze work in the Middle Ages, and fine examples of skill in treating this metal are to be seen in the three magnificent fountains which adorn the Maximilian-Strasse, and the splendid shields and trophies which ornament the gables of the Rath-haus and other public buildings. Our sketch, No. 1, represents the Maximilian-Strasse with the Rath-haus and the lofty tower called the "Perlacher Thurm," which is more than 350 feet high.

About five miles from Augsburg is Friedburg, a pretty old town with an old castle and a most picturesque Pilgrimage Church, a short way out of the town. This is represented in our sketch No. 2. It is a charming place of worship upon a hot summer day, as the arches supporting the roof are quite open, so that the part appropriated to the congregation has neither walls, doors, nor windows. Although there is not much to said in favour of the congregational singing in the Swabian churches, except that it seems to be hearty and popular, yet the writer is bound to acknowledge that he was very much struck by the effect of a congregation of peasants singing hymns in this pretty church at sunset one Sunday evening in summer. The swallows flying in and out amongst the beams of the roof, and the bleating of a large flock of sheep in a neighbouring field, added to the charms of this scene of rustic worship.

Swabisch Gmünd is a beautifully-situated town in a romantic-looking valley about twenty miles from Stutgard. It is a singularly picturesque old town, with walls, towers, and fourteen churches. It has a population now of little more than 5,000. The principal church, a very noble building, and is celebrated from the fact that it was designed by Peter Arler, the well-known architect of Milan Cathedral, and its lofty and noble interior bears some resemblance to the great Italian church. The tower was never built, and the bells are hung in a picturesque, isolated erection, which was intended to have been temporary, but still serves its purpose, though nearly 500 years old, a wonderful example of the excellence of Peter Arler's building, as the tower is only of timber covered with tiles. A view of this building, with the great church in the distance, is given in our Sketch No. 3, the curious building to the left is the front of St. John's Church, an interesting example of Romanesque architecture. The singular little church of St. Salvator, entirely cut out of the rock, is represented in Sketch No. 4. It is said to be the oldest Christian place of worship in Swabia. Esslingen is another very interesting old town, the walls of which were built by the last Ghibeline Emperor, Frederick the Second. It contains three churches, that of St. Dionysius has two very picturesque towers, connected by a bridge (see Sketch No. 5). It is a most interesting building, and has some fine stained glass in its windows and a richly carved rood-screen. The people here are very proud of the spire of St. Mary's Church, which is looked upon as a perfect example of German Gothic. However, to an Englishman who knows the fine spires of Coventry and the Northamptonshire churches, this one at Esslingen looks rather "gimcrack," and has a decidedly disagreeable outline; nevertheless it is interesting, and a good example of skilful building, as it is pierced the whole way up and unsupported by iron ties.

There is a singular old bridge at Esslingen, with a desecrated chapel upon it, which forms the subject of Sketch No. 7; and a very picturesque fountain, which is represented in Sketch No. 6.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS

III.

NEARLY a century has elapsed since the miraculous experiences of that Teutonic traveller whose name is now synonymous with humbug came out as "Gulliver Revived, or the Vice of Lying Exposed," and now "The Adventures of Baron Munchausen" (F. Warne) reappear in a fresh garb, as sprightly as ever, and rendered doubly entertaining by M. Bichard's clever illustrations. The present volume, compiled from the original English edition, and from Burger's translation, includes part of the sequel published in 1792 as a skit on Bruce's discoveries, and admirably has the spirit of the text been carried out by the artist. The lean baron, his gifted animals and attendants, and his extraordinary exploits are depicted with uncommon humour, which never merges into caricature, while all minor details are studiously cared for, and the colouring is most refined. Altogether "Baron Munchausen," old as he is, is evergreen enough to beat many novelties out of the field.—The same absence of garishness in coloured illustrations is notable in Messrs. Warne's "Aunt Louisa's Golden Gift," with its fascinating old-fashioned girls and children on a golden ground, wedded to nursery rhymes, novel and ancient.

Scenes of country life, common to the unobservant eye, full of beauty to the artist, are reproduced by "Nature Pictures" (F. Warne) wherein J. H. Dell furnishes thirty attractive drawings, carefully engraved by R. Paterson. Mr. Dell's style is delicate rather than bold—there is a touch of Birket Foster in his figures and backgrounds—but he produces some good effects of light and shade. The letterpress, each page surrounded by a most graceful border, consists of appropriate poetic extracts.—Anent the poets, Mr. Hutchieson has most industriously gathered together a quantity of anonymous poetry of the last three centuries in "Fugitive Poems" (F. Warne), a collection of varied merit. Many of the verses are familiar, and many beautiful, but the taste may be questioned, for example, of the effusion commemorating "The Wedding of Loo with her Sweetheart Lorne," or of the refrain, "Paddle Your Own Canoe," to a strain of moral advice. We may remind the author that "The Dying Boy" is by Mrs. Sigourney, and that "Watch and Pray," though here somewhat altered, is a well-known hymn by Charlotte Elliott.

The pleasant chatty dissertations on feathered pets contained in "Bird Keeping," by C. E. Dyson (same publisher), make the revised and enlarged edition of this useful little book very acceptable. Few birds are now left unnoticed, from the wee avadavat with its squeaky note to the lordly eagle, and the plates are good and natural.—Two inspiriting boys' books are also sent by Messrs. Warne. Back to the days of Alfred and the cakes goes "The Danes in England," and Mr. A. H. Engelbach is particularly happy in picturing early Saxon life, sketching the rude Vikings, and interweaving a love story.—There is plenty of life and adventure in Augusta Marryat's "Left to Themselves," for here are two young emigrant lads, whose father dies immediately on their arrival in Australia, working a farm themselves with considerable success.—The loss of his father acts far more seriously on the hero of "True under Trial," by F. Palmer (Wells Gardner), who from a comfortable existence is reduced to sharing a hay-barrel with an Italian monkey-boy. Eddy, by the way, is a worthy model for little boys disposed to forget their prayers.—"Master Bobby" (C. Kegan Paul) is just such another lad in the lower walks of life, and many are his temptations, happily averted by the influence of a quaint little sister in an orphanage.

As "breaking-up" day draws near, many teachers are looking for prizes and reward books, and a number of suitable small illustrated works, mostly adorned with a tasteful floral fly-leaf to contain the possessor's name, come from the Sunday School Union. Thoughtful girls, seeking after the higher life, may learn the importance of home duties from "Mary Mordaunt," by Annie Gray—a story eminently religious in tone, and free from the prevailing morbid taste for edifying death-beds.—The usual types of school girls—the rich and lazy, the poor and industrious, and the dishonest, but eventually repentant, maidens, are all to be met with in "Monksbury College," by Sarah Doudney.—More stirring fare is provided for boys, and the exciting relation of the first blow struck in the American War of Independence—the Battle of Lexington, involuntarily witnessed by two youths—makes Mr. A. R. Hope's "Young Rebels" thoroughly amusing. Founded on fact, the episode is well put before the reader.—No such important events are witnessed by the narrator of "Archie Dunn's Stories," nevertheless he and his cousin contrive to unmask a ghost, capture a runaway, and ferret out a secret with wonderful sagacity.—The succeeding volumes are fitted for Sunday School prizes. Thus the dangers of boy life in London are plainly set forth by Emma Leslie in "George's Temptation;" the same authoress contributing an effective sketch of the introduction of the translation of the Bible into England, "The Chained Book," in which Anne Boleyn appears to great advantage. Why, however, does Miss Leslie speak of the Paris "Palace Royale"?—The seamy side of life in a circus is painted in "The Infant Zephyr," by B. Clarke, although the tiny tight-rope dancer is brought out of her troubles happily; while the unloveable heroine of "Who Shall Win?" by Mrs. Seamer, also has a miserable berth with a cross-grained mother, and turns rebellious, but is ultimately reclaimed.—Miss Ellis's "Little Bess," with her innocent faith, seeking to find on earth the living embodiment of one of the Beatitudes which has impressed her at school, is a trifle too good to be natural.—Another sweet little maiden is found in "Sunshine Through the Clouds," by F. Tylcoat, which shows a sullen child reformed by the pure and loving influence of a schoolfellow. Unfortunately for would-be imitators, Eunice no sooner becomes good than she dies.—Further Sunday School literature from the same publishers comprises four New Year's addresses, respectively for parents, teachers, senior and junior scholars—"Take Pains," by the Rev. W. Skinner; "Quiet Words," by Mr. Macgregor; "Backwards and Forwards," by the Rev. J. H. Hollowell; and "The Best New Year's Gift," by the Rev. A. Bax; a "Sunday School Teacher's Diary," and a "Sunday School Teacher's Pocket Book," including the Year's Lessons with other information and space for class notes, a "Class Register" for pupils' names and addresses, &c., and twenty-four excellent little tracts for very youthful intellects in "The Child's Cabinet." Of special interest to the class too is the minute portrayal of Jewish worship given by the late John Dilworth's "Pictorial Description of the Tabernacle in the Wilderness." Mr. Dilworth had a model of the Tabernacle constructed, and in the present pamphlet details and illustrates the rites and ceremonies of the Old Testament, carefully explaining how the varied types of worship were symbolical of things to come and how entirely they were subsequently fulfilled.

To turn to a group of yearly volumes of religious magazines for all ages. Taking three from the Sunday School Union there are some pretty stories, verse and pictures for youngsters under ten in "The Child's Own Magazine," while "The Morning of Life" appeals to older children, with serial tales, historical and geographical descriptions, and brief moral lessons, and is enlivened by good illustrations. Prizes to encourage budding literary talent are given by this magazine as well as by "Kind Words," another periodical for young people in their teens which also devotes a page to youthful authors, and besides the usual stories, &c., has some able papers on British manufactures, "England's Wealth."—In Messrs. Partridge's collection the chief features of "The Infant's Magazine" are Mr. Harrison

Weir's outlines of animals intended for drawing lessons. "The Childrens' Friend" is a step higher in age, and "The Family Friend" for "grown-ups" may be commended for the instructive glimpses of Jewish life and customs afforded by the serial "Sophia de Lissau," while "The Friendly Visitor" is calculated to suit failing eyesight by its legible print.—"The Band of Hope Review" and "The British Workman" present the usual features of former years.—Mr. Arthur's brief tales of reformation wrought by childish influence, "Temperance Stories for the Young" (Partridge), are attractive, although we fear they will tend to make juvenile readers think too highly of themselves.

Sentiment and humour are diversely illustrated by a pair of annuals. Under the direction of Mr. C. H. Ross, "Judy's Annual" (Judy Office) brims over with merry caricatures from well-known pencils and lively prose and verse from equally well-known pens, further ornamented by the writers' autographs.—Flowers of the garden and the field are commemorated in "The Floral Annual" (Simpkin and Marshall), eight fairly coloured floral plates, accompanied by suitable poetic extracts. Two volumes of a sterner character suggest return to toil after the holidays. "A New Grammar of the English Language," by the Rev. G. Bartle (same publishers), is an excellently compiled work, curt and practical, possessing the usual features of grammatical manuals, and furnishing specially full information respecting the derivation of words.—Equally practical is the Rev. C. W. Tait's "Analysis of English History" (Macmillan), which is based on Mr. Green's "Short History of the English People," and will be of great use to the student as conveying a mass of valuable information in a condensed form. Historical in purport also, "The Mariners of England," by the Rev. W. H. Adams (Edinburgh Publishing Company), like several recent books of the same type, recounts the gallant deeds of English bluejackets, and sensibly adds a chapter explanatory of terms.

W. C. BENNETT'S NEW VOLUME. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett.
"While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in a drawing-room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves; he gives us songs of parting—graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' straining under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with fiery energy of diction on the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and will scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman.—CHAPMAN and HALL, Piccadilly, London.

MILITARY SKETCHES—INCIDENTS OF CAMP LIFE

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.——As was generally anticipated, Her Majesty's Message is of a very brief and of an eminently business-like character. Parliament has been summoned at this early date chiefly, if not entirely, for the purpose of granting supplies for the Afghan Campaign, and though the Ministry cannot avoid, and probably have no desire to avoid, a full and exhaustive discussion of the causes which have led to the unfortunate rupture with the Ameer, they tell the momentous story in a very curt fashion in the Speech which is supposed to be delivered by the chief personage of the realm. "The hostility towards my Indian Government manifested by the Ameer of Afghanistan, and the manner in which he repulsed my friendly Mission, left me no alternative but to make a peremptory demand for redress. This demand having been disregarded, I have directed an expedition to be sent into his territory, and I have taken the earliest opportunity of calling you together, and making to you the communication required by Law." This is practically the whole of the Speech, except that we are told that all Foreign Powers are friendly to us, and that the Berlin Treaty is "doing well," for no announcement is made regarding the nature of the Bills which the Government propose to introduce at a later date. Possibly this reticence foreshadows that, as in 1874, another Winter General Election is at hand. Short, however, as the Speech is, the opponents of the Government may have a good deal to say on the inadequacy of the motive alleged for our assault on the Afghan Power, and it is not easy to see what reply Ministers can make except that based on "the tyrants' plea, necessity." Meanwhile, in this not too virtuous world, nothing succeeds like success, and General Roberts' victory in the Peiwar Valley will tend to put Parliament in good humour; as affording a hope that the winter campaign at any rate may be brief, decisive, and therefore comparatively inexpensive.

THE WEAKNESS OF THE OPPOSITION.——The leaders of the Opposition must feel by this time that they have been singularly unsuccessful in their attempts to influence the nation. Mr. Gladstone never spoke with greater fervour than he is now doing; Mr. Childers displays all his old mastery of detail; Mr. Fawcett exercises to the utmost his considerable powers of angry denunciation. Yet they produce no effect. The meetings to which they address themselves noisily applaud; the nation supports the Government more heartily than ever. It would be very advantageous to the Liberal leaders if they would thoroughly investigate the explanation of this striking fact. We believe the meaning of it to be that Mr. Gladstone and his friends never make the smallest suggestion as to the course the nation ought to adopt in its present perplexity. They criticise the Government with tedious iteration; they point out innumerable faults of which Lord Beaconsfield has been guilty; they laud the surpassing wisdom of the last Liberal Ministry. But for any hint with respect to our present duty, we look through their speeches in vain. This is the only element in the controversy for which the mass of Englishmen really care. In the remote future it may be interesting to apportion to each party and to each prominent statesman the exact amount of praise and blame due to their actions; but in the mean time we are confronted by a powerful rival which may any day become an open enemy, and it is something like an impertinence to divert attention to questions about which there is no living interest. What would Mr. Gladstone do if he were in power? Would he reverse the existing policy, or would he continue it? Or would he merely modify it? These are the questions England wishes to see definitively and positively answered. While no answer is forthcoming, the people will give their confidence to men who have a distinct theory of their duty, and who do not shrink from the responsibility of executing it.

CENTRAL ASIA.——It seems but the other day that procrastinating politicians bade us take comfort. Russia and England could not meet in Asia for at least another half-century, and such a remote possibility was out of the pale of practical statesmanship. Russian progress has been more rapid than these gentlemen supposed it would be; already the boundaries of the two empires are nearly conterminous; and we must make up our minds at once how we ought to act, unless, indeed, the swift march of events makes up our minds for us. The vital question to determine is whether it is absolutely necessary for Russia and England (as regards Asiatic acquisitions) to treat each other as enemies. Is there not room in that vast Continent for both, and may not each exercise its civilising influence in its proper sphere, without trenching on the domains of the other? It would be very pleasant to be able to answer this question confidently in the affirmative, but even the staunchest Russophil among our countrymen would hesitate to say "Yes." Russian officials know perfectly well that we have no desire to penetrate into the barren steppes of Turkestan, but can we feel equally sure that they wish to leave our Indian Empire alone? The Russian conquests in Central Asia and the English conquests in India have often been compared, and there are many points of resemblance between them. In either case, without doubt, fresh annexations have sometimes been made rather from necessity than from a desire for immediate additional aggrandisement. But there are two points of difference between the Asiatic Empires of Russia and of England. Indian conquest was mainly the work of a trading corporation, acting, at all events in its earlier years, almost independently of the royal authority at home. Russian conquest has been the deliberate traditional scheme of a military monarchy, unfettered by Parliamentary restraints. Again, Indian conquest had no temptation to proceed beyond the Himalayas, on the other side of which are barren wastes and nomad tribes. But what is the prospect of Russia when she has arrived at the Himalayas? Why, beyond these Asiatic Alps, she knows that there extends a region as rich as Lombardy, and, by comparison, of illimitable extent, inhabited by an industrious population, who, unsupported by Western help, could not resist the Muscovite legions for a twelvemonth. And, again, this rich peninsula is bordered by the sea, to which at present Russia, in proportion to her vast extent, has but a very limited access. Are not these prizes—a fertile country, and a seaboard free from ice—likely to stir the ambition of patriotic Northmen, and have not our statesmen some right to feel uneasy?

DIVIDED ATTENTION.——If the Russians intended, by stirring up trouble in Afghanistan, to turn the thoughts of England from their doings in Turkey, they have been singularly successful. Even the phrase "divided attention" hardly gives a true account of the study now devoted to the Turkish problem. For some weeks the mass of Englishmen seem almost to have forgotten that such a problem exists, having given up to Afghanistan all the time they can afford to sacrifice to politics. This is natural enough, yet it is decidedly dangerous. The knowledge that Englishmen were jealously watching every movement imposed a strong check on Russian aggression. If our rivals fancy they are now free from British control, their courage will rise, and we may have the pleasure of suddenly finding that we are in the midst of our old perils. As yet, fortunately, there has been no such result as this. On the contrary, the Czar appears to have issued orders of genuine stringency, to the effect that the Treaty of Berlin is a reality, and must be executed. Probably the firm tone recently adopted at Vienna has had something to do with this satisfactory change. Count Andrassy has been using lately the language which befits the representative of so great a Power as Austria, and there can be no doubt that his words have quickened the desire of Russia to be loyal to her engagements. But we cannot feel confident that this influence will always act so effectually. Austria-Hungary is so complicated a State that its policy is liable to great fluctuations. A powerful movement among the Slavonic population would necessitate some abatement of the vigour due to Magyar pressure. Hence the absolute necessity of England preserving part of her attention for European as well as for Asiatic difficulties. The fate of Constantinople is just as important to us now as it was when we had no thought of sending troops through the Khyber. Were Russia to reverse the policy she is now pursuing, we should still have to resist her with the whole force of the Empire.

THE INFLUENCE OF PARLIAMENT.——Does Parliament—especially the House of Commons—exercise as great a sway over public opinion as it exercised, say, thirty years ago, and if not, why not? Mr. Gladstone evidently recognises that there has been a change when he complains that the present Parliament rather resembles one of the old French Parlements than the Great Council of the Nation, and that its functions are "to register the edicts which are issued from Downing Street." These remarks were received with cries of "Shame!" and of course Mr. Gladstone believes or professes to believe that this acknowledged decadence of Parliamentary influence is in some mysterious manner due to Lord Beaconsfield's Machiavellian machinations. The real cause is probably deeper, and far less easily removable. Parliament cannot fail to command considerable respect so long as it continues to be the principal law-making machine of the British Empire, but, apart from its legislative powers, its debates are no longer read with such eagerness and attention as they formerly were. It is not that the speakers—man for man—are intellectually inferior to their predecessors, it is that other methods of attaining publicity have come into vogue, which have taken the wind out of our Parliamentary orators' sails. A striking example of the change which has taken place is shown by the manner in which some of our leading public men, with two or three notable exceptions, have dealt with the Afghan question. In the last generation, a few anonymous pamphlets would, perhaps, have been put forth beforehand as feelers, but the real discussion would have been patiently postponed until the assembling of Parliament. The debate would then have come home to the public with a freshness and a force which are now unattainable. What with long letters in daily papers, in weekly papers, in monthly magazines, and speeches at City banquets and in skating rinks, the forthcoming debates, enlivened though they may be by the interest which personal encounters inspire, can scarcely fail to have something of the flavour of a twice-told tale.

AMERICAN PROSPECTS.——It is a long time since the future of the United States looked so promising as it does now. The "Greenback" party in Congress have been denouncing the resumption of specie payments; but to other people it seems to be one of the most hopeful symptoms of the national life. It must inevitably check a dangerous and insincere agitation, and give confidence to the sober and enterprising portion of the community. The fact that the national debt is now held mainly in the country itself is another excellent guarantee against dishonest legislation. Of course everybody knows that the mass of our kinsfolk have quite as sound moral convictions and impulses as the advanced European nations; but many American politicians are so reckless and so unscrupulous that every circumstance which puts difficulties in their way is gladly welcomed. Another point to which the President's Message at the opening of Congress alluded was the revival of trade. It is impossible not to be rather envious of the Americans in regard to this element in their prospects. Here there is not only no symptom of revival, but many things indicate that we have before us still deeper depression. The statesmen of America are luckily free of the Eastern Question; and the nation has doubtless profited by the bitter experiences to which it was led by wild speculation. There is good reason to believe that the tide of prosperity will rise rapidly, and that large numbers of emigrants will once more be attracted to share its benefits. If so, the result will be mainly due to a return to those elementary principles of honesty which were for a time treated as antiquated prejudices.

SMALL POX HOSPITALS.——We are inclined to think that the verdict of the jury in the Hampstead Hospital case might have been different if there had been a small-pox epidemic raging at the present time. When this loathsome disorder assumes the dimensions of a pestilence (tempered by vaccination) as it has on several occasions during the last few years, people rejoice to hear that those of their neighbours who have been smitten by the disease have been borne off to the hospital, they naturally feel that such institutions are real blessings, and they are ready to subscribe liberally towards their support. Perhaps—if they could get an equally convenient abode elsewhere—they would not choose to live hard by one of these establishments, and yet the prejudice in this respect cannot be very strong, when we remember the successive emigrations of The Small Pox Hospital par excellence. Twice in our recollection has it been driven out by the buildings which accumulated round it; from Mount Pleasant (Gray's Inn Lane) to King's Cross, and from King's Cross to Highgate, and even there it is the ample domain of the Cemetery rather than prejudice which preserves it from being hemmed in by "eligible dwelling-houses." Be it observed, however, that we do not complain of the verdict in the Hampstead case, and, even if it is reversed by another tribunal, it may exercise a wholesome effect on the external economy of such institutions. The jury specially exonerated the internal management from blame, but it stands to reason, small-pox being universally admitted to be a contagious disease, that there must be some risk to those who are the immediate neighbours of an establishment into which patients are constantly going, and out of which convalescents and corpses are constantly coming, unless—and herein lies the whole gist of the matter—the authorities exercise the most careful precautions. Seeing that small-pox hospitals are absolute necessities, and that they must be within a convenient distance of the great centres of population, they cannot be isolated, as a building is isolated on a Devonshire moor, and therefore the adjacent inhabitants are justified in complaining if it can be shown that a single case of disease is generated by their location in the district.

SUNDAY POLITICS.— Some attention has been excited by the strong utterances of prominent Nonconformist preachers with respect to the Afghan war. We are far from thinking that clergymen ought to confine their allusions solely to what are called sacred subjects. By doing so, unless they are men of a rare order of genius, they are sure to be guilty of the unpardonable, although too common, crime of dulness. Every true sermon ought to bear evidence that the preacher is in immediate contact with life, and that the principles he unfolds for guidance and consolation have not been merely learned by rote from books. This, however, is a very different thing from saying that ministers of religion are justified in delivering from the pulpit party harangues on current questions. It is all very well for them to assert that they must uphold the eternal laws of justice; but they must know that in a question like that which now agitates the nation there is room for difference of opinion as to the course which these laws prescribe. Men who approve the war are as firmly convinced of its justice as the irate preachers are convinced of its wickedness. In these circumstances such tirades can only do harm. They do not make politicians who already agree with them more sure of their ground; and they irritate persons who have arrived at a contrary conclusion. What good can an irritated man be expected to derive from the previous services? He leaves church in a far less religious temper than when he entered it. Altogether, it is to be hoped the mass of the clergy both in the Established Church and in the Nonconformist Churches will refrain from following the bad example which has been sent them. It is vain for them to point to the political sermons of men like Latimer. There were no newspapers in those days. Now the newspaper pursues us, morning, afternoon, and night; and to many people one of the attractions of church is that they can there forget all about leading articles and barren party strife.

MILITARY SKETCHES—INCIDENTS OF CAMP LIFE

HERE are some more of the humours of camp life, which may be regarded as a continuation of the series which we published a few weeks ago (No. 466, November 2). In Nos. 1 and 2 we have the interiors of two tents, tenanted respectively by a couple of officers and their orderlies. The tents being placed in juxtaposition, the masters overhear much of the conversation of their servants, and it may guessed that what they overhear is not always of the most flattering nature. The next sketches, 3 and 4, illustrate in a double sense the truth of the proverb, "A house divided against itself cannot stand." In the small hours of the morning, Brown being awakened by the creaking of the tent-pole, which is bending like a reed before the violence of the gale, calls to his friend Jones to go out and ease off the ropes, Jones politely replies that he will "see him hanged first," but when a moment afterwards the soaking canvas flops down upon them, each wishes that he had himself done what was needful, instead of wasting time in trying to persuade his companion to do it. No. 5 gives us a good idea of the grotesque shadows which are visible on the white canvas tents, every evening after darkness has set in. Presently, however, when the bugle sounds "Lights out," the phantasmagoria will suddenly disappear, and the lonely sentry on duty outside will no longer be able to while away the weary hours by watching the grotesquely magnified forms of his comrades who are enjoying themselves within. Finally, in Sketch 6, we have a scene which only those who live at home at ease can afford to laugh at. Poor Smith of the —th, slumbering with his martial cloak around him, has had a visit from Queen Mab, who has cheated him into the belief that he is at home on furlough, comfortably ensconced in a civilised bedchamber, with no imperative necessity to get up until he feels inclined. When his newly-polished accoutrements are brought in, the half-dreaming sybarite yawns "All right, Atkins," and orders a fire, and hot water; but then comes the dread announcement which awakens him to the stern realities of the situation, "Half-past four, sir. Parade at five, sir; and it's raining hard, sir!"

THE DISASTER IN THE CHANNEL

THE fatal collision which took place off the Foreland on Monday last resulted in the deaths of fifty-four persons, thirty-seven of whom were passengers. The accident happened at night, soon after most of those on board the Pommerania had retired to their berths after indulging in some festivities in the main cabin in celebration of their near approach to port. The crash was terrible, but as yet there is little means of forming an opinion as to which vessel was to blame, although this moral can at least be deduced, that water-tight compartments are practically useless unless they are made without doors. Both vessels were built with them, but the Pommerania sank like a log because her doors had been left open; whilst the Moel Eilian, though frightfully damaged in the bows, as will be seen in our engraving, was safely towed into harbour, the water never penetrating farther than her first compartment. Accounts differ as to the behaviour of the crew of the German vessel; a lady passenger says that they did all they could to save life, whilst, on the other hand, Thomas Brightling, a certificated chief mate, who was also a passenger, declares that they behaved very badly, actually saving their baggage and bedding, instead of trying to rescue the passengers. He also states that one boat was upset by some of the crew rushing into it after it was full of passengers, and that another, in which he himself was saved, was pushed off, in spite of his protests, while there was still room in it for eight or ten persons. He saw no officers, except Captain Schwensen, whose gallant conduct is attested by all the accounts. This brave seaman actually went down with his ship, but having risen again to the surface, he was picked up by the City of Amsterdam, and subsequently landed at Maassluys, on the Wednesday. It is singular, however, that nothing further concerning him has been announced. The majority of those saved were taken on board the Glengarry, and landed at Dover, where they were temporarily housed at the Sailors' Home, being subsequently forwarded to Hamburg, for which place the unfortunate vessel was bound. The coroner's jury have returned an open verdict; but the inquiry stands adjourned, and of course there will also be an investigation by the Board of Trade.

THE SOLDIERS' INSTITUTE, PORTSMOUTH

THIS institution is now in the fifth year of its existence, and has already become so popular that its benevolent promoter, Miss Robinson, is often puzzled to find accommodation within its walls for the many applicants who present themselves. Every inch of space is utilised, the cellars have been transformed into kitchens, the former kitchen offices into a handsome reception room, lavatory, and store, whilst the refreshment bar has also been much improved, marble counters, mirrors, handsome urns, &c., adding greatly to the attractiveness of the house. The Institute has fifty-two rooms, and makes up seventy beds; over ten thousand nights' lodgings have been provided during the year, and on special occasions, although beds are improvised in the reading-room, &c., many have been refused admission. Without counting sleepers, the daily average of soldiers and sailors using the house exceeds three hundred. The place combines the advantages of a Temperance Hotel, Literary Institute, and Social Club-house, in which soldiers, when out of barracks, can pass their time in an enjoyable and improving way. For those who simply need recreation, billiards, skittles, and other games are provided, whilst for the more studiously inclined there is a Reading Room well supplied with periodicals, a library of well-selected works, and a Lecture Hall in which meetings are held and entertainments given. There are also classes for secular and religious instruction. Miss Robinson and the ladies who assist her reside in the house at their own expense, and their gratuitous work is not confined to the establishment itself. They visit the outward bound troopships and supply the men on board with books, newspapers, writing materials, whilst those who have just disembarked are invited to the Institute, lodgings are provided in different parts of the town for their families, children taken care of, and widows and orphans provided for until they can communicate with their friends. Need we say more to recommend Miss Robinson's benevolent undertaking to our readers? Such a work cannot, of course, be carried on without funds, and in aid of these a Fancy Bazaar was last week held at Willis's Rooms. Those who missed the opportunity of attending it, may still aid the good work by sending money, books, and clothing for women and children, to Miss Robinson, at the Institute, High Street, Portsmouth.

"UNDER ONE ROOF"

MR. JAMES PAYN'S New Story is continued on page 577.

PROFESSOR PALMIERI'S OBSERVATORY ON MOUNT VESUVIUS

THE observatory of Professor Palmieri, the courageous savant who has devoted his life to the study of this mountain, is situated on a long and narrow ridge of rock on Mount Cantaroni, almost at the foot of the actual cone of the volcano, and about half-a-mile from the Hermitage of San Salvatore—the extreme point to which carriages can ascend the mountain. Owing to the slight elevation of the rocky ridge, and to the sharp point which it presents to any stream of lava which may come curling down the mountain, the observatory is much safer than at first appears; and our picture shows how the great torrent which devastated the slopes of the mountain in 1872 was cleft in two streams by the projecting edge of the rock. Notwithstanding the great risk, Professor Palmieri bravely remained at his post throughout; and it is to his observations that we owe a complete history of that eruption. The view from the observatory is most singular, as the house seems to be situated in the midst of a sea of lava, which curls around in great fantastic waves, sometimes rising to many feet in height, and at others showing traces of an overwhelmed tree or house. Before you rises the grim cinder-bestrewn cone, silently smoking and emitting an occasional shock or rumble, all of which is carefully registered by the delicate instruments inside the Observatory, which automatically mark the duration of the shock, its intensity, the particular part of the crater in which it was taking place, and its direction, as well as the exact time at which it occurred. While the writer was standing before the instruments, the mountain kindly obliged him with a slight quiver, all the details of which were at once noted by this most ingeniously-contrived apparatus. During the recent eruption, as well as that of 1876, the most valuable results have been chronicled by the Professor, who has been able to calm the exaggerated fears of the inhabitants of the surrounding villages, who were terrified at the threatening appearance of the mountain, by making a very fair forecast of the proceedings of the volcano, his accuracy of course increasing with every year's experience. The Professor, through careful observations, has also ascertained that, at time of eruption, the full moon has a curious stimulating effect upon the mountain's activity.

The observatory was first erected in 1844, and Professor Palmieri receives a considerable yearly salary for the pursuit of his valuable investigations. We should mention that the actual cone of the mountain is not shown in the engraving, being considerably to the left of the picture.

MAORI MEETING AT WAITARA, NEW ZEALAND

THIS interesting gathering took place at the end of June (having been delayed some days by inclement weather) in the Taranaki district, New Zealand. The meeting excited the greatest curiosity among the white population, numbers of whom flocked to the spot by train and by other conveyances. Owing to the lapse of old Maori customs, and still more the rapid decay of

THE AFGHAN WAR—AN ELEPHANT BATTERY ADVANCING TO THE FRONT the Maori race, such a meeting will in a few years be quite impossible. Moreover, this meeting was held to commemorate the war fought at the Waitara, and another native war on that scale is an impossibility. Turning to our engraving, which is from sketches furnished by the Rev. Philip Walsh, curate of Waitara, the time chosen for the illustration is the moment of the distribution of the food to be eaten at the feast, which is always an essential at Maori gatherings. This, according to custom, was contributed by the entertainers, who, on this occasion, were the various tribes inhabiting the Taranaki and adjacent districts. It consisted of some 2,500 baskets of potatoes, kumeras, and taros, a large number of dried shark, and ninety-one pigs. The whole was stacked in a solid heap, like a wall. The preliminary ceremonies of welcome having been concluded, a Maori, armed with a long wand, stepped on to the pile of food, and, directed by an old chief, Te Patu, who acted as master of the ceremonies, proceeded to call on the tribes present by name, and to allot to each a portion, previously marked off by a dried shark stuck on end. When he came to the centre of the pile, where was placed a flag, he formally handed over the rest to Sir George Grey, Premier, the Hon. the Native Minister, and the rest of the Ministerial party present at the meeting. According to etiquette this was accepted, but was afterwards returned to be distributed amongst the Maories present. After the distribution the food was taken by the tribes and rapidly cooked on hot stones in Maori ovens made for the occasion. An hour or two was devoted to feasting, and in the afternoon Rewi, the chief of the Ngatimaniapoto, and head man present, opened the meeting with Sir George Grey and the Government party, which lasted several days, many topics of interest to the natives being discussed.

FANCY DRESS BALL AT BRIGHTON

THE ball in aid of the Brighton Hospital for Sick Children was held on the evening of the 15th of November in the Pavilion, which was crowded by a brilliant throng of ladies and gentlemen in rich and fanciful dresses, borrowed from the fashions of almost every period in history. The present bent of the public mind was exemplified by the number of military and Eastern costumes, and the effect was added to by the presence of several Indian guests in gorgeous native apparel. Here, as in the outer world, "John Bull" made himself a prominent figure. A number of the costumes were supplied by Messrs. John Simmons and Sons, of Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, among which may be mentioned Raoul, Comte de Nevers, Punch, Charles Surface, Figaro, and Louis XV. The whole affair seemed a great success, and, we trust, added materially to the funds of the institution for whose benefit it was organised.

PIRATICAL RAID AT HONG KONG.

AT midnight, on the 24th September last, a singular attack was made by a gang of armed pirates, about a hundred in number, on a goldsmith's shop in Wing Lok Street, Hong Kong. This street runs parallel with the Praya, between the harbour-master's office and the Canton steamer wharf. It appears that previously to the attack the robbers, having extinguished the street lamps so as to cover their operations, boarded the Kate, a steam-launch belonging to a European firm, and having by threats silenced the Chinese in charge, got up steam so as to effectually carry off their expected booty and make good their escape. Having landed, the robbers divided into two parties, one of which kept guard in front and one behind. By means of a bamboo ladder some of the party reached the first-floor windows, forced open the venetians, and entered the house. Their motive for attacking this particular hong was that they had heard that the last American steamer had brought a large consignment of specie for it, and that the treasure was kept on the premises. Fortunately, they were foiled in their efforts to force the safe, and the inhabitants of the street, having become aware of the robbers' presence, though afraid to come out and offer active resistance, fired repeatedly on them from the windows. The constables also fired on the robbers, who returned the fire, and ultimately made good their retreat with the loss of one man shot dead (and probably some wounded, who were carried off by their comrades); and, on the side of the police, three European, two Sikh, and one native constable dangerously wounded. The Kate was pursued and fired upon by one of the police boats; but the pirates got clear away, and next day she was found high and dry on her beam-ends at Mong-kok-tsui. On board of her were found some rifles and ammunition, and a revolver stolen from the goldsmith's shop in Hong-Hong. It may be observed that a similar attack was made by a number of Chinese robbers in October last on the Dindings settlement in the Straits of Malacca, one European being killed and several wounded. A number of suspected persons are in custody.—Our engraving is from a photograph by Afong, a native photographer, and has been kindly forwarded to us by Mr. D. K. Griffiths, of Hong Kong.

THE OVERFLOW OF THE NILE

As our readers are aware, the rise of the Nile has this year attained a greater height than at any time within the last fifty years. It has unfortunately been attended with more than the usual destruction of life and property. In the Delta alone it is estimated that over five hundred of the natives perished, and about 200,000 acres of land were submerged.

The great cause of mischief was the break in the dyke at Mit-Habib, shown in one of our engravings. This disaster resulted in the complete destruction of several villages.

Samanoud, a great commercial centre for the growth of cotton, was partially inundated, as shown in another sketch, and the railway at Rahbain, close by, was also in many places swept away.

Another break in the Nile banks occurred at Kafr-es-Zyat on the Cairo line of railway, where a considerable portion of the town was flooded.—Our engravings are from sketches by Mr. Charles Royle, of Alexandria.

THE AFGHAN WAR

OUR three columns continue to advance into the Ameer's territory, but, with regard to the Peshawur division, there has been considerable trouble with some of the Afridis at the entrance to the Khyber, as they have fired upon our men, and at one time created so much apprehension by their attitude that several convoys destined for Dakka turned back to Peshawur, while it was even rumoured that General Sam. Browne's communications were cut. Those fears, however, fortunately turned out to be exaggerated, the marauders proved to be formed partly of members of a tribe (Zukkur Khels) whose headman had not withdrawn his allegiance from the Ameer, and partly of those lawless spirits whose love of plunder far exceeds their respect for their chiefs. Amongst those attacked were Major Pearson and a small signalling party, of whom a grass-cutter and a soldier of the 81st Regiment were killed. A mail with despatches to the Viceroy was also robbed. Troops were speedily brought up to the district, and Major Cavagnari, aided by the Kuki Kheyl Muliks, attacked and dispersed the malcontents, breaking up an intended combination, and rendering the communications comparatively safe. Large convoys now pass through, while Lord William Beresford has ridden through the Pass alone without being attacked. Arrangements have also been concluded with the friendly tribes to post strong guards on the most exposed points, Colonel Macgregor has been sent to Ali Musjid, and entrusted with the regulation of the traffic and the defence of the Pass, while General Maude and his division have now arrived at Peshawur. General Samuel Browne is still at Dakka, and has made a reconnaissance on the Jellalabad road as far as Hazar-nao, a place situated on the banks ot the Cabul River, while General Macpherson's division has reached Bosawal beyond the Khurd Khyber Pass. General Browne reports that the Khurd Khyber offers a good position should the British forces hold that part of the country. General Browne will probably now push on to Jellalabad, as the Ameer is "authentically" reported to have withdrawn his troops to the capital, so that there is now no Afghan force between Sir Samuel Browne's head-quarters and Cabul. According to The Times, there is "every probability" of Jellalabad being incorporated in the British Empire, and becoming a fortified frontier town. Captain Maclean, of the 14th Sikhs, who was wounded in the attack on Ali Musjid, is dead. Amongst the tribes who have tendered their allegiance to Sir Samuel Browne are the Sangu-Khel, the most powerful clan of the great, but notoriously unfaithful Shinwarri tribe.

General Roberts, after occupying the Kuram Fort, pushed forward to Habib Kala, at the foot of the Peiwar Pass, which he reached on the 28th inst. Next day a reconnaissance was made, and the 29th Native Infantry and the 5th Punjaub Infantry, with one gun, were sent on to skirmish, and exchanged shots with the enemy, Lieutenant Reid and six men being wounded and one man being killed. By a telegram from Lahore, dated the 5th instant, it appears that General Roberts has succeeded brilliantly in an attack on the Afghan position. He has carried the Peiwar Kothal, and has driven off the enemy, inflicting great loss, capturing all guns, and is following up the retreating enemy in the direction of Ali Khail. Our loss is about eighty, including Captain Kelso, R.A., and Captain Anderson, 23rd Pioneers.

General Biddulph has also advanced, and has reached Pishin, and has been reconnoitring in the direction of the Kohjack Pass, and General Donald Stewart is marching rapidly to Quetta in order to take the supreme command of the force destined to march upon Candahar, although owing to transport difficulties it is unlikely that he will begin his march in real earnest until January. By the last advices, however, he had reached Kistah in the Bolan Pass, about sixty-five miles from Quettah. The troops are said to be suffering somewhat from the cold, which appears to be exceedingly severe, while the difficulties of the transport service are still further increased by the sore backs of the camels, caused by the inexperience of the officials in charge of the convoy trains.

The Ameer's reply to the Viceroy has at last been published, and is said to be much milder in tone than was generally thought. Another letter from the Ameer has been received from Major Cavagnari, but its contents are not known. The Ameer, before the outbreak of hostilities, held a Durbar at Cabul, at which he exalted the power and prowess of Russia, and exhorted his followers to sharpen their swords for the enemies of their country. There is little other miscellaneous news, save that the Indian Press are in a great state of indignation owing to the severe restrictions put upon correspondents at the front, who are restrained from sending telegrams unless countersigned by a staff officer. Moreover, the old order prohibiting staff officers from writing for newspapers has also been revived.

AN ELEPHANT BATTERY

HERE we have a battery of those 40-pounders (Armstrongs) which have already proved extremely useful in the present campaign, as it is to their long and accurate range that the silencing of the Afghan guns in Ali Musjid and the subsequent capture of that fort is due. As may be seen, the guns are mainly drawn by elephants, whose powers of traction and endurance are far greater than a team of horses.

A PASS IN KHAGAN

KHAGAN is a mountainous district, forming our frontier adjoining the territories of the Maharajah of Cashmere on the western side. Although nominally under British rule, it is in a very unsettled condition, and until recently no one was allowed to travel in it without a guard. It consists of a large wooded valley down which rushes the river Nainsook. Some of the side valleys are very beautiful, being clothed with deodar cedar. At the upper end of the side valleys are passes leading into Cashmere; some of these are about 14,000 feet above the sea. Our sketch represents a surveying party on the march over one of these passes.

A TWIG BRIDGE IN KHAGAN

A JHULA, or twig bridge, which is often used throughout the Northern Himalayan districts, consists of a pair of ropes, formed of twisted twigs, sewn side by side, to form the pathway. A pair of light ropes are stretched about two feet higher up, so as to form hand-ropes, et voilà tout! As towards the centre of the span the hand-ropes often only reach to the knees, it may be imagined that to cross a roaring torrent by one of these bridges, suspended 150 feet above its surface, requires nerves of no ordinary character. Ladies have often to be carried over on the coolies' backs.

Although Khagan is hardly within the range covered by the war, we publish these sketches, as they will serve to show the features of mountainous districts similar to those through which our troops will have to pass.

THE REV. IMÂM SHAH PREACHING TO THE AFGHANS AT PESHAWUR

THE Church Missionary Society commenced its mission to the Afghans at the earnest solicitation of the late Sir Herbert Edwardes, in the year 1855, and for the last twenty-three years the operations of the Society have been carried on with considerable success at Peshawur. There is now a small native congregation of some eighty persons, amongst whom are several converted Afghans. This congregation is presided over by the Rev. Imâm Shah, who is himself a convert from Mohamedanism. Our engraving represents this native clergyman addressing a crowd of Afghans from the steps of the preaching chapel in the centre of the market-place of Peshawur. It has been taken from a drawing recently prepared (and not yet published) by the Church Missionary Society, from a photograph taken on the spot, and is specially interesting as giving one of the best groups of Afghan costumes we have yet seen. It was on the steps of the preaching station represented in our picture that the life of the Rev. Thomas Tuting, M.A., a clergyman of the Church Mission Society, was attempted in 1862, but with that exception preaching has been regularly carried on amongst the Afghans in Peshawur without any physical opposition, and the conciliatory conduct of the Society's European missionaries at Peshawur has, we are assured, enabled them to gain the friendship of most of the leading chiefs of those parts. At Peshawur there is a large Anglo-Vernacular Society conducted by the missionaries, and it is in this Institution that the Ameer's English-speaking clerks and interpreters have been educated. The European missionaries stationed at Peshawur are the Rev. T. P. Hughes, B.D. (now on a visit to this country), and the Rev. Worthington Jukes, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——Parliament was opened on the Thursday by the Lord Chancellor. Some comments on the Speech from the Throne will be found in our "Topics of the Week."—Next to the conjectures as to the tenor of the Queen's Speech and the probable tone of the ensuing Parliamentary debates, the main topic of the week has been Mr. Gladstone's farewell addresses to his constituents at Greenwich and Woolwich. At the Ship Hotel he dwelt chiefly on the necessity of Liberal organisation, advising his hearers to "imitate the Tories in their good deeds," and hinting strongly that the early dissolution of Parliament might be expected; while the oration at the Skating Rink was one long attack upon the Cabinet for their foreign policy in general, and the Afghanistan War in particular; and their trespass on the province and privileges of Parliament. He contended that it would be no answer to say that they had the support of a large majority in the House of Commons. It was not competent for Parliament to barter away the privileges of Parliament. If our liabilities were to be abridged it must be done by the people themselves. Shere Ali was said to be only a puppet in the hands of Russia, and yet, while tamely accepting the explanations of the Czar, we had commenced a war against the Ameer. He denied the statement that the present crisis had been brought about by anything which had been done by the late Liberal Government. The present Ministry were entirely and absolutely responsible for carrying fire and sword into the dominions of a friendly Prince, especially as it had declared war without consulting the country, or taking Parliament into its confidence. The final appeal must be made to the country, and the question which towered over all others was, whether the war was a just one. He feared that it was grossly unjust, and if so we should come under the stroke of the everlasting laws that suffering shall follow upon sin, and the day would arrive when the people of England would discover that national injustice is the surest road to national downfall. —The meeting, which was a ticket one, was very large and enthusiastic, and so great was the crush at the doors that the gentleman who had been entrusted with the illuminated address could not get into the building, so that Mr. Gladstone had to put up with an ordinary printed copy. An opposition meeting was held outside the rink, at which resolutions were passed approving of the action of the Government. Both at Greenwich and Woolwich handbills were freely circulated denouncing Mr. Gladstone as a traitor to Queen, Country, Liberal Party, and "Poor Greenwich," and "a servant to that pitiless and lying despotism, Russia."—Lord Shaftesbury, who at first declined to join the Afghan Committee, because he thought that the Ministry were entitled to forbearance, has now done so, because he thinks that in their despatch to Lord Lytton they have now stated their entire case. Although the forthcoming papers may possible abate their claim to public approval, they cannot possibly improve it, unless it should be found (which is most unlikely) on the perusal of the documents that Lord Cranbrook omitted some matters of importance to the position of himself and his colleagues. He remarks that their responsibilities are tremendous, and that neither success in the field nor an approving vote in Parliament can rescue their action from being a monstrous sin.—The London Positivists have issued a manifesto condemning, on principle, our Indian Empire and the Afghan War, and all other efforts for the extension of it, as repetitions of the original crime.—Numerous party meetings both Liberal and Conservative have been held, the details of which we have no space to record. The war has of course been the staple subject of debate, and it has been condemned or defended with more or less warmth according to the temperament and political proclivities of the speakers. Some of the meetings were very turbulent, notably that at Bath on Monday, at which Lord Bury, Under-Secretary for War, was the chief speaker.—Mr. Butt, in his third letter to the electors of Limerick, again counsels moderation, and asks how any right minded man, after taking the oath of allegiance to the Queen for the purpose of obtaining power in Parliament, could use that power, to baffle all her measures, confute all her counsels, and disrupt the citadel of her power? Rebellion begun in Parliament must, he contends, be followed by rebellion in the field, to suppress which England would spend her last shilling and stake her last man. Mr. Butt has also written to the Secretary of the Home Rule Party saying that he cannot attend the coming Session, and strongly advising that no amendment to the Queen's speech shall be moved.—Efforts are being made to establish a Ladies' Political Club in London, which, however, will not be opened until it numbers 1,000 members. The annual subscription is only five shillings. Miss Raisin, 154, Camden Street, N.W., is the Hon. Secretary.—The deaths are announced of Professor Smyth, M.P. for Londonderry, and of Mr. J. Dunbar, M.P. for New Ross,

MISCELLANEOUS.——The depressed condition of trade is becoming more general, and more widely felt. From almost every part of the country come accounts of strikes, lock-outs, business failures, and reductions of wages.—The Poor Law Guardians held a Conference on Monday, and resolved upon the establishment of a Metropolitan Poor Law Guardians' Association with the view of putting pressure on Parliament in relation to Poor Law questions.—A second steamboat excursion was made on Saturday by some members of the Board of Works to complete their inspection of "the sewage zone." Their experiments are said to have yielded evident and general satisfaction.—A portion of the sea-drive at Westgate-on-Sea, near Margate, is now illuminated by the electric light, which is to be tried there for a month, but the opinion is expressed that, on account of its expense it cannot supersede gas for domestic and general use.—The Established Presbytery of Glasgow have arrived at the conclusion that the altered condition of modern society makes the running of tram-cars on Sundays "a work of necessity and mercy," at least such is the effect of a resolution passed by 28 votes to 19.—At a meeting of farm labourers, held on Wednesday in Southwark, it was stated that the men who took part in the recent demonstration at Exeter Hall had been grossly deceived by the leaders of the agitation. Neither lodging nor refreshment were provided for them, and after the meeting many had to walk the streets all night, whilst others, who took shelter in low lodging-houses in the Mint, were robbed of what little they possessed. One of the speakers said that, had it not been for interested parties, the men would never have struck at the time they did. They had been blinded to their own interests by persons who, after having eaten the flesh off their bones, were now actually sucking the marrow out of them.—The remains of the late George Cruikshank were last week removed from Kensal Green Cemetery to St. Paul's Cathedral. There was no special ceremony.—The deaths are announced of Mr. G. H. Lewes, the eminent and versatile littérateur, and of Mr. Alfred Wigan, the popular actor, of whom we shall shortly publish portraits and biographical notices.—On Monday an accident occurred on the Merthyr Tydfil Railway, by which four of the company's officials lost their lives. Owing to some defect in the metals, the train on which they were working was pitched over an embankment on to a road beneath, and it was ten hours before their bodies were got out of the débris.

THEATRES

THE announcement that an adaptation of M. Augier's comedy, Les Fourchambault, was preparing for representation at the HAYMARKET Theatre awakened some misgivings among readers who are acquainted with the original piece, which was brought out at the Théâtre Français last April. This is one of those sentimental comedies for which the modern French stage is so famous. It sets forth the marvellous devotion and forgiveness of a mother towards her child. Fourchambault, a merchant, has deserted the lady on the ground of some idle calumny invented for the express purpose of prejudicing him against her, and mother and son have lived, apparently unnoticed by him, for some forty years, during which time, without any aid from his father, of whose name and very existence he has remained ignorant, the young man has grown rich. Yet the mother is represented as so touched by the news that her betrayer is in difficulties through a panic, that she implores her son to go to his assistance, thereby unintentionally revealing to her middle-aged offspring the relations in which the parties stand. Thereupon the audience are called on to believe that the son, moved by his mother's entreaties, and by a kind of mystic filial and fraternal instinct, preserves the Fourchambaults from ruin at an enormous cost to himself, reforms various matters in their domestic circle, and finally wins them from selfish and extravagant habits to the recognition of better principles. With the main thread of this story are interwoven other minor threads of a similarly ultra-sentimental kind. The task of Mr. Albery, therefore, in converting the piece into a story of English life and manners has not been an easy one; but if he has not attained an absolute success, there is still room to admire the skill and tact with which he has proceeded. The Crisis, which is the title of his version, represents a circle of friends and relations who do rather strange things from rather impalpable motives, and now and then both common sense and good taste are shocked by a certain want of refinement both in the incidents and the treatment they receive. Yet the piece furnishes genuine amusement, and the story to a certain extent interests. Somehow the spirit of comedy has to a great degree evaporated, but in its place we have much dialogue that is clever and humorous. Mrs. John Wood, as Mrs. Denham, the extravagant, vain, self-seeking wife of the gentleman who corresponds to the M. Fourchambault of the original, says perhaps more oddly characteristic things, and delivers herself of more good jokes, than have fallen to her lot for a long time; and the acting of Miss Louise Moodie, as the neglected and long-suffering mother, wanted really nothing but a little more truth and nature in the part and its surroundings to create a very powerful impression. Perhaps the same might be said of Mr. Charles Kelly's performance of the part of her son, for it is not the fault of the actor that this personage is of a rather tediously didactic turn, though a little less severity of tone and manner would certainly win for him more sympathy from the audience. Miss Eastlake plays an incidental, but not unimportant, part with singular vivacity and grace, and in more serious situations changes these qualities for a very earnest, truthful, and impressive manner of delivery. Unhappily, her relations with the Fourchambault, or rather Denham, family, by whom she is supposed to be engaged as a governess, convey almost from first to last an unpleasant impression to the audience. Altogether the comedy is really admirably acted. Mr. David Fisher, jun., Miss Lucy Buckstone, Mr. Howe, and Mr. Terriss, who sustain less prominent but not by any means insignificant parts, are equally good in their way. Brilliant scenes, and tasteful and liberal decorations, add to the attractiveness of the piece; nor must we omit to mention the rich attire, changed again and again, with which Mrs. John Wood almost overpowers the senses of the spectator. With all its faults, Mr. Albery's clever adaptation deserves the success it has achieved. It is pretty safe to predict that The Crisis will not fail this season to attract audiences to the Haymarket.

We would gladly record if we could an equally happy result in the case of Messrs. Albery and Hatton's new romantic drama at the PRINCESS'S, which bears the strange title of No. 20, or the Bastille of Calvados. This is an elaborate melodrama, with a murder scene, an escape from a fortress prison, an audacious scoundrel, and a pair of persecuted lovers; but it is not because its elements are tolerably well known that it failed to interest. Experienced playgoers do not expect much novelty in the materials of a melodramatic story; and a robust appetite, so to speak, for melodramatic entertainments will no more reject familiar incidents than a hungry man will expect originality of aspect or flavour in a roast sirloin. It is, in brief, not the familiarity of the incidents, but the failure to present them in the shape of a harmonious and interesting story, which constitutes the complaint against No. 20. Miss Fowler is really a very agreeable heroine, and if she is not a powerfully pathetic actress she can yet move our feelings when the opportunity is afforded. Mr. Barnes, who plays the romantic hero for whose sake Miss Fowler is seen to carry a coil of ropes made up into a petticoat (an unsafe garment to deal with before an audience otherwise tempted to laugh at inconvenient times), is also a manly hero of presentable appearance. It was not indeed from any short-comings on their part that lack of sympathy was felt. Mr. Charles Warner, however, certainly performed the part of a cold-blooded malefactor, who is also a gay hysterical and obstreperous personage, in a fashion which tended to exaggerate certain absurdities of which the joint authors are guilty. The coldness with which an elaborately fantastic and humorous ballet was received should be a warning to the authors that on the stage there is a time for all things; and that the vagaries of Punchinello are out of place while villainy is flourishing unchecked, and the hero and heroine are waiting to rush into each others' arms. There is nevertheless, ingenuity in the laying out of the story, which betokens some faculty for writing plays of this description. The work, we may add, is entirely original; and it is put on the stage with every advantage in the way of scenery and ingenious mechanical contrivances.

With the exception of a few performances by Mrs. Hermann Vezin at the Haymarket and the Queen's Theatres, no revival of Cymbeline has taken place since Miss Helen Faucit played the part of Imogen, fourteen years ago, until Wednesday evening last, when this play was selected by Miss Wallis for her benefit at DRURY LANE. Cymbeline—in spite of its many beautiful passages—is not one of its author's masterpieces; and, if the "divine William" had submitted his plot to a modern Lord Chamberlain, he would certainly have found his "growing reputation" interfered with by a prohibitory decree. Nevertheless, Imogen is a favourite part for ambitious young actresses, and Miss Wallis displayed considerable tenderness and power in her delineation, especially in the "Milford-Haven" scenes. We should like her still better if she could get rid of a certain shrewishness of tone and of facial expression in the more forcible passages. She was excellently supported as Leonatus Posthumus by Mr. Edward Compton, a very promising young actor; and it is scarcely necessary to say that Mr. Ryder was a good, though somewhat conventional, Iachimo.

HENGLER'S GRAND CIRQUE.——Mr. C. Hengler and his company have taken up their quarters again at the Grand Cirque, Oxford Circus, where a most pleasing entertainment is provided of great variety, introducing some very clever riders, beautiful horses, and athletic performers, the marvellous feats of strength by the Brothers Gilfort, comic interludes by the funniest of clowns, and many other attractions, which should not fail to produce as large audiences as on the opening night, especially during the coming holiday time.

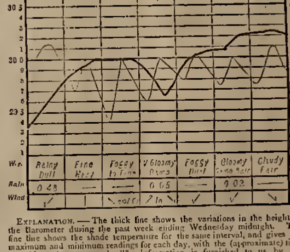
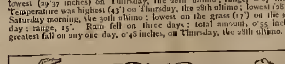
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

NOVEMBER 28TH TO DECEMBER 4TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The weather during this period has been on the whole cold, damp, and gloomy. At the commencement of the week a depression was found in our neighbourhood, and strong north-easterly winds prevailed, with exceedingly wet weather. Friday and Saturday, 29th and 30th, were rather finer; but on Sunday, the 1st instant, another disturbance passed over us, and rain again fell. Since that time the barometer has risen steadily, and we have been under the influence of an area of high pressure; but, as is commonly found at this season of the year, the anti-cyclonic conditions have been accompanied by a good deal of cloud and mist, and temperature has been very low. At the close of the period we find that the barometer is inclined to fall, and changes which are going on in other parts of the country seem to indicate that a period of warmer weather, with winds backing from north-west to west and south-west, is about to succeed. The barometer was highest (30·24 inches) on Wednesday, the 4th instant: lowest (29·37 inches) on Thursday, the 28th ultimo; range, 0·87 inches. Temperature was highest (43°) on Thursday, the 28th ultimo; lowest (28°) on Saturday morning, the 30th ultimo; lowest on the grass (17°) on the same day: range, 15°. Rain fell on three days: total amount, 0·55 inches; greatest fall on any one day, 0·48 inches, on Thursday, the 28th ultimo.



SCRAPS

AN INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION will be held in Mexico next year.

MR. BRET HARTE purposes to deliver his lecture, "The Argonauts of '49," an illustration of early Californian life, this winter, in London and in the principal provincial towns.

A REGICIDAL SOCIETY, entitled the Nobiling Club, has, it is stated, been founded at Leghorn, the prospectus coolly announcing that the name of the Society is sufficient indication of its object.

JOURNALISTS IN SOUTH AMERICA are not too politely treated by angry rivals. Thus the Buenos Ayres Herald reproves a Spanish contemporary, the Nacional, for styling certain obnoxious reporters, "Vile worms of earth, you live by what you can steal from others."

M. VICTOR HUGO'S PORTRAIT is being painted by the well-known French artist, Bonnat, for next year's Salon. Only two portraits of M. Hugo have ever been painted—one, taken by Auguste de Chatillon, in 1838, represents the author seated holding his youngest son in front of him; in the other, by Louis Boulanger, and dating from 1842, M. Hugo is standing.

AN ARISTOCRATIC CHRISTMAS NUMBER.——Among the contributors to the Vanity Fair Winter Number, which will be published on the 10th inst., are the Duke of Beaufort, the Duke of Manchester, the Marquis of Londonderry, the Earl of Winchilsea and Nottingham, the Earl of Dunmore, the Earl of Desart, the Countess Batthyany, Lady Florence Dixie, and Mr. Bret Harte.

A NOVEL AND HARMLESS KIND OF DUEL is specially recommended to Gallic statesmen by the Ulk, a Berlin comic journal, the Gambetta-Fourtou encounter having excited much derision in Germany. Each combatant would grasp the end of an enormous Christmas cracker containing some libellous verses, at a given signal they would pull the cracker, and the person in whose hands the verses remained would be considered the conquered party.

THE NEW KING OF BURMAH appears to have a somewhat unpleasant propensity for throwing spears about him. Recently an unfortunate courtier having incurred his displeasure His Majesty flung a spear at the offender, hitting him in the side, while when a Court herald appeared in a white coat which was too short for Royal taste, the monarch soundly rated the culprit, and, thinking that the reproof was not received with due humility, thrust a spear into his body.

A BAROMETRICAL UMBRELLA is owned by an unlucky Frenchman, who finds his property an admirable weather-gauge, but a totally insufficient protection from the rain. The stick is made of some wood so susceptible to atmospheric changes as to become a perfect hygrometer. Thus, in damp, and rainy weather, the stick swells so much that the owner cannot put up the umbrella, while on dry days the wood resumes its normal condition, and the umbrella can be used at will.

AN UNPUBLISHED COMPOSITION BY ROSSINI is to be played shortly at Monte Cavallo as a serenade to the King and Queen of Italy. It is a fanfare for military band, and was composed for the late Victor Emmanuel in return for his present to Rossini of the cross of a new Order, the Crown of Italy, founded on the marriage of the present King Humbert. Rossini called his fanfare the "Crown of Italy," but the work, composed in 1868, has lain unused till the present time.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING.——Mr. H. Wilde, of Manchester, whose name is so honourably associated with the subject of electric lighting, calls our attention to the description of a new form of "candle" devised by M. Rapieff, which appeared in last week's issue. Mr. Wilde points out that this method of burning the carbons, and lighting them automatically in the manner shown, forms the subject-matter of letters patent granted to him on the 17th of August last. He also informs us that one of the electric lighting companies has purchased the right to introduce the system into public use. We may mention that our description and illustration were taken from the lamp itself, as shown by M. Rapieff in his laboratory at The Times office.

"SIR WILFRID LAWSON," writes the Pall Mall Gazette, "might do worse than undertake a crusade in Russia, where the prospects of the Permissive Bill are not bright. It is stated that some Polish Roman Catholic priests lately succeeded in inducing their parishioners to abandon the use of alcoholic liquors. The local authorities complained of this to the Governor of Grodno, who thereupon ordered an inquiry. The priests were found to have acted solely for the purpose of benefiting their parishioners; but the Governor of Grodno ordered them to be transported to the interior of Russia, in order to give them time to reflect there on the presumption of depriving a paternal Government, by preaching sobriety, of the revenue from the duty on spirits."

LONDON MORTALITY increased last week, and 1,624 deaths were registered against 1,547 during the previous seven days, an increase of 77, but being 126 below the average. There were 70 deaths from scarlet fever (an increase of 16, but 19 below the average), 28 from measles (an increase of 10), 7 from diphtheria (a lower number than during any week since the beginning of last August), 52 from different forms of fever (an increase of 28, and exceeding the average by 10), 8 from small-pox, 39 from whooping-cough, 14 from diarrhœa, and 441 from diseases of the respiratory organs (an increase of 13, but being 3 below the average). There were 2,427 births registered against 2,530 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 39·0 deg., or 2·6 deg. below the average. The duration of registered sunshine was 4·1 hours, the sun being 57·7 hours above the horizon.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT is likely to be largely adopted in Sheffield, according to Engineering. In Sheffield and the neighbourhood, the mills are of exceptional magnitude, and from the nature of the work carried on are mostly on the ground floor, being thus more easily lighted. On account also of the extensive nature of the machinery there is generally from ten to twenty horse-power unemployed in the engines,—the amount of the steam which is seen "blowing off" showing clearly the waste—and this power may be used for the producing of the electric current necessary to the light. One firm have already illuminated their large works with the light, and have found it highly satisfactory. A Daily News telegram also tells us that Mr. Edison has succeeded in inventing a meter for the measurement of the current used in the light, and, further, that his plan for subdividing the light without loss is now complete. He is now engaged upon experiments to reduce the cost of the light, and these finished will make the invention public.

A NATIONAL MUSEUM OF HYGIENE.——The Parkes Museum of Hygiene, has been established for the purpose of diffusing a practical knowledge of sanitary science, and although quite in its infancy, contains objects relating to life-protection, dietetics, clothing, furnishing, engineering, and architecture, in fact, every branch of Hygiene. The library already consists of between 300 and 400 volumes, exclusive of pamphlets. The Queen has marked her approval of the undertaking by contributing 50*l.* to the fund, while the Council of University College have aided the Executive Committee by temporarily placing a large room at their disposal, together with a second room for the purposes of the library. It cannot be too widely known that it is intended to extend the benefits of the Museum to all classes, so that not only professional men, but owners of property, employers of labour, artisans, and others, both men and women, may be able to study at their leisure the subjects in which they are most interested. In order that the Museum may become a great Central Institution for the instruction of the public, an endowment is absolutely necessary to meet the working expenses, independently of the probability that it will ultimately become necessary to erect a separate building for its reception. The Executive Committee, whose Chairman is Sir William Jenner, therefore confidently appeal for pecuniary support to all who are interested in technical education and sanitary science. The Committee will not only be glad to receive subscriptions of money, but also books and pamphlets in any language, statistical tables, maps, plans, and other drawings, models, apparatus, or specimens illustrating any branch of Hygiene. Subscriptions may be paid to the Treasurer, Mr. Berkeley Hill, 55, Wimpole Street, W. Cheques should be crossed "Union Bank," and Post Office Orders made payable at Vere Street. All communications relating to the presentation of articles to the Museum should be addressed to the Curator, Mr. Mark H. Judge, Parkes Museum, University College, Gower Street, W.C. A detailed prospectus, which has been kindly prepared for the Committee by Mr. Twining, of Twickenham, and further information, will be forwarded on application to the Curator.

By JAMES PAYN,

AUTHOR OF "LOST SIR MASSINGBERD," "BY PROXY," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

THE NIGHT WATCH

THE storm had abated nothing of its ferocity, yet none of the party at the Point thought of going home. It seemed to all of them, though they could do nothing in the way of help, that it was a forsaking of these poor drowning creatures to quit their post. But the Hall folks did leave the quay and withdraw into the mill, from the windows of which they continued to watch the doomed vessel.

"Was not this poor Miss Hurt," asked Sir Robert of Mr. Walcot, "to have come to us last month instead of now?" The baronet knew almost nothing of the domestic arrangements at the Hall, which were effected without any consultation with him by his wife—not, however, without some indirect assistance from Mr. Walcot. He never "meddled," but her ladyship, who was of an indolent disposition, had always the advantage of his advice, and to say truth it was generally valuable. Mr. Walcot hastened to explain.

"No, Arden, you are confusing Miss Hurt, the German governess, with Annabel Spence, who, but for some indisposition, was to have come last month to be the young ladies' maid."

"Oh, yes; I remember my wife said you had recommended her."

"Nay, it was not quite that. The young person was spoken of very highly by a common friend of ours; indeed I think she mentioned her to Lady Arden first. I never set eyes on her but once in my life; but her story touched me, and would have touched you, with your tender sensibilities, even more. You remember the Swintons who lived at Makerly Hall; our dear Madeline used to rather like them you know."

"Did she?" he sighed. "I had forgotten—and yet I thought I had forgotten nothing in connection with her. Yes, I remember the name of Swinton. This girl, then, was in service with the family."

"Oh, no; it is a much stranger history. The old man had a son who died at college, and after his death it was found that he had left an illegitimate child. This was Annabel Spence. His mother was anxious to adopt her, but the old man would not hear of it."

"Dear, dear," said Sir Robert. "It was a difficult case as to morals, but I hope he was not hard upon her."

"Well, something was done for the child; but Mrs. Swinton died first, and her wishes were no longer attended to."

"That was abominable," exclaimed Sir Robert. "The wishes of the dead ought to be sacred."

"Of course, that is your view, Arden; but all men are not cast in the same mould. This girl then, fatherless, and, as it happened, not perhaps so unfortunately, motherless also, was left utterly unprovided for at her grandfather's death. A friend of Lady Arden's did what she could for her—put her in service and so on; but she is now out of place. She has the highest character from her employers. There is nothing against her except the misfortune of her birth; and I judged that that would not be an objection in your eyes."

"You judged well, Walcot; and my wife also—it was the more creditable in her, however, being a woman."

"Ah, you know human nature, Arden. It is, as you say, to Lady Arden's credit that this poor girl is her protégée. But it is as well that the circumstances of the case should be kept to ourselves."

"Certainly; though it behoves those who know them to be all the kinder to the girl on that account—— Do you know anything of this poor Miss Hurt?"

"Nothing whatever, except that she too is an orphan girl, highly accomplished, I believe, who has been recommended to Lady Arden by a German friend."

"I fear she will never touch English soil," said Sir Robert, glancing at the foam-covered wreck.

"I fear not; still if she is doomed to meet with so unhappy a fate I had rather it happened now, while she is unknown to us, than after she had been under your roof."

"Our sorrow would be more personal, of course, in that case."

"Yes; but I was thinking of Annette Roy. She was poor Madeline's governess, you know; the one that was lost on her passage to Havre, with her father, at Christmas time. Did she never tell you about it?"

"Yes, yes; but my memory is not what it was. I remember it but very dimly." He spoke with a nervous eagerness uncalled for, as it seemed, by the occasion. "What was it?"

"Well, it was a strange story; this Annette was an old-fashioned little woman, who dressed in a mob-cap, and looked like a buy-a-broom girl. She was very particular about all her little possessions, and when she went away that Christmas left a huge box in one of the attics with a written notice on it that it was not to be opened till her return. She never did return, and her father who was drowned with her was the only representative she had in the world; so the question was, What was to be done with the box? However, nothing was done. It lay untouched for a year till a certain bill for her happened to come in from some tradesman by whom it had been forgotten; when it seemed only reasonable that this should be discharged by the sale of her effects. On the day that my father had come to this decision one of the maids who had only been with us a few months ran down to him, half frightened out of her wits, to say that there was a strange woman in the attic. She said 'she stared at her like a dead creature, and had a baggy lace cap on.'"

"Yes, yes," said Sir Robert, "I remember it all now; my poor Madeline saw the figure herself."

"Well, she thought she saw it," replied Mr. Walcot; "I am slow to believe such stories. Still occurrences of that kind are disagreeable in a house; and whether they occur or not they are easily imagined. That is why I said I am glad for your sake that this was poor Miss Hurt's first voyage rather than her second. When any inmate of a house comes to a violent end superstitious ideas are always suggested."

"I would prefer to say that spiritual conditions are likely to be induced, Walcot," answered the other, gravely. "If, for instance, instead of my sweet Madeline having expired tranquilly in my arms, such a fate as that of yonder poor creature had overtaken her, I should, I know, have been haunted by her dripping form, her fair hair draggled in the brine—pshaw; I tremble to think of it."

There was a look of horror on Sir Robert's face at least as marked as that which the spectacle of the shipwreck had at first evoked on it; it was curious under such circumstances that Mr. Walcot should have pursued the subject; but perhaps he thought the opportunity for the administration of a little pure reason was not to be thrown away. His silence might have seemed too like adhesion to the other's fantastic views.

"I think you should say, Arden, that in the case you put you would have imagined yourself to be so haunted. When the feelings are deeply moved the Imagination becomes a slave to them."

"One is obliged to believe the evidence of one's own senses," answered Sir Robert, gloomily.

"I do not see the necessity. Moreover, some of our senses are more liable to deception than others."

Sir Robert waved his hand with a deprecatory air. "I know what you are hinting at, Walcot, and appreciate your good intentions. It is no use arguing the matter, and especially"—here he threw a glance at the young people who were crowded at the other window—"since we are not alone. It is enough for me that I know what I know."

Mr. Walcot uttered a sympathising sigh, and was silent. Nothing was heard in the almost empty chamber—the only room the Mill afforded not used for the purposes of trade—but the roaring of the wind and the rattling of the window frames. The minute guns of the ship had long ceased to fire, and, indeed, so far as matters could be made out, the sea had made a clean sweep of her.

Presently there was a knock at the door, and a short thick-set man, with a shawl wound about his neck, presented himself. He held his cap in his hand, and thereby displayed a head covered with red stubble mingled with grey.

"The mistress says," observed he in a strong north-country accent, "that it is very late for the young ladies and the bairns to be out of doors, and the sooner they gang hame the better."

Sir Robert looked displeased. This gardener's rough manner always annoyed him, but for that very reason he passed over certain misdemeanours in the man—especially a fondness for nips of whiskey at premature hours—lest he should act harshly towards him through prejudice.

"That was not her ladyship's own message, Groad," remarked Mr. Walcot, severely.

"Well, no sir," the man's voice took a more respectful tone at once, though it was far from deferential, "I took the mistress's orders from Mr. Beamish."

"And why didn't Beamish bring the message himself?"

"Because all the breath was out of his body before he got to the kirkyard wall, sir," grinned the gardener. "He was blowed down flat—or at leastways as flat as his shape permitted—by the wind in the wicket gap."

"Oh, Papa dear, don't send us home," pleaded Frank, removing for an instant his sharp thin face from the window pane to which it was glued in rapt excitement. "I do so want to see the lifeboat come."

"And I," echoed Milly; "I am sure I could never get a wink of sleep till I knew what is to become of those poor creatures yonder."

"You can know that, Missie, by just putting a word to any coast-guardsman," observed Groad, slowly; "they all say as they'll be drownded."

"If it is God's will, man, it will be so, and not otherwise," exclaimed Sir Robert, reprovingly. "What do you think, Walcot, about the young people going home?"

Before Mr. Walcot could reply Evelyn interposed, "Of course, if Mamma wishes it, we will go home, but she does not understand that we are in shelter here; and I do think that neither Milly nor Frank will get much rest till they know what happens to these poor people. Baba was sound asleep when I came away, so that we have only ourselves to look after."

"It will be a good many hours," said Sir Robert, doubtfully, and looking at Mr. Walcot.

"Still, as Miss Evelyn says," replied the latter gentleman, "the young folks are too excited to go to sleep. And if they could get refreshments—" Here the door opened again, and admitted a good-looking young fellow bearing a small hamper on his shoulders.

"I have brought some bread and butter and things from the farm," said the new comer, "which Mr. Dyneley sent down, Sir Robert, with his compliments; and he says if a bit of fire was lit here he thinks a cup of tea might be of advantage to the young ladies."

"That is the very thing," said Sir Robert; "now the garrison is victualled for the night. Thank you, Gilbert, it was very thoughtful of Mr. Dyneley, very."

"Well yes, sir; and he hadn't much time to think of anything either. I met him coming to the Hall stables, and saw him start off on the mare like a flash of lightning. She'll take him to Archester if four legs can do it, but the wind is mad upon the moors to-night, and that's the truth."

"Get some sticks, Groad, and light the fire," said Mr. Walcot in a more authoritative voice than he was accustomed to use, even out of Sir Robert's presence. He was a little annoyed, perhaps, by the forethought which the curate had exhibited in sending supplies from his own lodgings at the Manor Farm.

John Groad obeyed, though with a very ill grace; lighting fires, except in a hot-house, being as he considered an operation exceedingly derogatory in a head gardener at eighty pounds a year. He brought the sticks, "as cross as two of them," as Gilbert Holme afterwards observed, and even produced a kettle and coals. In a few minutes the apartment lost much of its cheerless aspect, and Master Frank found his attention divided between the shipwreck and an impromptu repast. Their exposure to the wind had given him and Milly a vigorous appetite, but the others only took a cup of tea.

"How I wish," sighed Evy, "I could give a draught of this to those poor shuddering souls upon the wreck; it seems quite shocking to be warm and to have no wants, while they are perishing yonder of wet and cold."

"Tea would do them little good I fear, Miss Evelyn," said Mr. Walcot. "They are past that by this time. There is plenty of brandy for them on the quay, however, if they ever reach it."

"May it please God that they may," observed Evelyn, fervently.

Sir Robert said nothing; his eyes were fixed upon the casement, but his finger was raised mechanically, as if for silence.

"What is it, Arden?" inquired Mr. Walcot in a whisper.

"She is speaking to me," replied he, in the same under tone. "I heard her say 'Robert, Robert.'"

"You mean you imagined you did; pray remember we are not alone."

"Yes, yes: that makes no matter to her, however. It was a more cheerful voice than usual, Walcot. It seemed to say, 'Be of good courage.' I believe these people will be saved."

CHAPTER V.

A TIFF

How few even of so-called educated persons, who trust themselves every day to the risks of a railway journey, have any intelligent reason for the faith that is in them. What the ordinary traveller knows of steam-power, or the method by which it acts, is next to nothing; and it is doubtful whether he is even acquainted with the means by which his carriage is kept (when it is kept) from going off the line. It is quite as well, perhaps, that this blissful ignorance exists, if the opinion once expressed to me by one of the most eminent of our railway engineers is a correct one. "If the public only knew," said he, "the risks they run, especially the 'shaves,' which take place in every railway journey of any length that they undertake, they would stay at home, or set up the coaches again." And if such is the ignorance of our land travellers, how much greater is that of our voyagers by sea, the whole confiding class that is included under the head "Passenger."

It was a type of this class, rather than an exception to it, that Thomas Hood alluded to, in the lady who, being in a vessel which the winds and waves were hurrying to its doom, exhibited such courage and high spirits because she had the Captain's own assurance that "they were going on shore."

When the good ship Rhineland started from Rotterdam for Bristol on what turned out to be her last voyage, the weather was what seamen term "dirty;" but it was not for those who had paid the very moderate passage money demanded of them to enquire whether that phrase did not, in this particular case at least, mean "dangerous." They could not be expected to understand that when a large consignment of cattle are eating their heads off at a shipowner's expense, a vessel puts to sea in weather that, under other circumstances, would keep her in port, or even that the presence of cattle on the deck of a steamer does not tend to increase its seaworthiness. Except those unhappy persons who never go to sea at all without a presentiment that they shall be drowned, and behold in every wave the instrument of their destruction, the passengers by the Rhineland were without misgivings. Those subject to sea-sickness at once fled to their berths to hide their agonies from the public gaze, and the others repaired to the saloon—the sofas of which rocked like cradles—or secured themselves in such shelter as they could find upon the deck, to snatch a fearful joy from the contemplation of the work of a southwester.

Among these latter were two persons, with one of whom, Elise Hurt, we are acquainted by name. She is a girl of eighteen years of age or so, of graceful figure, and a face, which, if not beautiful, according to our English notions, is, at least, eminently pleasing. She is tall and fair, and, well, yes, plump. No other word exactly expresses that particular contour, which, however, it may err in years to come on the side of stoutness, is for the present all that can be desired in the way of shapeliness, and no more. Her hair is of a light auburn, and very plentiful; her eyes, of tender blue, are large and thoughtful, and their long lashes droop over them in a manner which Solomon (who was a good judge of such matters) evidently appreciated; he talks of a lady "taking" one with her eyelids; and this is what Elise Hurt's eyelids did. They took you, or "fetched" you, as we moderns express it, in spite of all resistance.

The young Englishman by her side upon the deck has, however, made no resistance at all, and to judge by the expression of his bronzed and handsome face, as he arranges his railway rug about her shoulders, he hugs the chain that has enslaved him. His arrangements for her comfort are complete enough, yet he always seems to imagine that something is wanting; and his solicitude appears somewhat to embarrass her. She explains to him in the German tongue, which he perfectly understands, that she is quite comfortable; and also informs him in a natural and simple way that she is unaccustomed to such kind attentions.

"You will quite spoil me, sir," she says, "if you take so much trouble about me, who am not only used to look after myself, but must always do so."

"You don't know how to take care of your own money," says he with a good-natured smile, that becomes his olive face exceedingly.

"That is true—or at least it was so on one occasion. If you had not picked up my little purse in the church yesterday, or if it had fallen into bad hands, it would have been a great misfortune to me—nay, a catastrophe."

"I did not know I had averted a catastrophe," replied the young man. "But it was surely imprudent of you to carry so much money about in your pocket."

"'So much money' was only a few pounds, sir; but then you see it was all I had."

The young gentleman's eyes grew very pitiful. He had a kind heart which was always sorry for poor people; but it was especially sorry for this particular victim of poverty. It seemed so hard that one so young and so beautiful should be so poor.

"But had you no friend in Rotterdam?"

"No; my aunt—who is my only friend to call such—lives at Heidelberg. My money must last me for many months, though indeed," she added, with a smile, "if all goes well I expect to make more in England, and to return home quite rich."

"And how is it, if I may make so bold, that you propose to acquire this fortune?"

"I am engaged as a governess in the house of a rich English family. A friend of my aunt's was so good as to recommend me, though I have never been out before."

"Poor thing," ejaculated the young man in English. She laughed aloud.

"Take care what you say," said she. "I have been learning your language—though it is expressly enjoined on me that I am not to speak it—to some purpose. I do not consider myself a 'poor thing' at all, I do assure you, but a very lucky girl."

"Lucky! What to be leaving your only friend, and your native land, for a strange country, and a stranger's roof. It seems to me you are thankful for small mercies. If your case were mine I know I should think it a very hard one."

"I hope not; for in the first place, you see, I am no longer an encumbrance to my aunt, who has pinched herself for my sake. Then the lady I am going to, I am assured, is kind, as indeed I gather from her letters. My salary is a better one than I could expect. I like teaching young people, too; and it is a great thing when duty and inclination go together."

"Is it?—No doubt it is—of course," added the young man, hastily; for he saw that his naïve rejoinder had somewhat shocked his companion. "You see unfortunately I have no duties. Life has been made very easy for me."

"Still, I should think you would be happier if you made some object for yourself in life."

"I am not sure; I am happy enough—or at least I used to be so. I used to feel that I had all that I wanted. And then I am so incurably indolent."

"To know one's faults is half-way, they say, towards remedying them," observed the girl, in cheerful tones.

"Not in my case. For example, I was as nearly as possible late for the packet this morning, notwithstanding that I had a very particular reason for coming by it."

"Ah, then, you have more important matters on hand after all, it seems, than you would wish me to believe."

"I have no objection to your knowing about this particular one—the reason why I wanted to come by the Rhineland. It was because I heard you say that you were going by it."

"Sir, I do not think it is right," said the girl, with quiet dignity, "that you should say such things to me. Such idle compliments may please young ladies in your own rank of life. To one in mine they are quite inappropriate and, I must add, in my own particular case, distasteful."

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated the object of this censure. "It was unnecessary for you to say that. I could see that I had made a fool of myself before you opened your mouth. I am constantly doing that however——"

"With young ladies whom you meet accidentally in foreign churches?" put in the other, gravely.

"No; there upon my honour you wrong me. I speak thoughtlessly, I know, out of the fulness of my heart; but I am no philanderer—what do you call it in German—a male flirt. I despise such a character; and I should still more despise the man who, taking advantage of having performed a trifling service to an unprotected young lady to win her confidence, should venture to breathe a syllable to her that should be 'distasteful.'"

The young fellow spoke with fluency enough, but with earnestness also; there was no glibness about his tone; it was plain to see that he had been very much moved and hurt by the suggestion that he had behaved improperly.

"I am quite sure that you did not intend any rudeness," said the young lady gently.

"I hope not, Miss Hurt. I trust that I am at least a gentleman. What annoys me, however, is that you, of all people, should have supposed me capable of such misconduct. I trust I am saying nothing 'distasteful' in avowing that your good opinion is of great consequence to me."

"I can hardly understand how that can be," was the quiet reply; "since you never saw me before yesterday, and we are only acquainted with each other's names, Mr. Gresham."

"I cannot understand it either," replied he quickly; "I only know it is so. Before I saw you, heard you speak, or took your hand—for these three events that to you, it seems, look so trivial, are now epochs in my existence—I was a waif and stray in the world. It mattered not to me where I dwelt or whither I went. As it happened I was going to Paris and thence to England, where I have that home and friends which you tell me I do not sufficiently appreciate. You are a little hard upon me there, for I like my home and love my friends dearly; yet, I will confess, that until yesterday I felt like a ship without sails or anchor, drifting here and there, as the wind might blow. Now all that is changed; I do not venture to hope that you will believe it: but I cannot think I have done wrong in telling you the simple truth."

"I am sure you are speaking what you believe to be the truth, Mr. Gresham," answered the young girl, gravely; "but I am not sure that you have not done wrong in telling it me. On the other hand, I am quite certain that I should do wrong to listen to you any further. I thank you heartily for all your kindness to me; but your words have put an end to our acquaintance. I am going below, and shall remain there till we reach land. Good day, sir."

And she rose from her seat, and held on to the nearest rope, which had long become a necessary precaution to all on deck who would keep their footing.

"Miss Hurt, you are surely not in earnest!" exclaimed the young man. "The punishment you would thus inflict upon me for a venial fault is——oh! you cannot guess what it is: you are taking away my life blood."

"If it really seems so, Mr. Gresham," answered the girl firmly; "the discipline, harsh as it may appear, is only the more necessary to you. I am a friendless girl, and you are a gentleman of fortune. The gulf between us—since you compel me to speak of such a matter—is deeper than any between yonder crested waves. I depend upon your honour, and because I am sure you would not do a cowardly action, not to follow me."

With steps so hasty, that they did not permit of his offering her any aid, and catching here and there for support, at ropes and blocks, she reached the cabin stairs in a few seconds, and disappeared.

To say truth, this proceeding had required of Elise Hurt not only courage but self-denial. In her own heart she did not think that there was either wrong or danger in what Mr. Gresham had said to her. She only felt that she ought to think so.

Her bringing-up had been of a prudent and somewhat narrow kind—yet not on that account less adapted to her circumstances, which were narrow also. Her aunt, to whose sole care she had been left from an early age, was a solid, sensible woman—of which Germany has perhaps a larger share than most nations—and she well understood that her niece could not afford, as girls more blessed with this world's goods might do, to receive any kindness from strange gentlemen that exceeded the limits of mere civil attention; and in particular she had warned her against listening to the first words of flattery, or compliment, unless they were so light as to be dispersed by a wholesome laugh. She had taken care also to instil in Elise's mind a proper understanding of her own position, out of which it was very unlikely that she should be raised by marriage, especially in England, where social distinctions were so strongly marked. This advice, winnowed by the machinery of her delicate nature from its more coarse and calculating fibres, Elise had laid to heart, and was now profiting by. But, at the same time, it cost her not a little to exchange the breezy deck, with the comforts that Gresham's hand had provided for her there, for the stifling saloon, where no such pleasant companionship awaited her. And his society had been very pleasant. Most young ladies appreciate the attentions of a well-bred, handsome young fellow, who, naturally indolent, evidently puts himself out of the way to give them pleasure; his youth and respectful ways are agreeable to them; his honied talk, if it is not insipid, is music to them. And if this is so in the general case, how much more grateful was such an acquaintance to a friendless, almost penniless girl, quite unaccustomed to be made much of, and who had never listened to a compliment, neatly turned, from the lips of any man. She blamed Mr. Gresham's folly for having put it out of her power to enjoy his society any longer; but she forgave him. It was very foolish of him to entertain such feelings as he had expressed to her, of course, but if he really did entertain them; if, as he said, he had merely spoken the simple truth to her out of the fulness of his heart, she must needs pity him. But she pitied herself also.

As for Mr. Gresham, left alone on the slanting deck in undisputed possession of his railway rug, he was furious with himself for having kept no better guard upon his tongue. Any one but himself, he argued, would have had more sense than to insinuate, far less declare, his passion for this simple, innocent girl, on so short an acquaintance. He might well congratulate himself that she had not taken his words as a positive insult; that she had set him down for the fool he was, instead of a scoundrel. It had been the height of self-conceit in him to take it for granted that the grateful acquiescence with which this poor, friendless girl had received his attentions, was a reciprocation of his own ardent feelings. What was there in a great hulking fellow like him, that almost at first sight a modest young woman should have been ready to listen to his protestations of love—for what he had said to her, he admitted, was nothing less. He had picked up her purse for her, it is true; but in returning it to her he had only shown that he was not a thief—certainly not acquired the right to talk to her as a lover. It was a sign he felt his mistake very seriously, that he did not grumble to himself because he had foregone the delights of Paris and the pleasure of meeting Fred Mayne, his old college friend, there, as had been agreed upon, all for nothing—or for worse than nothing—as the being snubbed by this young woman might well be termed. Miss Elise Hurt was the exclusive object of his reflections and regret. He reproached himself for having gone so far as he had done with her, upon another account, also, which for the present need not be mentioned, especially as if he had succeeded in getting her to listen to him, he would not have experienced much remorse. Moreover, though that was a small thing, in comparison with the main distress and disappointment, he had deprived himself by his own folly of a charming companion on the voyage. And such a voyage as it was likely to be! The packet, half laden with cattle, was by no means the sort of craft which Mr. Gresham was wont to patronise. He always went by the best steamer and by the shortest route. He was never sea sick; but he did not like to be inconvenienced. And now what had he let himself in for? A voyage at the best, of uncertain duration, in a clumsy vessel, labouring in a raging sea against a gale from the south-west; while at the worst—though to do him justice, he was not one to look on the black side of things—he might find himself united with the object of his affections—at the bottom of the Channel.

NOVEMBER ON THE ATLANTIC

It is a peculiarity of the Atlantic, cheerful or otherwise, according to circumstances, that no one can anticipate with moderate certainty the sort of weather that may prevail in crossing from one hemisphere to the other. You may start in fair weather, and be buffeted by storms for nine days out of the ten occupied by the journey; or you may start in a storm, and presently steam into sunshine and smooth water. Generally speaking, June is a pleasant month to cross in, whilst the prospect of a voyage in November is one which few regard with complacency. Yet June has its storms not less renowned than those of December, and November brings unexpected streaks of good luck to Atlantic passengers. The voyage of the Sardinian, the sister ship of the vessel honoured by the preference of the new Governor-General of Canada, profited by one of these breaks in the gloom of November, and so achieved a passage which has actually become famous as the quickest ever made between England and the Dominion.

The good luck which, without a break, marked the voyage was notably shown at the outset. By the time the ship was due off the north coast of Ireland there was also due, according to the obliging arrangements of the New York Herald, a storm of more than average severity. I have not heard whether the appointment was kept, being content to know that if the storm came at all it spent itself outside the limit of the Sardinian's track. Indeed it seems that the periodic storms with which we in England have of late been so familiar, and whose coming is only too faithfully presaged "by telegraph from New York," come with the flow of the Gulf Stream. The Allan Line track to Quebec lies to the north of the Gulf Stream, and once clear of the British coasts Canadian passengers can read weather forecasts with that equanimity which is possible when we are considering other people's misfortunes. Thus it was with the Sardinian and her passengers. At no time of the year does the Atlantic enjoy the perfect rest which voyagers experience, say on a passage between the Temple Stairs and Westminster. At the best of times, when the ocean seems a vast lake with an almost unruffled surface, there is a long rolling swell which rocks the ship with a perceptible motion. But when you are prepared for a storm, you are not inclined to complain of a light breeze, and no landsman reasonably expects to cross the Atlantic without a certain amount of discomfort. So the passengers on the Sardinian made the best of it. They came down to the first dinner on the Atlantic in great force, though not free from the apprehension that "that few should part where many meet." They stayed as long as they could—some seeing the dinner fairly through, others disappearing at various stages. This was, it must be admitted, on the whole a doleful night—not that the sea was rough, but that the motion was unaccustomed. With the next day matters mended; the social barometer went up and continued rising steadily, till on the seventh day newly-made friends parted regretfully at Rimouski, and those who went on to Quebec spoke kindly of others who had left vacant places at the dinner-table.

On board ship is, perhaps, the only place where the Briton on his travels is endurable. We all know ourselves and our counterparts in a railway carriage, or a river steamer, how we look for quiet places where no one shall come between the wind and our nobility, how we button up our pockets, and generally conduct ourselves as if we were in the company of known thieves or suspected fever patients. On an Atlantic steamer all this is changed. There is felt a community possibly of danger, perhaps of discomfort, certainly of helplessness, which rolls smooth all ridges of social distinction, and all wrinkles of self-conceit. We may some of us be exceedingly able fellows and important personages on land. But what are we at sea as compared with the humblest cabin-boy, who, when the ship is rolling, can walk across the deck with a kettle of hot water in his hand, and when she is pitching in a heavy sea can contemplate boiled bacon and cabbage not only without disgust, but with positive relish? However it be, it is certain that on board a ship the most unsociable people grow communicative, and good fellowship everywhere abounds. On this particular voyage there would have been no excuse for any one to have been otherwise than jolly. The Sardinian, a splendid vessel in a storm, was deprived of all opportunity of distinguishing herself in this direction. After the first day out, with occasional intervals of an hour out of the twenty-four, her canvas was all set, and she bowled along at an average speed of fourteen knots. Two days in succession her log showed a run of 330 knots, and on the third day she ran the total up to 345. The mail steamer generally reaches Quebec on the Sunday, frequently on the Monday, and at this time of the year no surprise is felt if she does not appear till the Tuesday. The Sardinian was off Rimouski at five o'clock on the Friday, and was in Quebec at half-past four on Saturday morning. The passage would have been an hour and a-half shorter but for the fact that, no one expecting the steamer at such an hour, the tender at Rimouski was not ready, and an hour and a-half was lost in waiting for her. This was, of course, an unexampled voyage, and, as it has never been equalled since steamers began to go to Canada, it possibly may not be repeated in twenty years. But, under any circumstances, a voyage to Quebec has distinguished recommendations as compared with other routes to the American Continent. From land to land the average passage is not more than six days. Once within the Straits of Belleisle ocean travelling is over, and for hundreds of miles the steamer threads its way, first through the Gulf, and then through the magnificent River St. Lawrence. This is an immense pull, mitigating the terrors of an Atlantic voyage by at least one-fifth.

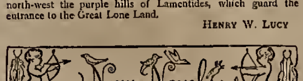
The effect of the first sight of land upon Atlantic passengers is extraordinary, even after a voyage in which there has been nothing worse than "sailing breezes." It is a far cry from the Straits of Belleisle to Quebec, but there is land on either side as the ship steams through the narrow gateway; and, though there are yet two days before the harbour is reached, it is felt that the voyage is practically over.

The sick get suddenly well; those whose sickness is a thing of the past become boisterously convalescent. The merry groups on deck pace up and down with renewed vigour; there is not a vacant seat at dinner; and afterwards, when the cloth is drawn and the long evening has set in, the saloon is crowded with friendly working-parties or card-parties, or companies of readers, who feel so sociable that they must needs sit together in order to the full enjoyment of their books. Everybody knows everybody else by this time, and only regret that they had not made earlier advances in intimacy. There has been no master of the ceremonies, and perhaps no two people have been formally introduced. But we all call each other by name, and seem to have known each other for years instead of days.

Thus, with the crowd below in the snugly-lit saloon, and with the two or three groups indomitably pacing the snow-white deck, the ship speeds on over the moonlit waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. We pass through the Straits at night, and in the morning wake to find ourselves once more out of sight of land. But as the shadows lengthen land looms again upon the horizon.

Here is Anticosti, as big as several English counties. Swiftly passing the island, we come upon the iron-bound coast of New Brunswick. Then follows another moonlit night, showing the ghostly coast on either side, shining in its first white winter dress, and we wake in the morning to find our vessel moored under the historic rock of the Citadel, and looking out from the deck see the busy river, the handsome town, and far away to the north-west the purple hills of Lamentides, which guard the entrance to the Great Lone Land.

Henry W. Lucy



"The Return of the Native," by Thomas Hardy (3 vols.: Smith and Elder).—In this fine work—perhaps the most artistically perfect that we have yet had from him—Mr. Hardy more than retrieves the ground he lost in its immediate predecessor, "The Hand of Ethelberta." Wisely refraining from a second attempt at depicting that life of the great world which one would be inclined to say he knew chiefly by hearsay and from other people's books, he has returned to the rural life which he knows "to the bone," and in the literary presentment of which he is surpassed—if, indeed, he can truly be said to be surpassed—by George Eliot alone. To show to those who have eyes to see that this rural life, placid and somewhat humdrum as it may well look, viewed from afar off, contains within itself all the materials for tragedy, has been a chief aim with Mr. Hardy in all his stories, and in none of them is this aim more marked than in the book before us. The scene of the drama lies altogether on "a vast tract of unenclosed wild" in the south-west of England known as Egdon Heath, an "obscure, obsolete, superseded country," and in the villages that border it, and the tiny clusters of poor cottages scattered here and there over its surface. And the dramatis personæ are really no more than five,—or perhaps we should say six,—only one of whom has any sort of pretensions to be considered as in station above the well-to-do agricultural class; these leading actors being supplemented by that rustic chorus which generally forms one of the most attractive features in the author's novels. With these personages, and the relations they stand in towards each other, we must leave the reader to make acquaintance for himself; for it is not our intention, and would, indeed, be out of the question within our limits, to attempt any outline of Mr. Hardy's story. Its masterpiece is the central figure, Eustacia Vye, who, as granddaughter of a retired naval officer of some kind, is entitled to hold herself somewhat superior to her surroundings—the girl with an eager longing to shine, and a consciousness that she could shine in some dimly-imagined world, but condemned to what to her is imprisonment and mental starvation in the remote and unsympathetic solitudes of Egdon; with a "supersubtle, epicurean heart," in love really with love far more than with her lovers, yet, whilst still dwelling "in maiden meditation," utterly sceptical of love's endurance. Of course such a woman affords precisely the material to suit a writer like Mr. Hardy, never happier than when revelling in intellectual and emotional subtleties. Space forbids us to say more of the book, except that the humour of the author's rustics is as fresh and racy, and his word-pictures as highly-wrought as ever; whilst his style has decidedly gained in power and clearness, and strikes us as freer from mannerisms than heretofore.

"A Great Mystery Solved," being a sequel to "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," by Gillan Vase (3 vols.: Remington and Co.).—We are here offered, with all due apologies for venturing on the completion of a work left unfinished by Dickens, a conjectural solution of the mystery of Edwin Drood's disappearance, of the merits of which the most competent judge would certainly be the gentleman who discussed the subject at some length, and with a thorough mastery over detail, in a recent number of Belgravia. Without claiming for ourselves any pretensions to speak with a like authority, it seems to us that Mr. Vase's solution is ingenious and plausible enough; and, at any rate, his sequel to "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" forms a very readable novel. He has unquestionably succeeded to a surprising extent in catching some of Dickens' tricks of style, so much so that there are passages upon passages here which we should find no difficulty in believing had been written by Dickens himself—only, unfortunately, by Dickens when he gave freest rein to that pathos and boisterous "geniality" of his, which are precisely the qualities in the great literary artist which his discriminating readers regard with least admiration.

"George Hern,' by Henry Glemham (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley).—"George Hern" is a story of very fair interest, by an author who is manifestly a man of singularly wide and varied reading, and has at least the gift of making some among his characters, to wit, all the gentlemen of the Ashbocking family, talk remarkably well if somewhat in the style of the scholars of a past generation. It is on the score of its conversations that we chiefly recommend the book to notice, not but what George Hern is an eminently worthy hero, who has every claim to the reader's sympathies.

We have also received "Elinor," by Clara Talbot (Remington and Co.), a pretty and often very humorous little tale, about a beautiful young lady, who, on the highest motives, insists on becoming a governess, and has the good luck to find her lines cast in unusually pleasant places. The picture of the virtuous British matron, furious with the governess for having—as she insists—ensnared her son into a proposal, and equally furious with her immediately afterwards for having had the presumption to refuse him, is very good, and, indeed, the little book is one altogether to be commended.

MDLLE. AMBRE

"A new vocalist," says the Musical World of the 16th ult., "of great promise and exceptional claims to consideration, is about to appear at Her Majesty's Theatre. Mdlle. Ambre is by birth an African, having first seen the light at Oran, in Algiers. Her parents belonged to a distinguished Moorish family, and were highly regarded in the Court of the late Emperor of Morocco. Both were accomplished in the musical art, and at an early age their child began to give proofs of sympathy in the same direction. Mdlle. Ambre, in short, may be said to have been a musician from her cradle. This speedily declared itself, and, as her inclination was evidently towards singing, she received instruction in the vocal art from an accredited professor, under whom she made progress so rapid as to decide her future vocation. Her studies were perfected at the Marseilles Conservatoire, the director of which, the well known and distinguished Professor Benedict, treated her with marked attention, and watched her advance with the greatest interest.

"Mdlle. Ambre's first public appearance was in Holland, four years since, at the Royal Opera of the Hague, where she showed herself not only a singer endowed with that rare gift, a fine, full-toned, and flexible voice, but an actress instinct with genuine dramatic impulse. Her performances at the Hague elicited praise from every quarter, and not only approval from musicians and amateurs but the high consideration of the Court, the King and Queen themselves ranking amongst her warmest patrons. Her success in Holland drew general attention to her merits, and Paris offering the fairest prospects for her artistic career, Mdlle. Ambre accepted an engagement for three years at the Théâtre Ventadour, the home of the Italian Opera in the great French capital. She made her début six months ago as the heroine of La Traviata, at once obtaining the suffrages of Parisian connoisseurs, who, by no means easy to please, were charmed alike by her personal attractions, her vocal grace and facility, and her dramatic fervour. Mdlle. Ambre's success admitted of no denial. It was, moreover, confirmed by her performance in another and greater opera by Verdi. Though frequently played before, and though the season approached its close, Aida, with Mdlle. Ambre as the new and, for reasons easily understood, congenial heroine, was performed no less than twenty nights in uninterrupted succession. The celebrated composer himself expressed his satisfaction; and thus the future of the interesting young Moorish songstress became established beyond further question. That Mdlle. Ambre is destined to shine as a bright star in the horizon of Italian Opera is the firm conviction of dilettanti in particular and the musical public in general."

THE ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS—PROFESSOR PALMIERI'S OBSERVATORY AT THE FOOT OF THE CONE

FASHIONS

Most of our young readers are studying and talking over their toilettes for the Christmas holidays; many of them are returning to their homes in remote country places, and are expected to appear in the latest London and Parisian novelties, which will set the fashion for many miles around the centre of attraction; it behoves these models to choose carefully, and to avoid all vulgar extremes, which will surely be exaggerated by the copyists. The most important and expensive articles of apparel to be first considered are the boots, shoes, and stockings, for out and indoor wear. In spite of all that our Parisian contemporaries may say to the contrary, we advise our readers to put aside all shoes for walking at this season, at least in the country. One or two pairs of porpoise-hide boots with cork soles, low square heels, buttoned up the side, and reaching half-way up the calf, are and look comfortable; they should be made to measure, and, although expensive, will ar should carry their wearer well through the winter. For indoor morning wear nothing looks neater than an Oxford shoe of black kid, tied with ribbons to match the dress; for the afternoon the Watteau shoe in black kid or satin, with a coloured bow, is admissible, although shoes to match the dress in colour and material are the most fashionable, often tastefully embroidered on the toe in coloured filoselle or gold or silver thread. As to the stockings, they must match the dress, no difficult task in these days, for they can be procured in every hue and shade; for the morning and promenade in fine cashmere and spun silk, for dress in the finest Lisle thread and silk.

We last month described some costumes for rough weather, and shall therefore now discuss those of a more dressy character. A walking costume for a bright sunny day may be made thus: The dress, short enough to clear the ground, of mulberry coloured cloth, cashmere, velvet, or velveteen; on the skirt two flat flounces, about six inches deep, scalloped and embroidered at the edge with an elegant design, in filoselle or crewel, of two or more lighter shades than the foundation; fully draped tunic trimmed to match, jacket bodice with a real or simulated waistcoat of embroidery, collar and cuffs to correspond. The same style of dress made in black or any rich dark colour looks very well embroidered in designs of faded leaves, après nature, variegated ivy, cream coloured roses and foliage, chrysanthemums or pompons, or many other floral patterns which may be very quickly worked by dexterous fingers at home, where economy is needful, or given to lady-workers who depend upon their art-needlework for a living. We may remark, en passant, that our male art critics are now so severe in their censure of female attire and needlework that it is well for workers and designers to shade from the natural flower or good water-colour drawings. Long and unrivalled as its reign has been, cashmere is still in high favour, nothing has appeared to displace it for demi-toilette. What can be more elegant than a Princess polonaise of white, cream, or any delicate colour over a train skirt of poplin, silk, or velvet? Amongst the newest materials of the season may be mentioned, for evening wear, "Challis Tamative," a soft texture, with a glossy, bright surface; it is a fine mixture of silk and wool, it may be especially recommended to young people for Christmas carpet dances as being at the same time very effective and inexpensive. The same may be said of the Louis velveteen, an admirable substitute for velvet which it so closely resembles as almost at times to defy detection.

From a number of bewitching elegant toilettes recently shown to us we have selected a few for description. Petticoat of brown silk with velvet longitudinal stripes, casaquin of brown velvet, edged with a band of beaver fur; velvet and satin bonnet trimmed with fur. Costume of steel-grey corduroy velveteen, Princess shape, plain demi-train, long waistcoat, covered with Pompadour embroidery; the bodice, fastened by two buttons only, and much cut away at the waist. A very elegant mantle of plain grey velvet trimmed with feather fringe and a wide crossway piece of the same material as the dress; grey velvet hat with feathers to match, and a bouquet of crimson and pink chrysanthemums. Dinner dress of silver-grey satin shot with white, made en saque, opening over a petticoat and waistcoat of pink-striped velvet; trimmings of old point lace; grey satin shoes with silver and opal buckles, necklet, earrings, and butterfly for the hair of opals mounted in silver. Ball dress of Celadon blue satin, long train skirt, white lace tunic, artistically draped, bodice high at the back, open in front to the waist in a point, and filled half-way up to the throat with puffings of tulle, divided by bands of pearl embroidery, pearl ornaments to correspond. Ball dress for a young bride: White satin petticoat, with three white scarves of tulle, edged with white flower fringe, and caught together at intervals with bouquets of flowers; white satin cuirass bodice, square back and front outlined with floral bands. The wearer of this graceful costume was very fair, her hair was arranged in short curls and a wavy fringe, a bandeau of pearls, three rows, was her only ornament for the coiffure, bracelets and necklet to match. We must not omit to mention a costume which appeared recently in the Révue de la Monde, as it is one of the prettiest we have seen, with the newly-introduced panier, which as yet has not made much progress in popular favour; it is a dinner toilette of the Louis XV. style, made thus: the front of shot blue silk; at the bottom of the skirt two pleated flounces, tablier kilted pleating; the upper dress and train of shot blue silk sprinkled with Pompadour fleurettes. The square-cut bodice is trimmed with white lace, and on the left is a rose. The lace is carried from the corsage round the pleats over the hips, which thus forms the panier; the elbow sleeves are finished off with a pleating of silk and two lace ruffles. The rage for costumes of the Louis XV. period has been the primary cause of the revival of paniers, as they are incomplete without them. There are several styles of panier, the smallest and least conspicuous is the "Mousquetaire."

Long sealskin tight-fitting paletôts are very fashionable in Paris as well as London; but they are so costly as to place them beyond the reach of other than wealthy people. A good substitute is a fine cloth or velvet paletôt, trimmed with otter, beaver, or any dark fur; velvet and sable are always elegant, and more becoming to the figure than is sealskin. Fur-lined cloaks are much worn this winter; they are certainly comfortable and warm wraps, but lack a stylish appearance, as a general rule.

There is a great variety in the shapes of bonnets and hats which are worn to suit the taste of their owners, if not always to become them. The bébé shape, which suits most faces, is much worn in dark velvet without any trimming, excepting a large bow in the front, and sometimes two or three small feather tips; the diadem shape is adopted for dress toilettes, concerts, weddings, &c.; the jockey bonnet, made in white plush or velvet, is very stylish, and suits pretty young faces, but is not so generally becoming as the Gainsborough and Rubens, which are still in favour, made in felt and velvet.—Caps for morning wear are of muslin and velvet or ribbon; at times, lace-edged pocket-handkerchiefs and fichus are made to do duty as caps, and very pretty they look, when tastefully arranged. It is very difficult at times to distinguish a dress cap from a bonnet, excepting that the former is more fussy than the latter; satin, thickly studded with pearl or gold beads and fringe, lace, and artificial flowers in profusion, are lavished on these head-dresses; greater care is needed in selecting a cap than in either a hat or a bonnet. Although gold is no longer used in excess for trimming costumes—it so very soon became vulgar—yet some of the new bands or galons which are made to match the costumes on which they are worn are very elegant; they are delicately worked in gold and silver thread; chenille fringes are fashionable, as are also the whalebone and grass fringes, which are made in rich dark colours, as well as the most delicate shades.—There is quite a furore for lace of every description, the more ancient the better; no dress toilette is considered complete without it. Some very beautiful specimens have been secured from the Paris Exhibition, not only by our leading West End and City firms, but by private individuals, hence we may be sure that lace of every description will be the favourite trimming both for morning and evening wear during the coming season.

THE READER

In "Adventurous Lives" (2 vols.: R. Bentley and Son), Mr. B. H. Becker leads us through a gallery of portraits, all interesting, many of personages still by no means too generally known. Let not, however, the reader think from a first glance upon the title-page that this is any Christmas-tide collection of good-boy heroes or moral paragons of "self-help." The lives—at least the larger moiety of them—are of adventurers in the less flattering acceptation of the term. The scamp, indeed, whether male or female, is a being for whom Mr. Becker has an evident tenderness, and whom he handles with a loving and a skilful touch. "Notre Dame du Thermidor" steps down from the canvas as Arsêne Houssaye painted her, to fascinate us with the brilliant eyes and Coan robe, whose memories nerved the feeble heart of Tallien for the last duel with Robespierre and St. Just. Jacques Casanova, that prince of scoundrels, from whose adventures Thackeray caught the idea of his Barry Lyndon, and whose Memoirs, carefully relegated to the back shelves of all respectable libraries, are never asked for, save upon the plea of a desire to read in the original their one not "quite too" improper chapter, the famous escape from the Piombi, is presented here in seemly outline and with as much fulness as under the circumstances is possible. The pretty silly nobody who in youth inspired "Junius" Francis with la grande passion, and in middle-age became the wife—and so far as such things could be, the beloved wife, too—of Talleyrand, weaves round us a chronique scandaleuse, whose strangeness is, perhaps, its chief recommendation, for "the thing was neither rich nor rare; we wonder how the —— it came there." Others there are who are only scamps in so far as a certain scampishness was inseparable from their time, and some who are in no way scamps at all, but whose shields of knight or citizen are spotless as Sir Galahad's. Sea-rovers of the good old days when peace was never even supposed to cross "the line"—old travellers like Busbequius, Benjamin of Tudela, and "Messer Marco"—old chroniclers like De Joinville and Villehardouin—supply material for a dozen papers, which make the second of these volumes quite as interesting as the first. On the whole, these sketches, though for some tastes probably too much in miniature, must be pronounced entertaining and instructive in no ordinary degree—the more so that Mr. Becker, so far as we can judge, is always at pains to get his facts at first hand, and not from the nearest authority within reach, after the common fashion of compilers.

"Egypt, Cyprus, and Asiatic Turkey" (Trübner and Co.), by Lewis Farley, is an extremely pleasantly written volume, in which political considerations suggested by the Anglo-Turkish Convention have been somewhat skilfully tacked on to chapters originally penned to advocate the claims of the Levantine coastlands as an agreeable health-resort for holiday-makers and invalids. A resident of old experience of the East, who writes from the fulness of his knowledge, and thus never shows between the lines that he is gathering his information as he goes, Mr. Farley is never tedious, even when most statistical. The brief opening pages on Egypt as it is, the lengthier chapter upon Syrian travel, with its ingenious recommendations for "doing" Palestine, not in the regular tourist's round, but by quiet excursions this way and that from Beyrout, are particularly light and sparkling. Nor are the strictly political chapters less valuable, though both in speaking of the Anglo-Turkish Convention—which we must hope has other alternatives than ruinous failure or the complete conversion of Britain into an Asiatic Power—and of the "undeveloped resources" of Anatolia—resources that will scarcely draw much British capital for the present—Mr. Farley appears to us to adopt a slightly exaggerated tone. More especially can we commend the chapter on the various Euphrates Valley Railway schemes as one of the best accounts of the whole matter that we could mention. At the risk, however, of differing from so great an authority, we are inclined to question Mr. Farley's harsh judgment of the Turk of Asia—not, of course, of the Pashas of Constantinople. Equally competent judges have pronounced the Ottoman at least the equal in the more solid virtues of the more showy Greek or Arab. We should like, too, to know Mr. Farley's reasons for asserting that Midhat Pasha made a fortune in Bulgaria. Midhat has usually been thought indifferently honest, and the story is at any rate inconsistent with his undoubted poverty a year or two later on at Bagdad.

"Through Asiatic Turkey. Bombay to the Bosphorus," by Grattan Geary (2 vols.: S. Low and Co.).—Mr. Geary's journey—rare and hazardous even in these days of general ubiquity—derives still deeper interest from the political crisis in the midst of which it was undertaken. "Alliteration's artful aid," it is perhaps ungracious to remark in passing, conveys at first an unfair notion of its extent. As a matter of fact the journey by land was from Bussorah to Alexandretta only, leaving the hills and cities of Anatolia to be surveyed from the commodious deck of the Scamandre. Even so, however, it traverses all the country where the Euphrates Valley Railway must ultimately run, and through which (if strategic prophecy is worth anything) the armies of the Czar must pour the next time the attack is renewed upon the Ottoman Empire; while it is still more valuable for its picture of the change that even in these remote lands came over public opinion when the Osmanli knew at last that his cause was lost, and no longer rallying, as Captain Burnaby had seen him in stubborn loyalty to his Padishah, though poor in purse and ill-equipped and ill-commanded, began to mutter in his beard "Nous sommes trahis," to grumble openly against the men at Stamboul, and almost wonder whether it would not be best to say at once what Persia has already said:—"We are too weak to fight you. Give your orders." In such a journey incidents swarm so thick that anything like attempts to summarise them within our narrow limits becomes impossible. From the southern province of Persia and the No-man's Land of the Gulf towns and inlands, where the police of the sea is maintained by British gunboats, and improvements on shore are firmly, but unobtrusively, burked by the ambitious Power whose object is to turn the entire trade of Persia to Poti and Batoum, to the marshes that render difficult the approach to Alexandretta, we never tire in Mr. Geary's company of investigating alike the remains of ancient greatness, the stagnation of the present, or the uncertain, though rich, possibilities of the future. Another chapter to which every reader will turn just now is that which tells us of the Turkish Mission to Cabul last year when the Afghan Ameer was still wavering, though already half-determined to rely on Russia, and of the conversation which the author held himself with an Osmanli ex-Minister on the course of British policy in the farther East. Of one thing at least Mr. Geary is quite convinced—that in the Ottoman Turk alone is either patriotism, or the instinct of rule, and that if he is dispossessed, his empire will at once break up and be captured piecemeal by the first comer. We can thoroughly commend these able and dispassionately-written volumes to readers of every shade of politics.

The early history of an important town is a matter of such universal interest that no excuse is needed for the expansion of Mr. J. Thackray Bunce's "History of the Corporation of Birmingham" (Vol. I. Published for the Corporation. Cornish Brothers) into a work of two volumes by the addition of "a sketch of the earlier government of the town," when charters of incorporation as yet were not, and municipal authority was represented by the Lords' Leet, the Churchwardens, the Steward, Bailiff, and Constables of the Manor. And Birmingham, as all readers of Dr. Doran know, though quite a parvenu among municipal and Parliamentary boroughs, is a most ancient market town, whose early institutions, from the antique Guild of Holy Cross to the simple household life in fashion still in Hutton's day, are equally curious and entertaining. It is when we come to the quarrels over the application for a charter, and the parochial disputes of the first Corporations, that our patience begins to fail us. The preface is good, but only the toughest of Radicals can be expected to work through the body of the work.

A cheap one-volume edition of Mr. MacKenzie-Wallace's "Russia" (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin)—our best book about the great Northern Empire—is most welcome at the present moment, if only to remind us that Russians are human beings like ourselves, with instincts always natural and often laudable, and that, moreover, there are eighty millions of them.

"Afghanistan: Its Political and Military History, including a Full Account of the Afghan Wars of 1838-42" (G. Routledge and Sons), by S. R. Townshend Mayer and J. C. Paget, is a handy little volume for those who like to read as they run, and have neither time nor inclination to consult original authorities.

We have also to acknowledge the fifth volume of the "Globe Encyclopædia" (Thomas C. Jack: Edinburgh), the careful compilation of which renders it an extremely valuable work. The articles are all written with as much completeness as is consistent with unavoidable brevity, and the information afforded is brought down to the latest possible date, e.g., in the volume before us—"Pass" to "Shell"—we have descriptions of such recent inventions as Professor Crookes' Radiometer and Mr. Edison's Phonograph; whilst under the head of "Reporting," allusion is made to the exclusion of "strangers" from the House of Commons, in April last, during the debate on the assassination of Lord Leitrim; and the history of "Russia" s brought down to the intrigue with the Ameer of Afghanistan.

WINTER EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS

This collection carries out more thoroughly than usual the promise of the catalogue, for it includes a considerable proportion of what are obviously "sketches" and "studies." In nineteen cases out of twenty outdoor studies are the kind of work which water-colour painters do best, and for which water-colours have peculiar advantages. Apart altogether from the impolicy of repeating in December the Exhibition of May, I see no cause to regret the absence of laboured studio work, which, in the great majority of cases, in process of elaboration loses more freshness than it gains completeness.

Both Members and Associates of the Society are well represented. Except Alma Tadema, G. P. Boyce, and Dobson there seem to be few absentees of mark. The contributions of Birket Foster, Carl Haag, and F. Powell are small and inconspicuous, though good of their kind, indeed, those of the last excellent. The drawings of Sir John Gilbert, the Fripps (G. and A.), Duncan, Dodgson, F. Tayler, Charles Davidson, T. Danby, J. Jenkins, Naftel, S. P. Jackson, J. D. Watson, H. Brittan Willis, W. Collingwood, and Collingwood Smith are of fair average quality, in their several well-known styles. Only one drawing of Sir John Gilbert's, "The Return Home," a rough waggon, with an escort, passing under a mill on a rising ground, in a squall of rain and wind, seems to me to have a different note in it from those Sir John is in the habit of striking. In his night scene, of an armed force by torchlight, I am puzzled to account for the absence of stronger contrasts of light and dark, and, indeed, find myself at a loss to explain the lighting altogether. George Fripp has one study of conspicuous excellence, the Gouliette Rocks at Sark, a masterly representation of the lines and colouring of a very curious rock formation, going sheer down to the sea; and some lovely drawings of the painter's well-worn, but never stale, subjects of hay-making and harvest, bathed in mellow serenity and sunshine. Dodgson has, amongst other drawings, a very fine stormy Welsh coast, with a grand sky, and a picturesque country fair. Alfred Hunt has been spending another autumn at Whitby, which seems to be inexhaustible in subject matter for his pencil (did not David Cox visit Bettws every year for nearly half a century?). His present drawing, a warm afternoon effect, looking over the red roofs of the houses that fringe the harbour on the east, to the river, the opposite houses, and the cliff with its crown of old church and abbey ruin, seems to me as good as anything he has derived from the same picturesque source. His smaller drawings are all noteworthy; the Whitby West Cliffs, lashed by a savage sea, under a stormy moonrise, the long-nosed "Carnedd David" in wild weather, and two interesting scenes, the approach to the Acropolis of Athens, showing the Genoese tower now pulled down, and the far-stretching view over the Theatre of Syracuse, both bathed in southern sunshine.

Venice furnishes subjects to several exhibitors, in particular to

E. A. Goodall (views of the Monastery of San Gregorio, and studies of Venetian craft on the lagune); to Clara Montalba, who sees Venice with eyes of her own, and has accomplished the seemingly impossible feat of bringing home a new set of subjects and effects from the sea-city (see her brightly-lighted little "View on the Grand Canal," her "Sunset," "Orchard," and "View on the Giudecca," the "View of the Piazetta" with figures; (217, 230, 319, 336, 349, &c.) the "Salute," at early morning, and the same church under an effect of Sirocco, to Oswald Brierley, whose studies of bragozzi, with their painted sails, on smooth grey-green water are excellent in drawing and most agreeable in composition and colour; to Birket Foster, who, besides his pretty outdoor studies of Surrey commons and cottages, and a most tempting little nook from Haddon Hall (373), has a picturesque scene of billet doux-smuggling on a Venetian balcony, and a gossip beside a Venetian water-door. Surrey, as usual, supplies a goodly store of subjects not only to C. Davidson, the painter-in-ordinary of the delightful neighbourhood of Red Hill, but to Mrs. Allingham, who exhibits a charming series of studies of wood-embowered, red-roofed cottages, enlivened with the most delicate little figures, wonders of expression and elaboration, yet so appropriately and artistically introduced that one has no sense of their being over-wrought or intrusive. Two mowers, in steady scythe-swing, in a hay-field under a wood, ought especially to be noted for their perfect drawing on the smallest scale, and for the judgment with which they are introduced to give the appropriate kind of life to the scene. Mrs. Allingham sends besides two beautiful little studies of children on the beach of St. Leonard's and Dover, a very truthful study of a grey sea, and a trim and watchful coastguard on the look-out, with a cluster of purple irises and their sword-like blades, all showing the same conscientiousness guided by fine artistic sense, which distinguishes every thing this lady puts her hand to. Henry Wallis is a very recent Associate whose contributions make a very decided mark. He has an impressive drawing of the distribution of a dole of loaves at Bruges, in which a powerful effect is produced by the broad and simple harmonies of the black failles of the women and the pile of yellow loaves relieved against a richly-carved oaken dado. Another very forcible drawing by him represents a spot between Hampstead and Highgate, with fine hedgerow-timber and red-roofed farm-buildings, which was a favourite walk of Lamb, Keats, Coleridge, and Shelley. The most conspicuous figure-subject in the room is Mr. Wallis's large study in crayons, entitled a "Sestette under the Terror," with the absorbed six working away as steadily at wind and strings as if all was peace out of doors. The contrast between the awful crash of discords without and the happy harmony within the charmed domain of "music, heavenly maid," is, I presume, what has attracted the painter in the subject. There is character in the heads as well as oddity in the costumes, and very good drawing and composition. This is a careful study, however seeming rough, in execution. But the completest piece of figure-painting in the room is Mr. Marks's highly elaborated study of a dinner-party of the fifteenth century, filing two two and two, lady and gentleman, in solemn state, along a tapestried gallery lined by serving-men, each with the cognizance of the house upon his breast. This is, in every sense, a thoroughly good piece of work; and so are Mr. Marks' two designs for decoration, which he calls "Capital and Labour" and "Wine and Water."

Of effective figure work there is a fair proportion, though Mr. J. D. Watson contributes less, and of less interest, than usual. Mr. Marsh's study of Dunluce Castle is an impressive drawing of an impressive subject, but we cannot say as much for his tourists in the sea cave under the Castle. The subject does not warrant the dimensions of the drawing.

Walter Duncan is acquiring more and more command of his resources, and sends clever studies of Ironsides, grouped and single. Prettiness and smoothness are pushed to an extreme in the work of E. K. Johnson, who seems to live in a world of pretty girls in the most elaborate, if rather décolleté, toilettes, and flowers. Mr. Parker emulates him, as far as the pretty girls go; only as his smooth beauties are servant lasses, or peasant maidens hanging out the clothes and wringing at the wash-tub, one is still more impressed by the daring defiance of probability in the character of their good looks. Mr. Hopkins seems to be tending to the same kind of untruth in his fisher lasses. Mr. Radford has but one drawing, a graceful half-length of a girl in white with black ribbons, and a sentimental face. In the presence of this growing tendency to over-prettiness, I feel the more obliged to Mr. Norman Tayler for the honesty of his groups of rustic lads and lasses, which yet have grace and good looks enough to charm.

It is long since Basil Bradley has produced so fine a drawing as this of a noble pair of St. Bernards leading a band of monks from the Hospice over the snow, on their life-saving errand.

W. E. Lockhart's Scotch coast views are certainly not chargeable with over-prettiness. They even push the unlovely to an extreme, exaggerating, as it seems to me, the blackness and grimness of their subjects.

H. Moore has some very living sea subjects, in particular a study of tumbling surf off the Gurnard's Head, Cornwall. Albert Goodwin's "In the Buttercups," and his "View on the Medway," have his characteristic charms of subtle truth and delicate colour.

Charles Davidson's out-door studies in Surrey, Wales, and Ireland, are delightful for their quiet truth, and the unpretentiousness with which the rare skill of the painter is put forth.

Thorne Waite's and Otto Weber's sketches are conspicuous among the out-door work which does so much to give this Winter Exhibition its distinctive character, and greatly enhances its interest for the many who, as amateurs in water colour, are glad to get a glimpse into the artist's use of a most difficult material.

EXHIBITION OF ETCHINGS AT THE FINE ART SOCIETY'S GALLERY

Condition of space restrict me from more than calling attention to an extremely interesting and instructive Exhibition of etchings, got together by Mr. Seymour Haden, one of the ablest of English etchers, and accompanied by a very interesting catalogue from his pen, which is, in fact, a brief treatise on what etching is and should be, and wherein the etcher's work is distinguished from the line engraver's. The collection of etchings illustrative of the points urged in the catalogue includes examples of Bakhuisen, Jacques de Barbari, the master of the Caduceus; Bartholomew Behan, Nicholas Berghem, Abraham Bosse, Jean Both, Peter Bout, Canaletto, Annibale Camcci, Claude, Durer, Van Dyk, Everdingen, Faithorne, Fyt, Goltzius, Hollar, Karel du Jardin, Lucas Van Leyden, Marc Antonio, Karel le Moor, Nainweencx, Ossenbeck, Adrian van Ostade, Paul Potter, Rembrandt, Ruysdael, Stoop, Swaneveldt, Turner, Adrian Van de Velde, Waterloo, Wilkie, and Zeemann.

The remarks on each of these masters in the catalogue turn the selected examples to best account for illustrating the points Mr. Haden wishes to inculcate or apply by means of them. Himself one of the finest, most forcible, and rapid of English etchers, he holds firmly to his preference for rapid and broad work, and insists strenuously on the essential distinction between painter-engravers and engravers who are not painters but mechanics.

This distinction is most emphasised, he maintains, in the difference between the etched and the engraved line, the one rapid, palpitating with life, and conveying with its varying force the varying moods of the artist, the other slow, dead, mechanical, and unchanging. The distinction is well illustrated in some of Vandyke's portrait series, of which the heads were etched by himself and the draperies and backgrounds put in by mere mechanical engravers. But in some instances (one of them is shown here) the engraver has gone over Vandyke's etched work, completely taking the spirit and fire out of it, and leaving what may, without exaggeration, be called a "caput mortuum."

The catalogue and collection together supply matter for an extremely interesting study, which in this day when etching is daily growing more popular, should prove not only attractive, but instructive in very high degree.

A selection of Mr. Haden's own brilliant and masterly etchings is shown in an outer gallery, and justifies his claim to a very high, if not the highest, place in the first rank of the etchers of this or any country. I am glad to learn that he has in hand two etchings of Windsor and Greenwich, to be published by the Fine Art Society, which will exceed in dimensions any etching yet produced, being on a base line of 17 inches.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS

IV.

"Switzerland, its Mountains and Valleys, described by Woldemar Raden, with Four Hundred and Eighteen Illustrations, engraved by A. Closs" (London: Bickers and Son).—This is a companion volume to the beautifully illustrated work on the Rhine which Messrs. Bickers and Son produced last season, but both in subject and execution it is much superior to its predecessor. The artists employed are for the most part German, and the engraving has been entirely the work of Mr. A. Closs, whose atelier is so well known and celebrated for the production of some of the finest effects that can be achieved by artistic wood-engravings. Many of the plates in the volume before us have the texture and softness of chalk drawings, witness the landscape with cattle entitled "Mountain Pastures," the charming bit of foreign scenery, "The Hollow Way at Kussnacht," and a host of others. The subjects chosen for illustration are admirably varied, and many of the figure drawings (portraits, we presume) are perfect studies of character, and as effective almost as etchings. The treatment of the whole is somewhat broader and more free than we are accustomed to meet with in English works of this class, but will not on this account be less attractive to lovers of art. The printing is a little irregular, some of the plates being too black, and carrying too much ink, but on the other hand many of the softer drawings are beautifully rendered, and the fine work displayed in one or two of the initial letters is admirably brought up. We cannot say quite so much for the text of this work, the style of which is apt to get turgid at times, as though the subject had been too much for the writer. The volume is gorgeously bound in red and gold, the binding blocks being particularly artistic.

"Pleasant Spots Around Oxford," by Alfred Rimmer (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), is a work of an entirely different order, and offers quite as great a contrast in its style of execution as it does in the character of its subjects. Mr. Rimmer will be remembered as the author of a charming volume on "Ancient Streets and Homesteads;" and although he has limited his wanderings to a narrower sphere on this occasion, he is still as chatty and as pleasing as ever both with pen and pencil. To Oxford men both past and present this handsome monograph of the pleasant nooks and picturesque corners which surround their Alma Mater will be especially attractive. It is difficult to apportion the due meed of praise to text and illustrations when both are so well done, but we have been particularly pleased with the admirable effects the artist has produced by his water scenes, which are everywhere thoroughly transparent and true to nature. The preservation by works of this class of artistic bits of architecture, now, alas! fast disappearing from our landscapes, gives them a peculiar charm, and will render them increasingly valuable alike to artists and archæologists.

"Longfellow's Poetical Works: The Author's Pocket Volume Edition (George Routledge and Sons).—The practice of issuing in a handy form the complete works of popular authors is a highly commendable one, and this natty little box, with its eleven tiny volumes printed in the clearest of type, and bound in the daintiest coloured cloth, will, we venture to say, prove one of the most popular and acceptable literary gifts of the season. It will be none the less so from the fact that the publishers, having managed to overcome the absence of an International Copyright Act, are able to give this popular author a share of the proceeds. We believe the edition is absolutely complete, including even "Keramos," the last published work by Mr. Longfellow.

"A New Child's Play; Sixteen drawings by E. V. B." (Sampson Low and Co.).—Although by no means equal to those by "E. V. B." in the exquisite edition of her first work, "A Story without an End," the illustrations in this volume are far in advance of the drawings to be found in the ordinary run of children's books. One or two, such as "The Little Nut Tree," "The Little Brown Owl," and "The Great Buzzing Bee," show the same delicacy of conception and quaintness of treatment, but we do not think the colour printing is quite so cleverly or so artistically done.

"The Baby's Bouquet; a Fresh Bunch of Old Rhymes and Tunes," arranged and decorated by Walter Crane (Routledge and Sons), is altogether a delicious little volume. We should be glad to think that it will be appreciated as fully as it deserves by the young folks for whom it was designed, but we doubt much whether, in spite of School Boards and Art Classes, the juveniles of the present generation are quite equal to doing it justice. At any rate, Mr. Crane is doing an admirable work in educating the eye and cultivating the taste of the youngsters; and if he succeeds even partially in rescuing them from the love of the vulgar daubs which have so long passed muster as coloured picture-books, he will not have lived in vain. The music is hardly up to that of the "Baby's Opera," published a year or two ago, but the introduction of French and German nursery songs is a novelty which will tend to make the popularity of the book more cosmopolitan.

"The Leisure Hour" and "Sunday at Home" (Religious Tract Society).—These popular periodicals come before us once more in their volume form, replete as ever with articles and stories full of interest, instruction, and amusement; with plenty of illustrations, many of them of a very pleasing and attractive character. The Leisure Hour strikes us as being a trifle more scientific than usual, whilst the Sunday at Home apparently has relied during the past year mainly upon its coloured frontispieces, serial stories, and unusually large instalments of poetry.

"A Narrative of the Voyages Round the World performed by Captain James Cook (London: Bickers and Son).—The peculiarity of this edition of a well-worn favourite is its illustrations, which have been reproduced by the heliotype or autotype process in exact fac simile, from drawings made during the voyages. The effect is decidedly good, and as the work is otherwise well got up, being printed in clear, readable type, on good paper, with handsome margins, this edition can hardly fail to become, as it deserves, a very popular one.

"The Grimm Fairy Library," in ten volumes (Routledge).—Here is another multum in parvo, a library in a box, that will delight the heart of the lucky juvenile to whom Santa Claus conveys it on Christmas morn. Few people have ever excelled the Brothers Grimm in inditing those weird stories of enchantment, and fascinating legends of the little folks, which have from time immemorial been so eagerly devoured by children of all ages. The handy form in which they are presented in this library box will at the same time tend greatly to preserve the volumes, and enable the readers to enjoy their beauties without monopolising the book.

"Peter Parley's Annual" (London: Ben George).—Mr. Parley is hardly up to the mark this season. His coloured illustrations are better printed than they are designed, whilst his wood engravings are decidedly inferior. His text is much more varied, however, and we doubt not the stories will be greatly enjoyed by the numerous readers for whom he has catered for so many years.

"Every Boy's Annual," edited by Edmund Routledge (London: Routledge).—This popular volume is full, as usual, of spirited stories of adventures. Captain Mayne Reid contributes a thrilling tale of the Gran Chaco, which, like all the gallant Captain's productions, is full of excitement, startling situations, and daring deeds. Mr. R. Mountency Jephson furnishes no fewer than six of the shorter tales, most of them illustrated very cleverly by Mr. T. S. Seccombe. The rest of the volume is made up of sporting anecdotes, hunting adventures, and a capital series of articles on conjuring, by Professor Hoffman.

A new candidate for favour, which Messrs. Routledge send us, may be regarded as a companion volume to the above, and is entitited "Every Girl's Annual." It is in every respect a charming book, and is beautifully illustrated throughout. The long story is by Mrs. Molesworth, author of the "Cuckoo Clock;" and the shorter pieces comprise articles and tales by such writers as J. R. Planché, Knatchbull-Hugessen, E. L. Blanchard, Fergus Grahame, Mrs. Riddell, Christina Rosetti, Mrs. Mackarness, &c. The illustrations include a delightful frontispiece and title-page, by Kate Greenaway, printed in colours, and numerous drawings by M. E. Edwards, J. D. Watson, and W. Browne. Such a bill of fare should be tempting, and we can safely prophesy that no one will be disappointed who becomes the happy possessor of this volume.

"Elinor Dryden," by Katharine S. Macquoid (Sampson Low and Co.).—This reprint of a story by the talented author of "Patty" is something more than a new edition, having been greatly altered in its present form. As a gift-book for girls of sixteen and upwards, it will be heartily welcomed as helping to fill one of the few voids which still exists in our literature for young people requiring something beyond a child's story, but who are not yet quite prepared to tackle a full-blown three-volume novel.

"Dodd's Beauties of Shakespeare," illustrated by Sir John Gilbert, R.A., &c. (Routledge).—This is a handsomely-printed edition of the well-known selections of our national poet, made by the ill-fated Rev. W. Dodd. The illustrations have apparently been transferred from Mr. Staunton's edition of Shakespeare for which Sir John Gilbert's drawings were originally made. A capital index adds greatly to the value of the collection.

"Sancta Christina," by Eleanor E. Orlebar (Sampson Low and Co.).—A tale, the object of which is set out the difference between ancient heathen civilisation and the Christian Church. It is of the order of Mrs. Webb's "Naomi," and seems to be fairly well done, but the canvas has been almost too large for the artist to cover, and it might have been better to have confined the narrative to a more restricted period. Still the Bishop of Winchester, in a few lines of preface, commends it as telling the story of the most momentous period in all history, and as being full of warm human feeling.

"Picciola," by X. B. Saintine, with ten steel plates by Leopold Flameng (Routledge and Sons).—M. Saintine's delightful story of the sentimental Count de Charney, who beguiled his imprisonment in the fortress of Fenestrella by the cultivation of a flower, which he dubbed his povera picciola, has never been more admirably produced than it is in this handsome edition. The steel plates by Flameng—etchings really—are full of vigour and colour, but are somewhat unequally printed.

"Little Wide-Awake," a Story-book for Little Children," by Mrs. Sale Barker (Routledge), is the annual volume of this favourite magazine, and is more than usually pleasing with its stories, poems, and music, and its 400 illustrations. Some of the latter are quite above the average, and the work has less the appearance of being a patched-up volume from old cuts than many of these Christmas annuals too frequently are.

"Fairy Tales: Their Origin and Meaning, with some Account of Dwellers in Fairy Land," by John Thackray Bunce (Macmillan).—This neatly-printed little book had its origin in a series of Christmas Holiday Lectures delivered at the Birmingham and Midland Institute last year. Mr. Bunce has been favourably known as a writer of fairy stories himself, and we are not surprised to learn that the success of the lectures was such as to prompt the production of the book. We confess to little sympathy with those who would find a meaning in every fairy tale, and so reduce our old favourites to mere symbolisms, but Mr. Bunce makes no pretence to scientific method, and modestly offers his book as an inducement rather than a formal introduction to the study of Folk Lore.

Messrs. Routledge and Sons send us "Uncle Chesterton's Heir:" A Translation from the French of Madame Colomb, by Henry Frith, illustrated by cuts, also of French origin; a new translation of "Swiss Family Robinson," edited by W. H. G. Kingston; "The Child's Picture Scrap Book," with upwards of 400 illustrations by Gilbert, Watson, Wolf, Coleman, &c.; "The Child's Delight," another picture-book for little children, with large type text by Jeanie Hering, which is as bright as the pictures it describes; and a collection of "Little Wide-Awake Pictures," selected from that periodical, with a few lines of text descriptive of each.

FOREIGN

The Crisis in the East.——Matters certainly seem improving between Russia and Turkey, who have now entered into direct relations with each other. Prince Lobanoff has assured the Porte of the Czar's intention to carry out the Berlin Treaty, and that Bulgaria and Roumelia will be duly vacated according to its stipulations, with the exception of Adrianople and Thrace, of which the evacuation will be dependent upon the signature of the definitive Treaty of Peace. He even offers that the Convention shall be completed at an earlier time than originally fixed if the Treaty is signed at once, and that an early settlement of the question is expected is manifested by the Czar's speech at Moscow on Monday, in which he expressed the hope that the definitive Treaty would soon be signed. Indeed, one of the chief points of Count Schouvaloff's travels now seems to have been to secure the consent of the Cabinets of Austria and England to the terms of the definitive Treaty, which, by the way, also provides for the payment of the indemnity of 300,000,000 roubles, by yearly instalments of 25,000,000—the first payment to be made on the complete evacuation of the territory. Turkey's difficulty with Austria also respecting the occupation of Novi-Bazar appears to have been smoothed over, as the Austrians have agreed that they will not enter the place this winter except any "necessity" for so doing should arise. The Greek question also continues to be actively discussed in Constantinople, and it is expected that a Turkish and Greek Commission will shortly be appointed to consider the matter.

At Constantinople there has been another sweeping Ministerial change, the Grand Vizier being Khaireddin Pasha—a Circassian of extremely liberal views, Ghazi Osman being Minister of War, and Caratheodori Pasha, now Governor of Crete, Minister for Foreign Affairs. The fortifications are still being busily pushed forward, and the various works which, ranged in parallel lines, are to protect the city, will soon be completed. They will be armed with 800 guns of large calibre. Finance seems to be the great home topic, and it appears that of the loan of twenty millions sterling twelve millions are to be devoted to the liberation of the Egyptian tribute, five millions to the withdrawal of the paper money, and the remaining three to be applied to reforms. The interest is to be raised as follows:—680,000*l.* from the Egyptian tribute; 136,000*l.* from the Cyprus surplus revenue, and 184,000*l.* from the Syrian Customs. Suleiman Pasha, who commanded the army in the Shipka Pass during the late war, has been sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment in a fortress for his conduct during the campaign.

To turn to Bulgaria, the proposed constitution has been submitted by Prince Dondoukoff-Korsakoff. It provides amongst other things that the Bulgarian Assembly should consist of one House of 400 members, of whom 100 would be nominated by the Government. The Prince of Bulgaria will not have the right of declaring war, but will possess the prerogative of mercy. The courts of justice will be independent, and the press free. The election of the Prince will take place on January 1, and General Ignatieff is still a favourite candidate.

France.——There is very little home news of any kind, and foreign affairs afford the chief subject for discussion, both in the newspapers and in the Cabinet Councils. Most of the journals approve of England's policy in undertaking the Afghan War, while the République Française also energetically denounces Russia for her policy in Turkey. The debates that have been in the Chambers are of very little interest, the Budget having been passed last week, and the chief Parliamentary topic is the management of the Opera, which the Committee have now decided should be placed directly under the control of the State, with M. Perrin, who has so skilfully managed the Théâtre Français of late years, as chief director. By this means a not insignificant source of profit will probably accrue to the Treasury. Even Paris is more than usually devoid of gossip, save for the production of Dumas' Fils Naturel at the Français—fairly successful—and the continual gambling in lottery tickets, which is by no means diminishing. The exhibition of the prizes is expected to be ready by the 10th inst., and the drawing will probably begin on the 10th January. The Figaro, in order to calm the fears of those who think that the tickets which they have bought are false, states that the forgeries can easily be detected by means of the type. The genuine tickets are printed in the National Printing Office, the characters being of a peculiar form, each having a slight hook on the left at the height of the preceding letter.—M. Massenet has been elected the musical member of the Académie de Beaux-Arts, in place of the late François Bazin.—The Académie will elect the successor of Archbishop Dupanloup on the 26th inst.

Germany.——The anti-Socialist crusade still continues, and the Government has been busily prohibiting foreign works and papers likely to foster sedition in the Teutonic mind, while forty-two Social Democrats have been expelled from Berlin, two of whom are Deputies, and a manifesto, prepared by them, has been seized by the police. This wholesale banishment is in accordance with a Ministerial order, issued last week, enacting that all persons from whom "danger to public safety may be apprehended" may be refused permission to reside in Berlin, Charlottenburg, Potsdam, and several other places. The Berliners also, with certain exemptions, are prohibited from carrying arms—in fact, the Prussian capital is almost declared in a state of siege. These severe measures were due to the discovery of an extensive Socialist organisation in Berlin, and to the fear that another attempt on the Emperor's life might have been made on the occasion of his public entry into Berlin on Thursday, for which the Berliners had made the most enthusiastic preparations—Unter den Linden having been most gorgeously decorated in honour of their Kaiser's return. On the arrival of the Emperor at the Station, he was to sign a decree, announcing the resumption by him of the reins of Government.

Prince Bismarck is again unwell, and has been ordered perfect rest by his physician.

Italy.——The Socialistic movement is causing no less excitement here than in Germany, and Tuesday's sitting of Parliament, when the subject was brought before the House by the Government, was looked for with eager expectation by all parties, each faction seeking some combination by which the debate on the subject might be turned to it's own particular advantage. Signor Cairoli, however, who continues to suffer severely from his wound, was unable to be present, and the beginning of the debate lost much of its expected pungency, although both Government and Opposition speakers freely bandied about mutual accusations of having brought about the present state of affairs. On Wednesday Sig. Minghetti asked the Government why Republicans any more than Internationalists should be allowed openly to propagate their doctrines. In the mean time active measures are being taken against Internationalists, and thirty of the Barsanti clubs have been closed, while numbers of arrests continue to be made. Signor Cairoli bore the journey from Naples fairly well, although his wound is exceedingly painful. The King visits him every day.

Austria.——Count Andrassy has made a long speech to the Budget Committee, replying to the charges brought against the Government for its Eastern policy and the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. He declared that no attempt had been made to secure fresh territory, and argued that any attempt of Bosnia and Herzegovina to obtain an autonomous position under a nominal Turkish sovereignty would have been hopeless. On Monday, nevertheless, the Budget Committee, by a vote of twelve to six, adopted a report which Count Andrassy declared to be an indictment, and a formal declaration of want of confidence, and the full Delegation were to discuss the matter on Thursday. On Sunday another bomb explosion took place at Pesth on the staircase of the Liberal Club, where Herr Tisza was speaking to the Liberal Party.

United States.——Congress opened on Monday, the President's Message being fuller and of more importance than usual. President Hayes begins by acknowledging the abundant harvests of the year, and that trade was reviving, and then plunges into the ever-vexed Southern Question, recommending Congress to examine into the charges of recent intimidation, so as to determine the validity of the seats in question. The Halifax Award comes next, and he states that the five and a-half million dollars have been paid to Great Britain, accompanied by notice of the ground of payment, and a protest against any other construction being placed upon his action. The relations with Mexico and the border question is then touched upon, and after an allusion to the success of the Paris Exhibition and to the International Monetary Commission, President Hayes announces the resumption of specie payments, and finally endorses the Secretary of War's recommendation that a corps of mounted Indian auxiliaries should be enrolled to keep the unruly Redskins on their "reservation," or repress disturbances, stating that this "would weaken the restless element among the Indians by giving a number of young men congenial employment, and would aid the army in a task for which its numerical strength is sometimes found insufficient." The arrangement for the resumption of specie payments is now complete, and after January 1, the Treasury will also redeem paper either in gold or silver at the option of the holder.

Canada.——The Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise have continued their triumphal progress through the Dominion, being everywhere received with great enthusiasm and the usual salutes, bonfires, deputations, and addresses. At Montreal there was a magnificent reception, the horses of the Marquis's carriage being unharnessed, and the new Governor-General drawn in triumph to the Windsor Hôtel. In the evening there was a grand ball. On Saturday the Marquis and the Princess attended service at St. Andrew's Church in honour of St. Andrew's Day, and in the afternoon visited the University, while a grand reception was held in the evening. On Sunday the Governor-General and the Princess went to the Cathedral in the morning, and to the Presbyterian Church in the evening, and on Monday the Marquis and the Princess went on to Ottawa, where the proceedings were marred by a fall of snow. On Tuesday the weather was better, and the official greetings were resumed.

Miscellaneous.——The great trial of T'Kindt, the clerk of the Bank of Belgium who succeeded in embezzling 800,000*l.*, has at last come to an end, and the prisoner, being found guilty of 149 acts of theft and various other misdemeanours, has been sentenced to fifteen years' solitary confinement. M. Fortamps, the Governor of the Bank of Belgium, who was accused of illegally repurchasing the shares of the Bank, was sentenced to a fine of 240*l.* and a year's imprisonment.—From Spain we hear that the Government have been in correspondence with other nations respecting the Socialist movement, and that all foreign Internationalists are to be expelled from the country.—In South Africa considerable uneasiness prevails, Cetewayo's attitude is now overtly hostile, and the British are continuing their military preparations.

THE COURT

The Queen entertained a number of visitors at Windsor Castle at the end of last week. Count Beust, who had been received in audience to present his letters of recall, the Marquis of Salisbury, Col. the Hon. F. A. Stanley, and the Earl of Dunmore, dined with Her Majesty, and Princess Christian lunched with the Queen. On Saturday the Princess Beatrice came up to town, and was present at the Saturday Popular Concert at St. James's Hall, returning afterwards to Windsor. The Queen gave audience in the afternoon to the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, who, as well as Lieutenant-General Ponsonby, dined with Her Majesty in the evening. Next day the Queen and the Princess Beatrice attended Divine service in the private chapel, when the Rev. James Fleming preached. Lord Beaconsfield came down to Windsor on Monday and had audience of the Queen, and Her Majesty subsequently gave audience to Viscount Cranbrook, while in the evening Prince and Princess Christian joined the Royal party at dinner. On the following day the Queen and the Princess Beatrice went to Chislehurst to see the ex-Empress Eugénie, remaining about half-an-hour at Camden House, and returning afterwards to Windsor. Her Majesty held a Council on Wednesday, when Prince Leopold also arrived at the Castle.

The Prince and Princess of Wales kept the Princess' 34th birthday very quietly at Sandringham, and as the anniversary fell on Sunday the annual tea to the women and children on the estate was postponed, while the usual bell-ringing and Royal salutes were deferred till next day. In the morning the Prince and Princess, with their three daughters and the Duke and Duchess of Teck, attended Divine Service at St. Mary Magdalene's, when Canon Tarver preached the sermon. Next day, the Duke and Duchess of Teck returned to town after a week's stay, and the Prince of Wales also left Sandringham on a visit to Mr. Gerard Leigh at Luton Hoo. The Prince shot over Mr. Leigh's preserves on Tuesday and Wednesday, and on Thursday morning he would visit Luton, where he was to receive an address from the Corporation, and inspect two of the chief straw hat manufactories. We shall publish some engravings relating to his visit next week. Subsequently the Prince was to leave Luton for town in order to be present at the meeting of Parliament.

The Duchess of Edinburgh returns to England earlier than had been expected. She left Coburg on Tuesday for Stuttgart, where she will remain till the end of the week with her aunt and uncle, the King and Queen of Wurtemberg. The Duchess will then be joined by her children at Mayence, and the whole party will travel viâ Brussels to London.—Prince Leopold has subscribed 20*l.* to the Parkes Museum of Hygiene.

The marriage of the Princess Thyra of Denmark and the Duke of Cumberland will take place on December 21st or 22nd. After the wedding ceremony has been performed in the Chapel of the Castle of Christiansborg at eight o'clock in the evening, the Bishop of Zeeland officiating, there will be a grand banquet at Amalienborg, and the bride and bridegroom will spend their honeymoon at Fredensborg. As head of the Guelph Family, the Prince of Wales will probably be the Duke's best man.

CHURCH NEWS

Cuddesdon College.——The lay memorial to the Bishop of Oxford, alluded to last week, has been met by a counter memorial from 277 old students of the College, and the Bishop, replying to the latter, remarks that the imputations on the teaching of the College proceed from persons who have no opportunity of knowing what it is, and the contradiction from those who know it well. He observes further that there is an entire absence of any definite charge to which they could distinctly reply, and with which he, as Visitor, could judiciously deal. The malcontents have, however, returned to the charge. One writer suggests that the controversy might be at once settled by the Principal saying "Yes" to the simple question, "Has the question of confession been uniformly and totally discouraged by the authorities of the College?" while another says that the Bishop, in his anxiety to shield the teaching staff, ignores the one general fact which Mr. Knox's speech pressed upon his attention, and upon which the lay address is based—that all the officials are members of the English Church Union, and thereby proved to be disqualified for the solemn function of imparting a theological education to future clergy of our Reformed National Church.

Various.——The Bishops of Peterborough, and Gloucester and Bristol have threatened to resign their positions as Vice-Presidents of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel unless the Committee immediately rescind the resolution recently passed, to the effect that in cases of missionary candidates nominated by Colonial Bishops the recommendation of the examiners shall be dispensed with. The trouble arises out of the rejection of a candidate by the examiners because he belonged to the Society of the Holy Cross.—A ten-days' mission was commenced at Liverpool on Sunday last, special services being held in all the Church of England places of worship.—The nave of Bristol Cathedral was lighted with the electric light one evening last week.—Mrs. Tait, the wife of the Archbishop of Canterbury, died in Edinburgh on Sunday night. She was the youngest daughter of the Venerable Archdeacon Spooner, of Coventry, and was married in 1843.—The Roman Catholic Bishops of the Archdiocese of Dublin held a meeting on Sunday to nominate a successor to the late Cardinal Cullen. Dr. M'Cabe (auxiliary Bishop) obtained forty-three votes; Dr. Moran, Bishop of Ossory, nephew of the late Cardinal, seven; and Dr. Woodlock, Rector of the Roman Catholic University, one. These names have been sent to the Pope for selection. A cathedral and a statue are to be erected as a memorial to the late Cardinal Cullen.—The Pope has given to the Society of Jesus the work of evangelising a portion of Central Africa. The Bishop of Salford, in giving permission for the collection of funds in his diocese, writes:—"God seems to seek compensation among the inferior races for the dishonour He sustains by the perversion of cultivated and refined intellect amongst the more favoured races. As it was in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, so it may be in the nineteenth and twentieth. The Church, through the zeal of her missionaries, will spread, and will acquire more than she has lost and is losing.—It is said that the New Forest Shakers are about to disperse, Mrs. Girling having given orders for the sale of their furniture.—Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, has written a long letter to the Nonconformist, in which, while indulging in in some peculiarly choice language, he attempts to defend his method of conducting the Fountain. He demands the real name and the address, "if he has one," of "Independent," whose letter appeared in the Nonconformist a few weeks' ago; declares that what he has done he is ready to do again; and says that the Nonconformist's statement is "a disgusting and infamous libel, every syllable of which is an offence against truth, decency, and honour." In reply to this the Nonconformist prints Dr. Parker's recent circular verbatim, leaving its readers to judge whether his vindication is as successful as his letter is long, and it declines to reveal the name of its correspondent, remarking that Dr. Parker, being a public man, cannot claim immunity from public criticism.—The Bishop of Carlisle has withdrawn the license of the Rev. Michael Haslam, Curate of Maryport, for having protested vehemently in the parish (not having been allowed to preach a sermon he had prepared on the matter) against the impropriety of fruit having been placed on the Holy Table at a recent harvest festival.—A stained glass window is to be placed in Westminster Abbey as a memorial of Dr. Livingstone, the African missionary.—A good story is told at the expense of the Rev. D. P. Mitchell, the Greenback candidate for Governor in Kansas, U.S.A. In a recent political speech, he advocated an exclusive paper currency, and derided gold and silver as "twin relics of barbarism." A few nights later, while preaching at a camp meeting, he described the Celestial City as pictured in the Book of Revelation, with gates of silver and precious stones, and streets paved with gold, when one of his coloured hearers shouted out, "Stop dar, Brudder Mitchell! No gold and silver in dat place. Dey's twin relics of barbarism!"

MUSIC

Her Majesty's Theatre.——Mdlle. Ambre has added not only Gounod's Marguerite but Verdi's Gilda to her repertory, achieving in each a legitimate success. She is evidently as well-versed in the music of Rigoletto as in that of Faust, and, though still suffering from cold, acquitted herself with no less ability than zeal. What was written about her previous efforts applies equally to her last, which throughout exhibits the utmost earnestness and intelligence. Her Gilda was not merely a success, but a success well merited. The part of Rigoletto, the miserable Court buffoon, who so well deserves the "maledizione" bestowed upon him by Count Monterone, was sustained creditably, if no more, by Signor Mendioroz. If this artist's means were on a par with his good intentions he would take a more conspicuous and prominent position. It must suffice to add that Signor Runcio, if he exerted himself less and gave his voice occasional repose, instead of straining it so as to make "points" that in the end are comparatively pointless, might justify the best hopes for his future career; and that the characters of Sparafucile, the hired cutthroat, and Maddalena, his sister and decoy, were respectively assigned to Herr Behrens and Miss Purdy. A new barytone, Signor Valcheri (Mr. Walker, if we are not misinformed), appeared on Monday night as the Comte di Luna in Il Trovatore. About this gentleman we shall have another opportunity of speaking. He has a good voice, but seems wholly inexperienced in stage business. Madame Pappenheim was Leonora, one of the best representatives of that character now before the public. There has been nothing else to speak of. Carmen goes on as merrily as ever; and for to-night we have the welcome promise of a revival of Weber's Oberon, with Sir Julius Benedict's admirable recitatives, and Madame Pappenheim (who grows more and more in public estimation) as Rezia.

Mdlle. Chiomi.——A correspondent wishes us to state that the Mdlle. Chiomi, who sang recently at Bayreuth in a soirée at Herr Richard Wagner's house, is not an Italian but an English artist, whose real name is Hairs. We labour under the impression that this fact was generally made known when, some time since, the lady appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre in Lucia di Lammermoor. As "Chioma" is one of the Italian equivalents for hair, the other being "capello" (the former feminine, the latter masculine), we thought at the time that the nom de théâtre assumed by Miss Hairs was unusually happy—much preferable to Mdlle. Hairsini, which precedent might have encouraged her to adopt. We may add, on the authority of our correspondent, that Mdlle. Chiomi is engaged to sing at Brussels next January. We wish her all success.

London Ballad Concerts.——The only novelty produced on Wednesday evening was a ballad by Cowen, entitled "Never Again." It is rather peculiar in style, but was well received, perhaps because of the artistic singing and sympathetic expression of Madame Antoinette Sterling. Hatton's "Good-bye, Sweetheart," sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, was most warmly welcomed; and equal favour was extended to Cotsford Dick's new ballad, "Olivia" (Miss Mary Davies), and "Zurich's Waters" (Madame Sherrington). Mr. Alfred Moore proved, by his delivery of Cooke's "Safely follow Him," that he has a capital voice; and lastly, Mackenzie's part-song, "A Franklynne's Dogge" (words from "The Ingoldsby Legends"), produced a most humorous effect, as sung by the London Vocal Union in their usual admirable manner.

Waifs.——According to the Brussels' papers Madame Adelina Patti and Signor Nicolini cleared no less than 60,000 francs (2,400*l.*) by their six performances at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. How much of this was due to the gentleman and how much to the lady it is easy enough to guess.—Miss Emma Barnett, one of our youngest and most rising pianists, sister to Mr. John Francis Barnett, and niece to John Barnett, composer of the Mountain Sylph, Fair Rosamund, the Pet of the Petticoats, Farinelli, and (more shame to our operatic entrepreneurs), the still unheard Kathleen, with great and deserved success. Her programmes, varied and excellent, comprise specimens of Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., with all of whose music she is familiar.—To-night a series of operatic performances, under the direction of Mr. Samuel Hayes, begin at Covent Garden Theatre, with Mr. Sims Reeves as the chief attraction. —A pianoforte recital was given by Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons at their concert room in Wigmore Street on Tuesday afternoon. The pianist was Miss Margaret Bucknall, who performed works by Chopin, Macfarren, and Thalberg, in an exceedingly brilliant and artistic style. The object of this recital was to introduce to public notice a grand pianoforte of new and improved make, the work of this firm. This splendid instrument possesses the unusual compass of seven and a half octaves, and has a greatly increased length and weight of string between the bridges, while the Sostenente sounding board is so constructed as to respond to the vibration of the strings with extreme readiness.

Death of Mr. Gye.——The accident which happened on the shooting grounds of Lord Dillon, on Thursday week, to the director of the Royal Italian Opera has led to fatal results. On Wednesday Mr. Gye expired, after a week's terrible suffering. He has so long been a prominent figure in the world of operatic music that he will be missed from amongst us. Some thirty years' probation showed him as one of the ablest and most energetic of managers. He was invited to superintend the financial and general business affairs of the Covent Garden Opera House in 1849, when it was carried on by some of the principal artists on their own account. In 1851 he became sole manager, and has remained so till now that death has taken him away. As an example of Mr. Gye's quick readiness and indomitable perseverance may be cited the almost unparalleled feat which succeeded the destruction by fire, Feb. 5, 1856, of Old Covent Garden Theatre, when under the temporary control of Mr. Anderson, the once renowned "Wizard of the North." Mr. Gye leased the Lyceum Theatre, and began his opera season about two months after the disaster, with the whole of his company. He then announced that the Royal Italian Opera would be rebuilt, and open on the 15th of April, 1858. The pledge was strictly fulfilled, a grand performance of Meyerbeer's Huguenots being given, with Grisi and Mario in the two leading characters, and Costa conductor on the very evening advertised. If there ever was a coup de maître, this was surely one. We have no space to dwell upon the repertory that season after season has built up until upwards of 50 operas are at ready command of the establishment which, thanks in a great measure to Mr. Gye's own exertions, has long been recognised as the first opera house in Europe.

SPORTING

The Turf.——The Croydon November Meeting concluded in even worse weather than it commenced, and those who were present at Woodside to witness the Great Metropolitan Steeplechase will long remember the day as one of the most wretched ever experienced. That several owners did not care to run their horses with the ground a very Slough of Despond may account partly for the small field of seven only contesting the chief event. The French horse, the Marquis de Sauveur's Wild Monarch, was elected favourite, with Bacchus and Sleight-of-Hand next in demand. Only one of the three, however, could get a place, and that was the favourite, who finished third, Citizen winning from Royal Oak II. by a length. Bacchus ran out of the course, a proceeding which called forth some remarks uncomplimentary to his rider, while Sleight-of-Hand, on landing at the last jump, may literally be said to have stuck in the mud—a contretemps which destroyed the excellent prospect he had of winning the race. Altogether, it may be said that, without taking into account the adverse influence of the weather, the meeting showed signs of weakness, and it seems not improbable that the new institutions of Kempton and Sandown Parks will still further interfere with Croydon and other meetings in the neighbourhood of London. Not that Sandown this week can boast of any great success, though it was favoured with fairly good weather. Seven was but a poor field for the Great Hurdle Race, run on Tuesday; and the pickers of favourites were again out in their choice, as the French mare Chimère, who won the corresponding race at Croydon, though made first favourite, had to put up with third place, while Bugle March, who was next in favour, could only get fourth. The race fell to Carthusian, who beat Sir Hugh by a head, after a game struggle. Chimney Sweep had to suffer another defeat in the Prince of Wales's Steeplechase, being beaten by Quibble, and it would almost seem that the old horse has lost some of his speed, though his jumping powers are as good as ever. In the Claremont Hunters' Race, Mr. T. T. Drake scored an eleventh victory with Quits. In a Selling Steeplechase Mr. Yates ran both Extinguisher and King Sweep, and as the former had won twice at Croydon and well beaten his stable companion, odds were laid on him. King Sweep, however, won, and as might be expected there were murmurings loud and deep, which were increased on the following day, when Extinguisher beat King Sweep easily enough, both horses having passed out of Mr. Yates's hands. This gentleman and his jockey, Mr. Barnes, were called before the Stewards to give some explanation; and the result was that Mr. Yates was exonerated of all blame, but Mr. Barnes was suspended from riding for the remainder of the day, and ordered to appear before the Grand National Hunt Committee on Monday next. A small field again could only be got together for the Great Sandown Steeplechase, and once more backers were at fault; for neither of the two selected favourites out of a field of eight were placed. Sleight-of-hand, it was confidently expected, would make up for his Croydon defeat, but he ran badly. The winner turned up in Marshal Niel, and thus Sir J. L. Kay has added the Sandown to the Croydon victory. The Priory Steeplechase was won by York, the favourite Tutor falling at the bottom of the hill.—Among some items of Turf news may be mentioned that Great Tom has been purchased for stud purposes in the United States; and that the promising Derby colt Falmouth has been sold to Mr. F. Gretton for the substantial sum of 6,000 guineas.

Football.——In the second round of the Association Challenge Cup Cambridge has beaten South Norwood by three goals to none.—At Eton, according to ancient custom, on Saturday last, St. Andrew's Day, the annual match—"the Game at the Wall"—between Collegers and Oppidans was played before a large assembly of old and present Etonians and their friends. The Collegers, who specially cultivate this form of football, were victorious by no less than nine goals to love. On the same day, also according to annual custom, the Old Etonians resident at Oxford and Cambridge played their match "in the field." The Cambridge team had it all their own way from the beginning, and won by three goals and three "rouges" to nothing.—Birmingham has suffered a signal defeat by London in an Association game at the Oval.—An Inter-County match under Rugby rules has been played between Kent and Yorkshire, the southern county winning easily; and Lancashire has beaten Northumberland and Durham combined.—The Sheffield team has beaten Staffordshire; Cambridge in an Association game was superior to the Old Harrovians, while Oxford and the Wanderers have played a drawn game.

Pedestrianism.——"Corkey," the English long-distance champion, offers to contest with O'Leary in two matches, one to come off here and one in America, for the possession of the English Champion and the World Champion belts.

RURAL NOTES

Fat Stock Shows.——At this period of the year little else is thought of by farmers than "to see and be seen." There is not much work to do on the farm that they cannot safely trust to their bailiff. Their crops have been gathered in, their winter wheat sown, their roots and potatoes lifted, and they are free to see how their roots and potatoes stand at great shows, such as Sutton's, Carter's, and Webb's, in comparison with those of their fellow agriculturists who grow in other localities. They are anxious also to observe how the cattle they have been kind to in their own way would contrast with others that have been fed upon different kinds of artificial food. Many disappointments often occur to exhibitors through too much localisation. They do not think, having taken stock of the cattle belonging to their immediate neighbours, and seeing their own to be superior, that they can possibly be beaten in their particular class at such great shows as have taken place this week—Birmingham, for instance. That this idea had pervaded the minds of not a few exhibitors was manifest from the fact that a considerable number of animals appeared in the stalls of Bingley Hall which had better have stayed at home. Their owners had not got the knack of putting on the flesh evenly on the frame, nor the nous to give such polish to the skin as men like M'Combie and other constant exhibitors can do. The Birmingham Show was below the mark this year, as, indeed, were several others preceding it. Hard times have precluded farmers from laying out so much money on artificial feeding as they had been wont to do; and another reason, perhaps, apart altogether from the "crisis" in farming affairs, is that they find that fattening for show purposes is not so profitable as keeping stock well on for the butcher. Looking rationally at fat-stock shows—they have now lost their educational training. The stock of all breeds and in all sections have not improved one whit for the last ten years. We have no finer type in form, quality, and style to look up to in the Scotch polled, for instance, than Mr. M'Combie's Black Prince, from which the Queen secured a baron; no heifer in shorthorns equal to the Rev. Mr. Bruce Kennard's Queen Mary; and no better cross than Mr. Harris's ox. Fat-stock shows are now valuable only as an advertisement for the ordinary stock of the exhibitor: sometimes the winners have found out that they have paid too dear for their whistle, and not a few previously well-known names have of late years dropped out of the competitive list. The exhibition at Birmingham this year had additional attraction given to it by the presentation of a silver cup of 100 guineas value, and a silver cup of 50*l.*, for the best animal of the cattle classes in the yard and the best sheep respectively. These prizes, indeed, were regarded as the blue riband of the arena, and the anxiety manifested as to their bestowal by those who had gained awards in their special sections was intense. One by one the sectionally-honoured ones were weeded out, and the final tussle lay between Lord Lovat's magnificent cross between a shorthorn and polled Angus and a wonderfully well-fleshed symetrical Hereford, belonging to Mr. Platt, Hereford. The judges did not take long to decide between them. Lord Lovat got Messrs. Gibbs' cup, a very handsome trophy, and the value of the prizes taken by this one animal at Birmingham amounts to 380*l.*, a sum sufficient to cover a few defects. The remarkable thing is that few disputed the justness of the decision. The Smithfield Show, which commences on Monday, will have better animals than those which appeared at Birmingham.

The Royal Agricultural Society's Forthcoming Show in London.——The funds towards the expenses of the R. A. S. E. are not rolling so rapidly into the Mansion House coffers as was to be expected. At least 20,000*l.* will be wanted, and as yet only 7,700*l.* are forthcoming. However, it is a long call to July yet. The present list as already arranged is immensely larger than anything that has preceded it. On Monday it was stated that 12,458*l.* had been allotted; the Mansion House Committee contributing 3,747*l.*, the Shorthorn Society 200*l.*, the Hop-growers' Committee 230*l.*, and from the funds of the Society itself are extracted 8,281*l.* After this announcement had been made an additional 292*l.* was voted towards Cups for the best shorthorn, English or foreign; 25*l.* given by the London Omnibus Company for the best 'bus horse; 50*l.* for the best waggon for conveying perishable articles a distance of 500 miles, such as meat, fish, &c.; two prizes of 25*l.* each for carcases of beef which arrived in good condition after 1,000 miles' transport; and two of the same amount for American beef and mutton arriving in palatable form fourteen days after slaughter. These swell the total of prizes to 12,900*l.*, a sum which ought to attract exhibitors from all quarters of the globe. Among the prizes, however, we do not yet note any for agricultural machinery, which surely ought to be recognised.

The Agricultural Crisis.——It is lamentable that in Kent such difference should exist between farmers and labourers. The breach instead of narrowing is gradually growing wider day by day, to the great disadvantage of both parties, but specially to the labourers at the present season of the year. Their Union funds cannot last very long, and if they continue unwisely to remain out of employment, it appears to us, there will be only a cold Christmas for them, which the fiery orations of their leaders will not warm. Farmers, however, might show a little bit more leniency than in some cases they are reported to have done, for, although they are comparatively independent of the labourer for a month or two, they will need his services in the spring.

The Weather.——A great amount of rain has fallen recently, more than we have had in the latter days of November for many years. All outdoor work on the farm has been stopped or carried on under very unfavourable circumstances. Sheep on turnips have not been thriving on account of the rain, and foot-rot has shown itself in some localities in the north. Speaking generally, however, the usual operations on the farm are on an average well forward.

LEGAL

Miscellaneous Items.——An extradition treaty entered into with Spain in June last comes into force on Monday next. It applies to all crimes and indictable offences recognised by the laws of both countries, and is retrospective in its action, so that numbers of persons who are "wanted," amongst others Mr. Nichol Fleming of the Glasgow City Bank, will have to seek an asylum further afield if they wish to avoid arrest.—The Irish legal appointments have now been completed. Mr. Gerald Fitzgibbon, Solicitor-General for Ireland, succeeds Lord Justice Christian in the Court of Appeal; Mr. Michael Harrison, of the Court of Bankruptcy, succeeds to the Common Pleas, in the room of the late Mr. Justice Keogh; and Mr. Serjeant Robinson, Q.C., succeeds to the Bankruptcy Court, Mr. Hugh Holms, Q.C., becoming Solicitor-General. Some of the Irish papers express great dissatisfaction at the appointment of Judge Harrison.—The trial of Mr. Robertson's libel action against the proprietors of Truth has been postponed in consequence of the illness of Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, the plaintiff's leading counsel, who was seized with a fainting fit during the hearing of the case on Friday last.—Mr. Lambri's action against the printer and publisher of Truth, was before the Queen's Bench Division on Saturday, when the defendants' pleas, which were objected to as not being sufficiently specific, were ordered to be amended within a week, so that that the trial might not be delayed. Attention was called to a paragraph bearing on the case which had appeared in Truth subsequent to the application; and the Lord Chief Justice remarked that it was an ungenerous sneer which ought not to have been published.—On Saturday, in the Exchequer Division, a gentleman named Rumer (not Rumour) brought an action against Lord George Hamilton to recover 250*l.* for "valuable information" regarding the Eastern Question supplied to the British Government. Lord George, however, stated that it was only out of respect for one of his constituents that he had read the plaintiff's communications which contained nothing but what had already appeared in the newspapers, and Mr. Baron Huddleston ordered a nonsuit on the ground that no contract had been proved.—On Saturday the depositions against Lady Gooch, and the nurse, Mrs. Walker, were completed, and both were formally committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court, bail being taken for each. It was stated that Lady Gooch, acting under the advice of her counsel, would commence an action for adultery against Sir Francis.—The defective state of the London tramways, which has long been a subject of general complaint, may perhaps be in some degree remedied now that the company have had to pay damages to the tune of 42*l.* 10*s.* to a medical gentleman, whose carriage was literally torn in halves while crossing the rails in the Kennington Road in June last.—It is not often that one has to thank a thief for robbing one: yet this seems to be the case of a lady in Scotland, who some time ago entrusted 2,000*l.* to an agent for investment in the Glasgow City Bank, and believed that he had done so, as he paid her the dividends regularly. Since the failure, however, it has been discovered that he appropriated the capital, and paid her the interest out of it. She has, therefore, no "calls" to answer, and may possibly recover her 2,000*l.*, if she can find the rogue who embezzled it.—The other day a gentleman was summoned by his butler for assaulting him, by forcibly turning him into the street, because he refused to clean a coal-scuttle. He was, however, told that his master had a right to put him out if he did not obey his lawful commands; his remedy for the improper termination of an engagement being in the County Court. Whether the cleaning of scuttles formed part of a butler's work the magistrate confessed he did not know.—The sentence of five years' penal servitude, passed by Mr. Edlin on a man named Davis for stealing money, which he declared to be his own, has been commuted to one of a year's imprisonment with hard labour.—A correspondent of the Daily Telegraph says that, on Friday last, a lady, having had her purse snatched from her, pointed out the thief to a policeman, who only shrugged his shoulders, and remarked, "He has gone too far; I can't catch him." It is a pity that the number of this active officer was not taken.—A coroner's jury have found that the death of the lad Nolan, which occurred recently in the House of Detention, resulted from inflammation of the lungs, and was accelerated by the repeated and excessive punishment of bread and water diet, ordered by the Governor and sanctioned by the surgeon. The verdict was given on Wednesday, and on Thursday an indignation meeting was held on Clerkenwell Green, at which a deputation was appointed to wait on the Home Secretary.—Mr. W. R. Wood, the Salford magistrate, who recently arrested two Sisters of Mercy for "begging," has been severely censured by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who threatens to remove his name from the Commission of the Peace in the event of a repetition of such indiscreet conduct. Mr. Wood, however, declines to be guided upon points of law by the Chancellor, and says that he shall only bow to the decision of the Supreme Court of Judicature.—Mrs. Peace, the wife of the Blackheath burglar, has been brought to London, and examined at Bow Street on the charge of "receiving" some of the stolen property. She is now under remand; but her counsel contends that, even if she did receive the things, she cannot be convicted, as she was acting under the influence of her husband. The Treasury is conducting the prosecution.—The manager of a "money club" at Sheffield has absconded with the funds, 300*l*., to America, whence he has written to say that he shall not return.—A fellow named Williams last week visited Liverpool, and managed to get cash for forged cheques to the amount of 1,500*l*. His clerk, however, suspecting something wrong, communicated with the police, who followed the forger to Birmingham, and caught him after a smart chase amongst the moving trains in the railway station, during which he was nearly run over by an engine.—A quantity of jewellery has been carried off by a burglar from the residence of the Bishop of St. Alban's.

PROFESSOR BROWNE has the largest stock of Ladies and Gentlemen's Ornamental Hair in the World always on view at his Establishment, 47, Fenchurch Street, London.

general impression is that the material Oxford has in hand out of which to form the Putney crew is better than was thought a few weeks ago.—The corresponding race between the Cambridge Trial Eights came off on Wednesday over the Ely course of three miles. Davis of First Trinity was the stroke of the winning crew, which, after a good race for the first two miles, drew in front and beat the eight stroked by Bird, also of First Trinity, by two lengths. As at Oxford, so at Cambridge, satisfaction is felt at the exhibition of rowing in the Trial Eights. The arrival at Bristol of Wallace Ross, the well-known American oarsman, is announced. He will endeavour to make some matches with our scullers during his stay in England.

COURSING.——The coursers have had a pretty fair time of it since the season began, but this week the frost has caused the postponement of the Ridgway Club Meeting, to the disappointment of very many lovers of the leash.—The Blankney Meeting was quite up to the mark, and has now fairly taken rank among first-class gatherings. Mr. Wise's Wedding Tour and Mr. Marfleet's Mead Flower divided the Chaplin Cup; Mr. Alexander took the Blankney Stakes with Alice Conroy; and the Temple Stakes fell to Mr. Robinson with Runaway.—The North of England Club (Eslington) had also had a good meeting, Mr. Walker's Miss Jane winning the Eslington Stakes, and Mr. Spearman's Nellie Miller the Ravensworth Cup.—There has been a little speculation on the Waterloo Cup, Lord Fermoy's nomination with those of Lord Haddington, Mr. Hornby, Mr. Douglas, and Mr. Briggs being the most in demand, the first-named being quoted at 18 to 1 on the supposition that Zazel, last year's runner-up, will fill it. Against Coomassie, the winner on the two last occasions, only 8 to 1 can be had; and there is hardly a whisper as yet whose nomination she will represent.

FOOTBALL.——Progress has been made in the second round of the Association Challenge Cup. It was a foregone conclusion that the Forest School would go down before the Clapham Rovers, as it was a case of men against boys. At Upton Park the Minerva beat the Grey Friars by three goals to none; and a draw was the result of Darwen v. Eagley. But by far the most interesting game has been between Oxford University and the Royal Engineers, both powerful teams. It was played at the Oval on Tuesday, when the Military sustained a four goals to love defeat at the hands of the "pale students," who are likely to make a very bold bid for the cup.—Those old antagonists, Maidenhead and Windsor, have played an Association game, the former winning by a goal to nothing.—Richmond v. Cambridge, one of the best Rugby games of the season, was played at the University on Saturday last, to the discomfiture of the Cantabs.—The Clapham Rovers have been too much for St. Thomas's Hospital; but the combined London Hospitals scored against the Liverpudlians at Liverpool.—In an Association Match between the Universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, the former won by eight goals to one.

HUNTING AND SHOOTING ACCIDENTS.——It is always sad to have to record fatal accidents in connection with our out door sports and pastimes; and two very lamentable ones have recently happened, the one in the hunting-field to Mr. Gye of operatic renown, and the other to Colonel Whyte-Melville, of hunting and literary fame, while galloping with the Vale of White Horse fox hounds. Of the latter accident there is nothing more to be said than that such mishaps will occasionally befall the best of riders when riding the best of horses; but in connection with the former it is impossible to avoid reflecting that it would never have happened, had the excellent rule of withdrawing cartridges when obstacles have to be crossed been observed.

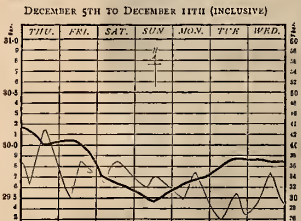
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

DECEMBER 5TH TO DECEMBER 11TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——During the past week the weather has continued dull, cold, and gloomy. The winds have again been generally northerly, inclining more to north-west than north-east, and some small barometrical disturbances in our neighbourhood at the commencement of the period caused cold rain on Thursday, the 5th instant, and snow on Friday evening, the 6th instant. The next few days were rather more settled; but the weather was extremely gloomy, and a good deal of fog and mist were observed. On Wednesday, the 11th instant, snow showers fell, and a disturbance appeared to be advancing along our east coast, causing the barometer to fall a little, and the wind to back somewhat. Temperature has fallen in the course of the week, and was very low on Tuesday, the 11th instant, the maximum being no higher than 31°. On Monday night, the 10th instant, the thermometer on the grass fell as low as 15°. The barometer was highest (30·18 inches) on Thursday, the 5th instant; lowest (29·47 inches) on Sunday, the 8th instant: range, 0·71 inches. Temperature was highest (43°) on Thursday, the 5th instant; lowest (26°) on Tuesday, the 11th instant; range, 17°. Rain or snow has fallen on three days; total amount, 0·15 inches; greatest fall on any one day, 0·12 inches, on Friday, the 6th instant.

CHRISTMAS CHEER.——Among those charitable institutions which need aid at this season is the Leicester Square Soup Kitchen and Refuge, Ham Yard, Great Windmill Street, W., where preparations are being made to give a Christmas dinner to a thousand families, each to receive 4lbs. of beef, 3lbs. plum pudding, a loaf of bread, with tea, sugar, &c. The bankers are Union Bank, Charing Cross, and Messrs. Barnetts, Hoares, and Co., Lombard Street. As the puddings are made in the kitchen, contributions in kind would also be very acceptable.

SHORT BALL DRESSES are to be worn in Paris this winter.

THE NEXT SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS is to be held in Manchester.

THE YELLOW FEVER EPIDEMIC in the United States has cost 12,000 lives and 40,000,000*l.*

VOLTAIRE'S SWISS HOME—Ferney, on the Lake of Geneva—is in future to be called Ferney-Voltaire.

ANOTHER AMERICAN EXHIBITION is projected on the plan of the Centennial—this time, however, in New-York.

GERMAN SOCIALIST ORGANS adopt very striking names—to wit, The Storm Blast, The Martyr of Capital, The Iron Hammer, and The Petroleum Can.

MR. EDISON has invented an improved receiver for his telephone which enables any person standing fifteen yards from the machine to hear distinctly a whisper uttered miles away.

A NEW ART GALLERY is to be built in Dresden, and the design will be selected from the plans of Dresden architects, who are to send in their works by February. The scheme has been long under consideration, the site for the building having been given in 1862.

THE PARIS LOUVRE has acquired the trunk of a new statue of Venus unearthed in the neighbourhood of Vienne. The figure is in a stooping posture, and has unfortunately lost both hands and head, while on the back is a tiny hand evidently belonging to a Cupid which she must have been bearing on her shoulders.

TABLEAUX-VIVANTS illustrating the prize pictures in the Paris Exhibition will probably be produced at the Gaîté this winter. The manager of the theatre has already written to Herr Mackart, the painter of the enormous "Entry of Charles V. into Antwerp," in the Austrian Section, for permission to represent his work.

THE ITALIAN SCULPTORS who exhibited at the Paris Exhibition have decided not to bring back their works to Italy on account of their fragility, but intend to sell them by auction in Paris. The proceeds of the sale will be equally divided among the sculptors, so that the minor artists may profit as highly as their more famous brethren.

A BIBLE DINNER is described by a Transatlantic contemporary, every item of the meal being ingeniously collected from various parts of Scripture, given verbatim in the language of the text. Every detail of the feast is noted, from the invitation of the guests and the laying of the table, to the actual bill of fare, the beverages and the music during the festivities.

THE VACCINATION ACT is curiously misunderstood by illiterate Romanists in Canada, according to the New York Christian Union. They believe that the operation is a sort of baptism, a trick to make them into Protestants, and one curé near Montreal has been working hard to reassure his flock on the subject, numbers having died of smallpox.

THE VICTORIA HOSPITAL FOR CHILDREN, Queen's Road, S.W., appeals for funds to free from a debt of 800*l.* the Convalescent branch of the institution established at Margate in 1876; this convalescent home contains twelve beds, and requires an annual income of 500*l.*, which as yet has never been entirely provided, although the house has been given rent-free.

A SNAKE-KILLING CAT is owned by an Arizona settler near Mohawk. Master Puss is a perfect adept at catching rattlesnakes; he watches them till they uncoil and begin to glide off, then he springs on the creatures, clutches the back of the neck, and chews the vertebræ until the snakes are dead, tearing loose with his claws any coils that may be thrown round his body.

WOODCOCKS have been plentiful in Central France during the recent bad weather. In the mountainous country through which part of the Loire runs the birds have been frightened out of the woods by the storms and cold, and have flown in flocks to the furnaces of the works at Terrenoire, where, fascinated by the flames, they have hovered so near that the workmen knocked them down with sticks.

KING LOUIS OF BAVARIA is going to build a gorgeous palace after the model of the Versailles chateau and grounds, on an island in the Chiemsee, a lake in the Bavarian Tyrol. Three hundred workmen are already employed on the foundations, and the building is expected to take ten or fifteen years, costing some 1,800,000*l.* A canal will also be cut through the island, and a lighthouse erected.

THE VATICAN is going to establish a special journal, which is intended to advance the Papal cause, to publish the full text of all allocutions, briefs, addresses, and supply clerical news. The journal will be printed in five languages, Italian, French, English, German, and Spanish, and will be organised by the Pope's brother, Mgr. Pecci. The first number comes out next March, and it is hoped will attain a circulation of 50,000, 10,000 to be sold in Rome itself.

A NEW FRENCH JOURNAL, La Semaine Française, has been brought out in London for the benefit of those English readers who may wish to study contemporary French opinion from all points of view, instead of confining their reading to one particular Gallic print. Judging from the character of the first number—which contains articles on varied topics culled from the best French papers, and odds and ends of interesting news—the venture certainly merits success.

THE PROMISE OF A SEVERE WINTER this season is further supported by some statistics in the Gardeners' Chronicle. The writer shows that a hard winter is likely to recur at periods of either forty-one or eighty years, and brings forward numerous proofs of the rule. Unfortunately for chilly people, the present winter comes eighty years after the bitter winter of 1798-9, and forty-one years after that of 1837-8, when the thermometer near London registered 46 degrees of frost, so that, according to the above rule, we have a double chance of severe cold.

CHRISTMAS CARDS, DIARIES, &c.——Everything that is issued by the well-known firm of Messrs. De la Rue is distinguished by its elegance and high finish. This criticism applies equally to their pocket-books, table and other calendars, and their Christmas Cards. Messrs. Letts aim rather at the patronage of the counting-house than the drawing-room, and their diaries vary in size and arrangement so as to suit every commercial requirement. From Messrs. Marcus Ward, from Mr. B. Sulman, from Mr. H. Rothe, and from Messrs. Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday, we have also received assortments of Christmas Cards, all calculated to afford pleasure to the senders and receivers of these friendly little missives. From the Religious Tract Society we have some very effective and highly ornamental wall texts.

LONDON MORTALITY increased last week, and 2,016 deaths were registered against 1,624 during the previous seven days. This increase was mainly due to the sinking of the Princess Alice on the 3rd of September, 389 deaths being registered. Exclusive of this number the deaths were 138 below the average. There were 4 deaths from small-pox, 28 from measles, 9 from diphtheria, 42 from whooping-cough (an increase of 3), 9 from diarrhœa, 62 from scarlet fever (a decline of 8, being 22 below the average), and 460 from diseases of the respiratory organs (an increase of 19, but being below the average), of which 299 resulted from bronchitis and 101 from pneumonia. There were 2,576 births registered against 2,427 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 36·3 deg., or 5·4 deg. below the average. There were 3·4 hours of registered bright sunshine, the sun being 56·1 hours above the horizon.

KELLY'S POST OFFICE LONDON DIRECTORY.——Once more we have to acknowledge the receipt of our old and esteemed friend with his new face for 1879. This is the eightieth year of publication for this invaluable manual. Although London yearly grows bigger, there are nearly 200 pages less than there were last year. This has been accomplished by printing the "Commercial" portion in smaller type. We would not, however, recommend the proprietors to carry this diminution of the size of the type too far. Under no circumstances can the "Post Office London Directory" be converted into a volume for the waistcoat-pocket, and it had better be very big and quite legible than nearly as big and much less legible. We may add that an improvement has been effected in the manner in which the map has been folded, so that any part can be referred to without unfolding the whole. But why not, Messrs. Kelly, charge a trifle more for your mighty annual, mount the map on canvas, and bestow it in a flap under the cover? As matters now are, the map is reduced to a rag long before the year is over.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA

EMBARKATION OF TROOPS AT SOUTHAMPTON

THE 99th Regiment, which was under orders for service in South Africa, left Aldershot for Southampton last week by special train. A portion of the regiment, numbering over 400 officers and men, besides women and children, was embarked on the Wednesday on board the Union Company's steamship American. On the following day, the remainder of the Regiment consisting of about 300 officers and men, with about 60 women and 120 children, embarked on board the Asiatic, a vessel which also belongs to the Union Company, and on board of which our sketches were taken. The American sailed on Thursday, and the Asiatic on Friday, and on Tuesday last the Teuton, a third steamer of the Union Company's fleet, left Southampton with a further instalment of troops, numbering some 600 officers and men. All three vessels are bound for Cape Town, where orders will be received as to the port of debarkation.

Our artist desires us to express his obligations to Messrs. Hedger and Giles, the manager and the engineer of the Docks, to Capt. Dixon, of the Union Line, and to Capt. Leigh, of the steamship Asiatic, for the facilities afforded to him for making sketches.

PRESENTATION OF COLOURS BY THE QUEEN

ON Friday last, the 4th Regiment ("King's Own"), which is now on its way to South Africa, received its new colours from the hands of Her Majesty the Queen. The ceremony took place in the Great Quadrangle of Windsor Castle, where a guard of honour, consisting of a company of the Coldstream Guards and 100 men of the 1st Berkshire Volunteers, was drawn up. The "King's Own" came from Aldershot under the charge of Col. Bray, C.B., an officer who in his youth served with Pollock's "Avenging Army" in Afghanistan, and soon after they had marched into the quadrangle, the Queen and Princess Beatrice, with the Duke of Cambridge and Staff, arrived. Her Majesty was of course received with a Royal salute, and after the National Anthem had been played by the band of the Coldstreams, the "King's Own" marched past, first in slow time and then in quick. The old regimental colours, on which appeared the name of many hard won victories, were then "trooped" and saluted for the last time, and then borne away through the southern porch. The band of the regiment then marched into the centre of the quadrangle, and piled their drums in a pyramid to form a military altar, upon which the new colours were presently laid. Bishop Claughton (Chaplain-General of the Forces) then offered up a prayer and pronounced a benediction, after which the Queen stepped forward to the altar, and standing between the colours, held erect by Lieuts. Shepherd and Hutchinson, who had received them kneeling, made a short speech, expressing her hope that order might be restored in South Africa before the regiment arrived, and of her confidence that she might at all times rely on their devotion and zeal, and that they would emulate the deeds of their predecessors, who for two hundred years had been distinguished in the annals of their country. Col. Bray then spoke in reply, addressing himself first to the men of the regiment, reminding them of its brilliant history, and calling upon them to carry the bright colours, that day presented to them by the Queen, through the ranks of Her enemies wherever they might dare to bar the way. Turning to the Queen he assured Her Majesty that the honour which she had conferred would be returned by the devotion with which the "King's Own" would lay down their lives for Her and for Her Royal House, and that "the colours presented by the greatest lady in the land would never be sullied by cruelty and barbarity, but always be carried with the national valour of true soldiers." Another Royal salute and the strains of the National Anthem brought the ceremony to an end, and the Queen retired amid the cheering of the men, who shouted and waved their white helmets with great enthusiasm. Before returning to Aldershot the officers of the "King's Own" were entertained in the Waterloo Chamber, a substantial meal being provided for the men in the Riding School.

SKETCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA

"'FORT EVELYN,' says our artist, "is the name of an earthwork thrown up on the Gazo Heights, in the Peri Bush, by Colonel Wood, whilst the bush was full of the enemy. On the plateau, more than a mile as the crow flies from the camp, the Kaffirs used to warm themselves in the sun, and challenge our soldiers to come and fight them. At the time of my sketch the fort was occupied by Hottentot Militia, which, however, have since been withdrawn and disbanded. The heights are several thousand feet above the level of the sea, which is visible distant some forty miles.

"Baillie's Grave is the name given to a post, close to the spot where Baillie fell in a former Kaffir War, which is now occupied by troops. The road over the hill in the centre leads to Kieskammahoek, a place of some importance. The high mountain peak on the extreme right is the Kieskamma, and on the left is the Hogs-back. Directly behind the long neck which unites the two peaks rises the Gaka Kopi, the highest peak of the Amatolas, but it is not visible in the sketch. A party of prisoners is passing the post.

"The view of the Peri Bush was taken from the spot where Lieut.-Gen. Thesiger stood when he made his arrangements for the combined movements. The Krantz in the centre is M'Naughten's Krantz. The Peri Bush stretches right across. To the left is Murray's Krantz (not seen in the picture), to the right is the Krantz where Donovan and Ward, of the D. F. Horse, fell. The bush (K K K) in the right centre was full of Kaffir huts and the remains of dead oxen. When in the mountains and in the Peri Bush the Kaffirs usually built their huts and kraals just within the bush, not further than twenty yards at the utmost from the open, so that in case a raid was made to burn their huts they simply retreated a few yards into the thick cover of the bush and opened fire. Their dwellings were quite invisible from without. Those represented had been partially destroyed by the captors, and the ground was strewn with husks of mealies, bones, and horns of slaughtered cattle, remnants of mats, &c., while here and there we came across the unburied corpse of a Kaffir.

"My fourth sketch represents the arrival of a party of Hottentots at King William's Town."

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT—MOVERS AND SECONDERS OF THE ADDRESS

As a report of the debate on the Queen's Speech will be found under the head of "Parliament" we need not here recount the arguments used in both Houses by the Movers and Seconders of the Address to the Throne. In the House of Lords the Address was moved by Lord RAVENSWORTH, whose portrait we are unfortunately unable to give, as his lordship has never sat to any photographer. We, however, learn from "Debrett" that HENRY THOMAS LIDDELL, First Earl of Ravensworth, was born in 1797, educated at Eton and Cambridge, succeeded his father in the barony in 1855, and was created Earl of Ravensworth and Baron Eslington in 1874. His lordship married in 1820 the eldest daughter of Lord George Seymour, and has a family one son and seven daughters.—The Seconder of the Address in the Upper Chamber was EDWARD DONOUGH O'BRIEN, BARON INCHIQUIN, a representative peer of Ireland and a Baronet. He was born in 1839, educated at Cambridge, and succeeded to the title on the death of his father in 1872. He married in 1862 the Hon. Emily Holmes A'Court, a daughter of the second Baron Heytesbury, who died in 1868, and by whom he has three sons and one daughter; and secondly, in 1874, the Hon. Ellen Harriette White, daughter of the second Baron Annaly, by whom also he has issue.

In the House of Commons the Address was moved by CHARLES STUART VANE TEMPEST, VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH, M.P. for County Down. He is the eldest son of the Marquis of Londonderry, was born in 1852, and educated at Eton and Oxford. His lordship is Lieut.-Colonel of the Durham Artillery Volunteers, a magistrate for the county of Durham, and Deputy-Lieutenant for Montgomery. He was married three years ago to the eldest daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot. At the general election in 1874 he unsuccessfully contested Durham, and in 1877 he was rejected by the electors of Montgomery Burghs, but was returned last May by the Downshire electors in the room of the late Mr. J. S. Crawford.

ALEXANDER WILLIAM HALL, Esq., M.P. for the city of Oxford, who was the seconder of the Address in the House of Commons, is the eldest son of the late Mr. Henry Hall, of Barton Abbey, Oxfordshire. He was born in 1838, educated at Eton and Oxford, and married in 1863. He is a Justice of the Peace, and Deputy-Lieutenant for Oxfordshire, of which county he was formerly High Sheriff. At the general election in February, 1874, he was an unsuccessful candidate for Oxford city, but in the following month the seat again became vacant by the elevation of Mr. Cardwell to the Peerage, and Mr. Hall was chosen by the electors in preference to Mr. J. D. Lewis, the Liberal candidate.

Our portraits are from photographs—that of Viscount Castlereagh by Alexander Bassano, 25, Old Bond Street, W., and those of Lord Inchiquin and Mr. Hall by Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street, Portman Square, W.

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT

Only a few women besides Elise Hurt had obtained a footing on the shrouds at all, and one by one, overcome by fatigue and fear, these relaxed their hold of the ropes, and were whirled away into the raging deep, as often as not in silence.

UNDER ONE ROOF: An Episode in a Family History

By JAMES PAYN,

AUTHOR OF "LOST SIR MASSINGBERD," "BY PROXY," ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

DRIVING SHOREWARD

GRESHAM was no sailor, and he was by no means easily impressed with the sense of personal danger; but as the gale increased he could not avoid the suspicion that the Rhineland was incompetent to fight against it, though whether this arose from her build, or the weakness of her engines, or the unfitness of her crew, he was no judge. He only knew for certain that she sank lower in the trough of the sea, remained longer than she had at first in those briny depths of the colour and opaqueness of bottle glass, and rose to the surface no longer buoyantly, but as it were with a dead lift. His view of matters was essentially that of a landsman, of course, yet it was clear that things were not as they should be. For example, notwithstanding his thick Ulster and the railway rug, he had now scarcely a dry thread on his body, for wave after wave washed the deck, so that it seemed at times to be under water. Seated at the foot of a mast in almost the centre of the vessel, he was in as level a spot as could be attained, yet his feet were as often as not higher than his head, and only by gripping a taut rope could he save himself at every lurch from being swept with the outgoing waters against the bulwarks.

There had been one or two male passengers who, like himself, had preferred the rough usage of the storm to the sights and sounds and smells that were only too certain to be met with below stairs, but even these had sooner or later sought the shelter of the cabin, save one individual, with bright grey eyes and keen, weather-beaten face, who now ensconced himself close to Gresham. "When there is war among the elements," he observed, with a strong American accent, "man and beast, fore-cabin and saloon passenger, all herd together in presence of the common danger."

The idea of this individual from the second cabin thinking it necessary to apologise for his intrusion on a privileged locality during what, not only to Mr. Gresham's eyes, but in actual fact had become little less than a hurricane, tickled that gentleman's sense of humour.

"You have been in a good many gales like this, no doubt?" said he, good naturedly, and also, perhaps, with a secret hope that his companion might reply in the affirmative.

"I have been in a good many gales, yes, sir, but not in one like this," answered the other, slowly. "This is a most all-fired and catawampous tornado."

"Do you think the ship will live through it?" inquired Gresham, in as indifferent a tone as he could assume.

"I have not given my consideration, sir, to that contingency," was the reply, delivered with a most philosophic air; "I don't care two cents about the ship, which, moreover, is doubtless insured beyond her value; but if you ask my opinion as to whether you and I will live through this tornado—well, I give it you plump, I don't think we shall. If I was on dry land, and yet in possession of the facts concerning our position, I would lay ten dollars to one against any person on board this ship getting to land alive."

"God bless my soul!" ejaculated Gresham, half mechanically, half from the serious shock of this communication.

"Yes, that's just what it's come to," answered the other; the coolness, not to say the cynicism of whose tone was greatly intensified by a certain prominence in his left cheek which looked as though he were putting his tongue in it, but was really attributable to a plug of tobacco. "A man—if he's to be called a man—knows how to take the last hard slap of Fate; the one with which she knocks you down for good and all. But the women they mostly take to hysterics. There will be sad scenes down there, I reckon," and he pointed to the cabin. "It's time for them as has Prayer-books to sport 'em."

"You are a seafaring man, of course, and I am a landsman," answered Gresham, gravely; "else I had hoped that my ignorance of the extent of our danger had magnified it. Why is it you take such a gloomy view of our position?"

"Well, the Rhineland is not A 1, and few vessels even that are such could bear such a buffeting as this for many hours; the engines don't work, in my opinion, as they should do; we're lower in the water than we should be, and I guess there's water on board below stairs. Moreover—but look yonder, and judge for yourself. Our captain would not heave that ballast overboard unless he were in great straits."

Gresham's eye followed the direction of his companion's finger, and perceived that one side of the cattle pen had been removed, and a corresponding portion of the ship's bulwarks swung back upon its hinge, so that with every roll of the ship to leeward many sheep and oxen fell into the sea. It was a simple way of unloading which the position of the ship, now on one side, now on the other, alone could have rendered possible.

"There will be less meat for the English markets," observed Gresham, resolved not to be outdone in coolness by the representative of Cousin Jonathan.

"There will be also less mouths to eat it," was the quiet rejoinder.

"Is it not possible to put back?" inquired Gresham.

"No. To steer one point out of the wind's eye would be to write Finis."

"If the gale doesn't abate, in short, we are dead men."

"Nay, things are not quite so bad; if we can hold our course till we are round the Land's End we shall have the wind behind us. Then we shall run, as if the devil were kicking us; and if we are not pooped may find ourselves in Bristol instead of Heaven."

Though the stranger spoke as if quite indifferent to the alternative, Gresham noticed that his eye watched narrowly every event—or mischance, for the words were now identical—that took place on board: the breaking loose of various articles that had been hitherto secured to the deck; the occasional crashing of the bulwarks; the lessening load of live stock; the behaviour of the two men at the wheel, and the gestures of the captain who, despite wind and wave, stuck like a limpet to his post upon the bridge between the paddle-boxes. He understood from what his companion said that if the ship were once in the Bristol Channel there would be a better chance for her, notwithstanding that she would be exposed to dangers of another nature.

Matters had thus endured for many hours, when the calls of hunger necessitated Gresham's descent into the saloon.

"If you are going to the larder," said his Transatlantic friend, "put both meat and drink in your pocket as I do"—and he produced a flask and a loaf—"for you may need it."

"You mean if we have to take to the boats? But one of the sailors told me that nothing but a lifeboat could float in such a sea as this."

"Never mind what the sailor told you. Do what I tell you. Depend upon it Providence always takes the most care of those who never throw away a chance."

There seemed good sense, if not much faith, in this advice; and Gresham procured certain supplies from the ship's steward accordingly. That functionary was very pale and silent, and took the money without a trace of his usual promptness on such occasions. Although no sailor, he had been too many voyages in the Rhineland not to know that there was something greatly amiss with this one.

The passengers in the saloon, too, were silent; uttering only a moan or a groan as the shock of a wave threw them from their moorings on the sofas. Some of them had a frightened look in their eyes, like that of a hunted creature who knows not whither to fly; but most had a stern, grave air. One or two sat hand in hand with their wives, who were weeping silently, but there were very few women present. Gresham glanced into the ladies' cabin as he passed by its open door, and saw Elise Hurt sitting at the corner of the sofa that ran round the room. Her calm, quiet face presented a strange contrast to the sorrowful and despairing looks of her companions.

She rose, and holding by the little pillars of the cabin, made her way towards him. "Are matters really so bad, Mr. Gresham," inquired she, quietly, "as they are thought to be down here?"

"They are very bad," he said. "Would you prefer to come on deck?"

"If I shall not be in the way, I should," answered she simply.

The relations between them, it was understood by both, had altered with external circumstances. In the presence of such sudden destruction as threatened them, all prudery disappeared; face to face with death it was moreover impossible that love should again become the topic of conversation.

"Put on every shawl and wrap that you possess," he gravely said; and she obeyed him.

At the foot of the cabin stairs a lurch more violent than usual shook the vessel, and Elise would have fallen had not the young man clasped her in his arms.

As the vessel lurched a murmur of apprehension arose from the inmates of the saloon. "What has happened, Mr. Gresham?" she exclaimed.

"I think the ship has changed her course: we are running before the wind."

They got on deck and reached their old place of shelter with less of difficulty than Gresham had met with in leaving it; for what he suspected had, in fact, happened. The vessel was now steaming—or rather scudding—for the paddles were of little use—with the gale behind her. The pitching and the rolling of the ship had somewhat mitigated, and her stern was now receiving the giant blows that had heretofore fallen on her bows. Neither cattle nor sheep now remained on board, and all things that had not been secured to the deck, or formed part of it, had been swept away. The Yankee had gone below, and besides the two men lashed to the wheel, the captain on the bridge, and the sailors at the pumps—which were kept constantly going—the two young people were the only persons who now braved the storm.

Not, however, that the condition of those in the saloon or cabins was much better; for every seam, through the straining of the ship, had begun to leak, and the berths were half full of water.

"Sit here, Elise," said Gresham, without the least consciousness of having addressed her by her Christian name; "and do not turn your head, or look behind you."

Being a woman—or perhaps it would be fairer to say, being human—Miss Hurt immediately looked behind her—to behold a sublime spectacle! The sea seemed to be pursuing the ship with open mouth, with the literal intention of swallowing her! Huge mountains of dark green water, fringed with flying foam, were rushing at headlong speed after their trembling prey. It was a chase wherein the odds against the hunted thing were as a thousand to one; for strength and life were failing it. The Rhineland flew with amazing speed, but no longer of her own volition.

There was a certain light to starboard, by which it was attempted to steer obliquely, but the ship scarcely answered to her helm at all; though this, as it happened, was of small importance, for the light was a floating one—the Hope lightship—which the gale had driven from her moorings two miles nearer shore. A little canvas with extreme peril had been spread in the forepart of the ship, when she changed her course, to keep her head straight, but this had instantly been split to ribbons. It was plain to the most inexperienced eye that the labouring and groaning vessel was almost in extremis.

Suddenly a tremendous sea broke over the bow, sweeping everything, including even the boats, to the afterpart of the deck, lifting the very starboard anchor on to the forecastle, and washing one of the steersmen from the wheel.

That Elise Hurt and Gresham did not share his fate was solely owing to the protection of the mast behind which they were screened. For the moment it seemed that all was over. The steamer, indeed, could no longer be so entitled, for its engines had stopped, the inundation having put the fires out; nor henceforth could the Rhineland be termed a vessel—it was a mere log, at the mercy of the winds and waves. Still it floated. Gresham's arm encircled Elise, and drew her closer to him; "Be of good courage," he said, "I see the land."

For the first time, indeed, the land had become dimly visible by the occasional light afforded by the moon when uneclipsed by the clouds that raced across her. A long black line of coast—high and rocky—showed itself on the northern horizon. There were more people now on deck—the watch below among them—who had been driven from their quarters by the inroad of the waves. Despair and irresolution reigned among them, but not in every case.

"Load the gun," roared the captain.

All the boats were badly damaged, some having been broken to pieces, and in any case no boat could have been lowered in such a sea. The only chance of rescue was from the land; and it was high time to tell, if haply there should be ears to listen to them, in what miserable straits they stood. The powder in such confusion was not easily procured, and the operation of loading was still more difficult. But somehow or other it was effected. Then the roar of minute gun after minute gun mixed with the artillery of the gale. Every thud of the cannon sounded like a knell to these poor wretches; till suddenly the hearts of all were lighted up by the sight of a thin light to southward. The consciousness of their peril had been at last conveyed to their fellow creatures on shore, and had been thus acknowledged! The light was that of the beacon that the men of the coastguard had lit upon the quay at Halcombe Point.

CHAPTER VII.

ON THE REEF

As to the locality in which the Rhineland was now situated, the Captain himself had only an approximate idea of it, while the majority of the passengers only knew that they were in the Bristol Channel.

The American, whose name was Pearce, and who preferred, as it afterwards appeared, to be called "Commodore," being appealed to (by reason of his knowing looks) upon this subject, grimly replied that he did not know in what portion of the Channel they were, but that in his opinion the question would soon be solved; the expression he used was, "I guess it won't be long before we're at the bottom of it." To do him justice, he only gave this answer to the men; to the women he always expressed himself hopefully. He said that there was a mighty difference between being drowned and having the starch taken out of their collars—which had happened to the poor creatures already. It was known, of course, by this time to himself and every seaman on board, that the ship was driving on shore, and that the question of safety for every soul on board depended on what sort of shore it was.

While he was making this very observation in Gresham's ear the ship suddenly struck with tremendous violence, though against no visible object, and like a dreadful echo a shriek of horror burst from every part of the ship. Many of those still below were killed at once by their heads being dashed against the sides, and even the roof of the cabin, many on deck were flung into the sea. It was the very crisis of horror and despair.

"To the fore-top for your lives," exclaimed Pearce to the two young people.

"Go, Mr. Gresham, go," cried Elise, "you have already done your best for me. I cannot climb the shrouds."

"It is probable you never tried," observed the American, drily. Gresham's only reply was to lift her in his arms, and, aided by Pearce and her own exertions, they managed to make their way through the terrified crowd to the forecastle; the crew had already fled there, and were running up the rigging in swarms. The top was occupied at once by as many as it would hold. With the help of the two men, however, Elise climbed to the very foot of it, and out of the reach of the waves that now swept the ship from stem to stern.

"There is a woman here," said Gresham to those above; "is there not a man among you who will give up his place?"

There was no answer, except from the American from below. "No, they won't, I bet. They will never oblige a lady even by so much as a seat in a car. You are better where you are, Miss," he added, in a lower tone, "if your young man will only lash you to the rigging."

For this purpose Gresham had nothing but a handkerchief, supplemented by the strength of his own arms.

"I can hold you on till daylight, Elise," he whispered, "and longer; while I have life I will keep life in you."

"Next to God, I trust in you," answered she, simply. It was fortunate that she had more than one friend, for though every inch above them was occupied by clinging limbs, the wretched people below endeavoured to make their way up, and even to climb over their very bodies. The horrors of their situation, rocked by every blow of the sea, and drenched with its spray, was aggravated by the pitiful cries which burst from those around them. From the broken skylight above the cabin miserable groans still issued, and now and then a sharp shriek of agony: "My child, my little one, is drowned!" was one of them, which went to Elise's heart. For the most part they were cries wrung by necessity from human throats, but now and then there was an ejaculation of frenzied terror. For instance, a young fellow immediately below the American suddenly exclaimed that the ship was breaking to pieces.

"Let it break," answered the Yankee, contemptuously, "you'll keep whole enough, I'll warrant."

It was curious to observe what an effect this one man's coolness and quaint good sense had upon those around him, notwithstanding the peril and misery of their position. That they were on a rock, and a hidden one, was all of which the best-informed were conscious. The force of the wave that had just thrown them upon it had been such as to carry the whole vessel on to the reef; otherwise, had part only been driven on to it, and part left on a lower level exposed to the breach of the sea, the ship would have been torn asunder in a few minutes. Thanks to the lowness of the tide, the masts and rigging stood out of water, and were only washed to any height by some exceptionally huge wave, but in the mean time it was only too plain that the ship's timbers were giving way under the reiterated blows of the sea. The wind was as keen as it was furious, and the cold soon began to tell upon these poor creatures, many of whom had rushed from below but scantily clad. Only a few women besides Elise Hurt had obtained a footing on the shrouds at all, and one by one, overcome by fatigue and fear, these relaxed their hold of the ropes, and were whirled away into the raging deep, as often as not in silence. The two men bade Elise shut her eyes, under pretence of her thus obtaining a little rest, but in reality to prevent her witnessing these distressing scenes. More than once, however, a man came tumbling down from the foretop or the shrouds more immediately above them, and that so close as to imperil her own safety in his descent into his watery tomb. The cold had benumbed the hands of these poor fellows, and they had become too weak from exhaustion and hunger to retain their positions.

And here it was that the forethought of the American stood Gresham and his companion in good stead. Not only did the young fellow insist upon her partaking of the viands with which he had filled his pockets, but also administered, under Mr. Pearce's directions, an amount of brandy which, in other circumstances, would have had a most unpleasant effect upon any young lady's organisation.

"'The blood is the life,' says the Scripture," were Mr. Pearce's words; "and the brandy is the blood upon this occasion,—you needn't be afraid of taking too much, ma'am."

Elise, though very unwillingly, being as temperate as all German maidens are, took what was given her: which, after all, was not so very much, for what with the swaying of the mast, and the numbness of Gresham's hands, much of the liquor missed the mouth it was aimed at. Nor was it only the young man's hands that were numb, for his feet had become like marble; and in compliance with his request, Elise more than once had to stamp upon them to restore their circulation. That she herself was exempt from this inconvenience of course proved the care that the other took of her, in which it must be acknowledged that he was greatly assisted by Mr. Pearce.

It was strange to see how during those weary hours these three were drawn together—almost as much mentally as physically—by the circumstances of that supreme occasion. Each spoke to the other of himself and of his private affairs, with a frankness and confidence that they could not have used after six weeks of ordinary intercourse.

"If you get to land, Mr. Gresham," said Elise, "send a few words of tender farewell for me to my good aunt;" and she gave him her address with methodical exactness.

"If I live, Elise, you will live," returned the young fellow simply. "It would be no self-sacrifice to perish in trying to save you, since life without you would not be worth having."

He spoke with earnestness as well as fervour, and was quite unconscious of any extravagance of expression. In such sublime moments the emotions become, as it were condensed: his whole previous existence appeared divided into two parts; during one part he had known Elise Hurt; during the other, he had not known her. And the former part monopolised his thoughts.

"Do not talk so," answered the girl reprovingly; "for in my case there is but one person to mourn me; and my good aunt, I am thankful to think, has others to love her. But you—you yourself told me that you have dear friends and relatives——"

"One relative—a very kind one," interrupted the young fellow; "and some dear friends certainly."

He hesitated a moment; should he tell her something he had in his mind, or should he not? The waves were beating against the doomed vessel more frantically it seemed than ever. The tide was rising. No, it was not worth while. "You, Elise, are more than all to me," he added simply.

Presently Gresham, turning to the American, begged him to send the girl's message to her aunt, in case he should be the sole survivor of the three.

"Oh yes," he answered; "and do you two remember, for my sake, the address of Henry Pearce, at the 'Figure Head' Hotel, Charing Cross."

Gresham smiled sadly; for small as either of their chances of life were, his chance—bound up as it was with that of the girl—was surely the smaller.

"That is your brother, I suppose?" he answered.

"No, sir; it is myself," replied the other coolly. "The 'Figure Head' is always my address in London town, in case you should want a skipper for a yacht. My friends call me Commodore. I've got my certificates——"

Here a great wave filled his mouth with salt water, and blinded all three of them with its spray. Two more wretched creatures were thrown from their hold by the shock of it, and were carried away in its whirl. These had occupied positions above "the tops," and were worn out with hunger as much as fatigue; those, on the other hand, in Gresham's vicinity, had been supplied, at Elise's entreaty, with the remainder of his provisions.

"It is no use keeping them for me, love," she had whispered; "for death will come to me before hunger returns."

Her logic was unanswerable; it was plain that the vessel could now only hold together for a very short time.

Presently "the dawn, the dawn!" she moaned in German.

"What is it?" inquired the American, anxiously. "Her strength is failing. Give her more brandy."

Before Gresham could explain, some one cried out, "The land, the land!" And in a moment the coast line became distinct against the sky.

"Great Heaven! It is Halcombe Point!" exclaimed Gresham.

"It is something to know your bearings," observed the American. "What sort of landing do you give to strangers hereabouts?"

"It is a rock-bound shore," answered Gresham, gravely. "The ship must be on the Lancet Reef," he murmured. "There are people on the pier. Sir Robert——"

"'Sir Robert,' and 'Halcombe,'" ejaculated Elise. "Is it Sir Robert Arden of Halcombe Hall of whom you speak?"

"Yes, dearest; do you know anything of him?"

"It was to his house I was going as governess."

"And I am his nephew," said Gresham. The coincidence, strange as it was, did not strike him so forcibly as might be expected; those words of his companion, "I was going," speaking of herself in the past tense, had saddened him too much to admit of wonder.

"Hold on all," cried the American, in a sharp clear voice. "I see a boat coming—a lifeboat."

It was well that he had given his warning before he gave his news; for the excitement which his good tidings communicated to the poor wretches about him past the bounds of reason. Even as it was, it was with difficulty that some could be persuaded not to cast themselves into the sea to meet the coming succour.

What an apt term is that of Life-boat! How nobly does the god-child prove its right to the name that has been given to it! What an ark of safety does it appear to those for whom the depths of ocean rage and roar—thanks to it—in vain! In no other visible form do Human Endeavour and Divine Intention combine so sublimely. Consider, too, the comparative humility—nay, to all appearance, the inadequacy—of the means of salvation. The "Commodore's" keen eyes and technical knowledge had at once caused him to recognise the nature of the help that was approaching them, but to the ordinary observer it looked scarcely help at all; but merely more of wreck and ruin. Was it possible that that frail undecked boat, now tossed on the foam of some mighty wave, now lost in the trough of the sea, not urged by its rowers at all, but flying before the fury of the gale, could be Rescue—Life? To those on shore it seemed so at all events; for though the sound of their cheering could not reach the ears for which they were intended, the poor shipwrecked creatures could see flags waving from the little pier and from the windows of the mill in token of joyful sympathy. Notwithstanding their evil plight this moral support—the sympathy of their fellow-creatures—had an inspiring effect; they felt, as it were, that the great heart of humanity was beating high for them. They were not cut off, these things seemed to assure them, from the sunshine, yet.

COURSING À LA MODE

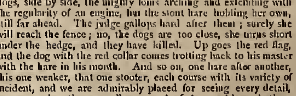
A DAY'S coursing on the downs; delightful anticipations of the advance in the long line of spectators, the judge on horseback, and the dogs in the slips ready for the hare when startled from her form; the uncertainty when and where she will jump up, and the uninterrupted view of the course, down the steep coomb, over the round swelling shoulder of the down, and the kill just before she reaches the sheltered coppice in the bottom of the dean.

The railway station; the throng of men of a healthy out-of-door appearance; the tall solemn greyhound in his sheets, following his master unled; the boy with a bunch of dogs, two couple in each hand, all dragging him in different directions; the surly dog with his muzzle; the mixed company, two-legged and four-legged, with which the carriages are rapidly filled, settling themselves variously as the train moves off; one dog, inquisitive, standing on the seat to see the landscape as it glides past the window; a second, sociable, laying his head on the knee of a fellow-passenger of friendly countenance, and the rest coiling themselves down for a sleep, or uneasily watching the door, till the train slows down as it approaches its destination.

The downs on which we expect so exhilarating a walk seem a long way from the station, and on our left the fence is supplemented by a high wire netting. We pass through in single file, follow a wired path, and pay for a ticket to enter the wired enclosure. Surely those carriages, with the luncheon baskets and ladies, do not expect to follow the coursers across the country, and, by the way, how strange it is that scarcely any of the men, even those that lead the dogs, wear gaiters, or are otherwise equipped for rough walking? Not a bit of it; this is coursing à la mode, with all the latest improvements, brought within reach of gout on a camp stool.

The ticket-holders, passing through the wire fence aforesaid, find themselves in a space roped in, about half way up the side of a long field. At the bottom, adjoining the railway station, is a spinney and artificial covert, closely hurdled in, the undulating and richly wooded country of the weald rising up behind. Down both sides, and across the bottom, extends the high wire netting, but at the top the fence is unguarded, and beyond the picture is closed in by the battlefield of Mount Harry, and the bluff escarpment of the South Downs.

The judge on horseback, in his redcoat, and the slipper with the first couple of dogs, are in their places, and while we wonder where the hare is to come from, the keeper and his assistants open the hurdles, and after a little poking about in the spinney, send her out, as a shepherd would a sheep from the pen. Here she comes, straight up the field, and now the dogs are slipped, gaining on the hare at every stride, black and white forges past fawn; he is close on her, he seizes her; no, she turns, and the dog, striving to stop in his extended gallop, pitches on his head, and falls clean over on his back. Fawn, turning quicker, is left with the hare, and is making up lost ground, but the gallant black, in spite of his sickening fall, comes racing past, and, after two quick turns, picks up the hare, and in a second of all her speed is left nothing but a draggled wisp of fur, pulled two ways by those powerful jaws. And then a second couple of dogs is placed in the slips, and a second hare sent out, but she is too small and weak, and is allowed to escape. A third comes scudding up the field, and here come the dogs, side by side, the mighty loins arching and extending with the regularity of an engine, but the stout hare holding her own, still far ahead. The judge gallops hard after them; surely she will reach the fence; no, the dogs are too close, she turns short under the hedge, and they have killed. Up goes the red flag, and the dog with the red collar comes trotting back to his master with the hare in his mouth. And so on, one hare after another, this one weaker, that one stouter, each course with its variety of incident, and we are admirably placed for seeing every detail, for comparing the marvellous speed of dog and hare, both so swift, and yet with action so different. We never saw coursing so well before, except from the saddle, and yet we do not feel quite satisfied about it. Can this entertainment, so skilfully arranged, be called a field-sport? No, altogether we think we should have preferred that walk over the downs, beating up the wild hares from their forms, that we looked forward to when we dressed this morning. And, as we turn away for a long walk home, we hear the remark of a critic in a smock frock:—"They runs well enough for the young dogs, but they beant stout enough to give sport for the old uns, because he's never give 'em enough carrots." Carrot-fed hares, hand-reared pheasants, the advance of civilisation, and the improvements of British sport!



"ROXY," by Edward Eggleston (2 vols.: Chatto and Windus).—"Roxy" is an American story, the scene of which is Luzerne, a village of Southern Indiana, on the banks of the Ohio, and the period between thirty and forty years ago. It is distinguished by that odd and peculiarly-flavoured combination of humour and mysticism which we may almost describe as the speciality of American novels; it is clever and original throughout; and many of its situations are conceived with much dramatic power. Yet somehow it leaves on the mind the impression that with all its merits it is not quite so good as it ought to have been. We suspect the fault lies with the heroine herself. Roxy Adams, the daughter of the village shoemaker, is a religious enthusiast, a girl saddened by the contemplation of the human wickedness which she believes is doomed to meet with so terrible a retribution. She keeps a diary in which she puts down her spiritual experiences, meditates much on the careers of the wife of President Edwards, Mrs. Fletcher, Lady Huntingdon, and such saints of Puritanism, craves for a "mission," and, in fact, as her practical little friend, the Swiss girl, "Twonnet" (Antoinette) Lefaure, says, "would feel obliged to anybody who would give her a chance to be a martyr." No doubt the religious life is a field full of peril for the novelist, and Mr. Eggleston, to our thinking, scarcely seems to have the gifts for treating it. Anyway, we must confess to having found Roxy, until very nearly the end of her history as here set before us, a heroine more estimable than attractive. It is only when the storm has burst, and Roxy, dealing sternly with her conscience, is forced to recognise that her own austerity and half-unconscious assumption of spiritual superiority have had much to do in driving her merely mundane, but far from naturally vicious husband, Mark Bonamy, into sin, that she rises to those heights of true womanly greatness and devotedness of which she is really capable, and takes genuine hold on the reader's sympathies. The author analyses and dissects the moral anatomy of the husband almost as carefully as that of the heroine herself, but we have not space to dwell upon him here. Among the minor personages of the tale it may be sufficient to name Roxy's father, the shrewd disputatious shoemaker, never happy till he has provoked somebody into contradicting him; the cultured, mildly-ascetic young Presbyterian minister, Whittaker; the bright, mischievous, affectionate "Twonnet," and Major Lathers, the good-natured, and quite unprincipled "politician," as of special excellence. Whatever we may find or fancy amiss in "Roxy," it must be considered a book of no common mark, and it certainly will not disappoint those who go to it in search of striking and entertaining reading.

"Salvia Richmond" (3 vols.: Bentley).—The anonymous author of this novel has unusually good notions of what a plot should be, but at present is somewhat of a novice in carrying them out. She—for we can scarcely doubt that we are dealing with a lady's workmanship—sets about her task with a great deal too much artlessness. One need not be a very practised novel-reader to see clearly all along here that the sale of Julian Leylands' reversionary interest in the Reyburn property has been really effected by Gilbert Archer, who has personated his dead friend; the only question being whether the purchaser, the money-lender, Ivory, has played the part of dupe or accomplice. Still, the idea is decidedly ingenious, and worked out with a carefulness as to details which lead us to think that with farther practice the author may one day take honourable rank among novelists of Mr. Wilkie Collins' school. The characters are somewhat thin and conventional, and it is noticeable that they, all of them, from the heroine—who tells her own share in the story by means of extracts from her diary—downwards, speak in exactly the same key, a similarity which has often anything but a happy effect. The incident of the anonymous letter again, and its easy credence by the lover, is far-fetched, and a little absurd, especially as nothing is really gained by it. But, with all shortcomings, "Salvia Richmond" is lively and sparkling, and carries the reader along, and we can unhesitatingly pronounce it eminently creditable as the performance of a beginner.

"Hillford-on-Aire," by Martin Weld (3 vols.: Tinsley).—This is a tale of country-life with a manufacturing town as background, sufficiently well-written and well put together to be read through without weariness, though it may hardly impress or charm. The most exceptional among its dramatis personæ is the young hero of the people, Stephen Carr, who, as Radical, philanthropist, and free-thinker, and as choosing to live among and as his own work-people, instead of taking that position above them to which his worldly success entitles him, seems rather an echo of Felix Holt. The tale is not without an episode or two of a sensational character, but such interest as it possesses depends chiefly on the more ordinary of its incidents and personages, who are very fairly natural and pleasing, and whom we find occasionally really amusing.

IV.

"BABY BELL," by T. B. Aldrich; and "Excelsior," by H. W. Longfellow (Routledge and Sons), are two daintily illustrated books, apparently of American origin, for, if we mistake not, we noticed the first of these in these columns last year from an American publisher. "Baby Bell" is still as delightful as ever with its little vignettes of figures and landscapes, but we cannot say much for the illustrations to "Excelsior," which strike us as being hard and unpleasing.

"St. Nicholas" (Sampson Low).—This is without exception the very best magazine we know for boys and girls. The illustrations are simply splendid and exceedingly abundant, and the stories by some of the best American writers. Miss Alcott's "Under the Lilacs," which appears here, is written in her best style.

"Drawing-room Amusements and Evening Party Entertainments," by Professor Hoffmann. With Illustrations. (Routledge). Professor Hoffmann's volume, this year, is more varied in its contents than usual, and consists of a capital collection of round games, card tricks, after-dinner amusements, drawing-room magic, and tableaux vivants, &c. It is altogether a wonderful omnium gatherum, which will, we doubt not, brighten many an otherwise dull party this season.

"Lady Betty's Governess" and "Bell Marjory" (J. F. Shaw and Co.) are two very handsomely got-up story books. The first is the chronicle of a family during the time of the Commonwealth, in which historical characters are very ingeniously and naturally brought upon the scene. The second is the history of a young girl's struggles to arrive at the meaning of the adage, "It is better to be blessed than happy."

"Burns' Poetical Works," edited by Charles Kent (Routledge).—This is a very handome red-line edition of the Scottish national poet, with an able introductory biography and notes by Mr. Kent. The illustrations, by Sir John Gilbert and others, are very effective, and the whole book is charmingly printed.

"Decisive Events in History," by Thomas Archer (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin).—This is a very good idea admirably worked out. The aim of the book, as expressed in the title, is to set forth in a brief and picturesque manner the particular events in history which have been turning-points in the destinies of nations. Sixteen full-page illustrations, from drawings made specially for the work, tell the stories almost as powerfully as the text, though that is admirably done.

"The Green Hand," by George Cupples (Routledge).—We are glad to see a good library edition of this old favourite. As a sea story it is without rival, with the single exception of "Tom Cringle's Log." We should think if Mr. Cupples had been paid a royalty upon all the recruits for the Navy this book has sent, he would be a rich man.

"Paul and Virginia" (Routledge).—A large-type handsomely-printed edition of another old favourite, with upwards of three hundred illustrations, the quantity of which is more evident than the quality.

"Routledge's Picture Natural History," by the Rev. J. G. Wood, is a thick volume with seven hundred engravings by Wolf, Zwecker, Weir, Coleman, &c., apparently made up from the well-known "Illustrated Natural History" by the same author.

"Grandmother Dear," by Mrs. Molesworth (Macmillan), is a charming book for boys and girls by the author of "Carrots" and the "Cuckoo Clock." The illustrations are by Mr. Walter Crane, and are full of quaintness and good drawing, though we prefer to see Mr. Crane's creations printed in colours.

"Winifred" (J. F. Shaw and Co.), and "Sybil Garth" (Religious Tract Society) are two very interesting stories for girls, the first one being a well-written description of the life of an English maiden in the seventeenth century, and the latter on account of the successful efforts of a maiden of to-day to live up to her highest ideal in the midst of the distraction of society in the nineteenth century.

"A Picture History of England," by Dr. Dulcken (Routledge), is an attempt to tell the story of the British nation in a manner easy of comprehension for very young children. The eighty full-page engravings with which it is illustrated are from designs by Mr. A. W. Bayes, and are bold and vigorous in outline, but not very highly finished.

"Robinson Crusoe" (Routledge).—This edition of Defoe's immortal work is of especial value as containing fifty-two illustrations by Mr. J. D. Watson, some of which are beautifully engraved examples of that artist's very best style.

"Chapters on Everyday Things" (Religious Tract Society) is a little volume of histories and marvels in common life. The main object of the writer has been to teach the youthful reader how to observe, and to stimulate young people to seek information for themselves.

"Once Upon a Time" (Religious Tract Society) is a boy's book of adventures, written by those who have passed through, witnessed, or taken an active share in them. It consists for the most part of stories selected from the Leisure Hour.

"Tales of Three Centuries" (Religious Tract Society).—These three stories of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries are translated from the French of Madame De Witt, the daughter of the illustrious Guizot. They are heart-stirring tales of the persecution of the Protestants, most of the personages and incidents being real.

"Mrs. Burton's Best Bedroom, and Other Readings for Working Men's Homes" (Religious Tract Society), is a volume of miscellaneous readings, with large illustrations, the title of which, coming from the quarter it does, savours a little of smartness of a kind we should hardly have expected from a religious society. It is announced as a story by the author of "Jessica's First Prayer" and other readings, &c. The story which gives its title to the book occupies 2½ pages, and the other readings 195½, none of which are by the same author.

"The Child's Companion" (Religious Tract Society).—The annual volume of this well-known magazine is charmingly got up, with a very attractive coloured frontispiece, and a striking novelty in the way of binding.

"The Prize" (W. W. Gardner) is a volume of a similar sort, intended for very young boys and girls, with an abundance of full-page illustrations, for the most part well drawn.

"The Cottager and Artisan" (Religious Tract Society), another annual volume, intended for older folks, is chiefly remarkable for the very high character of its illustrations, many of which are animal subjects, by Harrison Weir, and all of which are singularly telling and effective.

"Father's Motto" (Religious Tract Society) is a collection of stories for "boys and their sisters," somewhat of the goody-goody order, with a very weak preface, the omission of which we should recommend in the next edition.

From Messrs. Routledge—who seem to have issued the lion's share of children's books this season—we have in addition to those already noticed, "Only a Cat," by Mrs. H. B. Paull, a capitally written autobiography, with clever life-like sketches, by Alfred Elwes.—"A Picture Book for Laddies and Lassies," a collection of engravings and short stories, together making a class of book of which "The Children's Album" was the forerunner some years ago, and of which many imitations have since been offered to the public.—"Happy Day Stories for the Young," by Dr. Dulcken, especially noticeable for the thirty full-page pictures it contains by A. B. Houghton, an artist we miss greatly as a book illustrator.—"Aunt Effie's Rhymes for Little Children" are here set to music, by T. Crampton, with pretty little head and tail pieces drawn by Hablot K. Browne; "Golden Light," by Dr. Dulcken, is a volume of Scripture histories, with designs somewhat too realistic by A. W. Bayes, the binding is very handsome; and "The Large Picture Primer," as its name indicates, is intended for beginners, and as such is one of the best of its kind. The illustrations by Harrison Weir and W. Small leaving nothing to be desired.

"The Scripture Pocket Book," and "The Young People's Pocket Book" (Religious Tract Society), are two handy little volumes got up in the orthodox roan tuck style of annuals which were so abundant twenty years ago, but which latterly have been very much reduced in number.

In "The British Working Man, by One Who Does Not Believe in Him, and Other Sketches" (Fun Office), we have a first selection of the very amusing and satirical drawings which Mr. J. F. Sullivan has for some time past contributed to the pages of our comical contemporary. Of the many exasperating nuisances that go far to make up the total of our minor miseries scarcely one escapes his sarcasm, which is all the more forcible because of the truth that underlies it. This is felt most keenly when he uses his pencil to direct attention to the blots which disfigure our social life. However funny or grotesque Mr. Sullivan's pictures are, there is nearly always a serious purpose in them, and we close his book wiser, if not sadder, from its perusal. We have also received "Fun Almanack for 1879," which quite maintains the standard of its predecessors.

Continental travelling is undoubtedly less expensive for experienced tourists than British excursionising, but the author of "A Continental Tour of Eight Days for Forty-four Shillings" (Sampson Low) is certainly an adept at doing things "on the cheap." True, the "journeyman" did not go far afield, and it is dubious whether many holiday makers would enjoy as much as he did travelling in the fore-cabin from London to Dunkirk, and mooning about the remarkably flat country from Dunkirk to Ypres in showery weather. Entering heartily into the national life, however, he was free from the ordinary crowd of tourists, and his example may well be copied by many who declare they can't afford to go abroad. The journeyman's lively narrative is decidedly worth reading, although it would be improved if he were less anxious to be jocular.

The usual reward of childish virtue in books of the present day—death—is meted out to the most charming character of the happy band of Cornish children whose adventures are related in "What the Swallows Told Me," by L. Mohun Harris (Hatchards). Apart from this blemish, the tale is bright and simple. The authoress, however, is totally mistaken in her definition of the Holy Grail.—A new object of ingenuity for the feminine needle on behalf of masculine relatives or acquaintances is included in the designs of the second series of "The Lady's Crewel Embroidery Book," by E. M. C. (Hatchards),—a smoking-coat of black satin appropriately ornamented with the pink blossoms of the tobacco plant. Fancy workers will hail this fresh instalment of twelve designs, with the flowers naturally treated.—The "Shakespeare Birthday Book," edited by M. F. Dunbar (same publishers), already a favourite, now owns thirteen capital photographs of scenes from the poet's life and plays; while a companion volume of humorous scraps of poetry from divers authors, "The Comic Birthday Book" (same publishers), has been compiled by W. F. M[illegible]h-Philipps for people fond of a joke.

M. de Laveleye's article, "Prince Bismarck," in the Fortnightly Review, is based on the extraordinary revelations concerning the great statesman contained in Herr Busch's recently published book, many of the most striking of which he quotes, though the majority of readers have probably made acquaintance with them already in the columns of the newspapers. Persons, however, who, heedless of the reproach of laziness, persist in regarding their morning slumbers as among the chief pleasures of life, may take comfort from learning here that Prince Bismarck, the man whose personality, as M. de Laveleye truly says, has for fifteen years been the pivot of European history, rarely rises before ten o'clock. We note also, on the authority of the Prince himself, that it is a fact that Victor Emmanuel was with the utmost difficulty restrained from marching to the aid of France after the great disasters at the beginning of the War of 1870.—A paper of much interest is one written by the late Mr. Walter Bagehot, in 1874, immediately after the present Government had come into power, on "The Chances of a Long Conservative Régime." The rock ahead of Ministers, Mr. Bagehot anticipated, would prove their want of administrative training, whilst their task peculiarly required skilled and trained administrators. "If they" (the Tories), he says, "wish to inherit the fruits of the last forty years, they must work in the spirit of the last forty years," that is, "they have to adapt themselves to a situation which they did not make, and to administer a policy which is not their own." If, however, this difficulty was conquered, he seems to have thought that a long Conservative reign was to be looked for. It is a curious instance of the blindness to the immediate future often displayed by the keenest-sighted of mortals, that it does not seem so much as to have occurred, even to so sagacious an observer as Mr. Bagehot, that foreign affairs might assume such a predominating importance, that a Ministry might come to be judged almost exclusively by its foreign policy.—The number contains also Lord Carnarvon's Edinburgh speech, of a month ago, on "Imperial Administration," and a refutation, signed by the Editor, of Mr. Hyndman's gloomy forebodings of an approaching Indian bankruptcy.

The chief interest of the Nineteenth Century resides in Sir Henry Rawlinson's masterly article on "The Afghan Crisis," which is, in truth, a weighty and elaborate State-paper, though its author is careful to disclaim for it the possession of any such character. As even a rough outline of a paper of so much importance would be impossible within such modest limits as ours, we had, perhaps, better content ourselves with earnestly recommending it to the reader's attention, as the work of a man in the opinion of good judges better entitled than any other now living to be listened to on the matter in hand. We may observe in passing that Sir Henry Rawlinson is of opinion that as far back as 1873 Shere Ali had decisively made up his mind in favour of a Russian rather than an English alliance, and that the negotiations at Simla that year, of which we have of late heard more than enough, were never intended by him to be successful, but only to serve as pretext for picking a quarrel.—Mr. Mallock's essay, "Dogma, Reason, and Morality," is a sequel to "Faith and Verification," in the October number of the review, and, like that, deals with a series of philosophical questions ill adapted for such brief discussion as we could give them here. Its drift, roughly stated, is a plea for the Church of Rome, on the ground that the acceptance of her authority involves only that sacrifice of reason to faith which all men have made already who believe in the dignity and moral value of life, and, so it is urged, in a spiritual and supernatural world of which science gives no intimation. Mr. Mallock argues ably, but we do not think it would be a difficult task to point out not a few weak places in his reasoning.—Mr. Ruskin concludes his "Three Colours of Pre-Raphaelitism," and leaves us, we confess, still in considerable uncertainty as to his precise meaning in it—except that he disapproves generally of the Nineteenth Century—the age, we mean, not the periodical—and greatly admires Mr. Burne Jones' pictures. Readers, however, may be grateful to him for reproducing here the noble passage at the conclusion of the third of his Oxford Lectures on Art.—Space forbids us from saying more of Mr. Wilson's inquiry into the position and duties of a Colonial Governor, and Mr. Kebbel's exposure of the bugbear of "Personal Rule," than that they are in every way worthy of attention.

The Alcohol Question again occupies much space—too much space, to our thinking—in the pages of the Contemporary Review. "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" seems the only reflection that can be suggested by the controversy. One would have expected that the beneficial or injurious effects of the use—the moderate use, we mean, of course—of alcohol, would have been a point as to which medical experts had by this time arrived at some sort of unanimity; but, on the contrary, we find authorities like Sir James Paget and Sir William Gull flatly at issue with each other. The former of these gentlemen alleged, as our readers may remember, in the last number of the Review, that the evidence of history showed that in respect of working power the advantage was with the consumers of alcohol; the latter, who occupies the place of honour here, although he would not go so far as completely to deprive the working man of his beer, would have every one else employ alcohol strictly as a medicine, not as an habitual article of diet.—The Abbé Martin makes a not ineffective rejoinder to the replies put forward by Mr. Gladstone and Dr. Littledale to his original inquiry, "What Hinders Ritualists from Becoming Roman Catholics?" and we trust for the present there may be an end of the matter. The "Great Roman Controversy," as somebody has called it, was in fact pretty well threshed out before the present generation was born, and, except in the hands of a genius like Dr. Newman, it is somewhat of a weariness to the spirit.—We have also an account of the growth of "The Greatness of England," by Mr. Goldwin Smith—interesting enough, and written, we are glad to say, far more in the spirit of the historian than of the political partisan; and a farther instalment of Professor Monier Williams' sketch of "The Progress of Indian Religious Thought."

In Blackwood we have a good paper—the first, apparently, of a series on "Contemporary Literature"—devoted to "Journalists." The writer sketches the position and duties of journalists "of sorts," as the amateur expert, the "all round" leader-writer, the special correspondent, war correspondent, and so on, well and amusingly, though, perhaps, without saying much that will be novel to those at all behind the scenes. He complains—not altogether without reason, as it seems to us, but then we may not be guiltless of a tendency to magnify our office—of the neglect which the claims of literature are apt to receive from the Press. An editor, he says, "learns to look on his reviews as so many useful stop-gaps that may serve to pad an issue on occasion," and "the back-of-all-work who has broken down somewhere else is thought quite sufficiently good" for criticism.—We may mention as also of interest "In the Country," the fourth of the second series of papers on "French Home Life," and "The Cottage by the River," which seems an exciting tale of mystery.

"Tory Finance," in Fraser, is a furious onslaught on the financial administration of the Government, by an enraged Radical, who appears unconscious that the policy which caused the increased expenditure can hardly in the eyes of its authors appear so insane and wicked as it does in his.—Mr. McCoan gives another of his "meaty" articles on "Public Works in Asiatic Turkey: Existing and Projected," the drift of which is, that, when once administrative reforms are assured—if that time is really coming—Englishmen will find in their new protectorate a vast and virgin field for the employment of enterprise and capital; and we have a lively sketch of "'Frisco," a city highly-favoured in many ways, but beset with three great obstacles to comfort in the prevalence of fires, earthquakes, and "Hoodlums." These last are boys of from fifteen to twenty years of age, banded together in gangs, for the purpose of preying upon society. "No crime seems to be too bad for these young brigands; almost all of whom carry revolvers, which they use on the most trivial occasions." The police are quite unequal to coping with the nuisance, as they are but four hundred strong, all told, to a population of 300,000, exclusive of 80,000 Cinese. The excellent series of papers, entitled "Among the Burmese," is here concluded.

The Gentleman's Magazine contains an article on "The Afghanistan Imbroglio," by the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, the character of which may be guessed, whilst its argument hardly seems to call for notice.—With all respect for the motives which animate the Rev. H. N. Oxenham in his article here on the "Moral and Religious Estimate of Vivisection," we regret that he should display so much heat in dealing with a very difficult subject. We cannot but feel that psychologists and medical men have a case, and that this is not to be disposed of by Mr. Oxenham's benevolent indignation. No doubt, however, the practice of vivisection should only be permitted under the most careful regulations, and if the present regulations are abused, as we are here assured, they should be made stricter.—The effect of the "Unpublished Episodes in the Life of Dr. Johnson" is to present the Doctor—for a wonder—in an unfavourable light; but we think that most readers will feel that there is probably another side to the story.

In Belgravia Mrs. Lynn Linton's "Pictures from Venice," with the thoughts they suggest, form very pleasant reading, and Mr. T. A. Trollope gives us a sketch of Batista Guarini, foremost among the Italian pastoral poets of the sixteenth century, and the author of the "Pastor Fido."—Mr. Barton Baker's "Theatrical Makeshifts and Blunders" is amusing enough. We have a story of a terrible mishap that once befell Mrs. Siddons when playing Lady Macbeth at Edinburgh. "Just before going on for the sleep-walking scene, she had sent a boy for some porter, but the cue for her entrance was given before he returned. The house was awed into shuddering silence as, in a terrible whisper, she uttered the words, 'Out, out denned spot!' and with slow mechanical action rubbed the guilty hands, when suddenly there emerged from the wings a small figure holding out a pewter pot, and a shrill voice broke the awful silence with 'Here's your porter, mum.'"

The North American Review contains an article by Hobart Pasha on "Systems of Offence and Defence in Naval Warfare," which is of much interest for its remarks on torpedoes. The gallant Admiral is of opinion that with a very good look-out, especially if the electric light, properly arranged, is employed, a successful torpedo-attack against ships lying at anchor may be prevented, but he thinks that a blockading squadron may be dreadfully harassed by torpedo-vessels in large numbers choosing their own time and place for a dash.—Another most distinguished contributor to the Review is M. Ernest Rénan, who gives a brief essay on "The Emperor Hadrian and Christianity," which is, in fact, a general review of the reign of this ruler, who is regarded by M. Rénan as one of the ablest and most far-seeing of all the Cæsars.—"The Government of the United States," by Dr. Horatio Seymour; "The Congress of Berlin and its Consequences," by "An Old Diplomatist;" and "Antipathy to the Negro," by Mr. James Parton, are also papers on which we would gladly dwell did the very limited space at our disposal permit.

In the Cornhill we have one of Mr. Leslie Stephen's delightful "Hours in a Library," devoted to Landor's "Imaginary Conversations," which he criticises with much justice and insight. It is a work, he says, which he believes has been a great deal more praised than liked; and he has the courage to confess for himself that, with all his admiration for Landor, he is often bored by him. We think most people who have made any study of Landor will understand and sympathise with both these mental attitudes.—Mr. Henry James' "International Episode" seems a very delicately executed sketch, and the astronomical article on "The Sun's Long Streamers" strongly suggests Mr. R. A. Proctor as its author.

Mr. E. B. Tylor's paper, "Backgammon Among the Aztecs," in Macmillan is of interest and value for the evidence it contains that the Mexican civilisation—whether the civilisation was really as advanced and complicated as is popularly supposed or not—was to a very great extent derived from Asia; and Mr. Laing-Meason's article on "Our Army in India," and Mr. E. Clarke's "Notes on Afghanistan" will also find many readers at a time like this. But the number is, perhaps, slightly below the usual mark.

The best article in The Atlantic Monthly is one on "The Nature of Music," by Mr. R. G. White. We incline to agree with Mr. White in the theory he here advocates that sensibility to music is simply the result of a certain physical organisation, but certainly not in the consequence he draws from it, that "at the point of capacity of appreciation" (of music) "at which a man stands in early life will he stand throughout life." According to our own experience and observation nothing is clearer than that a man's musical sensibility admits of many degrees of education and gradual perfecting.—The notices of contemporary literature, which form a standing feature in this periodical, are as usual of high critical excellence.

WINTER EXHIBITION OF THE INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS

This is an unusually interesting exhibition, as including a larger proportion than usual of sketches and studies, not wrought up by after labour in the studio. As in the case of the Society's Winter Exhibition, this is the only condition on which two exhibitions in the year can be adventured, without damaging the reputation of the artists, and leaving the public with a sense of sameness. I should be inclined to say that the younger body had the better of it in this year's Winter Exhibition.

This impression is mainly owing to the contributions of the Institute's clever young members, Linton, Herkomer, and Gregory, and the Associates, Edwin Bale, C. J. Staniland, G. Clausen, and Harry Hine. The large heads by Herkomer and Gregory, in particular that which the former calls "A Phrenologist," have a vigour of handling, a power of light and shadow, and a taking dash, which carry away the judgment. There might be as much force with less bravura. But the critic cannot but admit that, bravura allowed for, here is real and rare vigour of hand, shown on a scale seldom attempted in water-colour, in refreshing contrast, on the one hand, with the niminy piminy prettiness into which the English school of water-colour is apt to fall, while as regards material, and manner of work, this is pure water-colour without that large employment of body colour which threatens to turn what used to be transparent water-colour work into opaque gouache or distemper, a very good and legitimate method, but only to be blended with drawing in transparent colour with the utmost reserve, and under the most guarded conditions.

In these large heads water-colour pure and simple, with a little scratching and rubbing out of lights, is made to do the work of oil, as far as regards force and effect, and that on a scale little less than that of life.

At the same time, these heads look like three or four hours' studies, such as would be made for introduction into elaborated pictures. Mr. Herkomer's "Phrenologist" contemplates a skull, to which by a little dexterous management of light and shadow in the empty orbits, and a protrusion of the teeth, the painter has imparted a ghastly grotesqueness which suggests an answering look and grin of mockery in reply to the phrenologist's gaze of intense inquiry.

The phrenologist's head is repeated, with that of a dark, plain, middle-aged woman, in two studies for portraits, and life-like ones. Mr. Gregory's two heads, one of a figure in mediæval costume, with a light falling on the shoulder and side of the head, the other of a soldier, are singularly keen in grasp of character, and push vigour of execution to the verge of, if not into, exaggeration. It is a sure sign of something wrong in a picture when we find ourselves thinking more about the artist's way of doing his work than about the work itself—more impressed by the dash and dexterity with which a head has been knocked off than by what there is in it of beauty, dignity, or character.

Mr. Linton's work here, while in no way deficient in force, had more of the self-restraint which seems rather too intent on keeping out of sight, than insisting on, the speed and skill with which the work has been dashed off. His "Fisher Girl" is a capital bit of work, solid, full of life, suggestive of blood, purified by the fresh air of the seaside, and of health and strength due to wholesome toil and simple fare.

I do not find the same simplicity and frankness in Mr. W. Wilson's large and laboured study of a Scotch fishing village, in which, while the old woman picking mussels for bait, and the other old crone in the foreground whose back is to the spectator, are capital bits of study direct from the life, the short-skirted Christie Johnstone, whose lover wants to share her labours, and in whom the interest of the picture should be concentrated, is affected in air and action, and not a bit like a simple Scotch fisher-lassie.

E. Bale's graceful full-length, which he calls "Memories," of a lady in a sacque, absorbed in old letters, is a harmonious, refined, yet vigorously painted study of well-arranged colours, mainly neutral greys, delicate drabs, and yellows. While the whole drawing is a pleasing arrangement of tones and tints, the figure is graceful and the face attractive and expressive. There is no reason why the two pleasures of harmonious colouring and pleasing form should not be combined; every reason why they should. Yet they are often severed as if the painters thought one sufficient without the other.

G. Clausen has a capital drawing of the interior of a church in the Isle of Urk, in the Zuyder Zee, with demure maidens in their wide and stiff-frilled caps bound by a broad black riband, and stalwart fisher lads, in full suits of blue, which is dramatic and humorously pleasant in expression, while good in colour.

Hugh Carter's large portrait of an old Dutch woman, with a kindly, wrinkled face, is excellent in its kind.

Young Harry Hine has a number of capital out-door sketches, most of them of red-brick buildings in and about Yarmouth, others at Chesterton, St. Alban's, Sandwich, and elsewhere, all indicating respect for truth, and showing sense of colour both in buildings and landscapes, and a feeling of picturesqueness in choice of subject, of capital augury for the young artist's future career. There are not honester or better examples of out-door work in any of the Winter Exhibitions.

J. Aumonier has some good, impressive, and broad out-door sketches, one in particular of a brown fallow, crowded with rocks. H. Johnson's out-door studies in and about Dartmoor are vigorous and true, and free from any suggestion of other men's work, against which direct study from Nature is the best preservative. Hargett's Scotch mountain scenes are as telling as ever; so are Philp's Devonshire and Cornish coast scenes.

J. Orrock's Lincolnshire studies of sand and sea, with little to break the level monotony of flat surface and warm yellowish grey, but here and there a line of groynes, or a tuft of bents, have the impressiveness these flat waste subjects always carry with them, to me at least, and I fancy to many. W. May's Dutch sea subjects are as good as ever.

W. Small's "Summer Time," with a trim lass spreading her bleaching of lace, and two happy little boys lounging by, with the brook for their wonderland, is very fresh and cheerful. I like very much a seashore with cobles, by T. Collier. The interior of a convent kitchen, and the inner court and the readers' room in that most interesting of all museums, the house of Plantin, at Antwerp—lately acquired by the Municipality, with all its wealth of contents—the accumulation of six generations of learned and laborious printers, are picturesque in themselves, and to all who know the history of the house very interesting.

C. Staniland's sketch of a drowning man and woman from a wreck on a Yarmouth sand is striking, and looks true. Mr. W. L. Thomas's head of a Swiss girl of Schweitz in gala costume is the most attractive and effective piece of his figure-painting I have ever seen. Towneley Green's "Play in an Inn-yard," of the Shakespearian time, is a most carefully finished drawing of one of these performances, with the spectators at it. Its blemish is too great a uniformity of finish, which tames down textures and faces into something approaching insipidity.

Of two pictures by H. G. Hine, a moonlight, and a tumble-down smugglers' haunt, seen through rain and mist, I need not say anything, having so often said my say of this always to me delightful artist. Dashing or careful drawings, after their respective manners, by Whymper and Wimperis, Mole and E. Warren, C. Warner and Mogford, a series of cartoons in sepia from Anglo-Saxon history by Corbould, among the other interesting contributions to this Exhibition, are unusually good. Two effective full-lengths of a Puritan, with book and sword, in buff coat and calf-skin boots, and a Cavalier in black and gold armour, by Seymour Lucas; a clever Hungarian study and some Bedaween figures by Guido Bach; two of Tenniel's admirable studies for Punch cartoons: "Hard Lines" and "Britannia on Neptune's Lap," and the drawing for the central cut for the last Almanack, of which the central cue is given by Cleopatra's Needle.

THE READER

"THE TRANSVAAL OF TO-DAY," by Alfred Aylward, Captain (late) Lydenburg Volunteer Corps (W. Blackwood and Sons).—There is probably no portion of the British Empire of whose political condition home readers have, as a rule, a hazier notion than the newly-annexed frontier land of our great South African colony. Nor is our perplexity much diminished if we turn to those who should be our authorities. From some we shall hear that annexation was an Imperial necessity to save the Dutch Republic from itself—that the Boer was stubborn, unprogressive, and uncivilised, wedded to the practice of domestic slavery, and much inclined to take might for right in all his dealings with the native races; from others that annexation was neither necessary nor desired (save by a little "ring" of theorists and land speculators), that the Dutch settler, though slow, was industrious, though of little culture a lover of education, and of all European colonists the only one who, in his simple patriarchal way, had made the Kaffir a faithful and willing servant, and without regular soldiers or police contrived to keep the border tribes in order. Mr. Aylward, a writer evidently of Irish descent—query the same whom the Diamond Field newspapers qualified, if we mistake not, a year or two ago as a Fenian—is an authority of this latter class. Annexation, whether of the Diamond Fields or of the Transvaal, he pronounces at once an injustice in itself, made practically more galling still by the unfair arguments adduced in its defence—though he admits that it was peacefully and successfully carried out—and a measure full of peril for the future, both from the stubborn discontent of the Boer farmers, and the surprising readiness with which the natives—unmoved by soft words about protection for the aborigines or artificial temptations of "high wages and new wants,"—have begun at once to make the new comers the objects of their hostility. For the rest the volume is a lively and fairly interesting tale of "war and witchcraft, sport and spoils," during a long residence in Southern Africa, but more especially of border skirmishes in that first Transvaal War with Secocoeni and his Kaffirs, for which neither the Boer "Commandos" nor the "filibusters," headed by Von Schlickmann, Captain Aylward, and others, received from the Cape Press quite the honour they deserved. Of the power of the native chiefs, and even of the great Zulu king himself, Mr. Aylward, it is worth noting, is inclined to form a much lower estimate than has been usually entertained by recent writers on the African difficulty. Easily vanquished by disciplined Europeans in "the open," they can almost as easily, he thinks, be "worried" out of their strongholds without much loss by assailants experienced in Kaffir warfare. Altogether, if only on the audi alteram partem principle, this is a volume decidedly worth reading, though often at variance with authorities commonly held in some esteem, and at the last leaving the reader a little uncertain whether it would undo the policy of the past year, or make it a success after all by the sheer force of vigorous improvements.

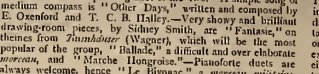
A melancholy interest attaches to "Memoirs of the Life of Anna Jameson," by her niece, Gerardine Macpherson (Longmans and Co.), for ere the volume could be revised for the press its author, the stout-hearted relict of the Robert Macpherson whose name some fifteen years ago was as a household word to every visitor to Rome, had passed away to the majority. If not a life of startling incident, it is one which in these days of biographies had every title to be written. For Mrs. Jameson was not simply a clever woman—a personage of some mark in literature when women were less commonly littérateurs than now—but a being of strongly marked though undemonstrative individuality, noteworthy both in herself and for her intimates—Ottilia von Goethe, Harriet Martineau, the Brownings, or (last, but by no means least) that strange unpleasant Lady Byron whose influence over most who came in contact with her is quite a psychological mystery. Her Mrs. Jameson—herself unfortunate in her marriage relations—loved with a love beyond the love of women, and the breach which inevitably came at last, and separated for ever two equally unbending spirits, was in truth the crowning sorrow of her life. But even in childhood the daughter of Brownwell Murphy, the clever Irish miniature painter, who came to England just in time to escape being mixed up in the rising of '98, and who became in after life a favourite artist with many noble families, is a very interesting little body. Indeed, the stories of her childish escapades are some of the most pleasant pages in the book. In latter years an atmosphere of repose, well fitting the historian of "Sacred and Legendary Art," clothes with a sort of sunset glow the closing scenes of a career which, favoured enough in many ways, had yet deep and bitter disappointments in love, in friendship, and in fortune-winning. Among biographies of illustrious women this graceful volume will justly take a modest but not undistinguished place.

In the two charming volumes, entitled "Our Old Actors" (R. Bentley and Son), Mr. H. Barton Baker has done much more than gather together a neat selection of the events and anecdotes, tragical or mirthful, in which the lives of "the players" are so prolific. Taken as a whole, these volumes tell the story not of individual lives alone, but of the successive schools of actors—so far as we can know them now from contemporary report and criticism, growing ever dimmer and more vague the farther we push our researches back—which have ranged in turn from the supremely natural to the supremely artificial, and from the artificial back to the natural again, and have fairly divided the history of the stage into five great periods, each known by the name of its most famous actor: the periods of Burbadge and of Alleyn, of Booth and Betterton, of Garrick, of Kemble, and of Edmund Kean. Mr. Baker is with some reason a laudator temporis acti, of the days when patent theatres kept the good actors in the same house, and rendered it possible to put Shakespeare on the boards without a single feeble part, when the "trousers'-pocket" school did not exist, and the delivery of blank verse was not as yet one of the lost arts; and equally naturally he sighs, though we fear in vain, for a National Theatre which, like the Comédie Française, shall develop anew the "higher acting," and educate the taste both of spectators and of performers. But this is only by way of epilogue. The lives themselves are the main portion of the book, and these, without exception, are capitally written, well-seasoned, but not overdone, with anecdote, and full of excellent comment, critical and antiquarian.

The long dark evenings of the winter months, when men like to recall the memories of summer cruises, and shudder sympathetically only to think of snipe and duck-shooting on moor and marsh, are just the hours for a new series of "Wildfowler Snap-shot's" "Shooting Adventures, Canine Lore, and Sea Fishing Trips" (2 vols.: Chapman and Hall). Sometimes, perhaps, to those who read only to be amused, recollections of previous sketches will obtrude themselves, for to such readers a mackerel is a mackerel and nothing more, whether caught off Scarborough, Brighton, or Dalkey. Such daintier readers will possibly pick and choose among the many samples of very similar trips, and not wade through all with the devouring zeal of the sportsman in search of some new "wrinkles." But even these will find some papers they cannot possibly let go if they once take the volume up—two notably: one, "How they Catch Poachers in Alsace;" the other, "How to Train a Night-Dog," a most exquisite bit of canine lore we greatly wish that we could quote in full.

In "Royal Windsor" (Vols. I. and II.: Hurst and Blackett), Mr. Hepworth Dixon has found a subject most rich in opportunities for the gorgeous word-painting and the dramatic power of which—though in too exaggerated form for gentle tastes—the writer has unquestionable command. The Royal dwelling in its various phases—Saxon hunting-lodge, Norman keep, and Palace-Castle, altered, enriched, and added to by king after king—supplies in vulgar phrase the peg on which to hang the storied chronicle of the kings and captives who all these years have tenanted its walls. The work—ending at present with the union of the Roses—is pre-eminently one for the general public. The antiquary may complain that of Windsor Castle, from the architect and the antiquary's point of view, we have no more than so much picturesque outline as may lend local colouring to the narrative; the accurate student that the treatment throughout is rather that of the dramatist than the historian. But it is not a work to be passed over with indifference, but to be liked or disliked very much. Detractors and admirers of Mr. Dixon will rise, we think, from its perusal more confirmed than ever in their respective opinions.

Amongst the various Christmas annuals is "Little Dorinda" (Burns and Oates), a thrilling story of modern life, by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald. The plot is based on the old old story of love versus money, in which money temporarily and love ultimately wins the day, but is cleverly worked out, the dénouement being singularly novel and striking. Altogether, "Little Dorinda" furnishes pleasant reading for a leisure hour.



New Music

MESSRS. ASHDOWN AND PARRY.——Vocal duets are always welcome, especially at Christmastide, when sisters, fresh from school, are expected to sing, when asked, however limited their voices may be. Four vocal duets, music by Ciro Pinsuti, are melodious and pleasing, within the compass of most soprani and mezzo soprani. The poetry of two is by Longfellow—namely, "There is a Reaper," a really charming two-part song," and "It is not always May."—The words of "Three Charms of Life" and "Kind Words" are taken from "The Afterglow." The former is the more pleasing duet of the two.—A simple song of medium compass is "Other Days," written and composed by E. Oxenford and T. C. B. Halley.—Very showy and brilliant drawing-room pieces, by Sidney Smith, are "Fantasie," on themes from Tannhäuser (Wagner), which will be the most popular of the group, "Ballade," a difficult and over elaborate morceau, and "Marche Hongroise."—Pianoforte duets are always welcome, hence "Le Bivouac," a morceau militaire, playable and ear-catching, will find many admirers.—Six remarkably graceful little songs without words, for the pianoforte, by Stephen Heller, are fitly styled "Feuillets d'Album." They should be committed to memory, for, though short, they are very sweet.—"Elfes" is from the same composer's "Album Dédié à la Jeunesse," a brief but clever trifle.—The same may be said of "Petite Valse," by Max Schröter.—Appropriate for the coming festive season are the latest numbers of "The Glee and Choral Library," from 90 to 93. They are all well-known favourites, as "The Captive to his Bird," a glee for three voices, by J. Mazzinghi; Sir Henry Bishop's tuneful music to Shakespeare's racy words, "What shall he have that Killed the Deer?" arranged for S.A.T.B. by J. L. Hatton; also "Come, Thou Monarch of the Vine," written, composed, and arranged by the same gifted trio; and "A Little Farm well Till'd," a comic glee for three voices, by J. Hook.

J. BATH.——The name of Dr. William Spark as editor of "Bath's Musical Museum for the Harmonium" is a sufficient guarantee for the judicious selection and arrangement of its contents. Twenty carefully and easily arranged extracts from ancient and modern composers' works will supply a daily increasing demand from students of this often abused instrument; the price of this compact little book places it within the reach of the most impecunious executant.—"Celestial Trumpets," a march for the organ, by Dr. A. S. Holloway, is but a weak specimen of his musical compositions; the grotesque frontispiece is enough to condemn it.—Exactly the reverse may be said of "Dreaming Eyes," a feeble fantasia for the pianoforte, by J. Harrison, with a graceful frontispiece.—In memory of many pleasant days passed at "The Cottage, Wimbledon," a warm reception will be given to "The Cottage Polka," a specimen of less than average merit, by G. Grossmith, jun.—Worth treble its cost is "Bath's Shilling Album of Easy Dance Music," which contains six tuneful and danceable examples of their species.—John Cooke, jun., has done and can do better than with "La Comète Valse," which is absolutely void of originality.—"The Soldier's Return," a march by J. E. Newell, has a pleasing melody; its chief fault is too frequent repetition of the leading theme.—"Tell Me, Sweetheart," written and composed by E. Oxenford and M. Watson, and the "Cloud and the Flower," by Messrs. R. Reece and B. Tours, are favourable examples of drawing-room songs; the former for a baritone or tenor, the latter for a soprano.—Two very laughable comic songs for bachelors are "The Careless Man" and "The Gay Photographer," by G. Grossmith, jun.; the imitation banjo accompaniment to the latter is really clever.

MESSRS. STANLEY WEBER AND CO.——"Eight Songs for Three Female Voices," by F. Hiller, English translation by Julia Goddard, are far above the average of their kind; especially worthy of mention are, "Where Can My Darling Be?" (No. 3), "Cuckoo Song," wherein the work of the two under voices is but light, consisting of the repetition of the word "cuckoo" on two notes, the effect of which is quaint and telling (No. 6), and "Parting Song" (sung at the departure of the bride), the melody and words of which are pathetic (No. 7).—"Kein Feuer, Keine Kohle," is an admirable arrangement of a German popular song, composed for two voices in canon-form by George Henschel; intelligent singers may do well with this song.—The same composer has effectively set to music Sir Walter Scott's poem, "O, Hush Thee My Babie."—A genuine contralto will find a song to please most listeners in "Sleep, Darling, Sleep," slumber-song, music by J. Schönbach, words by his mother.—mild imitation after Kingsley is "Only a Broken Dolly," written and composed by Somerville Gibney and Myles B. Foster, both of whom are capable of better work.—A moderately good tenor song is "Ah, Sheelah, Thou'rt My Darling," words by Tannahill, music by M. L. Girelon.—Very graceful and tuneful is a vocal duet for two soprani, the music by Carl Hause, poetry by Longfellow.—"To My Fellow Traveller" is the dedication of "Five Pictures on a Journey," for the pianoforte, by Francis Davenport, far more interesting they are without doubt to the two personages concerned than to the public in general.—A "Barcarolle," for the pianoforte, by Alexander Rowland, is written with care, but void of originality.

MESSRS. METZLER AND CO.——In its place the quaint poem, "I Once Had a Dear Little Doll," written by the Rev. C. Kingsley in his "Water Babies," made its mark, but it has failed to inspire Alfred Cellier to compose music worth singing or listening to.—By the same composer are "The Ship Came Sailing from the West," a dramatic song for a contralto, words by Mrs. Eric Baker, and "My Laddie," also for a contralto, words by E. Oxenford.—Nos. 4 and 5 of "Six Pensées Dansantes," for the pianoforte, by A. Cellier, are excellent studies for the schoolroom.

W. PAXTON.——A marvel of cheapness and correctness is Paxton's edition of Crispin's Valses," which consist of the "Invitation à la Valse," "Trois Valses Brillantes," "Grand Valse," and "Trois Valses."—Both poetical and melodious are the words and music of "The Singer," a soprano song, written and composed by Wade Robinson and Cleveland Wigan.

MISCELLANEOUS.——From A. E. Klitz, a rising young composer, come a song and two pieces, which give promise of future excellence; it will, however, be better when he has decided upon a publisher. They are entitled respectively, "O, Happy Hour," words by Saml L. Moore (H. Davidson); "Grand March" (Messrs. Willey and Co.); and, best of the three, "Elaine," a mazurka de salon (Messrs. Howard and Co.).

A TOUR THROUGH NORWAY

THOSE whose main object is scenery-hunting should enter Norway at Throndhjem, and leave it at Christiania, and if they defer their visit till September, by which time early frosts will have caused the bracken to assume a ruddy hue, and turned the quivering foliage of the birch to a bright yellow, their sacrifice of an hour or two of daylight for travelling will be compensated for by the glories of the autumn tints on mountain side and valley floor. The ancient capital of the land of the Vikings, founded nearly 900 years ago, is not likely to detain the visitor long, but the Domkirke, or Cathedral, which dates as far back as 1160, furnishes some of the best specimens of Norman and Early English architecture, and is now in process of restoration, much of the most beautiful work having for centuries been hidden beneath coats of plaster. The Tomb-house much resembles Becket's Crown in Canterbury Cathedral, and the high altar is surmounted by a superb cast of Thorwaldsen's statue of the Saviour, presented by the sculptor. In this Cathedral is always performed the ceremony of crowning the Sovereign, and Oscar II. and his Queen were duly proclaimed here in 1872. Journeying southwards by karyol, the Dovrefjeld range is crossed in two days' pleasant travelling through grand scenery over wild mountain plateaux, and the Romsdal, or Valley of the Rauma, opens out to the west. Some twenty-five miles in length, and hardly exceeding a mile in breadth, this grand valley is shut in by precipices some 2,000 feet in height, from the edges of which tumble innumerable waterfalls. The lion of the gorge is the Romdalshorn, a solitary peak, 4,188 feet in height, and much resembling a ruined steeple. It rises abruptly from the valley in almost vertical precipices of dark grey rock, but, though the crag is apparently inaccessible, a local blacksmith is said to have reached its summit. It is reported in the valley that an English M.P. has recently purchased the mountain for 50*l.*; he leases the fishing in the Rauma, but what object he has in buying the Romdalshorn does not appear.

From Veblungsnæs, the port of the Romsdal, two days' passage in little coasting steamers gives the tourist lovely views of the Romsdal, Hjorrend and Stor Fjords, and brings him to Hellesylt, whence by four days of karyol travelling, in the course of which he will skirt the Justedals glacier, the largest ice-field in Europe, he can reach the northern shore of the Sogne Fjord, which huge arm of the sea runs inland to a distance of more than 100 miles from the Atlantic. At the head of this fjord is a little village, Aardal, whence the Maarkefos, or Vettisfos, the loftiest of the four great waterfalls of Norway, can be visited. It is the plunge of a mountain torrent, 940 ft. from lip to basin in a clear unbroken fall. The Staubbach, and the Bridal Veil Fall in Yosemite are of equal height, but the gem of Yosemite outshines the Maarkefos, and the Staubbach must be content with third honours. From Aardal a tiny steamer takes the traveller up the Næro Fjord, a lane of water, eighteen miles in length, and averaging little more than half a mile across. Here and there are yellowing slopes of birch and pine, but almost vertical precipices of from 3,000 to 5,000 feet, down which pour a hundred cascades, form the characteristic feature of this, the grandest fjord in Norway. At its head is Nærodal, reputed third in magnificence amongst the valleys of the world, Yosemite and the Taurus Gorge in Cilicia alone surpassing it. Like the fjord, it is hemmed in by stupendous walls of rock, and resounds with the roar of cataracts. No one who has gazed into its purple depths from the Stalheimskleft at the head of the valley, can ever forget the scene. Hence a day's brisk karyol-driving, and we are at Eide on the Hardanger Fjord, into a lake situated in a lateral valley of which falls the Skjæggedalsfos, from the height of 700 feet. The amphitheatre of ink-black rocks which receives it is gloomy in the extreme, and the unfathomable waters of the lake are walled in by cliffs rising sheer from the margin to the snow-clad fjeld two thousand feet above. From Odde, the little port at the end of the Sor Fjord, leads the high road across Thelemarken, the wildest district of Norway. Costumes are picturesque, and the exteriors of houses and stables are quaintly carved, as will be seen from our sketch of a stable at Bredheim. The superb Rjukanfos and Hitterdal Church are the chief lions of Thelemarken. The latter dates back to the twelfth century, and is built of pine, but very few of the original timbers remain. It is surrounded by cloisters, and the interior is painted a light buff colour, the windows being of green glass. There is much quaint carving in the body of the building, which for a Norwegian church is highly decorated. This and that at Borgund are the two most picturesque churches in the country. Hence a couple of days travelling by karyol and train brings us to Christiania and the steamer for Hull.—Our engravings are from photographs by Knudsen of Bergen and Frith of Reigate.

ARTHUR G. GUILLEMARD

A SPLENDID AQUARIUM is to be built at Leipzig. The building will contain twenty-one enormous tanks, nine being filled with sea fishes, and twelve with fresh-water specimens, while there will be a large centre grotto full of tortoises and alligators, and including an aviary for water fowl.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA—DEPARTURE OF TROOPS FROM SOUTHAMPTON

FOREIGN

THE CRISIS IN THE EAST.——The new Ministry at Constantinople has certainly begun well, and the first effect of Khaireddin Pasha's appointment has been the virtual banishment of Mahmoud Damad Pasha and the most prominent members of the Palace party from Constantinople, as their intrigues threatened to neutralise the endeavours which are now being made to organise the proposed reforms. Another Imperial Hatt is expected to be issued by the Sultan announcing the reforms ordained by the Treaty of Berlin, and the Sultan himself has declared that the appointment of Caratheodori Pasha as Minister for Foreign Affairs implies that he is determined to carry out the stipulations of that Treaty. Khaireddin Pasha, also, has officially assured the Armenian Patriarch that all Ottoman subjects will henceforward be regarded as equal, completely irrespective of creed, adding, "We all pray to the same God, we in the mosque, you in the church." Whether or no all these fine words will bear any better fruit than the innumerable promises which the Porte have so liberally given forth during the last twenty years remains to be seen. Amongst the most prominent members of the new Cabinet is Said Pasha, a great favourite of the Sultan, who had vainly tried to induce the late Grand Vizier to accept him as a colleague. Notwithstanding the declaration of Ministerial responsibility with which the new Ministry has inaugurated its reign, it appears that the Sultan is as determined upon autocracy as either Abd-ul-Aziz or Abd-ul-Medjid, or even the great Mahmoud himself. The general impression upon the various Powers caused by the appointment of the new Ministry is fairly favourable except in Austria, to which country Khaireddin is for some reason or other supposed to be personally hostile.

To turn to the provinces, the Delimitation Commissioners in Roumelia are quietly pursuing their work, and the International Roumelian Commission appears, as usual, to be in a state of ferment through the quarrels of its members, while there is a growing excitement in Bulgaria respecting the coming election of the ruler of that new Principality. Prince Dondoukoff-Korsakoff is the favourite candidate, but as it is considered in Russian circles that neither Turkey nor the Powers would approve of a Muscovite ascending the throne, more particularly when he holds such pronounced views regarding the absorption of Roumelia into Bulgaria as Prince Korsakoff, it is proposed to make a prominent Montenegrin the favoured candidate. The Bulgarians, however, are not unlikely to object to this, as they hold themselves far superior to the mountaineers, and would by no means approve of electing one as their Prince. At Adrianople the Russians have committed an outrage on the British Consulate, where a British subject, accused of some civil offence, had taken refuge. The Russians requested Consul Calvert to give up the culprit, and on his refusal, sent a body of Bulgarian police to the Consulate, where they broke open the door with hatchets, and forcibly carried off the prisoner. Consul Calvert at once lodged a protest with the Russian authorities, and communicated with the British Ambassador at Constantinople. There is little other news. ROUMANIA is busy consolidating her rule in the Dobrudscha, and has just reorganised her Cabinet, M. Bratiano having formed a new Ministry.—Tuesday being the anniversary of the capture of Plevna was kept as a general holiday throughout the country.—It is reported that Russia will probably object to the proposed Turkish loan, on the ground that as the Berlin Congress had declared that only the existing loans had precedence of the war indemnity, the latter would be rendered illusory, should the available resources of Turkey be pledged by a fresh loan.

FRANCE.——The invalidation of the election of the Duc Decazes by the Chamber of Deputies has been the great theme of discussion this week, and now that he is down the Republican papers have been somewhat ungenerously administering a severe castigation to the fallen Minister. Under the circumstances, which were most flagrant, the Chamber could not do otherwise than unseat the Duke, but it must not be forgotten that during a very trying period he piloted France through the dangerous maze of foreign politics not only with safety, but with dignity and honour. Still his manifest love of power, his willingness to coquet with Right and Left alike, with M. de Broglie and M. Gambetta, and, finally, his very questionable conduct with regard to his election, will go far to injure his political career for the future. The Duke made an energetic defence before the Chamber on Saturday, but without effect. There is no other political news of interest, except that a Perpignan newspaper is to be prosecuted for insulting King Alphonso, and that on Tuesday the Bonapartists celebrated the 10th of December by drinking the Prince Imperial's health at a grand banquet at St. Mandé, under the presidency of M. Haentjens. Another toast was to the "Return of the Emperor," and the various speakers abused the Republic to their hearts' content, so that the liberalism of the present régime can hardly be called into question even by its enemies. The lottery still continues to create considerable excitement, and people are eagerly looking forward to the exhibition of the prizes, which some two hundred and fifty men are busily arranging in order. Amongst the prizes which have been bought are the sculptured bedstead which excited so much attention in the Chinese section, and which, wrought all over with hideous dragons and imps, will probably give the winner a severe nightmare—some magnificent carpets, sets of drawing-room furniture, clocks and watches in hundreds, layettes, boots in dozens, and, if we are to believe Figaro, "surprise baskets," containing two bottles of ink, a bottle of blacking, two packs of cards, a penholder, a pair of stays, a pair of braces, a waistband, and a fan. This reads like a "miscellaneous lot" at a popular auction. The 480,000*l.* realised by the sale of the tickets has been expended as follows:—48,000*l.* in commission and general expenses; 144,000*l.* in taking 22,000 working men to the Paris Exhibition, the original object of the lottery; 280,000*l.* in prizes; the remainder, 8,000*l.*, being retained for a reserve fund destined to defray the cost of forwarding the prizes, &c.

From Paris there is little news save that M. Littré has been ill, that M. Gigot, the Prefect of Police, has come over to London to arrange with the British police relative to the exchange of "information," more especially respecting Socialists, and the production of a new play by the author of the Danicheffs, M. Pierre Newski (M. Corvin Kroukovskoi)—which has just been brought out at the Ambigu. Although exceedingly cleverly written in parts, it is by no means so successful as the Danicheffs, owing to the crudity of some of the language—a fact doubtless due to the non-collaboration of M. A. Dumas. A bright three-act vaudeville, Fleur d'Oranger, by M. Cœdès, has also been brought out at the Nouveautés. The first bal masqué at the Grand Opera is fixed for the 18th of January.

GERMANY.——The Emperor has returned to Berlin, and has reassumed the reins of Government amid general enthusiasm. No disturbance whatever occurred during the rejoicings, which were virtually continued for several days, the Emperor receiving congratulatory deputations, while a grand thanksgiving service was held in all the churches of Berlin on Sunday, the Emperor, Empress, and all the Royal family being present at the service in the Cathedral. The official crusade against the Socialists continues unabated, and the Minister of the Interior has stated in the Prussian Diet that "the Socialists were carrying on a secret propaganda, by which the lives of all European Princes appeared to be menaced, as was evidenced by the occurrences in Berlin, Madrid, and Naples. Moreover, Nihilists from foreign countries had arrived, who were in communication with the Berlin Socialists. The Government, therefore, was under the necessity of shutting up the school of crime and expelling the teachers." Up to the present time 153 clubs, 40 periodicals, and 135 other publications have been placed on the black list.—Prince Gortschakoff has paid a flying visit to Berlin, and has had an audience with the Emperor and the Crown Prince, and a long interview with Lord Odo Russell.

ITALY.——Signor Cairoli has been defeated in the Chamber after several days' hard debating, the motion of confidence in his Ministry being rejected by 263 against 189. The Italian Premier had sufficiently recovered from his wound to attend the debate in the Chamber, and spoke vigorously in defence of the Government policy, but all to no avail, and the Cabinet is expected to resign.

The canonisation of the late Pope Pius IX. continues to excite considerable discussion in Papal circles, and Pope Leo XIII., hearing that certain Bishops objected to the step, has sent them a sharp reminder that they owe unqualified obedience to the Holy See. The Ultramontanes have now determined to take a decided part in all elections, and the Pope has rescinded the rule which compelled candidates and electors to demand a modification of the oath of fidelity to the King and his dynasty.

UNITED STATES.——The House of Representatives at Washington have thrown out the Bill for the recoinage of trade dollars into dollars of standard silver, and has passed a Bill reducing the salaries of the Diplomatic Representatives. This, however, will probably be negatived by the Senate.—The Southern States have addressed—through a mass meeting at New Orleans—a resolution of thanks to the whole country for the assistance afforded them during the recent yellow fever epidemic.—General Grant has accepted the offer from the Secretary of the Navy of a vessel to convey him on a tour through the East Indies, China, and Japan. The Richmond has accordingly been sent out to him, and it is expected that his visit will have good influence in extending American commercial relations in the East.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The marriage of the King of HOLLAND is fixed for January 7th. The King and his bride will make a state entry into Amsterdam, on the 20th, and the subsequent festivities will last a week.—In AUSTRIA the debate on the Treaty of Berlin was begun in the Reichsrath.—In RUSSIA there has been a grand festival, commemorating the 109th anniversary of the Order of St. George, at the Castle, St. Petersburg, when the Czar told the arrayed knights, who amounted to four thousand, that "our young army during the last campaign showed itself worthy of the heroic traditions of the old army of Russia."—In BELGIUM there are symptoms of a serious religious conflict, the clergy are beginning to threaten eternal damnation from the pulpit to parents who send their children to the "godless schools," i.e., schools without religious instruction," after the reform of the law on religious instruction. In the Chamber, also, an amendment to the Address to the throne was proposed, placing the coming celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Belgian Independence under the special protection of the Deity, but was rejected by 66 to 54 votes, the Chamber considering that the motion tended to mix up in a party interest the religious with the political question.—From SOUTH AFRICA the news is not reassuring. Cetywayo is concentrating his troops on the principal points of the frontier, and a conflict has already taken place between the British troops and one of his chiefs, in which our losses were one man killed (Sergt. Pegg, 13th Regt.), and eleven wounded.

THE COURT

THE Queen with the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold will leave Windsor on Tuesday for Osborne to spend Christmas. They will remain in the Isle of Wight until the beginning of February. Last week Her Majesty presented new colours to the 2nd Battalion of the 4th Regiment, and in the evening several of the officers who had been present at the ceremony dined with Her Majesty. On Saturday afternoon the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold went to Eton College, where they were present at the performance of Mozart's "Requiem" in the chapel, and afterwards visited the Provost and Mrs. Goodford before returning to Windsor. In the evening the Countess of Stair and Mr. Cross dined with the Queen. Next morning Her Majesty with the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold attended Divine Service in the private chapel, when the Rev. Henry White preached, and after the service Princess Christian lunched with the Queen. On Monday Her Majesty gave audience to Earl Beauchamp, who presented an address from the House of Lords, and in the evening the Dean of Windsor and Mrs. Wellesley, Major C. E. Phipps, and Captain T. J. Edwards, R.E., joined the Royal party at dinner. Prince Leopold came up to town and was present at the debate in the House of Lords. To-day (Saturday) is the 17th anniversary of the death of the Prince Consort, and the Queen with those members of the Royal Family now in England will attend the usual memorial services at the Frogmore Mausoleum.—The Queen and the Princesses Christian and Beatrice and Prince Leopold sent wreaths by Dean Stanley to be placed on the coffin of the late Mrs. Tait, Her Majesty adding a letter of condolence to the Archbishop.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are now staying in town, the Princess having joined her husband at Marlborough House on Monday. The Prince on Sunday afternoon went to Charing Cross Station to receive the Duchess of Edinburgh. Next morning he visited the Cattle Show at the Agricultural Hall, where he is himself an exhibitor, competing in seven classes, and having obtained several awards. Afterwards the Prince lunched with the Duchess of Edinburgh, and went to the House of Lords in the evening. On Tuesday the Duchess of Edinburgh visited and lunched with the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the Prince was again present at the debate in the House of Lords. On Wednesday the Prince presided at a meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society at Hanover Square Rooms.

The Grand Duchess of Hesse is seriously ill with diphtheria. She was attacked at the end of last week, and at first suffered from violent fever in addition to the diphtheric affection. Much anxiety was felt on her account, and on Monday the Queen despatched Sir W. Jenner to Darmstadt, but on Wednesday the Princess showed less fever, the local symptoms had not increased, and her general state was satisfactory. Meanwhile, the Grand Duke and his children are convalescent, and have been recommended to go to Heidelberg for change of air.

The Duchess of Edinburgh and her children have returned to London. The Duchess, who had spent a few days with her relatives at Stuttgart, joined her four children at Mayence, and travelled by Cologne and Brussels in the Prince of Wales' special saloon carriage to Calais, where she crossed the Channel in the Maid of Kent, and came up to town by special train. The Prince of Wales, Prince Leopold, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck, met the Duchess on her arrival in London.—The Duke of Connaught's marriage takes place on February 7th in St George's Chapel, Windsor. The Princess Louise-Margaret will have eight bridesmaids chosen from daughters of English, Scotch, and Irish peers. The Duke continues in Berlin on a visit to his fiancée, and on Sunday, with the rest of the German Imperial family, attended a thanksgiving service for the Emperor's recovery at the Cathedral. On Tuesday he visited the Emperor and the Imperial Prince. Emperor William has appointed the Duke Honorary Colonel of the Brandenburg Ziethen Regiment of Hussars, which is commanded by the Duke's future father-in-law, Prince Frederick Charles, whose sobriquet of Red Prince comes from the colour of the tunics worn by this regiment.

The Russian Czarevna, Princess Dagmar, sister to the Princess of Wales, has another son—her fourth child and third son. The baby has been named Michel Alexandrowitch.—The Queen's consent to the marriage of the Duke of Cumberland and Princess Thyra has been officially announced.

CHURCH NEWS

ADVANTAGES OF AN ESTABLISHMENT.——The writer of a series of articles upon this subject, which have been published in Church and State, sums up the arguments in favour of the union of Church and State as follows. "It enables the State to profess a national religion, and to have a medium through which it can discharge its responsibilities, and lead the nation's thoughts and religious life—benefits which are made universal by its territorial organisation, and permanent by its legal provisions. An Establishment gives the weight of the law to the work of the clergy, generates a sober standard of religious thought and doctrine, and besides being a bulwark to truth, is a help to Nonconformists, for by means of its organisation the Church's ministrations can be claimed by every one. It promotes the education of the poor, especially in rural districts, lessens conflict between Church and Dissent, and diffuses its blessings over all the dependencies by means of Colonial Churches to both colonists and heathen. In addition to these religious advantages, the following social reasons are urged for its maintenance. The parochial clergy are the germs of civilisation in every parish; it tends to form national character; its roots are intertwined with the whole framework of English society; it enables men to rise in the social scale; it influences society, literature, public opinion, all institutions, and art; a higher class of men are attracted to the ministry by the Church prizes; and finally, it preserves the political continuity of the nation. It is therefore our highest wisdom to keep these blessings we possess, and put up with any disadvantages we may have than 'fly to ills we know not of.'"

VARIOUS.——The Bishop of Durham has issued a circular to his clergy, announcing that, on account of continued illness, he has placed his resignation in the hands of the Archbishop of York. His lordship expresses his regret and pain in having to sever his official connection with the diocese, and adds that he will not require a pension, as he possesses some private means. Dr. Baring, who is a decided Evangelical, was educated at Oxford, where he took his degree (a double first) in 1829. After holding the Rectory of Limpsfield, Surrey, and that of All Souls', Langham Place, London, he was consecrated Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol in 1856, and translated to the See of Durham in 1861. The income of the Bishopric is 8,000*l.* per annum, and the preferment is in the hands of the Premier.—The Evangelisation Society have just finished a fifteen days' mission at Canterbury, during which crowded meetings have been daily held in the Theatre, the Music Hall, and the Rink.—The Rev. James Davis, secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, has been compelled by failing health to resign his post, the duties of which he has discharged for upwards of twenty years.—The students and ex-students of the Dublin Roman Catholic University have addressed a letter to their Archbishops and Bishops, urging them to resist the rumoured Government proposal for the establishment of an Examining Board, and stating that nothing less than the endowment of the existing University will be satisfactory.—It is said that Mr. O'Shaughnessy intends to introduce a Bill for the purpose of enabling persons about to marry to make valid and binding agreements with regard to the bringing up of their children. It probably arises out of the recent decision in the Agar-Ellis case.—The Echo, virtuously indignant at the issue of the prospectus of the "Clergy Co-operative Stores," wonders if Christianity would have made the wonderful progress it achieved in the first century if St. Paul had set up a big shop in Corinth, with Titus, Mark, Timothy, and Barnabas as directors, to undersell the retail traders of that city. For our own part we cannot see anything wrong in clergymen seeking the cheapest market for any worldly goods of which they may stand in need.—A memorial was recently sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury by Mr. G. J. Holyoake, begging his Grace to open the grounds of Lambeth Palace to the poor children resident in the neighbourhood. The Archbishop in reply states that the ground is already used for cricket, football, volunteer drills, and children's school treats, and adds that, considering the limited extent of the space, no advantage could be secured by throwing it entirely open which would at all compensate for the loss of the advantages at present.—The remains of the late Mrs. Tait were on Saturday interred in the churchyard at Addington, in a grave next to that of the late Rev. Craufurd Tait, who died six months ago. The service was read part by the Rev. W. F. Knollys and part by the Bishop of York, the Primate himself pronouncing the Benediction by the grave side. The Bishops of London, Winchester, St. Alban's, Rochester, and Dover, the Deans of Canterbury, Westminster, and Durham, and several other clerical dignitaries, were present, and amongst the floral mementoes placed upon the coffin were wreaths sent by the Queen, the Princesses Beatrice and Christian, and Prince Leopold.

MUSIC

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——A revival of Oberon, according to the Italian version prepared expressly for Her Majesty's Theatre eighteen years ago, gave special interest to the performance of Saturday. The Baron Max von Weber, Carl Maria von Weber's son, who was present on the occasion, no doubt felt somewhat astonished at hearing his illustrious father's last work under conditions so different from those to which he was accustomed at home in Germany. Nevertheless, if Oberon, like Der Freischütz, must absolutely be metamorphosed into an Italian opera, however objecting to the interpolations from Euryanthe, and other liberties, he may have found some consolation in the admirable skill with which Weber's favourite pupil and staunch disciple, Sir Julius Benedict, has set the spoken dialogue to accompanied recitative, and the reverential delicacy with which he performed a task not to be entertained without certain misgivings. In regard to Oberon itself (pur et simple), it is quite unnecessary to go into details. Despite a hopelessly weak libretto, it has lived, thanks to the music, over half a century, and is likely to survive half a century more. Such melody as it contains is perennial—nay, imperishable; and while listening to it, we are by no means inclined to discuss the raison d'être of a piece which inspired so richly gifted a composer. Oberon, at any rate, has long been a recognised "classic." For this distinction it is indebted neither to Huon de Bordeaux, the source whence the story is derived, nor to Wieland, who made a poem out of it, nor to Sotheby, who translated that poem into English, nor to Mr. Planché, who turned it into an operatic libretto, with verse worthy a more congenial theme, but exclusively to Weber, who found music which throws over it an indefinable charm, endowing with life and characteristic individuality the shadowy nonentities who make up the dramatis personæ—herein almost rivalling Mozart, in his incomparable Zauberflöte, a prodigy inducing very many sane people, also musical enthusiasts, to believe they have discovered some hidden significance in that singular medley written by Shickaneder (or, by somebody else, for Shickaneder) for which the poor composer, despite its success with the public of Vienna, never got a ducat. The performance of Oberon, on the whole, at Her Majesty's Theatre is good, though in many respects it might certainly be better. The want of sufficient rehearsal is manifest throughout; and this, considering that six or seven representations take place weekly, is hardly to be wonderd at. The distribution of characters, if not unimpeachable, is by no means wanting in efficiency. Sir Huon is represented by Signor Gillandi (who has been terribly overtaxed of late), Oberon by Signor Carrion, and Scherasmin, the (should be) comic squire, by Signor Mendioroz—each of whom works zealously, if not all with the same results. The parts allotted to ladies, however, are much more ably sustained. Miss Purdy is a pleasant and lively Puck, Madame Bauermeister the most engaging and persuasive of Mermaids, Madame Trebelli a Fatima beyond reproach, and Madame Pappenheim a Rezia worthy to tread in the footsteps of Titiens herself. At the first performance the three last-named of the artists greatly distinguished themselves—Madame Bauermeister in the exquisitely tuneful "Oh! 'tis pleasant to float on the sea," Madame Trebelli in both the airs allotted to Fatima, more particularly "Oh! Araby, dear Araby," upon which Weber set such store, and Madame Pappenheim in "Ocean, thou mighty monster," a scena which may pair off with the great soliloquy of Agatha in Der Freischütz, being quite as expressive and quite as dramatic. Madame Pappenheim, by the way, in every character allotted to her, makes a step forward, and already, with good reason, stands high in the estimation of the London operatic public. The orchestra, under the direction of Signor Li Calsi, is, as might have been expected, all that could be desired, playing the magnificent overture, which every member knows by heart, with wonderful spirit and unfailing accuracy. The chorus, too, although not invariably up to the mark, performs its duties well; and the ballet, if (like the scenery and decorations) scarcely what Weber would have gone into raptures about, as in 1826, when Oberon was originally produced by Charles Kemble, at Covent Garden, has, nevertheless, thanks to Madame Katti Lanner, some excellent points. In any case the revival of such an opera is something to be welcomed by all who care for music which is not only dramatic but poetical. Verdi's Forza del Destino has, we understand, been set aside for reasons not worth discussing; and, indeed, next week will be the last of the season at reduced prices. Early in February Mr. Carl Rosa takes possession of the theatre; and from him and his company much, as usual, will be expected.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.——These admirable entertainments are following their accustomed course, and with their accustomed success. Masterpiece after masterpiece from the works of the really great composers is presented, in accordance with the plan originally contemplated. We have by good luck only had one innovation on that much-to-be-respected scheme, in the shape of a not very interesting, though very pretentious, trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by M. Bronsard, who belongs to what is called the "advanced," but which we must persist in calling the "retrograde" school. Madame Norman Néruda is playing more divinely (we use the term without hesitation) than ever. Her leading of Schubert's very fine Quintet in C major, for stringed instruments, on a recent occasion, could not possibly be surpassed by any artist of either sex. Mr. Chappell is fortunate in obtaining the services of so admirable a first violin as this accomplished lady for his ante-Christmas concerts. About his new pianist, Mdlle. Janotha, we shall find another opportunity to speak. She is young, and already a favourite.

ENGLISH OPERA AT COVENT GARDEN.——It was a happy thought of Mr. Hayes to fill up the usual gap between the termination of the Promenade Concerts and the commencement of the annual pantomime with a series of popular English operas. The first of these performances took place on Saturday evening last, and attracted a large audience. The programme consisted of the second and third acts of Wallace's Maritana and Dibdin's Waterman, with Mr. Sims Reeves as Tom Tug. The great tenor was in capital voice, and caused a perfect furore by his admirable rendering of "The Bay of Biscay," but, though his resolution was severely tested, he firmly resisted all efforts to obtain an encore. Mr. Reeves was very ably supported by Madame Cave Ashton (whose singing of "Cherry Ripe" was deservedly encored), Mr. Aynsley Cooke, Mr. J. Maclean and Mr. J. D. Stoyle, who had to repeat his capital rendering of "Cherries and Plums." Mr. Sidney Naylor conducted an orchestra which was all that could be desired.

WAIFS.——Dr. Arthur S. Sullivan, who conducted the English concerts in the Trocadero, has been created a Chevalier of the Legion d'Honneur.—The monument to Felicien David, composer of the "Desert," is now completed all but the statue, to which the sculptor is putting the finishing touches.—Madame Annette Essipoff, the famous Russian pianist, has been playing with brilliant success at Zurich.—At the recent visit of the Emperor of Germany to Wiesbaden, Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord was performed at His Majesty's express desire.—Dr. Hans von Bülow, after performing Weber's Concertstück, at a concert of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, conducted by Sir Julius Benedict, has returned to his post in Hanover. His recent sojourn among us has been unusually brief.—It is said that no offers whatever can persuade the Abbate Franz Liszt to pay a visit to this country in consequence of the cool reception he met with in 1840.

THEATRES

THE past week has been almost completely barren of theatrical events. On Monday Mr. Bandmann, who has been absent from the London stage for some months, reappeared in the character of Hamlet, a part which he has often represented on the English stage. Mr. Bandmann's impersonation unfortunately does not attain any high level of excellence; and his foreign accent, though only slight, is sufficiently marked to be distressing to the ear of an English reader of poetry. His performance is, moreover, overloaded with action. Partly for these reasons, and partly from his failure to mark, by tone of voice, the appropriate key of pathetic regret, the beautiful passage beginning, "I have of late (but wherefore I know not) lost all my mirth," may be said, in Mr. Bandmann's hands, to have lost all its poetry. Miss Wallis is a pretty Ophelia, acting with grace, and speaking her lines with due tenderness. Of the other performers little that is favourable can be said. The whole representation, indeed, betokened hasty preparation—which, perhaps, is all that is deemed necessary in the case of a revival "for six nights only."

A good programme and a good object drew together a large and fashionable audience on Tuesday evening at the ROYAL AQUARIUM Theatre, where a performance was given by the gentlemen in the London and Westminster Bank in aid of the funds for the Home for Incurable Children, Maida Vale. The curtain rose on An Ugly Customer, while for the second piece The Honeymoon was revived and well played throughout. Both pieces were most favourably received.

A new musical extravaganza, entitled Our Baby, will be produced at the STRAND Theatre this evening. The authors are C. H. Ross (the inventor, we believe, of that amusing personage, "Ally Sloper,") and Mr. A. Freer.

The GAIETY Theatre and the AQUARIUM will produce their pantomimes on Saturday afternoon next.

The new play, entitled The Republican Marriage, has proved so successful at the OLYMPIC, that its representation on Saturday afternoons appears to have become a standing arrangement. It will be repeated to-day.

Morning performances will also be given to-day at the Gaiety, the Vaudeville, and the Haymarket.

A GRAPHIC CLUB has been established by the principal Viennese printers to afford members of the trade a meeting place where they can discuss and obtain information relative to the graphic arts, a library having also been formed containing journals and books on printing and the Arts. Lectures on inventions and improvements in printing and artistic subjects are to be delivered at intervals and the club already includes 200 members.

"PROGRESS" is the name of a new weekly Philadelphia journal, framed somewhat after our Society journals, and edited by Mr. John W. Forney, whose name is well known in England. On the front page it states that Progress is typified by the nine portraits depicted in the title:—"William Penn began the one century when he organised Philadelphia in 1682, and Benjamin Franklin opened the other when he finished his great career in 1790 in the same city. The seven others—Lincoln, the liberator; Grant, the soldier; Sumner, the statesman; Carey, the philosopher; McMichael, the journalist; Childs, the philanthropist; and Edison, the inventor, illustrate the successive stages of American progress in liberty, arms, government, and science, during the century closing with the Centennial of the National Constitution," September 17th, 1881.

THE DIFFERENCE IN FRENCH AND ENGLISH CHARACTERISTICS, particularly in their respective seaside resorts, is noted by a correspondent of the American Architect, who compares alike architecture and manners. "As the English people spend their leisure in walking, so the French spend their leisure in talking," says our Transatlantic observer, "consequently at English watering-places there are vast jetties running out into the sea, built expressly for 'constitutionals,' where day and evening both sexes tramp up and down. The French at all seasons like to sit in the open air and chat, and this accounts for their casinos, which at every watering-place are the centre of interest from the wide piazzas where they can sit." In their modern country buildings the French adopt a far more stereotyped style, thinks the critic, than the English. "The French have not so keen an appreciation of the picturesque as their neighbours. The latter as a nation have always been travellers and accustomed to sketch, and in all lands a sketcher is at once set down as an Englishman. Thus the people at large as well as the architects naturally seek and note picturesque 'bits,' while the theoretical education of the French leads to the study of elevations and plans in books rather than of the real buildings."

POPE LEO XIII. is a very hard worker, according to the Italie, and has so fatigued his secretary, Mgr. Bocali, that he has been obliged to take an assistant. His Holiness dictates sometimes for hours at a time, walking up and down the room, and even during his meals he likes a secretary to read aloud to him his private correspondence. The Pope also cares little for eating, at dinner he only takes one kind of meat, and his supper consists of one or two new-laid eggs. His solitary pleasure of the table used to be a certain wine called asprino, which he always drank at Perugia, and which he now to his great regret cannot obtain at the Vatican. Asprino is made from grapes cultivated on the mountain, and gathered before they are ripe, and His Holiness declares that it materially aided digestion. Leo XIII. loves solitude, and unlike Pius IX., who surrounded himself with Cardinals when he gave audiences, has only invited the Cardinals to form his Court on one occasion, when he received the Spanish pilgrims. Nor is the Pope over-gracious to his former friends, for after his accession, when his various acquaintances appeared at the Vatican in hopes of obtaining some favour or preferment, they were politely informed that he had nothing to give them.

SOME CURIOUS ARCHÆOLOGICAL DISCOVERIES, we learn from an interesting paper read before the Devonshire Association for the Advancement of Science, Literature, and Art by Mr. Edward Parfitt, and now published, have been recently made at Exeter during the excavation of some cellars for a firm of Exeter wine-merchants. These cellars were excavated under a courtyard and house attached to the Cathedral, and abutting on the ancient wall of the Close built in 1295. The first discovery was a Gothic doorway in excellent preservation, apparently a postern gate, and opening into a passage, which it is supposed led to the Cathedral. Beyond this gate were found eighteen human skeletons, heaped in all sorts of positions, and presumably Roman, from the quantity of Roman and Greek coins and pottery unearthed close by. As the Cathedral Close was used as a graveyard for 900 years it is supposed that these bodies occupied a burial ground, and the manner in which they were placed in the ground points to a period anterior to the time and mode of Christian sepulture. The earliest Roman coin found during the excavations bears the bust of Trajan, of the date A.D. 98—117, and the earliest Greek coin that of Septimius Severus, date A.D. 193—211, thus coinciding with the Roman occupation of Britain. The West of England, by the way, has been specially fertile in antiquarian treasures of late, for the excavations at Mudgeley, a hamlet near Wedmore in Somerset, which have been going on for some time under the direction of the son of the Bishop of Bath and Wells, have resulted in the discovery of the remains of an old building, declared to be the palace of our West Saxon Kings, and the scene of the festival of 1,000 years ago, when peace was signed with the Danes. The Palace is situated in a field called the Court Garden, and considered as the site of King Alfred's Palace by long tradition.

LEGAL

THE CHARGE AGAINST LADY GOOCH.——On Monday, at the Central Criminal Court, the Recorder, in charging the Grand Jury, explained that in order to prove "conspiracy" it was necessary that it should be established that all the parties should be acquainted with the criminal object that was intended to be carried out. He could not see that there was any evidence to support the charge of conspiracy against the second defendant. All she appeared to have done was to have made the false statement which Lady Gooch told her to make. The mere telling of a lie was not sufficient to make her responsible, and it therefore appeared to him that the charge of conspiracy would entirely fail. The Grand Jury appear to have taken this view of the the case, for on Tuesday they returned "No True Bill." The Morning Advertiser, on Wednesday, commented severely on the conduct of Sir Francis in preferring the charge, and in the course of the article made the curious statement that there was nothing criminal in what Lady Gooch had done.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——The irrepressible Mrs. Weldon appeared again at Bow Street on Saturday, and stated to Mr. Vaughan that she had unwittingly rendered herself liable to twelve months' imprisonment by receiving into her house an escaped Chancery lunatic. Her object was to get the help of the press so that she might defy the Commissioners. Mr. Vaughan, however, declined to allow the time of the Court to be used for such a purpose, and the lady retired with the remark that she had perhaps better "try Mr. Flowers."—A Liverpool policeman, who was the other day summoned for non-payment of rates, urged that he ought not to be rated so heavily as other people, as in consequence of his occupation he was not allowed a vote. The magistrate declined to enter into the question thus raised, but ordered the rate to be paid.—Three Westminster milk-dealers have been fined for adulteration by Mr. Woolrych, who very sensibly declined to entertain the plea that the article was not sold "to the prejudice of the customer." His interpretation of the act coincides with that of Mr. Justice Lush and the majority of the metropolitan magistrates, though other London magistrates and a Scotch Court have taken the opposite view. Some amendment of the law is necessary to do away with the continuance of this absurd division of legal opinion, which practically makes that an offence in one street which is not so in the next.—Some extraordinary revelations have just been made in the Dublin Rolls Court. It seems that about three years ago a Mr. Vincent died intestate, leaving a widow and seven daughters. His fortune of 30,000*l*. consisted of freehold property and shares in various insurance companies, and letters of administration were granted to Mrs. Vincent, limiting her power to the receipt of dividends. She, however, mortgaged the shares and some of the freehold property, and after spending the proceeds became insolvent in March last, and a writ has now been issued on behalf of the children, charging her with breach of trust. The Master of the Rolls said that he never heard such a career in the whole course of his life; the wildest thing that fiction ever portrayed was nothing to it. "It was deplorable that a splendid fortune which a man had accumulated in the course of a long life should thus be scattered to the winds. Full statements of the accounts must be filed, and every one of the securities must be traced."—The judge of the Brighton County Court has decided that, in the absence of express stipulation at the time of engagement, a cook cannot be compelled to attend family prayers.—The alleged wife of Peace, the burglar, is still under remand. She states that her marriage certificate has been burnt,

SKETCHES FROM SOUTH AFRICA—BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST and unless she can prove that she is really his wife the plea set up on her behalf must of course fail.—A dreadful murder has been committed near Sandwich, in Kent, the victim being a young farmer named Gillow, who had recently introduced steam-ploughing upon his land. The engine had been more than once tampered with by some malcontent labourers, and on Wednesday night, last week, Mr. Gillow had gone out to watch for the miteners, who are supposed to have set upon and murdered him. His body was found next morning covered with wounds and blood, and the coroner's inquest resulted in a verdict of wilful murder against some unknown persons. A man named Gambrell, employed upon the farm, was subsequently arrested, and while in custody made a desperate attempt to commit suicide by cutting his throat, and tearing open the wound after it had been stopped up. He now lies in a critical condition, closely watched, and some days must elapse before he can be brought before a magistrate.—A man named Trittner is in custody at Mile End for attempting to murder his wife, whom he attacked with a chopper, inflicting no fewer than seventeen wounds. He had been previously summoned for assaulting her, but the hearing was adjourned in the hope that the quarrel might be amicably settled.—On Friday last, a prisoner was killed while attempting to escape from Lewes Gaol. He had broken through the ceiling of his cell, and endeavoured to descend from the roof, a distance of 55 feet, by means of a rope of plaited "sennel," 31 feet in length. Much surprise was expressed by some of the jurymen that the prisoners should be allowed to have such a quantity of material in their cells, but the coroner stopped the questioning on the subject as irrelevant, though, he said, it would not have been so had the deceased used the means to commit suicide instead of to escape. One of the jury, however, persisted for some time in his endeavour to get a rider attached to the verdict, recommending the Home Secretary to alter the prison rules, but he was ultimately overruled, and the return made was simply "Accidental Death."—Sentence of twenty years' penal servitude has been passed on the man Wyness for shooting at Mr. Jefferies. He pleaded drunkenness, denied having any murderous intention, and said that the prosecutor's wife was always following him about, but this statement was denied by Mrs. Jefferies, who said that, so far from giving him any encouragement, she had entertained a perfect horror of him ever since the death of her first husband, for shooting whom the prisoner was tried and acquitted about two years ago.

Government acted only on the dictates of common prudence in taking the precautions to which effect is now being given. There is some reason to hope that the brief Session will have an excellent effect on the progress of events in the East. A narrow majority might have misled the Russians by allowing them to fancy that a change would pass over the national temper. They can have no doubt now that Great Britain will pursue the policy on which she has entered with as much resolution as has ever been displayed in a great crisis.

MEAT-SELLERS AND MEAT-BUYERS.——"The price of meat," like the difficulty of getting good servants, is one of those perennial topics which are almost always "on tap" in the domestic circles of the middle classes, and are often also gravely discussed in the newspapers. As in all such cases, there is a great deal to be said on both sides. What with customers who demand long credits, and often fail to pay altogether; what with muggy weather which, even in these days of cheap ice, is still a formidable foe to the dealer; and lastly, what with dishonest assistants who too often, judging from some recent criminal reports, dispose of their masters' joints on their own account, the butcher is probably by no means always such a happy and prosperous being as the customer is wont to depict him. But the other day we came across some statistics issued by the authorities of the Metropolitan Cattle Market, showing the prices realised by beasts at the Christmas Markets since 1841, and these figures certainly indicate that, from some cause or another, there is a far wider margin now than there used to be between the wholesale and the retail price of beef. In 1841 the price (per 8 stone, sinking the offal) varied from 3*s.* 8*d.* to 5*s.* In 1851 and 1852 it reached its lowest point, 2*s.* 8*d.* to 4*s.* 2*d.* (perhaps those were very mild Christmases). In 1859 5*s.* 6*d.* is still the top price, nor is 6*s.* reached till 1869. 1873 is the dearest year recorded. Perhaps the beasts were all of prime quality, for the figures only vary from 5*s.* 6*d.* to 6*s.* 8*d.* Since then, between 1874 and 1878, the lowest price has been 4*s.* 6*d.*, while the top-rates have oscillated between 6*s.* and 6*s.* 10*d.*, which latter, in 1874, is the maximum price reached. Now, judging from this table alone, which we should suppose is a fair index of the movements of the wholesale meat trade, there seems but small warrant for the very large advance of retail prices which has occurred since 1841, and we should like to see some explanation of the phenomenon.

WHO IS TO PAY?——The Government have not added to their popularity by the manner in which they have dealt with the question as to the payment of the Afghan War. They have undertaken that some portion of the burden shall be borne by England, but they apparently did so unwillingly, and the terms of their resolution seemed to imply that the whole was to be fastened on India. The expression of opinion from all sides of the House was so strong that it is to be hoped the Ministry will now altogether change their original plan. It is true that England can ill afford increased expenditure, and it will not be pleasant for the Cabinet to face the ill-will of the taxpayer. But the duty of the nation appears to be quite clear. It is surprising that an attempt should have been made to describe the war as a matter concerning India alone. We always understood that the main contention of the Government was that it did not merely relate to India, but was an episode in an Imperial policy. Of course if we go far enough back, everything we do in the East has a relation to our great dependency; but then we are not, it must be remembered, acting solely in the interests of the native population; we are also striving for the maintenance of the national greatness. It so happens that India is at this time rather better off than usual; but if she were much less poor than she is, the principle would remain the same. Besides, the improvement in her finances is slight and accidental; fresh taxation would press heavily on the humblest classes, and tend to excite a doubt in their minds whether, after all, it was so great a benefit to secure the North-West frontier. Of course it is not suggested that India should make a profit out of the war. All the expenses she would have to meet under ordinary circumstances she should meet still; but every rupee that goes beyond these ought to come from England.

EXPRESS LETTER SERVICE.——It seems to us that the Huddersfield Chamber of Commerce are like the Dutch in Canning's famous rhyming despatch. They are "asking too much" when they propose that upon the arrival of a letter bearing "a threepenny express stamp" at any town or village, it shall be immediately despatched by special messenger to the addressee. In large towns, where deliveries are frequent and houses are close together, the system is already practically at work for the sum of one penny; but when we remember the scattered character of rural populations, it is really too much to ask that, for a fee of twopence extra, every village postmaster should keep a messenger handy to tramp off a distance of several miles. Far more practical than this would be, as a correspondent suggests, to lower the shilling telegram to sixpence. Not that we feel particularly in favour of this reduction. The classes who chiefly use telegrams can well afford to pay the shilling, and twenty words, with the addresses taken gratis, is a very liberal allowance. Such so-called reforms as these are very apt to ease the pockets of a well-to-do class at the expense of the public.

NATIONAL DISTRESS.——There is no doubt that we are in the midst of a time of national distress such as this generation has hardly seen. In London it is not felt so much as in the provinces; but from all the great centres of manufacture we hear the same story—trade almost at a standstill, capitalists withdrawing from business, workmen thrown out of employment. It is a somewhat novel feature of the crisis that the sufferers seem to look more than has ever before been done to the authorities for help. In Edinburgh, for instance, a number of workmen seem to have demanded, and to have obtained, work as a kind of undefined right; and elsewhere the same spirit is daily manifested. The temptation to give way to such demands is very great, but we question whether it ought not to be resisted. Let any class of the community fall into the habit of trusting to the Government or to the local magistrates, and not only must the spirit of independence be undermined, but we shall sow the seeds of serious future trouble. Socialism is a dangerous power in Germany and other countries mainly because there is a popular notion that the Government can do anything, and that it does not make everybody rich simply because it will not. On the other hand, it is to be hoped that private charity will do all that can be done to relieve the sufferers. At the present season vast sums of money are spent in gifts. Might not ths expenditure be limited, and the amount saved devoted to the poor? The sympathies of children are quick and generous, and it would not be from them that any objection to this plan would come.

CALIFORNIAN TESTIMONIAL TO LORD BEACONSFIELD

THIS casket has been subscribed for by a number of British residents in California, and contains an address expressive of their high appreciation of "the brilliant statesmanship which the Earl of Beaconsfield evinced during the late European crisis, and the interest and pride with which they have watched the successive triumphs which his genius has won for their beloved country." It was brought over to this country by Mr. W. G. Harrison, who, accompanied by several members of Parliament on Saturday last, went to Downing Street for the purpose of making the presentation to the Premier. The receipt of the sad news of the death of Princess Alice had, however, reached his lordship that morning, and he therefore wrote a letter asking the deputation on that account to defer their meeting, a request which was of course readily complied with, several of the deputation expressing their deep sympathy with Her Majesty in her bereavement. The deputation again attended at Downing Street, by appointment, on Thursday, when the presentation was made, and Lord Beaconsfield expressed his thanks in a gracefully worded speech. The casket, which is the work of Messrs. Anderson and Randolph, of San Francisco, is made entirely of Californian materials. The body is of silver, and the ornamentation of gold and polished gold quartz. One side bears the Royal arms in mosaic relief, and the other presents a view of the harbour of San Francisco, while at one end is represented in relief an English soldier and a Goorkha, and at the other a British sailor and a Sepoy, with the mottoes "Defence, not Defiance," and "Ready, Aye, Ready." On the lid are the arms and supporters of Lord Beaconsfield, done in gold, with mosaic panels, composed of cut and polished plates of gold and silver ores, and stones found on the Pacific coast. The address which the casket contains was engrossed and illuminated in London, the Californians not being very skilful in those arts, and the the whole is enclosed in a handsome case of Californian maple.

CHRISTMAS IN BARRACKS

"MERRY CHRISTMAS" has once more come round to us, and everywhere in Great and Greater Britain the good old English fare, Roast Beef and Plum Pudding, is placed upon the board. In all circles of society, in mansion, cottage, palace, and poor house, the season is one of feasting and rejoicing, and in barracks it is certainly not less so than elsewhere. Your soldier can never be an ascetic. The regularity of his ordinary regimen, and his constant physical exercise generate a buoyancy of spirits which make him ever ready to take part in frolic and festivity, and it is doubtful whether any other class of persons (young children, of course, excepted) so thoroughly appreciate the enjoyments of Christmas as do our brave defenders in the Army and Navy. Our sketch needs little explanation. The scene is a barrack room, the uncut pudding is smoking on the board, and

SERVANTS OF THE WRONG SORT

The alleged misconduct of servants forms a frequent staple of conversation among their mistresses, and there can be little doubt that thoroughly good servants are more difficult to obtain than they were a generation or two ago. Some of the reasons for this dearth of capable servants are not difficult to discover. Discipline, whether as between parents and children, or as between employers and employed, is less sternly enforced than it used to be, and hence revolt, or at all events disobedience, has become more frequent. But the chief reason for the change is that servants are far less at the mercy of their employers than they were in the old days. Then locomotion was difficult and costly, and there were few other openings for female employment, so that if a girl left her mistress without a character she ran considerable risk of having to choose between starvation and the workhouse. Nowadays, there are all kinds of employments for which women are fitted, and which act as formidable rivals to domestic service; it is easy and cheap to travel from one part of the country to another; and the colonies are never overstocked with domestic female servants, but are, on the contrary, glad to bring them out free of expense. If masters and mistresses were to ponder over these inevitable changes, and were to alter their behaviour accordingly, there would be fewer servants of the type depicted by our artist, which at the same time it would be unfair to regard as fair average specimens of the modern British handmaiden. Bad people always make more noise in the world than good people, and while we hear of the troublesome and inefficient hundreds, little is said of the unobtrusive thousands who, although with many short-comings, are really trying to do their duty towards those who feed and pay them.—Our sketches are self-explanatory.

IN THE ARENA

This is an allegorical picture which we shall leave our readers to interpret for themselves according to their political predilections. The leading dramatis personæ—England, the Lion; India, the Tiger; and Russia, the Bear—are obvious to every one. Whether the prostrate animal in the foreground represents the Ameer, we are not so sure; for that potentate, at the present stage of the war, can scarcely be regarded as prostrate. The jackals or foxes by whom the Bear is surrounded may be generally typical of Panslavism, or may represent the small nations which are likely to follow the lead of the Czar.

THE T'KINT-FORTAMPS TRIAL IN BELGIUM

This trial, which for a whole month has absorbed public attention in Brussels, will always be reckoned amongst the most gigantic and extraordinary cases of fraud ever perpetrated. Twenty years ago a clever youth, T'Kint de Roodenbecke, was engaged as a supernumerary clerk in the Bank of Belgium. His extreme cleverness and good address quickly made him a general favourite with his employers, and he was ultimately entrusted, at a yearly salary of 160*l.*, with the care of the securities deposited in the bank for safety by its customers. Although not actually entrusted with the key of the safe, he was able to obtain whatever securities he wished by asking the secretary for them, and was trusted to the fullest extent, as he was the especial friend of the Governor of the Bank, M. Fortamps, who, indeed, appears usually to have conveyed all his orders to the officials through T'Kint, so that at last T'Kint's commands were looked upon as obligatory as those of the Governor. In the mean time T'Kint was abstracting securities of large value, and gambling with them to an enormous extent on the Bourse, while he lived in the most extravagant style, keeping a town and country house, a splendid picture gallery, a box at the Monnaie, a racing stable, and all the extravagances of a profligate man about town. Although some wonder appears to have been excited that a clerk on 160*l.* a year should be able to do all this, it was accounted for by the fact that he was said to possess private property, M. Fortamps even stating him to be worth 160,000*l.*

One day, however, M. Bischoffheim, the well-known financier, noticed that certain securities which he had withdrawn from the bank did not bear the same numbers as those which he had deposited, and complained accordingly, but was met by T'Kint with the bold assurance that he had confounded that gentleman's securities with his own, and the excuse was duly accepted. A short time afterwards there was a general examination into all the securities by one of the directors, who, however, was successfully hoodwinked by T'Kint, and gave a certificate that all the securities, save five, were in proper order.

From that time, however, ugly suspicions began to be whispered about, notwithstanding that M. Fortamps still reposed entire trust in his favourite, who accordingly pillaged the bank more ruthlessly than ever. At last, however, an official investigation was ordered into the whole question, and T'Kint fled to Paris, writing a most penitent letter to the manager, confessing fraud, but stating that he had gone to Paris to find means of restitution. He then went to London, thence to Liverpool, where he embarked for the United States, being arrested, however, at Queenstown in March, 1876. Two years and a-half have been occupied in an investigation into the case, and on the 4th ult. T'Kint was brought to trial, M. Fortamps being placed by his side, not accused of complicity, it is true, but of having permitted illegal returns of the shares to be issued.

The trial lasted a whole month, during which it transpired that T'Kint had defrauded the bank of 800,000*l.*, and had utilised the greater part of this money in transacting business with no fewer than twenty-five brokers, one of whom had bought and sold securities for him in five years for nearly two millions sterling, and another to the extent of 400,000*l.*—the commission of one of these gentlemen amounting to 80,000*l.* The trial excited the most intense interest, and the Court was crowded each day. In the end no fewer than 594 questions were put to the jury, who found T'Kint guilty of 149 charges of fraud, and for these he was sentenced to fifteen years' solitary imprisonment. M. Fortamps was also found guilty, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of 240*l.*

Note.——In our issue of Nov. 16th, we gave the fac-simile of a document signed by the British Prisoners at Cabul, 11th March, 1842. One of these signatures is interpreted in the explanatory letter-press as that of "J. Waller, probably the eldest child of Lieut. Waller" (another of the captives). This is an error. The signature in question is that of Mr. T. J. Fallon, who is still living, and who at that time was attached to the Commissariat of Shah Shooja's Force, and was afterwards Deputy Commissioner in British Burmah. Mr. Fallon also informs us that Mrs. Mainwaring, another of the prisoners, was the wife of Captain Mainwaring, who, fortunately for himself, was at the time with General Sale's force at Jellalabad.

PARLIAMENT

The House of Commons assembled on Monday inspired with fresh vigour. It had sorely languished throughout the previous week, when the debate on Mr. Whitbread's amendment to the Address dragged its slow length along. The arguments were familiar, the illustrations stale, and the conclusion foregone. The House can withstand monotony and a long debate if the issue of the division be in any measure doubtful. But the case is different when the thing is settled beforehand, and the estimated majority can differ only in a matter of ten per cent. Begun on a Monday, a debate of of this class grows exceedingly stale by Thursday. Last week we had, hour after hour and night after night, speeches from one to three hours in length, the subject India, and the orators for the most part possessing just the measure of attraction which pertains to authority on India. On Monday all this was changed. There was a reasonable anticipation of an exciting row—a prospect which has an irresistible attraction for hon. members. On the previous Friday Sir Stafford Northcote, in his innocent manner, had cast a bombshell on the floor of the House, and on this Monday night it was expected to explode. He had given notice of his intention to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply in order to consider a vote in aid of the sufferers in the Rhodope district. The Opposition was at first alarmed, and then elated; the Ministerialists commenced by being dumbfoundered, and finished by being rebellious. There was to be a general attack from the Opposition, whilst at the same time anarchy was to reign in the Conservative camp, and, attacked in rear and front, Her Majesty's Ministers were expected to see their long triumph varied by an ignominious defeat.

But before this business could be approached a solemn duty was to be performed. The Princess Alice was dead, and the House of Commons, in this case the unquestioned exponent of the national sentiment, was in profound mourning. Many of the Ministers, notably Lord Barrington, indicated their grief by wearing actual mourning. Plain Sir Stafford Northcote did not follow the example of his courtier-colleague; but that he was profoundly troubled by the calamity that had bereaved the Queen was unquestionable. Being really sincere, his words, simple and appropriate, went straight to the heart of the crowded House, and a low murmur of sympathy marked the cadence of his sentences. According to the graceful custom of English politics, the leader of the Opposition seconded the Address of Condolence, and was not less felicitous in his speech and manner than the Chancellor of the Exchequer. A contrast to this method of dealing with the subject was supplied on the following night in the House of Lords. Their Lordships had adjourned from the previous Tuesday, when they settled off-hand the question of the Afghan policy, and met again on Tuesday for the purpose of formally adjourning. Here Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Granville performed the task elsewhere accomplished by Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Hartington. It would not be kind to say that the Premier rather overdid his part, whether in the densely funereal garb in which he presented himself, in his elaborately mournful manner, or in the high strain of his allusions to the dead lady and the august family that mourned her. However that be, it may be recorded, as a personal impression, that Lord Beaconsfield's oration had not about it the ring of unaffected and manly sympathy, which Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Hartington and, in less degree, Earl Granville succeeded in imparting to their speeches.

When the duty of condolence was over in the House of Commons the whole bearing of the place changed. Heads which had been bared whilst in the presence of Death were now covered. Shoulders were squared, and with fierce delight the House plunged into the fray. The signal for battle was not long in coming. Rising again as soon as the Address had been agreed to, Sir Stafford Northcote, in changed tone and manner, alluded to the business of the evening, and announced that since the proposed grant in aid of the Rhodope sufferers had not been received with special favour it was not intended to proceed further with it. Here was a disappointment for Her Majesty's Opposition. It was like passing a tempting bone across the jaws of a hungry dog, and then replacing it under lock and key. So near the opportunity had been and now so far. But hon. members were determined not to be altogether disappointed, and Lord Hartington, with quite unaccustomed promptness, led the way in an attack upon the Ministerial columns, now in full retreat. If the original proposal had been extraordinary the present announcement was, Lord Hartington said, amid loud Opposition cheers, "still more extraordinary." The House could not tell where it was or where it might be, and his lordship thought it would be desirable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should at least say whether the proposal was definitely abandoned or only temporarily withdrawn. To the Leader of the Opposition succeeded Mr. Anderson and Mr. Serjeant Simon, and then came Sir William Harcourt, seizing an opportunity, of late years rare in its occurrence, of chaffing a strong Ministry and an overwhelming majority. Sir William is seen at his best on an occasion like this. Nothing could be better than his barbed jokes and light raillery. The Opposition roared with laughter, whilst the Ministerialists sat silent and sullen, Sir Stafford Northcote literally bowing his head before the storm of chaff which flew about him.

Member succeeded member from the Opposition benches, till at length, in reply to a taunt at the unusual silence which Ministerialists, ordinarily so apt at speech, now maintained, Sir Robert Peel presented himself. The right. hon. baronet had nothing to say in defence of his friends, and was not able to do more than to suggest that the Opposition were making a little too much of the matter, and that, on the whole, it would be well for the House to proceed to business. This suggestion was received with roars of laughter and ironical cheers, amid which Mr. Gladstone rose. The right hon. gentleman had long resisted the temptation to speak. He had moved several times, and had as often drawn back. But now he could remain dumb no longer, and taking a serious view of the subject he pointed out how the Government were imperilling the credit of the country by thus lightly undertaking a work of charity, and then precipitately withdrawing. The episode was brought to a conclusion by the Chancellor of the Exchequer giving a formal pledge that nothing more should be heard of the proposal, and the subject dropped, the Liberals having spent the pleasantest hour they have enjoyed since they first sat on the left hand of the Speaker.

After this the real business commenced, and as might have been expected proved far less attractive than the sport. Mr. Stanhope moved a resolution the effect of which would be to charge the cost of the Afghan War upon India. Mr. Fawcett moved an amendment condemning this as unjust, and on these lines there ensued a debate which lasted up to midnight. It had been expected that the House would adjourn on Monday, but this intention was frustrated by a familiar Parliamentary phenomenon. In view of the debate of last week many members had prepared speeches for the delivery of which no opportunity presented itself. This new motion on a cognate subject gave the off-chance, and so the speaker (at least) was fain to sit and listen by the hour to speeches from Anglo-Indians like Mr. Smollett, Sir George Campbell, and Sir George Balfour. But all things have an end, and the great Indian Debates of the memorable Winter Session of 1878 closed half-an-hour after midnight on Tuesday, and the House adjourned till the 13th of February.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——The Council of India have voted by a majority of one for an increase in the native army of India; and a Parliamentary paper, issued on Saturday, contains the "opinions" of five of the members in explanation of their votes in its favour. Sir Erskine Perry argues that the war is inexpedient, and that it is unjust that any part of its cost should be thrown on the revenues of a poor country like India; but he has voted in the affirmative because he sees that no time should be lost in providing for a necessity growing out of actual war. Sir Barrow Ellis says that the war is the outcome of events in Europe, and trusts that its locale will not be made the excuse for placing a new burden upon India; Sir R. Montgomery says the war is for Imperial purposes beyond the boundaries of India, and any permanent addition to the civil, military, political, or administrative charges of India, arising out of it, ought to be shared by the Imperial Government; Mr. R. A. Dalyell considers the war in some respects Imperial, and thinks it only just that a considerable portion of the burden should be transferred to the finances of Great Britain; and Sir W. Muir holds that, now the war has commenced, there should be no hesitation in supporting the Indian Government in all measures for its successful prosecution; but the British nation is, he thinks, responsible for its cost.—Mr. Gladstone is to receive a birthday present on the 29th inst., in the shape of a solid silver axe, subscribed for by a number of his political admirers.—The Liberals of Manchester have sent a requisition to Mr. Gladstone, asking him to become a candidate for that borough. He has, however, consented to contest the county of Edinburgh, and it has been suggested that, as a tribute of respect and honour, he should be elected by a number of constituencies, and that it should be left to himself to choose for which he should take his seat in the new Parliament.—The Irish Home Rule Party are more disunited than ever. Lord Robert Montagu, M.P., has withdrawn from the Home Rule League, on the ground that the course taken by the party in Parliament during the last three Sessions has been injurious to the movement.—The Liberals have secured a victory at Bristol by the return of Mr. Fry, who polled 9,342 against Sir Ivor Guest's 7,795, while in the little borough of New Ross the Conservatives have triumphed, Colonel Tottenham being returned by 96 votes against 90 secured by Mr. Delany, the Home Rule candidate. After the poll closed on Tuesday, there was serious rioting and fighting in the streets; the Riot Act was read, and the police, charging the mob with fixed bayonets, wounded several persons. Stones and sticks were freely used, and one constable had his skull badly fractured.

Miscellaneous.——The death of the Princess Alice, particulars of which are given in another column, has spread an universal gloom over the country, and expressions of sincere sympathy and condolence have been sent to the Queen from the local authorities and residents of most of the chief cities and towns throughout the kingdom. On Sunday last the mournful event was alluded to in touching language by many preachers, both Church of England and Nonconformist, in London and the provinces; and on Wednesday, the day of the funeral, there was every indication of general mourning. Shops were half-closed, blinds drawn at private houses, and muffled peals rung on the church bells. In St. James's Park, and at the various garrison towns, minute guns were fired, as also from the ships of the Fleet at the various naval stations, while at all ports the shipping displayed flags at half-mast.—The electric light is now in use on the Thames Embankment and the Holborn Viaduct, the Jablochkoff candle being employed at both places. The experiment is a decided success as far as illuminating power is concerned, but the question of its cost as compared with gas has yet to be determined.—During the early part of the week a sharp and continuous frost prevailed, the weather being especially severe in Scotland and the North of England. Skaters and sliders have been actively engaged in London and elsewhere, and in Scotland the favourite national pastime of curling has been indulged in. Thousands of people have daily congregated on the waters in the Parks of London, and many unlucky wights have come to grief in consequence of the ice giving way. On Wednesday, in London, the weather began to break, and the ice was so wet that it required constant sweeping to preserve a good surface, and on Thursday a decided thaw set in. The Royal Humane Society have done good service, and it is rather surprising, considering the valuable nature of their work, that, on Saturday, when the parks were thronged, the total collection made by twelve of their men, who were supplied with boxes, amounted only to twopence-halfpenny. Whether this is to be attributed to the existing commercial depression we cannot say. One or two severe falls are reported, resulting in fractured limbs.—Another serious landslip has occurred at Devonport, by which the construction of the new dock will be greatly delayed, and its cost much increased. A mass of stone, 250 ft. long, 12 ft. wide, and 30 ft. deep, has shifted, carrying with it many thousand pounds' worth of stock, whilst another fissure has opened in the main road of the dock-yard 30 ft. distant from the excavation. The water mains were carried away, and many hundred tons of water flowed into the works.—On Tuesday, the President of the Local Government Board received a deputation of Cheshire landowners, who complained that the working of the salt mines in that district was causing an alarming subsidence of land, in consequence of which roads and bridges have sunk, and several houses have fallen. The President declined to promise any special legislation, but said that the Government had already recognised the peculiarity of the district by sanitary bye-laws, and he could not see why further inquiries should not be made.—Her Majesty's recent built steel corvette Cleopatra on Wednesday got into collision with a Dublin steamer while coming down the Clyde. Both vessels were damaged.—Reports as to the dulness of trade and the distressed condition of the working-classes continue to come from all parts of the country. Relief funds have been established by the local authorities and clergy of various denominations, and food, fuel, and clothing supplied to many thousand sufferers, but the funds collected are scarcely adequate to meet the necessities of the poor, and the evil is daily and hourly increasing. At this season of the year let it not be forgotten that charity is one of the chiefest of Christian virtues.—Sir John Bennett, in a letter to a contemporary, recalls attention to the necessity of continuous footboards on railway carriages, through the absence of which he the other day slipped between the platform and the train at the Temple Station, and but for the prompt assistance of some friends would probably have been killed or fearfully maimed.—Mr. Carlyle, on Saturday, completed his eighty-third year, and the London St. Andrew's Society have sent him a letter of congratulation upon the occasion.—The anniversary of closing the gates of Derry was on Wednesday celebrated as usual by the town apprentices.

THE AFGHAN WAR

THE chief interest of the week has again centred upon General Roberts' column, who advanced with a reconnoitring party, on the 9th inst., to the heights of the Shutar-gardan Pass, which he reached unopposed, only finding some gun-carriages and limber which had been left by the retreating enemy. The road thither appears to have been better than had been expected, and the position less defensible. Having explored the Pass, General Roberts returned to Ali-Khel, and on the 12th broke up his camp and began the return journey to Kuram, where he intends to spend the winter. While on the way he was warned that an attack upon his force was projected by the Mangals, who, however, confined their operations to a descent upon a baggage convoy in the Saperi Pass. The Goorkhas, however, made a brave stand, and, being quickly reinforced by detachments of the 72nd Highlanders and the 23rd Pioneers, drove back the enemy, three Goorkhas being killed, and Captain Goad of the transport and Captain Powell, 5th Goorkhas, and thirteen men wounded. General Roberts has demanded prompt reparation, and, should this be refused, he will take summary vengeance upon the offenders. The other tribes, including the Ghilzais and Jagis, have up to the present time shown themselves extremely friendly, the former even proffering active assistance, and undertaking to keep the road to the Shutar-gardan Pass clear. The wounded are doing well; but the troops are suffering from intense cold—all the more so as, by some strange oversight, they appear to have been unprovided with sufficient clothing. A garrison has been left on the Peiwar Khotal, which is being rapidly put into a complete state of defence. The troops are in high good humour at their success, and are especially pleased with a congratulatory message which Her Majesty has forwarded to them.

The news from the other columns is not less encouraging. General Biddulph has occupied the Khojak Pass without opposition, and the Engineers and Pioneers are busily constructing the necessary roads for the artillery and camels. General Donald Stewart is also at Khojak, which his division will traverse as soon as the roads are ready.

In the Khyber Pass all is quiet, the Afridis are giving no trouble, and the Mirzam Khel tribe, which recently attacked a surveying party has been punished by Colonel Tytler, who has burned their principal fort of Chinari. Colonel Macgregor has taken the Afridis in hand, and is said to be keeping them in order admirably; while General Maude has moved up his division so as to keep all communication open with Dakka, whence General Sir Sam. Browne is now advancing upon Jellalabad. There are now no Afghan troops in Jellalabad, and such has been the effect produced there by the news of General Roberts' victory, that the notables of that town have come into Sir Sam. Browne's camp to offer their submission, and treat for the occupation of the town. General Browne, however, knowing the habitual treachery of the Afghans, will advance with great caution, although he will be exceedingly glad to gain possession of the place, as there he will be able to secure bountiful stores of provisions from the surrounding fertile plains. At present he is unable to obtain anything more than forage and firewood from the natives, and all supplies have to be transported from Peshawur. The health of the troops is not very good, moreover, and the whole of the 14th Sikhs have been sent back to Peshawur owing to the large number of invalids in the regiment.

The whole of the native contingent—excepting a small detachment due from the Rajah Mahum—has now arrived at Lahore, where last week they were reviewed by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjaub, the Maharajah of Cashmere appearing for the first time in the uniform of a British General. On Tuesday they were reviewed by the Viceroy, who made them a speech, addressing each corps separately, and referring in warm terms to their services in 1857, and to their present readiness to assist the Government. He hoped that the Ameer, warned in time, would render any further prosecution of the war unnecessary, but there might be need of severer measures, in which case they would share with the British army its dangers and successes. The Maharajah Scindiah, who was expected at Lahore, was unable to come upon the plea of ill-health. The native contingent numbers altogether 13 guns, 850 cavalry, and 2,700 infantry, armed with Enfield rifles. The contingent will leave for Peshawur to-day (Saturday), and is destined to hold the Cabul River and the Khyber Passes in order to allow the regular troops to advance.

There is no news from the Ameer beyond that it is reported that the troops at Cabul are becoming disaffected. The Viceroy has left Lahore for Calcutta, where he intends to hold an investiture of the Star of India on New Year's Day. Considerable discussion has been excited throughout all India by the news that the expense of the war is to fall upon the Indian Exchequer. Public opinion is divided, but the general opinion is that Great Britain ought to sustain half the cost of the campaign.

WAITING FOR THE ELEPHANTS

THIS sketch depicts some of the difficulties our troops have to encounter in their march forward into Afghanistan. The country is exceedingly rugged throughout, and the best roads consist of mere mountain paths or the beds of dried-up torrents, so that the transport of artillery by simple horse-power is a task of considerable difficulty, and frequently of utter impossibility. In our sketch a desperate effort has been made to get some field guns through a narrow defile, but the attempt has hopelessly failed, and a messenger has been sent to the rear to hasten forward the elephants—those valuable monsters whose traction powers are almost priceless in the present compaign.

WITH THE KÜRAM VALLEY FORCE, THULL

THULL, the head-quarters of the Kuram Valley Force before the advance into Afghanistan, is a small village in Upper Merauzai, the extreme limit of our border towards Cabul. This site was selected as the one for collecting the Kuram Field Force, under the command of General Roberts, C.B., V.C., previous to the advance to Cabul. At the time our sketch was taken the camp consisted of the 5th Punjab Infantry, on the extreme left, then come the 5th Punjab Cavalry, the 29th Bengal Native Infantry, F. A. Royal Horse Artillery—the 12th Bengal Cavalry, and the 5th Ghoorkas subsequently arriving at this place. The River Kuram divides our boundary from that of the Ameer, and the Sangroba Nuddee (stream) is a small river which flows into the Kuram, and on which the village of Thull is situated. The village of Thull consists of mud huts, and has a population of 300 or 400 inhabitants, who are subservient to us. The Thana of Kapyauga, a fort belonging to the Ameer, and situated on the river Kuram, is discernible in the distance.—The sketch, forwarded by an officer of the force, was taken from a small hill immediately in the rear of the village.

THE KURAM VALLEY AND PEIWAR PASS

THIS view up the Kuram Valley is taken from Kafer Khot, a hill some eight miles from Thull, up the left bank of the river from Thull. It is all but opposite to Ghilzei Bunda, the first march up from Thull. There is a flat piece of ground immediately below, along which the road runs. The hills have stunted trees upon them. The right bank is more wooded than the left. The two little hill tops in the far distance are well beyond the others, and looked very barren, no sign of trees. The Sufied Koh, or White Mountain, was, at the time our sketch was taken, black, except at the spur to the left, where there appeared to have been land slips, upon which the sun fell. A little snow was in the ravines. In the middle distance may be seen the Peiwar or Peiwari Pass, the scene of the recent gallant exploits of General Roberts and his force.

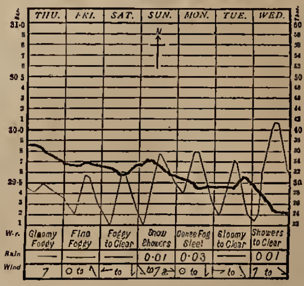
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

DECEMBER 12TH TO DECEMBER 18TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather during this period has been very cold in all parts of the kingdom, the mean temperature being more than 10° below the averages for a large number of years. The cold was very severe in the northern parts of the kingdom on Thursday (12th), Friday (13th), and Saturday (14th), the shade thermometer having sunk as low as 3° at Durham on one occasion. In London the lowest readings (22°) were recorded on Saturday and Sunday mornings (14th and 15th), and on those occasions a thermometer on the grass fully exposed to the sky registered 12°. Since Saturday night, the 14th instant, occasional thaws have been experienced over England, the most decided of which occurred on Wednesday, the 18th instant, when the thermometer rose to 41° in London. Northerly winds have been prevalent generally; but these have latterly become mingled with breezes from the westward. The barometer was highest (29·86 inches) at the beginning of the period; lowest (29·23) at the close of the period; range, 0·63 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (41°) on Wednesday, the 18th instant; lowest (22°) on Saturday and Sunday, the 14th and 15th; range, 19°. Rainfall: Total fall (chiefly snow and sleet), 0·05 inches, in three days; greatest fall in one day, 0·03 inches, on Monday, the 16th instant. On Thursday morning, the 19th instant, the wind had freshened from west, with fine weather.

THE ST. CLEMENT'S DANES' MISSION HOUSE, LAUNDRY, AND SOUP KITCHEN makes a Christmas appeal for funds. This excellent institution provides a public laundry, where the poor can do their own washing at very slight cost, and which is much appreciated, as often fifty applications for admission are refused in a single day; a kitchen where twice a week a quart of soup and a slice of bread at the charge of a penny are served out to those supplied with a subscriber's ticket: a prosperous Penny Bank; and a Mission House in Yeates' Court where, besides religious assistance, broken victuals from several of the Clubs are given away. Donations may be sent to the Treasurer, H. H. Twining, Esq., 216, Strand.

OFFENBACH'S NEW OPERA, Madame Favart, comes out at the Paris Folies-Dramatiques early next week.

"UNCLE TOM'S CABIN" is being played at the Berlin Victoria Theatre by the negro troupe lately in England.

PARISIAN BON-BONS in readiness for the New Year are invariably named after some contemporary celebrity or event. So this year M. Lecocq's latest opera, La Camargo gives its name to the fashionable sweetmeats in their dainty boxes.

A LADIES WALKING CLUB has been formed in New York. The members take train or boat to a short distance from the city and spend a day in the country, walking some six or seven miles. They are all strongly shod and wear short dresses.

CHRISTMAS CRACKERS.——Messrs. Tom Smith and Co., of 69, Wilson Street, Finsbury, have sent us a packet of these commodities, of new and original design. During the holidays we hope to report upon them, and to hear their reports in exchange.

GRAY'S YARD RAGGED CHURCH.——Mr. J. Edmunds, Hon. Sec. of this charity, writes that it has been the custom to give a substantial breakfast on the first Sunday of the year to about 800 destitute men and women, and earnestly appeals to the public for funds to do so again on 5th January, 1879.

SNOW has fallen unusually heavily in Switzerland this season, and so severe a fall as in the last week has not been known for years. Almost an unbroken sheet of snow extends from the Jura to the Alps, traffic is greatly impeded, and the omnibuses in Geneva are running as sledges. Probably the young Switzers will have involuntary holidays from lessons like their little contemporaries on the Bavarian-Bohemian frontier, where last month the snow was so deep on the ground that the children could not get to and fro and the schools had to be closed.

A BRISK TRADE IS STILL DONE IN LOTTERY TICKETS in Paris, more especially in temporary shops in the Avenue de l'Opera. There are large placards announcing from 10,000 to 20,000 for sale. The prices, however, do not vary very much. Thus those of the first series sell for 2 fr. 65 c., the second series 3 fr., third series 2 fr. 70 c., fourth series 3 fr., fifth series 2 fr. 50 c., sixth series 2 fr. 45 c., seventh series 1 fr. 55 c., eighth series 1 fr. 45 c., ninth series 1 fr. 40 c., tenth series 1 fr. 30 c., eleventh series 1 fr. 25 c., twelfth series 1 fr. 15 c. A complete collection sells for 24 fr. 50 c. Those series priced at 3 fr. are for some reason or other rare, and consequently command a better figure.

FEMININE INFLUENCE IN ELECTIONS is historical, and a Conservative Gallic mayor, during the late elections, ingeniously utilised the charms of his daughters to overcome the Republican tendencies of guileless provincial voters. He posted the three damsels—fascinating girls of seventeen to twenty—at intervals along a narrow corridor leading to his study where he presided over the voting urn. Each maiden held a packet of white (official) voting-papers, and offered one to the voters as they came by singly, inducing many wavering spirits to vote according to the mayor's sentiments. The young ladies carried the day, and the Conservative candidate won his seat; but the history of his success has just been told in the Versailles Chamber, which coolly invalidated the election.

LONDON MORTALITY decreased last week, and 1,698 deaths were registered against 2,016 during the previous seven days, a decline of 318, being 89 below the average. There were 17 deaths from small-pox (an increase of 13, and a higher number than in any week since August last), 34 from measles (an increase of 6), 46 from scarlet fever (a decline of 16, and 39 below the average), 14 from diphtheria (an increase of 5), 47 from whooping-cough (an increase of 5), 33 from different forms of fever, 11 from diarrhœa, and 501 from diseases of the respiratory organs (exceeding the average by 15), 350 resulted from bronchitis, and 101 from pneumonia. There were 2,397 births registered against 2,576 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 25·8 deg., being 14·8 deg. below the average. The duration of sunshine was 3·6 hours, the sun being 54·9 hours above the horizon.

THE CHILDREN'S HOME (Bonner Road, Victoria Park, E.), held their Christmas Festival on Tuesday evening at Exeter Hall, when a large detachment of the children, 300 strong, executed an admirably selected programme of vocal music with great spirit, and in a manner that reflected much credit on their tuition. Music forms a very important element of the education given in the Home. This Institution is doing a very large and most excellent work. Besides the Central Home, there is a branch at Gravesend, another, with a farm, at Bolton (Lancashire), and another at Hamilton (Ontario, Canada). The Home receives waifs and strays and destitute children of any age and of any sect, or, more often, of no sect. It is conducted on the Family principle, is a religious and essentially industrial institution, and is entirely dependent on voluntary contributions. A training ship in the Thames, it is hoped, will soon also be attached to it. Five hundred children are now in residence, and their appearance and demeanour speaks volumes for the able administration under which they live. A child can be kept in the Home for 16*l.* a year. A visit to this Institution will be welcomed by the Principal, and will be a timely and most interesting pilgrimage at this season.

AN ARTIST'S PROTEST.——Mr. Elihu Vedder, of 68, Capo le Case, Rome, writes to us as follows:—"I have just seen the December 1 number of L'Art, containing reproductions of two of my works at the Exposition Universelle, together with the exceptionally elaborate flagellation accorded them by the critic of that valuable review. Permission to make use of my works was obtained from me through a polite note from that journal requesting me to furnish them a drawing of one of my paintings, which they would be happy to fac-simile and publish in one of their forthcoming numbers. In case I could not send the drawing, they would desire permission to photograph one of my works. I may be excused for accepting this as a compliment, and granting the permission. Judge of my astonishment on finding both my works had been reproduced merely to show (in the words of the journal itself, or what amounts to the same thing) their utter lack of all artistic merit; and, as if this were not enough, the public were warned that, even in looking at the reproductions, all their merit must be attributed to the engraver. I take no exception to the low estimate of my artistic ability on the part of the critic (it would be impossible for me to agree with the critic); but I do protest against this species of trap into which I have inadvertently been drawn, and wish to bring it to the notice of my brothers in art for their future benefit. Whether editor and critic were alone actuated by a sincere regard for the interests of art is not the question. I protest against the methods they have employed."

THE LATE MR. G. H. LEWES

George Henry Lewes, the eminent essayist, historian, and philosopher, was born in London in 1817, and, after receiving his education at Greenwich under Dr. Burney, he was for some time employed as a clerk in a mercantile office. He subsequently studied medicine, which, however, he abandoned for literature, and began to write largely for leading magazines and other periodicals. In 1838 he resided in Germany, studying its language and metaphysics, and the earliest outcome of his more profound studies was his celebrated "Biographical History of Philosophy," published in four volumes in 1845. This was followed, in 1846, by the "Spanish Drama," in 1849 by the "Life of Robespierre," and in 1853 by "Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences." Amongst his more recent writings are the "Life and Works of Goethe," the "Physiology of Common Life," a work on Aristotle, entitled "A Chapter from the History of Science," and his latest work, "Problems of Life and Mind: the Foundations of a Creed." Besides the above-named works, Mr. Lewes was the author of a number of novels and dramatic works, but it is not so much upon these as on his more solid productions that his reputation must rest.

In 1850 Mr. Lewes, in company with some other men of mark, projected and started the Leader newspaper, Mr. Lewes himself being the literary editor until the spring of 1854. In 1865 he again assumed editorial functions, the Fortnightly Review being started under his direction. The duties of this he was, however, obliged to resign in the following year owing to failing health. In social life Mr. Lewes was naturally much sought after, his great intellectual gifts and restless activity of mind making him a most agreeable and profitable companion. Amongst his many friends may be mentioned Carlyle, Grote, Mill, Dickens, Thackeray, Jerrold, Arnott, and Wilson.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Mr. Charles Watkins, 1, Torriano Avenue, Camden Road, N.W.

SKETCHES IN LADÂKH

Visitors to Kashmir who, on leaving the Valley, take a north-easterly direction, after a few marches find themselves in a country the very opposite to that they have just quitted. Ladâkb is desolate in the extreme, and except in the neighbourhood of the villages built near streams, which are few and far between, is almost totally destitute of vegetation, yet it has a good deal to interest travellers. It is the extreme western of the countries professing Bhuddhism, the followers of which constitute so large a proportion of the earth's inhabitants, and whose head, the Grand Lama, remains in such seclusion, and is encircled with so much mystery, at his capital, Lbassa, the home of the Bhuddhists. The Lamas, or priests, form the greater part of the scanty population.

Their Lamaseries are built in the most picturesque and uncomfortable manner on the faces of rocks, it being one of the principles of Bhuddhism that such places should be built as far as possible from the haunts of man. The Lamas, whose chief characteristics are piety and dirt, as they have a rooted objection to washing in any form, are curiously dressed in dark red robes. Service is held in the Lamaseries three times a-day; the Chief Lama of the place sitting at one end of the temple with some half-dozen other of the priests, furnished with long trumpets, conch shells, and other means of making noise, while the remainder squat on the floor in two rows as comfortably as they can. The Chief Lama selects portions of the Bhuddhist Scriptures, which he reads, as a rule, at a great pace, and on getting to the end of a chapter, beats together a pair of cymbals; the remainder then join in, each trying to rival the other as to who can make the most inharmonious sounds. Those without instruments mumble something which answers for responses, and then go to sleep till they are woke up again by the music at the end of the next chapter. The Lamas have a good deal of artistic genius among them, and decorate the walls of their temples with brightly coloured portraits of their numerous saints, and also with scenes showing the different rewards and punishments for human beings in a future state. Sin in this life according to their ideas is met with different amounts of chastisement in the next, and there being twenty-four places of various degrees of discomfort and temperature in wait for those who transgress and are unrepentant, their artists have a wide field for exercising their perception of the horrible. In the temples are generally rows of idols more or less grotesque. At the village of Shé, there is a gigantic one of Sakya Thubba, or the Great Bhuddha, thirty feet in height, sitting in that attitude of complete abstraction which is the aim of every true Bhuddhist. On entering the temple containing the statue, the lower part at first is only visible, it being necessary to ascend a flight of steps in order to see the head and shoulders, which appear above the floor in an upper storey. In many places the Lamas are snowed up great part of the year, the Lamaseries being at a great elevation, that at Gya upwards of 14,000 feet. The largest are those at Hanlé and Hémis. The celebrated prayer cylinders are to be met with everywhere in Ladâkh. In the Lamaseries they are small painted cylinders, turning on vertical axles, and ranged along the walls in rows, inside each there is a roll of paper, some hundred feet long printed many thousand times with the mystic sentence of Thibet—"Aum Mani Padme Aoum." The words are Sanscrit in origin, of which the literal translation is meaningless, and would be, "O!—the jewel—lotus—Amen!" But each syllable is considered mysteriously to act as a charm of unlimited power. There have been few satisfactory conclusions arrived at by the numerous writers who have gone into the subject, as to what this combination of words can have originally meant, to be handed down to the present time with such significance attached to it. The people of the country can offer no explanation as to its origin, so the wheels will continue to revolve, and the charm keep its efficacy, but the mystic sentence will probably remain as such till the end of time. The people of Ladakh carry small cylinders about with them, which revolve by means of a weight attached to a string. This is certainly an easy way of getting over devotional exercises, but in some parts of Ladakh and Lahoul (an adjoining district to the south) large prayer cylinders are attached to water-wheels, and turned like mills, which is a still more excellent system. The mystic sentence is continually before the eye, outside the villages, and along the roadsides are long mounds or walls, covered with flat stones, having the sentence carefully cut on them. The number of these is astonishing, for they are found everywhere by the roadsides, even in the most uninhabited parts. They are cut by the Lamas, and are executed with great finish, the letters being in relief. The people purchase them, and the placing a stone by the wayside is looked on in the light of a votive offering. When a Lama dies there are various ways of disposing of his body,—one by burning, when the ashes are collected and put into curiously-shaped receptacles called chortens, which are found in great clusters round the villages, making them to appear from a distance much larger than they really are. When a Lama of great sanctity dies, his ashes, after being mixed with clay, are moulded into a number of small images, and placed on shelves in a temple. The other ways are by burying and exposing the body to be eaten by birds on the tops of mountains. Leh, the capital, is well known as being the great emporium for trade on the Yarkand road. It is a very picturesque town, being the spot where various trade routes from different points meet, so that the bazàr shows a variety of nationalities in their different costumes, which forms an attractive picture.—We are indebted for the drawings from which our engravings are taken, and for the above description, to Mr. Farquharson, Lieut. Royal Scots.

The Three Professions—Law, Physic, and Divinity—are well supplied with feminine members in the United States. The lady doctors number 530, and feminine dentists 420, while 68 women are preachers, and 5 practise as lawyers. Some American ladies, however, adopt two or three callings at once; and a certain Mrs. Gibbs, living at St. Louis, notifies on her door-plate that she is an "elocutionist, poetess, washer, and ironer."

CHAPTER VIII.

A RECOGNITION

JOHN DYNELEY had not spared Sir Robert's bay mare upon his way to Archester; it was not his way to push a willing horse to the full extent of its powers, but human life was in the balance that night, and he had not spared the spur. He was a heavy man for so speedy a journey, but his weight had this advantage, that it steadied the gallant bay, against whom such a wind was blowing, broadside on, as had never swept Halcombe Moor within the memory of man. The curate, however, paid little heed to the gale; he was recalling to his inward gaze the bright look of approval that had lit up Evy Nicoll's face when he had asked her stepfather for the use of his mare; that would have been reward enough, if he had needed any, for the discomforts of his ride, of which in truth he recked but little. He was a man to whom wind and rain, and heat and cold, were indifferent, a man of thews and sinews, as well as of girth and inches, and with a great heart in his great body. His intelligence was not remarkable, but he had plenty of common sense, which, however inconvenient to a theologian, is to a working clergyman the most valuable of all senses. And yet at this moment he was doing a very foolish thing, for what could be more contrary to common sense than to cherish so tenderly that last look of Evelyn Nicoll, whom he knew to be as good as engaged to another man?

Common report had given her to Sir Robert's nephew, George Gresham, and while she had taken no pains to contradict it, her mother had, by implication, corroborated it. Indeed, it was understood that George was shortly expected at the Hall, for the very purpose of making himself better known to his future bride before the knot should be tied between them.

Still, as Evelyn had never with her own lips confirmed the general opinion, the curate gave himself the benefit (as he fondly imagined it to be) of the doubt, and persuaded himself that he was doing no harm in thus secretly worshipping his idol.

He was far too modest a man to suppose that his passion was returned; he was not half rich enough for her, he knew, nor half good enough for her, he thought—though in that last idea in my judgment he was mistaken—and she was altogether, he confessed, out of his reach. If he did entertain a hope that he should ever win her, it was one of the very vaguest kind; but now and then he could not avoid giving himself up to it. In his saner moments he foresaw that he must be content with honouring and admiring her as the wife of another, and would think himself happy if, under such circumstances, the opportunity might be afforded him of doing her some self-sacrificing service.

Such men there are in this nineteenth century, by contrast with whose natures all that has been recorded of the so-called "Ages of Chivalry" grows pale and dim. One other mistress he had who was not denied to him, Work, and his devotion to her was incessant. Some fools thought less of his labour in the Lord's Vineyard because he went about it as often as not with a short pipe in his mouth; he was labouring in it now (or words have lost their meaning), and though his pipe, by reason of the gale, was an impossibility, his attire was far from what is generally associated with the ecclesiastical calling. He wore a dark pea-jacket, with waistcoat and trousers of the same thick material; and his black cravat was knotted instead of being tied in the orthodox way.

Thus he rode at the bay's best speed along the sandy roads, making occasional short cuts (not free from rabbit holes) across the heathery moor, till the lights of Archester gleamed before him.

Without drawing rein for an instant he galloped down the stony street to the little pier, which he knew on such a night would have its complement of seafaring men, watching their old enemy the storm, and in a few words explained his errand.

"A ship on the Lancet, opposite Halcombe Point, and the lifeboat wanted; ten pounds a head from Sir Robert to each man that pulls an oar in her."

It would doubtless have "looked better in print" had he appealed only to these brave men's sense of duty, and it would have been sufficient, for the mariners of Archester were never backward in risking limb and life for their fellow-creatures; but, on the principle of "surplusage being no error," the curate addressed them as we have described. Moreover, it saved time, and time—a few minutes more or less—was of immense importance to all those upon that cruel reef (which, however, had thus far been the cause of their preservation). Time had become, indeed, the alternative of Eternity with them.

A rush was at once made for the boat-shed, where the cork-jackets and all other things were kept; and in an incredibly short space of time eight men were ready for this perilous enterprise. There are two things which expedite human action above all other motive powers; namely, the opposing elements of Fire and Water. The celerity with which a fire engine is got ready and started is the greatest triumph of human forethought and agility. Next to that is the quickness with which a lifeboat is got under weigh. From the shed at Archester were two "slips," one on either side, so that the boat could be launched to north or south, according to the quarter from which the wind was blowing; the men were in their places, and a score of eager pairs of hands were on her stern and sides ready to run the Swiftsure (contraction of Swift and Sure, I wonder?) off the truck on which she stood, when the coxswain suddenly roared, "Stop!"

There was a man missing: only seven being in the boat beside the coxswain. From the list of the crew hard by (for everything was at hand in that place) he began to read out the names of those absent; "George Parfitt?" "Here," answered a ready voice. "You are not George."

"No; he is ill a-bed, but I am his brother."

"A bold fellow, no doubt; but hardly strong enough for the tight job before us. "Henry Absolon."

"Gone to Mirton," was the reply.

"Hullo, sir, this is quite irregular." This to Dyneley, who had slipped on a cork jacket and sou'wester cap, and jumped into the boat.

"No matter, coxswain, I am as strong as any of you, and can pull as good an oar. There is not a moment to lose, I tell you—push off."

There was a burst of cheering, which, however, in no way impeded the exertions of those who thus indulged their feelings, for at the same moment the boat began rapidly to move down the slope.

"Steady, steady." The moment she touched the sea it seemed to every man that he was under water. Never since the gallant Swiftsure had been built had she put out in the teeth of such a storm, the wind beat almost dead against the land, and strove with frantic screams and fiendish fury (the Prince of the Powers of the air being in command that night in person) to dash the boat back on the rocky shore. "She never, never," shrieked the frantic blast, "shall ride the main this night to rob the hungry waves of their human prey."

Thrice the Swiftsure was cast a score of yards up the strand, then withdrawn like a plaything which a child throws from it only to pursue and clutch again, but the fourth time the oar-blades and the strong arms that use them are plied to such good purpose that she is flung back no more.

"Steady, men, steady," cries the coxswain, for rowing against a moving mountain range renders time more difficult to keep than between Barnes and Putney; "once round the Point the wind will do our work for us."

This was satisfactory so far as it went, but made it clear to every man (if he had not known it before) that the return to Archester against the wind would be a physical impossibility. After performing their perilous mission, should that be practicable, they would have to go on to Mirton Harbour (twenty miles away) if they should reach harbour at all, since to try Halcombe Point would be to go to pieces.

Such things are trifles to the heroes who man our lifeboats, and we ashore think still less of them, but supposing even the case of a country doctor robbed of his night's rest by a summons to a sick bed, and compelled to ride twenty miles in a storm which did not admit of his return, we should call it a hard one; add to this utmost fatigue of body and extreme peril of life, and give the laurel where it is due.

Once round the Point the Swiftsure flew before the wind, as though, instead of being a bare boat, she were a racing cutter. She was following, in fact, the very route of the Rhineland, only the sea had a very different customer to deal with. The waves filled her again and again, but her escape pipes freed her from the deluge as quickly as it was poured in; they threw her on her side, but she made light of that, and even had they thrown her over she would have righted again in half a second—though, unhappily, empty.

Thus hurried along at headlong speed it was no wonder that, in a shorter time than it had taken the mare and her rider to cross the Moor, the one man in the boat to whom the use of his eyes was not denied—for the eight rowers, we may be sure, cast no look behind them—exclaimed, "There she is, boys."

And there she was; half of her—the stern part—now covered by the rising waves, and the other half, now hid, now seen, with a bare mast sticking out of it, covered with human beings, like bees in swarm. The sea was running like a mill race, and the sharp reef beneath it.

"I doubt if we can get nigh her," ejaculated the coxswain.

"There are women on board," observed Number Six, who was the curate.

"Never fear, Master Dyneley, but we'll do what man can do to save 'em," was the reply, not without a certain haughtiness in its tone. The waves and winds could be discounted, as it were, as a source of peril, but whether there was water enough above the rock to float the lifeboat to leeward of the wreck, was an experiment not to be reckoned upon, but only tried. If they shot by her, it was plain they could not put back again in the teeth of such a gale, ere the flowing tide should engulf the last spar of the Rhineland.

"Steady; be ready to ship oars and out with the grappling irons." The next minute they were under her quarter, and had made fast to it.

"The women first," cried the coxswain, in a voice of thunder. There were but three women left, and none of these could move across the rocking deck without men to help them. The first two were carried, rather than led, and lifted into the Swiftsure; the third, Elise, used her own limbs, though stiff and cramped, upheld on either side by the American and Gresham.

All sat where they were placed, without a word, as though astounded (as they well might be) at their own deliverance. The wreck was clear of all save one man, who clung to the mast apparently stupefied.

"Quick, quick," exclaimed half-a-dozen voices. He never moved.

"Are we all to be drowned for one fool?" ejaculated the coxswain, passionately. "Cast off, boys."

"One moment, sirree," cried the clear shrill voice of the American. He leapt back on the wreck, seized the still hesitating man round the waist, and fairly threw him among the rest.

"It's the poor Cap'en, Coxen; he don't like to leave his ship," said he apologetically. "I've felt the same myself—especially when I've had a share in her."

As the boat once more flew before the wind its occupants could see a little group upon the quay of Halcombe, whose joy appeared only second to their own. These persons, of course, knew not how many of the crew had succumbed to the waves, or to the fatigues and privations of the night; they only saw that every soul upon the wreck had been taken off, and were in comparative safety. They were well aware that on their cruel shore no boat could land in such a sea, but to many of the poor shivering creatures on board the Swiftsure it seemed strange enough that they should be turning their backs on these hospitable and friendly people.

Gresham, of course, knew why they didn't land at the Point," and secretly he was not displeased that the attempt could not be made. He recognised female forms upon the quay, and guessed, rightly enough, their identity; and he had good—or at least sufficient—reason to congratulate himself that the Swiftsure was making for Mirton. He was now turning over in his mind whether it would not be better to wait a day or two before presenting himself to his friends at home, and to let it be imagined that he had not taken passage in the ill-fated Rhineland at all.

The accommodation on board lifeboats is in extent considerable, but it is not of a select or private character. Rescued folks settle down where they can, and are seldom found to complain of their quarters. The craft is broad of beam, and there is room for passengers, even in the very centre of it, without interfering with the rowers. Here sat Elise Hurt, exhausted but grateful, with the same loving arms supporting her that had made her hold secure upon the shrouds.

"I owe my life to you," were the first words she murmured in his ear.

"Nay, darling, the Commodore, as he calls himself" (he had once commanded, as it turned out, a certain flotilla of trading vessels to the West Indies) "did his part; it was he, for example, who called my attention to the victualling department—I have still a little brandy left, by the bye."

"Not for me," she said, putting aside the flask; "I feel I shall live now. Is it not strange, George, that wet and cold as I am, in this open boat, and with only a plank between us and death, I am happier than I have ever been?"

"It is not strange," answered the young man tenderly. "It is because you love."

"Ah, yes," she sighed.

"Why do you sigh, darling?"

"Because this may be the last hour in which I may say, 'I love.' Out yonder—with the waves yawning for us, I told you the secrets of my heart; there seemed no harm in it, and it was very sweet to tell them. But now we are no longer two fellow creatures awaiting the same doom; I am again a penniless girl, and you—you are Sir Robert Arden's nephew."

"Well, and what then?" said Gresham, lightly, but there was a look of trouble in his face that accorded ill with his jesting tone.

"I know not what then," she answered. "You know best how it will fare with us. But I have always heard that the rich English are very proud. There will be a great gulf fixed between you, Sir Robert's nephew, and me, the governess of his children."

"They are not his children," replied Gresham; "they are the children of his wife by her first marriage."

"Indeed? Then you are his own kith and kin, and they are not. His very heir, perhaps?"

"Perhaps; though I have never thought of that. When one has a benefactor so kind as he has been, one does not speculate upon his death."

"I hope not, dear. Pray do not be annoyed with me——" for there had been a certain irritation in his tone; "I only wish to look matters in the face. As it seems to me you are bound, above all things, to obey this good uncle's wishes; and especially never to act counter to them. Is it likely, think you, that he will wish you to marry me?".

"My dear Elise, I thought that those who love were given to building dream-castles for love to live in; whereas you build only obstacles to love. It will be time enough to combat opposition when it has arisen. There will, of course, be objections to our union—some even that have not entered into your apprehensions: but we must trust to time and happy chance. My uncle is very peculiar: a man of impulse and sentiment; by no means the hard, conventional man of the world you have probably pictured to yourself. But, no doubt, we must be prudent. It will not be necessary to tell the good folks at Halcombe all that we have said to one another. Nor even need you repeat the conviction you expressed just now that I was the happy means of saving your life last night; it is an exaggeration to start with, and to proclaim such a fact would be very injudicious. People would think that gratitude might cause you to overrate my deserts—do you understand, darling?"

"I do not like concealments," answered Elise gravely. "Besides, to dwell under the same roof with you, and never to be able to speak to you, nor look towards you, as I should wish to speak and look—No, Mr. Gresham; I could not do it."

"What? You call me Mr. Gresham because you have no longer need of my loving service? That is ungenerous, Elise."

"You do not think so,—you can-not think so," answered the girl impetuously; "it gives me ten times the pain to address a cold word to you than it gives you to hear it. But it is better to say 'Farewell' now—cruel as it seems to part—than later on."

"We will never part, Elise; I swear it."

"Hush, hush!" for in his vehemence he had raised his voice, so that if those next to him had not been sunk in their own thoughts they might have heard him, despite the roar of the wind and the rush of the wave. "God has been very good to us; do not call Him to witness to aught that does not lie in the path of duty. I fear,—I fear that your love for me runs counter to it."

"Do not fear, Elise," he answered gravely; "Love and Duty can never be in opposition to one another. Only, as I have said, we must expect obstacles. The course of true love never does run smooth, you know."

Elise was silenced, if not convinced; it was difficult, no doubt, to compel herself to picture mischances, not only to her own happiness, but to that of her preserver.

Presently they came in sight of Mirton, a picturesque village, built in zig-zag up steep cliffs; but with a good harbour and breakwater. Once within shelter of the latter the mountain waves lost their crests, the gale thundered harmless above their heads. With a few more strokes of the oar they reached the side of the little jetty where a few men were gathered together in the grey dawn.

Gresham and the Commodore assisted Elise to land, and were escorting her up the winding street to the little inn, when they were overtaken by one of the crew, who seemed about to address them.

"I will see you in five minutes, my good fellow," said Gresham. "For the brave work you and your mates have the night, no reward can be sufficient, but—— What! Dyneley?"

"Yes, it is I," answered the curate, removing his sou'-wester. "I could scarcely believe my eyes when I saw you step into the boat; and when I felt sure of your identity I had no breath for even a word of recognition."

Then Gresham remembered that the features of this man had seemed somewhat familiar to him; he had had other things to think about, or else there had been plenty of opportunities of observing him, for he had sat cheek-by-jowl with "Number Six" for the last two hours.

CHAPTER IX.

MR. WALCOT VENTURES A SUGGESTION

So unexpected was the presence of the Rev. John Dyneley that for the moment Gresham forgot the strangeness of his guise, and even the obligation which he owed to him in common with the rest of the gallant crew of the Swiftsure; the thought that was monopolising his mind was, "Does he guess the relation between Elise and myself?"

He had said he could scarce believe his eyes when he saw Gresham, and, knowing what he knew as respected Evelyn, it would have been even more difficult, if he had overheard his talk in the life-boat, to believe his ears.

There had been something in the Curate's tone which had struck him he addressed as smacking of reproof as well as astonishment, but that might have been but the sting of conscience. Whether he knew all, or not, however, any lingering idea Gresham might have entertained of ignoring under his uncle's roof all previous acquaintance with Elise, even if he could have persuaded her to join in such deception, was now become out of the question. There was nothing left for him but to assume a bold front.

"This is Miss Elise Hurt, Dyneley; the young lady Lady Arden was expecting from Germany, and who, I am thankful to say, will reach her journey's end after all; thanks to you and the rest.—Miss Hurt, I demand an amount of confidence in me that almost reaches to credulity, when I ask you to believe that this gentleman in a dustman's hat and a cork jacket is a British divine."

Elise held out her little hand with a quick flush. "How brave you are, sir! how good you have been to us," said she simply. "I shall think more highly than ever of God's ministers since you are one of them."

"I am glad to have been of use," said the Curate, blushing too; for he could not bear anybody's praise. "But as for my own share in last night's work, I had no choice in the matter; for the crew could not be made up without me."

"Ah," exclaimed the Commodore; "that's what looks well in a man. One always likes a fellow who sits down at euchre merely to oblige. I've noticed they're generally good players, those. And you pull a good oar, sir—there was no better in the boat, except the stroke's. Let me shake your hand, sir."

The Curate, of course, shook hands; but it was evident the Yankee puzzled him.

"This is Commodore Pearce, of the United States," explained Gresham; "without whose sagacity and assistance neither the young lady nor myself would, I honestly believe, be alive at this moment. I hope I shall persuade him to pass a few days at Halcombe, where I am sure that he will find a hearty welcome."

"Thank you, Mr. Gresham, but my time is limited. So soon as I have got my clothes dry, and have had a snatch of sleep at this *ho*tel, I'm off for London."

This was a relief to Gresham, though he was ashamed of himself at finding it to be so. However successful he might be in imposing silence concerning recent events upon Elise, it would have been quite impossible, he felt, to keep Mr. Pearce's mouth shut, who, unaware of the shortness of the two young people's acquaintance with one another, had taken it for granted, from the first, that they were an engaged couple.

"You will allow me, at all events, Mr. Pearce, to be your banker," said Gresham. "I am well known here."

"Thank you, sir," interrupted the Commodore, "but I have given nothing to the fishes, except my kit—and that won't clothe the Leviathan. My money is safe in my breast pocket; and I've got tobacco for a week's consumption, though it's a trifle damp."

They had now reached the "Golden Lion," the hostess of which had been already informed of the arrival of her involuntary guests, and had partly attired herself to welcome them. It was arranged that Miss Hurt should be left in her charge till a carriage could be sent for her from the Hall; and after some refreshment for the inner man, and dry clothes for the outer, lent him by the landlord, Gresham took his leave of the Commodore with many expressions of goodwill on either side.

"If I'm in England, sirree, mind, I come down to your wedding," were the Commodore's last words, which, delivered as they were in Dyneley's presence, turned Gresham scarlet. Then the two young men stepped into a dog-cart,—for the gale was still strong enough to have turned any closed vehicle that the "Golden Lion" could offer them topsy-turvey,—and set out for Halcombe.

It was a satisfaction to Gresham that the presence of the ostler close behind them precluded any conversation of a private nature; but as a matter of fact the Curate was the last man to have asked his companion for any explanations. He had certainly observed the familiarity that existed between Gresham and Elise; and had even caught some fragments of their conversation in the lifeboat. But his nature was too unsuspicious to jump to the right conclusion from such scanty premises. The Commodore's parting words had rather dissipated, than confirmed, any suspicions he might have entertained; for he took it for granted that they alluded to Gresham's marriage with Evelyn. Had he guessed the truth, it might be imagined that he would have gladly welcomed such evidence of his rival's lack of love for Evelyn; but so loyal was his nature, that he would on the contrary have found in it a cause of quarrel with Gresham for his traitorous conduct. Even as it was, Gresham's behaviour had excited his displeasure, though his sense of justice compelled him to make allowances for his young friend, placed as he had been in such an exceptional position with respect to his fair companion. Perhaps there was nothing that made John Dyneley so ill-understood as this gift of charity, as rare with the commonplace Pious, wrapped up in the salvation of their own souls, as with the children of this World. Moreover, John Dyneley was a gentleman, and he did not feel justified in hauling a fellow-creature over the coals without adequate warrant.

From all which it arose that there was little conversation between the two occupants of the front seat of the dog-cart; and what there was confined itself to details of the wreck and the rescue.

Unwilling to disturb the tenants of the Hall from their slumbers after their long night of watching, the Curate invited Gresham to breakfast with him at his lodgings at the Manor Farm. Here they aroused the young farmer, Gilbert Holm himself, from his first sleep, for he had remained with some of the men at the Point till they had not only seen the lifeboat carry off the tenants of the Rhineland, but beheld the remains of that unfortunate vessel go to pieces, which happened in about an hour after the rescue. He described the distress and agitation of the young ladies as having been very great, but they had restrained their tears, he said, until the safety of all on board had been assured, and when, as it seemed to him, "there was no sort of occasion for 'em."

"Ah, Gilbert, you don't know the nature of women," said Gresham, jestingly.

"Perhaps not, sir," answered the farmer drily; "but I know the nature of one of them as I'm talking about enough to be sartin' sure that she would a'most ha' cried her pretty eyes out, had she been aware as a certain person was on board that craft last night; and I daresay Mr. Dyneley here could give a name to her."

"Well, of course, they would all have been greatly more distressed," said the Curate, evasively, "had they been aware that Mr. George was among the wrecked."

It was merely common civility in Dyneley to ask his nominal host (for Holm was only Sir Robert's tenant) to breakfast with them considering that he had been disturbed by his visitors at so untimely an hour, so the three men partook of their meal together.

There was little talk, however, among them, for the young farmer's allusion to the supposed engagement between Evelyn and Gresham had annoyed the latter. He thought it familiar and impertinent, though perhaps he would not have done so had he not been thrown, during the last three days, into the companionship of Miss Elise Hurt.

"There's to be a new arrival at the Hall to-day, sir, as I understand," observed Holm, addressing the Curate. Gresham felt growing red and white by turns; he felt sure that this insolent clodhopper—with whom, however, he had heretofore been on the familiar terms that are usual between men in their relative positions in a place like Halcombe—was about to speak of Elise herself.

"Indeed?" said the Curate. "Who may that be?"

"Well, the young ladies are going to have a new maid. John is going to take the gig over to Archester this afternoon to meet her."

Gresham uttered a little sigh of relief; it was plain that this man had not heard of the expected arrival of the governess.

"I hope John will have less wind against him than I had last night," said the Curate, "or he will need some ballast on his voyage out."

"Ah, to be sure, you must ha' been much blowed about," observed the farmer. "Perhaps a little drop of the right stuff would do you no harm this morning." And he produced from his cupboard—the fire had been lit for them in the kitchen, as being at that early hour most convenient—a bottle of brandy.

"No, thank you," said Dyneley; "I never touch such a thing in the morning."

"Nor I," said Gresham, curtly.

"Well then, gentlemen, I'll just drink to the health of both of you." And he helped himself to a full glass.

Though still very early, it was agreed that Gresham should now go to the Hall to relieve the fears of its tenants as to Miss Hurt's safety, and the Curate accompanied him as far as the garden gate.

"There was one person, Dyneley, I did not ask you about when we were in the dog-cart together, because of the ears so close behind us. Ferdinand Walcot is here, of course, and as much master as ever?"

"Yes; even more so, I think, than when you left us."

"I call it a downright infatuation in my uncle," exclaimed the other, with irritation.

"Well, I confess I don't share Sir Robert's predilection for his brother-in-law," answered the Curate, smiling; "but I suppose we are what your uncle calls antipathetic—in plain English, I don't like Mr. Walcot, and he don't like me."

"Of course not. I had hoped that you might have opened my uncle's eyes; you are the only man who could do so without the suspicion of having any interest in the matter."

"Nay, I have nothing to say against the man. It is only a question with me of 'I do not like thee, Doctor Fell!' and I cannot suppose that Sir Robert would espouse my prejudices. When I did once venture to say that I thought Walcot took too much upon himself in the way of parish affairs, your uncle was obviously annoyed. He said that I little knew Ferdinand Walcot; everybody who did so must revere him. 'As for myself,' he added, 'there is a sacred tie between us which nothing but death will sever.'"

"A sacred fiddlestick," observed Gresham, contemptuously. Then, after a pause, "Who is that yonder, going over the hill."

"It is Gilbert Holm. He is bound for the shore, I reckon, to see if there is any flotsam or jetsam from the wreck. He had much better trust to his farm for his profits than to such waifs and strays."

"Ay, he's another of Walcot's protégés, is he not?"

"I don't know about that," said the Curate, "but he has great influence over him, as he has over every one else; and I wish he would use it to persuade him to give up taking brandy of a morning.—I shall see you again in an hour or two, no doubt, Gresham. Good morning."

The tone of the Curate was cordial, much more so, had Gresham been aware of his feelings towards Evelyn, than his companion had any right to expect; for what is more calculated to raise the spleen than to suspect the object of our own affections to be held but lightly in those of our successful rival? Even as it was, Gresham acknowledged to himself what a worthy, modest, and high-souled fellow Dyneley was, and how incapable of a baseness. This last reflection was, perhaps, suggested by a prick of conscience, for Gresham did not in his heart approve of that policy of silence—not to say deception—which he had chalked out for himself in the future as respected Elise. He was by nature, as his uncle had called him, frank. The story Mr. Walcot had narrated respecting his behaviour at the Homburg gaming-table had been, to say the least of it, distorted to his disadvantage; he was too impulsive for duplicity, though a certain weakness of character might, as in the present case, suggest concealment.

Nor must it be supposed that George Gresham had in his advances to Elise acted disloyally towards Evelyn. Not only had he not broken truth—for troth had never been plighted between them, but he had done her no tacit wrong; there was no mutual understanding between them whatever, such as lovers use, and though they had been drifting towards Matrimony, it was without aid of sail or oar, and merely from the wind and tide of circumstances. They were both aware that marriage was expected of them by others, and they had not actively opposed themselves to the pressure from without, but that was all. Gresham was not aware that Evelyn had ever stated "I am not engaged," but he knew that she did not acknowledge an engagement. Nor had she once given him, during all the years they had known one another, such looks or words as Elise had bestowed upon him within the last few hours. He felt less self-reproach in fact as respected her than as respected others—such as his uncle and her mother, but with these he was undoubtedly about to play, if not falsely, a false part.

The adults of the Hall party were already downstairs, despite the earliness of the hour, eager to hear the news from Mirton, and their astonishment was great indeed at finding it was Gresham who had brought it.

"What, you here?" "George!" "Good Heavens!" and "This is unexpected, indeed"—the last and less enthusiastic greeting being Mr. Ferdinand Walcot's.

The ladies kissed him, of course. Lady Arden with a stately affection, befitting a mother-in-law in posse, as well as a step-aunt in esse; Milly with lively effusion; and Evelyn, not as some young ladies kiss "tall Irish cousins whom they love in a sisterly way," but with a certain gentle decorum for which he could have hugged her—it so convinced him that she didn't care twopence about him.

"And is the poor girl safe?" were her first words.

"You left her? Why how did you know who she was?" inquired Lady Arden.

"I—oh—well," stammered Gresham, "we became acquainted on the voyage, you know; it was not like an ordinary passage, you must remember."

"Indeed it was not," sighed Evelyn. "Shall I ever forget last night, and that wave-swept wreck with the poor creatures clinging to it!"

"Yes," cried Milly, "and yet we did not know that you were there, George. Fancy what our feelings would have been had we been aware of that!"

"You are very good," said Gresham, with a bow.

"It is too horrible to jest about, George," exclaimed Sir Robert, reprovingly. "I saw two poor souls swept into the sea with my own eyes."

"Yes, indeed, sir, there were more than that. There were many drowned, and but three women saved in all." Then he proceeded to tell them certain details with which we are more or less acquainted, to which they listened with eager horror.

"But how came you to come by the Rhineland at all, George?" inquired Lady Arden; "they tell me it was a cattle ship."

"Yes, why on earth did you do that?" said Sir Robert.

"No doubt from motives of economy," observed Mr. Walcot, with a dry smile.

"Well, no, it was not exactly that, I must confess," said Gresham, conscious of a flaming cheek; "but being in Rotterdam when the vessel was about to start, a sudden impulse took me. It was not right, because I had promised to meet Mayne in Paris, but no one can say that my perjury went unpunished. I nearly lost my life—I did lose every rag belonging to me. I am indebted to Mr. Marvell for the very things I stand up in. They are not fashionable, I know, nor a good fit, but it was something to get into dry clothes of any kind after such a soaking."

"Then poor Miss Hurt must have lost everything too," observed Evelyn.

"Very true, Evy," exclaimed the Baronet. "You ladies must make contributions from your wardrobes."

"Is she my size, or Evelyn's, or mamma's?" inquired Milly roguishly.

"Well, really," stammered Gresham——

"He is blushing!" cried Milly, clapping her hands.

"I don't see that there could be any harm in your remarking whether she was short or tall," observed Lady Arden stiffly.

"Certainly not," continued Milly; "and since she was so communicative, it seems, she may have told him what sized gloves she uses, and from that data we could judge everything."

"Be quiet, Milly," exclaimed her mother reprovingly. "Let George speak for himself."

"Well, I think this young lady is about Milly's size," replied Gresham, with an air of reflection; "rather shorter, if anything. I told her, by the bye, that you would send some conveyance for her."

"Quite right," said Lady Arden; "the carriage shall go at once. And Jennings shall go in it with a change of clothes for her."

"That is just like your thoughtfulness, Lady Arden," observed Mr. Walcot; "but if I might venture a suggestion, don't you think that, under the circumstances, if Miss Evelyn herself would not mind the trouble——"

"The very thing I was thinking, myself," interrupted Sir Robert. "The poor girl would take it so kindly."

"Oh, indeed!" exclaimed Gresham hastily; "there is no occasion for that. I am sure she would be quite distressed at such a thing."

"Still, if Miss Evelyn doesn't mind the trouble," repeated Walcot.

"There is no trouble in the matter," observed that young lady quietly; "and, indeed, without wishing to rob Mr. Walcot of the credit due to his forethought, I had made up my mind to go for Miss Hurt before he spoke."

If anything could have been a solace to Gresham under such circumstances—for the plan about to be carried into effect was, as may be well imagined, to the last degree distasteful to him—it was the curtness of tone in which Evelyn addressed those words to Mr. Ferdinand Walcot. She was the only inhabitant of the Hall who was able to "snub" Sir Robert's brother-in-law, or who had the courage to attempt it. His being thus "set down" was, however, but scanty satisfaction to Gresham as compared with his apprehensions of the dangerous results of Walcot's officiousness. If he had only had the courage to tell Elise of the quasi-engagement existing between himself and Evelyn, it would have put her on her guard; but—now—what damaging admissions might she not make during that tête-à-tête—what questions might not Evelyn put to her in all good faith, and without the least idea that they were "leading" ones! Moreover, the suggestion of Evelyn's going to meet the girl was greatly more distasteful to him from its having proceeded from Walcot. Did the man already suspect something? It was more than possible, for his attitude towards him, in Gresham's view, was always one of suspicion; he was certain in his own mind that Ferdinand Walcot was a tale-bearer and an eavesdropper; and that the knowledge thus basely acquired had been already used to his prejudice with his uncle. Suppose that this cur, who was also a sleuth-hound, had already smelt out that there was something—something wrong, as he would be sure to term it—between Elise and him!

CHAPTER X.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE

We have described the owner of Halcombe Hall, and also him who was practically the master of it; but we have given them precedence only on the time-hallowed principle of "Seniores priores." There was one other individual under that roof, quite as masterful by nature as Mr. Walcot himself, and who was looked up to by the whole family with a reverence accorded to neither of his two rivals. This personage was Baba Nicoll (aged 4), commonly called, half in irony, half in tribute to his social position, the Great Baba. The origin of this name, save that it was begotten of Love and Euphony, was lost, at the time we make acquaintance with him, in the mist of antiquity. It was certainly not given him by his godfather and godmother, who had in fact named him "Gerald." Perhaps he was termed Baba, after the Great Mogul called Babo; and the "o" had become "a" by one of those etymological processes so familiar to commentators; but if so he was a far greater potentate than his prototype. His dominions, indeed, were limited, being bounded on the north, on the south, on the east, and on the west, by the walls of his home, but within that region he was despotic. Nay, like the Czar of Russia, he might be said to be an object of worship. A prophet we are told is held in small account in his own country, but the Great Baba, who was oracular upon matters present only (and even on those never distinct) was held at home in a reverence not paid to prophets anywhere even after the fulfilment of their vaticinations. Even abroad he was thought highly of; ladies and even ancient gentlemen were wont to stop him in London streets, or at the seaside, when he went forth in state in his perambulator, to do him homage; they did not, as in the case of the Holy Pontiff, kiss his toe, for, indeed, that member was not easily approachable, being encased, first in a shoe and stocking of extreme diminutiveness, and finally in a gaiter of Shetland wool, but they kissed what they could, and invoked the blessings of Providence upon his sacred person. He was wont neither to approve nor disapprove of these manifestation of public approval; but would "stare right on with calm eternal eyes," on some distant object of nature—especially if a dog or a donkey presented itself on the horizon. A philosophic calm was his usual characteristic; but there were chords in his nature, which being struck he was immediately roused to enthusiasm. The sight of Punch's show had quite a galvanic effect upon him; a soldier—such was his particularity, that although he had probably never so much as heard of the Amazons, he rolled him "a soldier-man"—aroused in him an ardour which it is inadequate to describe as martial; while a monkey on an organ caused him such agitation of mind, as (although evidently pleasurable) gave nervous admirers some apprehension for his precious life.

That he considered himself by very far the most important personage on this terrestrial planet is certain (and no wonder), and we are also inclined to believe that (in spite of appearances) he also deemed himself the first even in chronological order. It was his imperial humour to conceive himself the sole repository of information, and he imparted it in infinitesimal quantities, to the world at large, and with the air of a teacher. When a horse passed him, he would observe to his attendants, "Gee-gee," with a wave of his small hand, as though to impress it upon their attention. "I have named that quadruped, you observe" (he seemed to say), "and mind you don't forget it." He was equally at home with Science as with Nature, and, on once meeting with a steam-roller in London, remarked, "Puff, puff," in a precisely similar manner. Although he did not speak, as other sovereigns do, in the first person plural, he was far from using the ordinary style. He would say, "Baba will have this and that," and if it was to be attained by any means within the reach of his loving subjects Baba got it. Like the Persian monarch who flogged the seas and razed the hills, Baba was indignant with Nature herself if his inclinations were thwarted. He was once found, to the great alarm of His Majesty's household, upon a chair, upon which, finding it near the window, he had climbed, unassisted, in order to reach what he called, "That wound yed ball," which was the sun—it being an exceptionally foggy day for Halcombe. Upon being informed that this feat was impossible, on account of the height at which that luminary is placed above us, he expressed a passionate discontent with that arrangement; and I am sorry to add even with its Author, the Great Architect of the Universe. His views of the Creator, indeed, though tempered with a certain tender awe which was extremely touching, were what High Church divines would consider familiar. Having been told that God lives above us, he for some time regarded the attics with mystic reverence, and approached them when carried up thither with caution. He once remarked that the Supreme Being did not live alone "up yonder," but "along with the joke."

"Good gracious," cried his mother, seriously shocked—though his innocent tone and broken accents did in fact rob all remarks that dropped from his baby mouth of their irreverence, "what can the child mean?"

Upon cross-examination of the nurse it appeared that she had once observed in Baba's hearing that "she could not see the joke," and since he had been told that "we cannot see God," he had combined his information, and, quite unwittingly, thus associated the Sublime with the Ridiculous.

An infant of such simplicity, and with such original views, would have been popular even among philosophers; it may be imagined therefore with what reverence he was regarded by his mother and sisters. We have said, by the way, that Evelyn was the only person at Halcombe Hall who at times opposed herself to Mr. Ferdinand Walcot; let us hasten to repair that error; the Great Baba detested him, and was accustomed to tell him so in broken language, but still sufficiently distinct, "On are a nasty back ugly man, and I won't kiss you," a veto that had almost the force of an Excommunication. Mr. Walcot would smile in the tenderest manner at him, and assure him that he could not mean what he said, but the other would answer, "Baba means it very much," and intrench himself against his caressee behind the nearest chair.

Then poor Mr. Walcot, adopting the plan he had seen others use to mitigate his elfin wrath, would pretend to cry, and say, "Oh, see how I am hurt by your unkindness," to which his duodecimo enemy would reply, "Baba sees, but doesn't care." Then Mr. Walcot would try another tack, and, imitating the child's cross looks and pouting lips, would mimic contemptuously, "What does Mr. Walcot look like now?"

"He ook like a fool," would be the crushing rejoinder.

Upon the whole, however unwilling to impute duplicity to a man of such force of character, we doubt whether Mr. Ferdinand Walcot was quite so fond of the Great Baba as he pretended to be.

But all the rest of the household loved him, and none better than his brother Frank. "The boy that loves a baby" has always good in him, and generally some rare kind of good. Frank was ingenuous and affectionate, but very sensitive, and though "sharp enough," as every one allowed, his imaginative powers were greatly in excess of his intelligence; he was passionate—and though his passion lasted but for a minute, and his gentleness filled up the huge interval—this fact was dwelt upon by his detractors. Of these, however, he had not many; and, if it had not been for the greater claims on their devotion, advanced and somewhat insisted upon by the Great Baba, his family would have adored him. There had been as yet but one shadow upon his bright young life. The incident which had produced it was curious, and even absurd, but the effect had been somewhat serious. Late in the preceding autumn Master Frank had ridden over on his pony to pay a visit to a young friend at his mother's house—a few miles from Archester. He had stopped later than was prudent, and Lady Arden had been greatly alarmed when darkness fell, and the child—for he was then but eight—did not present himself. His pony was a quiet one, and he had ridden it daily for some months; still there was, of course, the danger of his having been thrown. Moreover, though he knew his way over the moor quite well, he did not know it as the Curate did, blindfold; and the night was dark. He did turn up about nine o'clock, but in a very strange condition; his mind seemed to have become unhinged, he talked so strangely at first they thought that his friend might have been so imprudent as to have given the lad a glass of cherry brandy before he set out. And yet his behaviour was not that of one intoxicated. The doctor, who was sent for, pronounced that he had received some shock to his system. He might have been pitched off his pony, on his head, he thought, and then got on again unconciously.

E WRONG SORT

His story, told in a boyish disconnected way, but one which never wavered as to the facts, was this. He had started after dusk, but had no difficulty in keeping to the sand road, nor felt any apprehension in his own mind as to reaching home. He did not like the darkness that was falling about him—he never did like being in the dark—but on this occasion he protested that he had not felt afraid. Suddenly, as he reached the spot where the road branched to Mirton, he came upon this spectacle: a giant moving slowly through the mist, upon six legs. Of course the pony was frightened, and started off at such speed that he was wholly unable to restrain him, but he was not one half so frightened at his rider. At the mere narration of what he had seen, indeed, the blood fled from the boy's delicate cheek, and his voice shook with horror.

"I saw it," he asserted solemnly, "as plainly as I see you, mamma; the creature was as tall as one tall man pick-a-back on another, and had six legs; the two in the middle thinner than the two outside."

To this legend he had clung with such tenacity that no argument could shake his conviction; and he had become in some sort a martyr to his faith. If there was one thing Sir Robert was slow to forgive, it was a falsehood; and there could unhappily be no doubt that the giant with six legs could not have truth for his foundation. There was, indeed, an apparent absence of motive for such a monstrous fiction, but this had been supplied by a mind fertile in imputing motives.

"I do not take the severe view of Frank's peccadilloes that you do, Arden," Mr. Walcot had said, when privately consulted on the matter by his brother-in-law; "but, on the other hand, I see a quite sufficient reason for his having invented the story. The lad knew that he had transgressed his mother's commands by remaining with his young friend so late; and his object was to substitute sympathy for reproof. He felt, if he could persuade us he had been desperately frightened, that that would be considered punishment enough; and having a strong imagination, and a mind stored with histories of Jack the Giant Killer, and similar worthies, he evoked a giant out of his own consciousness. He has been too long in the nursery, and ought to be sent to school."

"He is so delicate, and gets on so well with his lessons at home, I am told," answered Sir Robert dubiously.

"I know Lady Arden is opposed to his leaving home and 'roughing it' in any way," observed Mr. Walcot quietly; "but as you were saying, a habit of falsehood must be eradicated at any sacrifice."

"Did I say that? I had no idea of having done so; but I was certainly thinking something of the kind. How unconsciously thought weds itself with speech! How strange is our mental mechanism!"

"I am afraid Frank's story was not put together in that unconscious manner," said Walcot, smiling.

"No, indeed; I fear not. Yes, I will certainly speak to my wife about sending him to school. Your opinion, Ferdinand, will I am sure have its due weight with her."

"Pardon me, Arden; but I had rather you left me and my opinion out of this question. It is a purely domestic one; you, of course, have every right to propose—nay, to dictate—the course I have ventured to suggest. But your wife would naturally resent any interference in such matters on my part."

If it had not been for an opposition on Lady Arden's part much more strenuous than she was used to exhibit, Frank would have gone to school after his meeting with that giant; but as it was, he still remained at home.

One of the future duties of Miss Elise Hurt would be to teach him German. In the mean time he learnt readily enough whatever his sisters could impart to him; but the effect of such tender teaching and environments was somewhat to increase a certain constitutional effeminacy. When Sir Robert once spoke with admiration of Frank's devotion to his little brother, Mr. Ferdinand Walcot observed that it was, indeed, a pleasant spectacle to see them together; "one would think," he said, "they were almost of the same age; but, for all that, it was doubtful whether it was advantageous for a lad of nine to be so very childish in his pursuits."

These words of wisdom were a little hard on the elder lad; for the share he took in his brother's pleasures was solely in order to increase them. The Great Baba (like other princes of a larger growth) was never so happy as when marshalling his army of tin soldiers in the tented field, with Frank by his side, as aide-de-camp, to pick up the fallen, and set them on their pins again. After Frank had done his lessons, he always placed himself at his brother's service for an hour before he went out to take his own amusements. He had done so on the morning when Evelyn had gone to Mirton to fetch Miss Hurt, and had promised the Great Baba to come in betimes to help fire the battery (of peas) against the invading army (twenty-three top-heavy men in green), and finish the campaign with a pitiless slaughter. A plan which, unhappily for both parties, was not destined to be carried out.

Frank's first thought on getting free from his military duties was to go down to the Point to see whether any of the wreck had come ashore; and, in order to enhance this pleasure, he had called on his way at the gardener's cottage to pick up Jem Groad, the only playmate of his own age that Halcombe could supply. Jem and he were singularly antipathetic: the former being a stout, unimaginative lad, of a sullen disposition, which he probably inherited from his father. Mr. John Groad was an excellent gardener, and he knew it. Upon the rare occasions when he was reproached by his mistress for not having fruit or flower in such perfection as they were produced elsewhere, he intrenched himself behind the lines of incredulity.

"But Mr. Merrick as well as his gardener," she would say, "have both assured me, John, that such-and-such is the case; the flower does grow in that soil, or the fruit has attained to these dimensions."

"I tell you what it is, my lady," John Groad would reply, leaning on his spade; "they lies." The assertion was unanswerable; but it was not courteous. Nor was courtesy his forte at any time. He was one of those dogged, ungracious persons whom human nature (which has more charity for such characters than for more agreeable ones) concludes to be "honest as the day" since, if not that, it is clear that they ought to be hung. And Jem Groad was John in miniature.

The cottage was scrupulously clean; but, though its inmate was understood by envious neighbours to have money laid up in the Bank, it had no trace of ornament. It had not even a flower in it, a circumstance, however, which might have arisen from Mr. Groad's having too much to do with flowers professionally to care to look on them in his leisure hours. A large black parrot, however—the terror of the village children, and darkly whispered by their seniors to be the Fiend incarnate and in feathers—swung from the ceiling in a wicker cage. Mr. Groad had purchased it of a shipwrecked mariner at Archester for two-and-sixpence, and had taught it his own language.

"We are all for ourselves here," was its hoarse welcome to Frank as he opened the cottage door. "All for ourselves; all for ourselves; yes, yes."

It had made the same observation too many times before to attract that young gentleman's attention.

"Now, Jem," cried he gleefully, "give up your tato'-paring and come down to the wreck."

As a matter of fact no proposition could have been more agreeable to the youth addressed, but, like some full-grown people of my acquaintance, it was his humour never to appear grateful for any suggestion.

"What's the good o' wreckings to me," he said; "if I was your uncle and lord o' the manor, then I should like 'em well enough; 'all findings keepings' with him, for that's the law."

"Well, whatever you find this morning you shall keep, Jem, that I promise you," said Frank, assuringly.

"There'll be no corpses, that's for certain," responded the other, doggedly. "Father says as the lifeboat took away whatever was worth taking."

"What on earth would you do with a corpse if you found it?" inquired Frank, with a look of disgust, not unaccompanied, however, by a certain morbid curiosity.

"Well, I'd empty his pockets, that is what I'd do with a corpse; but I tell 'ee there'll be no such luck."

"Let's hope for the best," said Frank, secretly much resigned to this stroke of misfortune, but eager to conciliate his morose companion, "come along."

Jem Groad came along accordingly, though still in an aggrieved and sulky mood. Stronger and more inured to toil than his aristocratic companion, he made much better running up the steep hill. "You needn't cut away from a fellow," gasped poor Frank.

"You got neither legs nor wind, you ain't," replied the other, contemptuously."

"I can run as fast as you and faster," answered Frank, with irritation, "but I'm tired this morning with sitting up all night at the Mill."

"Tired with sittin' up! Bah, if you had stood on the quay for six hours and more, as I did, you might talk of being tired."

They had now reached the churchyard, close to which a stream which fed the mill ran rapidly down to the sea. About half-way down a dam had been formed, over which was a narrow foot-bridge, always an attraction to the boys from its obvious danger.

"Now I will race you to the mill-dam," cried Frank, who was swift of foot.

"Bah, any fool can run," rejoined Master Groad, whose forte was less speed than endurance.

"Nevertheless off they started like greyhounds from the leash. Frank first reached the gaol, but in a very distressed condition; he held on to the rail of the foot bridge and breathed in gasps. His rival arrived three seconds afterwards, but with quite a superfluity of breath in him, which he at once applied to purposes of disparagement.

"Yes, you can run; of course, you can run. It is well for you, since you can't fight."

This was very hard, because the other could not answer him except by pants. He looked, however, pugnacious enough.

"Ah, you may grin" (he had not meant to grin at all), "but you're a molly-coddle. I don't wonder that they call you Nell"—he would have said Nelly, but Frank's fingers throttled him at the first syllable. He had flown at him like a young cat-a-mountain. The next moment the two boys were sprawling on the slippery bridge, in a struggle in which the rules of battle, as laid down in "Fistiana," were grievously neglected. On one side there was no rail at all, but very deep water, which rushing under the bridge fell through a grating into the mill pool below. Thus whoever was once sucked in, no matter how great his swimming powers, must needs perish, since there was no egress. The combatants recked nothing of this, till one of them—Jem Groad—slipped over; his legs went instantly away from him, under the bridge which his hands still clutched in desperation.

Frank, on his part, frenzied with fear, seized him by the hair, and roused the echoes with screams for help. Had he loosed his hold for an instant, or if Jem's hair should show a sign of what the barber's call "weakness at the roots," the latter would have at once discovered whether the black parrot had been libelled or not by public report. He would have been bound for Tartarus to a certainty.

On the hill top, some quarter of a mile away, two men had been conversing for some time: one evidently a student, or man of thought, the other an agriculturist.

"The hay was bad," the former had been saying; "and that was not the worst of it. It was half a load short of the quantity."

"There must have been some mistake, sir," replied the other deferentially, and very pale.

"The law calls such mistakes by the name of fraud. You cheated Sir Robert about the cows you sold for him at Archester."

"I charged him a few shillings for the commission, sir; that was all."

"You lie, Gilbert Holm. You put ten pounds of his into your own pocket."

"Oh, pray Mr. Walcot, have mercy upon me for this once."

"I have not made up my mind as to that," was the cool rejoinder.

"I will be your slave for life if you will not expose me——"

At this moment a piercing cry for help came up to them from below.

"Good God! Mr. Walcot, there is some one drowning. It is little Frank."

He would have rushed off in aid at once, impelled, it is just to say, by natural instinct, though upon its heels came the selfish reflection, "Here is an opportunity for laying Sir Robert under a life-long obligation, and covering all my peccadilloes against him."

Perhaps the same thought occurred to his companion, for a hand was laid upon his wrist, and a voice more potent than the grasp restrained him.

"It is not Frank, you fool. It is the gardener's boy."

"But, sir, he is drowning!" ejaculated the other with dismay that fell little short of horror.

"True; you had better save him. Go.' As the speaker's hand released him, Gilbert Holm bounded towards the bridge.

The ground was in his favour, and he ran like a deer, but he was only just in time. Two seconds more of Mr. Ferdinand Walcot's converse, always momentous as it was, would on this occasion have weighed down a human life.

Breathless and dripping Jem was hauled out of the hungry current, and deposited upon the grassy bank; his face was almost as cadaverous as one of those human flotsam and jetsam which he had lately evinced such a desire to come across.

"Oh, Jem, dear Jem," cried Frank, kneeling by his side, and weeping bitterly, "do tell me you are not dead."

"If I'm not, it's no thanks to you;" growled the object thus addressed. "He tried to drown me, Mr. Holm."

"Oh what a wicked story!" exclaimed Frank.

"We'll see what the policeman says about that," murmured Jem. His eyes were still closed, but he dimly saw his way to pecuniary compensation for having been worsted in his late encounter.

"Come, come, young Groad," said Holm, "it was a fair tussle between you, only you must needs take a slippery plank to try your strength upon."

"You were not near enough, Holm, to be sure of that," put in a grave voice. "Let us be careful not to side unjustly with the rich against the poor."

"That's just it, Mr. Walcot," groaned the dripping one. "It's because I'm only a gardener's son that he thought nothing of drowning me; oh please to fetch a policeman."

"But I didn't try to drown him," exclaimed Frank, appealingly; "upon my word and honour I did'nt. It was terrible to see him fall into the dam, and I held on to him all I could."

"He cort hold of me by the hair," muttered Jem, complainingly. "He tried to pull it out by the roots. Oh, where is the policeman?"

"It is a sad case altogether," observed Mr. Walcot. "It is for your father, Groad, to take what steps he pleases; you may tell him that much from me."

"Oh, Mr. Walcot," cried Frank, despairingly, "do you then believe it possible that I tried to drown him?"

"My dear Frank, I cannot look into your conscience. But I know you often give way to uncontrollable fits of passion, such as lead men and boys to manslaughter, if not to murder."

"Yes, Mr. Walcot, it was murder," exclaimed Jem, with eagerness. "Let him give me a sufforin at once, or else I'll send him to the gallows."

"It is much too serious a case for compromise," sighed Mr. Walcot. "The law does not permit it. Go home, Groad, and send your father to me. As for you, Frank, you had better not return till your usual time, lest suspicion should be aroused at once against you. Go away into some solitary place and think over your hasty temper and the fearful consequences to which it has led."

"Oh, Mr. Walcot, I am so sorry," sobbed the terrified Frank, "I will never be angry again, and I will do everything you bid me, always, if you will only protect me this time."

"I will do what I can, Frank, if I see your promised amendment bearing fruit. In the mean while you had better say nothing of this to anybody, and I dare say Mr. Holm will be good enough to do the like."

"I am in your hands entirely, Mr. Walcot," answered Holm, humbly, as they walked away together, while a smothered sigh betrayed his sense of the literal truth of his reply.

THE READER

"MEMOIR OF THE REV. FRANCIS HODGSON, B.D., Scholar, Poet, and Divine" (2 vols: Macmillan and Co.).—The records of a goodly company, amongst whom Byron, as he was in his Cambridge and London days, towers head and shoulders above the rest, would not have been complete without this somewhat long-delayed memoir of one of the most generally liked, if scarcely the most gifted, of its members. Time, we fear, has already set aside as "alms for oblivion" the many writings of Francis Hodgson—the reviews in those forgotten rivals of the infant Edinburgh, the Critical and the Monthly, the original poems, the translation of Juvenal, about which Giffard wrote such flattering things, and which drew from Byron the complimentary allusion to "Hodgson's verse" in "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." It is not in any special sense as "poet, scholar, or divine" that the subject of these memoirs imposes himself on our fancy, whether we follow him through his earlier work of mingled literary labour and (to use his own phrase) "gerund-grinding," to his vicarage of Bakewell; or, lastly—his old friend Lonsdale declining to stand against him, his old head-master, Keate, no longer caring at his advanced age for the appointment—to that highest pinnacle of scholarly preferment, the Provostship of Eton; but rather as a perfect type of the Etonian—true product of the grand old school over which the guardian spirit of Henry Wotton lingers still—a type in which all these three elements were deftly blended to make a debonnaire and accomplished gentleman. Not every one, perhaps, will do more than skim the full chronicle of Hodgson's life, the samples of his recreations in prose and verse, the reminiscences of Drurys, Blands, and Merivales, gathered these many years to their fathers. But all will like a little even of this, and all will read with very unusual interest the copious correspondence—forming, in fact, no small portion of the work—from which we learn so much of Byron, and more especially at the great crisis of his life, his marriage with Miss Milbanke, and the subsequent separation. Thoroughly enjoyable as mere biography, Mr. Hodgson's memoir of his distinguished father is even more valuable for the light it throws upon the story of a still greater name.

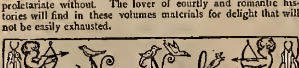
In his "Robert Dick, Baker, of Thurso, Geologist and Botanist" (John Murray), Dr. Smiles has given us a companion picture—as interesting and only just a little less artistically drawn—to his well-known "Life of a Scotch Naturalist." There is this difference, however, that whereas Thomas Edward still lives to enjoy the pleasures and rewards of fame, the "baker of Thurso," who "robbed himself," says Hugh Miller, "to do me service," and who mapped out the geology of Caithness, "the worst mapped county in Scotland," in flour on the bakehouse table before the astonished minds of Sir R. Murchison, has passed away, now twelve years syne, from a world that did not use him tenderly. To unscientific eyes the life, in truth, is somewhat melancholy. Deprived in early childhood of his mother, Dick had to suffer as stepsons sometimes do—to give up hopes of becoming a "college student," and take his place in life as a baker's apprentice. When scarcely yet past middle age the votary of science had to succumb in the battle of trade competition, and to wait for death in poverty and sickness. Yet a glance at the laughing portrait on the opening page will show that Science has compensation for her children. Strong, resolute, reticent, and independent to a fault, Dick while yet able to walk his fifty miles a day—and this he could do within a year of his death—was a fairly, if not a supremely, happy man. Nature had charms for him of which he never wearied, and Humanity a few chosen friends—most notably Hugh Miller, and later on Charles Peach, a self-taught naturalist, very like himself. Though too shy and retiring to write much, he had literary skill, too, at command, and of his letters Dr. Smiles makes effective use for his repeated pictures of Caithness and its scenery—the wind-swept moors, the lonely peaks of Morven, the crags along the Pentland Frith, built up of bones of fish and reptiles that perished in the pre-historic ages of the world. The story is in parts romantic as a Christmas tale. It is a pity that it does not end as brightly as Christmas tales invariably do—that we must read of the disposal of cherished fossils to pay off outstanding debts, and of bodily suffering aggravated by pecuniary losses. Dick's great scientific friends had probably no idea till the very last of his necessities, and Thurso people did not understand him. But the town gave him a public funeral, and raised an obelisk—stone is cheap in Caithness—over his grave. And the sale of his books and furniture paid his debts, and even left for his old Highland housekeeper the furniture of one room, where she still lives, though no one knows exactly how.

"The Life of Palissy the Potter," as told by Professor Henry Morley, has almost taken rank among our English classics. A new edition (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), much abridged by the omission of the original appendix, and by some curtailment in the account of Palissy's writings, but leaving the story of the life untouched, will be widely welcomed as a handy re-issue of a book which, whether we regard Palissy as inventor or Reformer, deserves to be a fireside favourite in every household.

From lives that are grove even to sombreness we turn to pages of merry, almost riotous, holiday-making, in "On Foot Through Spain" (Chapman and Hall), by Major Campion, already favourably known to readers of light literature for his pleasant descriptions of war and sport on the Indian frontier of the United States. Pedestrian tours in Spain are not, we fancy, quite so unprecedented as the gallant Major seems to think; nor can a walk which commences at San Sebastian and ends at Barcelona be said to traverse a very large portion of the country. On the other hand, we can recall for the moment no similar volume which describes so amusingly the fare and company at the road-side taverns of Navarre and Arragon, or at those establishments (still less known to wandering Britons), the pensions of the larger country towns, nor have we ever before heard so many good things said of the refreshments (solid or liquid) to be obtained in the most out-of-the-way corners of the Basque Country—of Arragon the judgment is less favourable—or of the various "diversions" to be found in quiet little towns like Tolosa or Tafalla. Major Campion, no doubt, was a citizen of the world, an old campaigner, who had set himself to win the hearts of Navarrinas and Arragonese by a careful study of the jota, or national dance, and succeeded in no ordinary degree. But even travellers less light of heart or limb may clearly enjoy a journey in this wild country very much, and accomplish it for marvellously little cost. Of graver matters we have naturally somewhat less, though there are some good notes of the officers and soldiers of "the Army of Occupation," and a very interesting account of the chilling reception vouchsafed to the young King in Barcelona, seasoned with a terrible tale of scandal for which we should hope there is insufficient authority. We can promise the reader much entertainment from this vivacious and prettily-illustrated volume.

Under the title of "The Storm and its Portents" (R. Bentley and Son), Dr. T. Phipson has brought together a choice collection of character-sketches and of anecdotes drawn with considerable industry from the numerous mémoires of political and social life in France between 1770 and 1794. All help to furnish a striking picture of the times, though as a rule we prefer the stories told of minor victims of the general disorder, such as "the Assignats," "The Woman without a Name," "A Banker in the Revolution," &c., to the comparatively meagre sketches of greater personages like Necker or Madame Roland. Altogether, the volume—slightly Conservative, we should say, in general tone—will be found both interesting and instructive reading, while those who wish to study these matters more deeply will thank Dr. Phipson for the excellent catalogue of authorities in his concluding chapter "Bibliography of the Revolution."

In her "Old Paris" (R. Bentley and Son)—two volumes that quite overwhelm us with an embarras des richesses—Lady Jackson takes us back to a city yet unconscious of the coming storm, to the Paris of Richelieu, of Mazarin, of the Grande Monarque, of the Court life, and the literary salons which sprung into being after the tension of the religious wars, and reached their highest splendour in the long reign of Louis XIV. Often as the features of this brilliant century—a century which may be taken to begin with the public coronation of Marie de Medicis, that second wife of Henri Quatre whom he could have loved so much had she not been his wife, and to end with the death of Louis Quatorze—have been described by novelists and historians, we know few, if any, works in which their ensemble is more sympathetically or picturesquely presented to us than in this; whether we turn, at Lady Jackson's bidding, to view Old Paris in its streets and buildings, or bow with very different feelings before Ninon de l'Enclos and la Grande Mademoiselle, or assist at the quarrels of the rival salons of the Petit Luxembourg and the Hotel Rambouillet, or strain our ears to catch, amidst the revelry of Versailles, the angry murmur of the proletariate without. The lover of courtly and romantic histories will find in these volumes materials for delight that will not be easily exhausted.



"LESS BLACK THAN WE'RE PAINTED," by James Payn (3 vols.: Chatto and Windus).—Mr. Payn has apparently dug down to quite a fresh vein of vigour and inventiveness in himself, which we only hope he will not overwork. It is hardly more than six months ago that his brilliant novel, "By Proxy," took even his warmest admirers by surprise, and now we have from him another story equally good, though its excellences are of a wholly different kind. It has not the powerfully-conceived situations of "By Proxy;" but it interests and attracts us no less by its unflagging sprightliness and humour, and the mirth-provoking incidents that crowd its pages. We are concerned here with the fortunes of one Dick Talbot, a young gentleman who is certainly a perfect scapegrace for getting into mischief and running through his money, as long as he has any money to spend, but still is less black than he would be painted by decorous respectability, as he is good-hearted and true, and, with all his failings, free from any tinge of baseness or brutality. How in early adolescence, before he has even exchanged Eton for Cambridge, this precocious youth falls in love with beautiful Lucy Lindon, daughter of his old nurse, and step-daughter of a most disreputable gamekeeper, whom he has persuaded his father to employ, how relatives and friends—Evangelical father, Ritualistic aunt, and "Anythingarian" bosom companion—though agreeing in nothing else, are agreed that such a marriage is out of the question for the heir of Talbot Tower, and do their utmost to thwart the course of true love, and how Dick persists and marries his Lucy, who is as wise and good as she is fair to look upon, readers will do well to learn from Mr. Payn himself, who tells the tale in his most graphic and amusing fashion. The interest of the plot, however, is not so intense and absorbing but that we can afford to journey through it leisurely, and enjoy the entertainment which the author provides for us so liberally on the road. Foremost among the pleasant interludes we come upon we may name the mishaps of the hero and his friend "Pussy" Greene, at Masham Manor, which afford a couple of situations so exquisitely comic that on the stage they could be warranted to "bring down" the house. It must not be supposed, however, that the story is without graver elements; it has these also, and very successfully they are dealt with. But, for the most part it is the author's lighter moods that are most apparent in it, and it is these that will probably prove most effective in winning for it the welcome which, if we mistake not, it is destined to receive.

"Through a Needle's Eye," by Hesba Stretton (2 vols.: C. Kegan Paul and Co.).—This is a story of that deceitfulness of riches which may lead an honourable and even religious man away from the path of rectitude. An accident which he half succeeds in persuading himself may be considered Providential—the destruction of one will instead of another—puts the hero, who is conscious that he will make an admirable squire, though he feels but an indifferent parson, in possession of the wealth he has longed for as knowing how to use it aright, and which, if it passes out of his hands, will be wasted in reckless and selfish extravagance, on the one condition that he holds his tongue about that mistake as to the will which is known to himself alone. How Justin Webb, or Justin Herford, yields to the subtle temptation, becomes a model landlord, and for years lives a life so useful and honoured in the eyes of all men that he almost forgets that he is doing good with the money that rightfully belongs to another, and how at last conscience makes itself heard, and he finds the strength to pass "through the needle's eye," and make such restitution as is possible, is all very effectively set forth here, after a fashion which shows that Miss Hesba Stretton's hand has lost none of its wonted force and fineness of touch. The Nemesis also which follows on Justin's sin, and which his own repentance is powerless to avert—the melancholy fate that befalls his dearly-loved daughter, little Pansy—is very well conceived and worked out; Pansy being a heroine who will win the sympathies of all readers. The book is throughout of a great deal more than average excellence, and fully sustains its author's deservedly high reputation.

"A Secret Marriage and Its Consequences," by the author of "Who Is She?" &c. (3 vols.: Chapman and Hall).—The Duke di Pomar—for it can hardly be an indiscretion to refer to an authorship of which no secret is made in advertisements—cannot be said to improve as a novelist. There is sensationalism enough in this story to satisfy the hungriest appetite, but it is neither natural nor altogether healthy, and bears an unpleasant affinity to the fiction of the "Penny Dreadfuls." The American lady who figures so conspicuously in the book, Mrs. Champion, otherwise "the divine Dorothea," would seem an echo, though it may be an unconscious one, of the "divine Theodora" of "Lothair;" but her habitual style of speech is strongly suggestive of lineal descent from the great Mrs. Hominy herself.

We have also received "Royale," by St. George (Charing Cross Publishing Company), a story which is, at any rate, readable, and well enough put together for the slight thing that it is, though there is nothing in it to call for particular notice.

VI.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE AND SONS are not behindhand, this season, in catering for the junior branches. Amongst their best books are "The House that Jack Built" and "John Gilpin" (to which we have already alluded), with illustrations by Mr. R. Caldecott, who certainly shows himself facile princeps in that line of art; his humour is inimitable, as are the drawing and tone of the pictures,—witness the cat and dog scenes, Gilpin's flight past the turnpike, and the lovely landscape to "The Farmer."—Mr. Walter Crane is not at his best in "The Children's Musical Cinderella," his designs lack novelty, and the colour is gaudy in the extreme; the rhymes and popular airs to which they are set are good enough for their purpose.—"Chimes and Rhymes for Youthful Times" has coloured pictures by Mr. Oscar Pletsch, in his peculiar style; the verses are simple, and suited to childish understandings.—Of a more advanced type are Mr. W. H. G. Kingston's "Seven Champions of Christendom," Knatchbull-Hugessen's "Uncle Joe's Stories," and a little book for girls called "More Dolls," by Auntie Bee, which is a sequel to the same author's former tale, "Rosabella." and will please those for whom it is meant,—the story of the little mermaid is rather pretty. Of the first two, the latter is the best; the new résumé of Richard Johnson's verbose old romance is not improved by such laboured attempts at wit as calling St. George's squire De Fistycuff, and the illustrations are positively painful. But it would be hard to praise "Uncle Joe" too highly. Apart from M. Ernest Griset's admirable drawings—note the cat playing the fiddle—the stories told by the rather mendacious relative are as delightfully funny as any the author ever wrote, and the sly bits of incidental satire on men and manners tell wonderfully. To our thinking "Ophelia" is the best tale, and "Cat and Dog" the next, but the burlesque of Gustave Aimard and similar writers is cleverly written, and as thrilling as any boy could desire, especially the fight with the Sioux.—Then there is an illustrated edition of Mr. William Carleton's "Farm Ballads," in which the verses are by far the best part; of their humour and pathos, rugged as it sometimes is, we have spoken highly on a former occasion, and need not repeat the praise.—A better-known writer furnishes material for yet another volume of a sort now popular in "The Longfellow Birthday Book," arranged by Cecilia Dixon; the extracts have been judiciously selected.

From amidst a batch of story books from different sources, Mrs. Herbert Martin's "Ida Mayhew" may be selected as rather above the average of such tales for girls, as it is brightly written and free from the "goody" element. It records the reformation of a self-willed Anglo-Indian child by means of love, after severity had failed, and is published by the Sunday School Association; the illustrations are fairly good, but conventional.—Miss Hesba Stretton's "A Man of His Word" (C. Kegan Paul) is rather a maudlin tale, apparently written in praise of Dissent as compared with the Church of England; fortunately it is short.—Much better is another story of girlish reformation, concerned this time with a Smyrniote young lady given to self-indulgence and mastic-chewing; but since "Lost" is "a tale of the English lakes," why should "S. M." have altered their names, and what was the object of slaughtering one of the Temple boys? Messrs. Bemrose and Sons are the publishers.—From Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton comes "The Flower of the Grassmarket," by the author of "Tim's Troubles," which, as will be rudely guessed, deals with the northern metropolis, and is a home story written strongly in support of missionary exertions; those who care for such tales may do worse than trace Jessie's fortunes from her accident up to her marriage with Frank. Mr. Vine must have been a hard man to prosecute the poor lad, by the bye, and it is hoped he was heartily ashamed of himself.—And, last of all, as a crowning treat, we have Messrs. Sampson Low and Co.'s illustrated edition of "Dick Sands, the Boy Captain," by the inimitable M. Jules Verne, capitally translated by Miss Frewer. When we say that the action takes place mainly on the Gold Coast, and in the interior of Africa, it is unnecessary to add that there is no lack of exciting adventure, occasionally, perhaps, a trifle improbable, as in the case of Dick's successful descent of the cataract; but there is fun too, and boys with an entomological turn will sympathise with Cousin Benedict in his threatened deprivation of the tin box. Mr. Meyer's illustrations are capital; amongst the best is the death of Negoro, and the wreck of the Pilgrim is a good sea effect.—And here we may incidentally mention the last volume of "Tales from Blackwood, which contains Major-General Hamley's clever burlesque of Dumas' "The Last French Hero," and a most amusing sketch of Gibraltar scenery, by Colonel Lockhart, called "Unlucky Tim Griffin," as well as another tale. The new series bids fair to rival the original one.

A series of volumes and tracts of a similar tendency is issued from the Hand and Heart Publishing Offices; all of a semi-religious cast, and with a strong bias towards teetotalism. Without much claim to originality they contain much that is wholesome and praiseworthy. First, there is the yearly volume of a magazine called "The Fireside," the best thing in which is a set of thoughtful essays on the Caroline devotional poets, and Mrs. Brassey is laid under contribution for an account of Tahiti. "The Day of Days Tablet Almanac" is a set of leaflets with a text for every day in the year.—The volume of another periodical, "Home Words," is chiefly distinguished by some pleasant verses from the well-known pen of Mrs. F. R. Havergal, and by the fact that some of the writers seem still to believe in the veracity of "Foxe's Book of Martyrs."—Mr. James's "Pithy Proverbs Pointed" is a collection of short essays on familiar sayings, addressed to the working classes, which may do good, as it is simply written and interspersed with anecdote; of the illustrations the less said the better.—"Many Things" is a compilation by the Rev. C. Bullock from various sources, but chiefly from the public press, on such subjects as, amongst others, "Idle Boys," "Umbrellas," and "The Queen's Income." It is intended to help people to "prepare for conversation" (sic), and what frightful bores they would be if they did! And lastly, "Home Makers," by the late Mrs. C. L. Balfour, is the record of a good woman's life, and a collection of short stories, written by her in the cause of temperance, some of which have rather an apocryphal ring.

Amongst yearly volumes of various periodicals may be mentioned "Darton's Girls' Own Annual" (W. Wells Gardner), with some good practical notes on swimming; "Sunday"—which may be honestly recommended to those who think it wrong to enjoy first-class literature on the first day of the week; and "The Weekly Welcome" (S. W. Partridge), which has a specialité in giving original songs and instructions for singing them.—Also, from Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, "Cassell's Family Magazine," "Little Folks," and "The Magazine of Art;" of the two first it may suffice to say that they are up to their usual standard; the third is chiefly noticeable for its chapters on living artists, and its etched frontispiece from "The Fool" of Franz Hals; Mr. Millais' original drawing is not in his best manner.—There is also, from Messrs. E. Moxon, a superb new edition of Doré's illustrations to Tennyson, with an introductory essay on Arthurian lore which adds nothing to our knowledge of the subject.

A superb edition of the Scriptures, suitable for a family Bible, is issued from the Oxford University Press; it contains not only all Dr. Blayney's references, but historical, chronological, and geographical tables, with a concordance, and much other valuable matter, and is illustrated by coloured maps.—We should also notice "The Cosmopolitan Masonic Calendar, Diary, and Pocket Book for 1879,"—the value of which is well known to all members of the craft; and a useful little handbook, published by Messrs. Frederick Warne and Co., "The Magic Lantern Manual," by W. J. Chadwick, the title of which describes its contents sufficiently.

"Vanity Fair Album" (Vanity Fair Office, 12, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden). Here we have the tenth annual issue of a volume which is almost worth its weight in silver to hosts and hostesses during the mauvais quart d'heure preceding dinner, or indeed at any period of the evening when conversation is inclined to flag. Considering that most personages of first-rate importance have already been "took" by "Ape" and his brother limners, and that the residue now remaining are comparatively only second-class celebrities, the present volume forms a very interesting collection. Besides, this Album has already been so long in existence that it is possible to repeat the portraits of persons of world-wide fame, and this has been very successfully done in the case of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales and of Lord Beaconsfield. Three foreign portraits, drawn by "T.," of the Pope, Garibaldi, and King Humbert respectively, are very good, especially the last. The remainder of the volume is illustrated by "Ape" and "Spy," the latter of whom, though less inclined to caricature than his accomplished fellow workman, furnishes some very life-like resemblances. Among the literary and artistic portraits, we are least pleased with that of Mr. Archibald Forbes, who is by no means such a big, burly, surly-looking customer as the figure here represented; Mr. Whistler and Mr. Edmund Yates are much more true to the originals. Mr. Edward Jenkins ("Ginx's Baby") is excellent, but not flattering.

FOREIGN

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——There is the usual crop of rumours this week, but there is even less than the average instalment of trustworthy news. Caratheodori Pasha has returned from Crete, and has assumed the Foreign Ministry, so that the definitive treaty with Russia will now be speedily concluded, more particularly as the various foreign representatives of the Porte are said to have reported that the Powers advise Turkey to conclude negotiations at once. The great stumbling-block at present is the mode of payment of the indemnity, but it is expected that even this will be satisfactorily arranged, as the Russians are reported to be making preparations to leave Adrianople, which will only be vacated when the definitive Treaty is signed. Contradictory reports come from St. Petersburg and Constantinople respecting the new loan to be guaranteed by England, the Russians denying that they intend to oppose it, while a telegram from Constantinople distinctly states that Prince Lobanoff has presented a Note declaring that Turkey could not alienate her resources before she had liquidated her former engagements, including the war indemnity. In addition to the loan it has been currently rumoured that a new Convention is to be concluded with England by which the latter will obtain increased authority in Asia Minor. This probably arises from the various schemes for the Euphrates Valley Railway, one of which, if accepted, would give the English contractors large tracts of land throughout the route, as well as from a desire to secure the stability of the Government, which, it appears, has been threatened by a dangerous conspiracy having for its object the deposition of Sultan Abd-ul-Hamid, and the enthronement of his son Reshad. One of the chief conspirators seems to have been Mahmoud Damad, who has long been the evil genius of the Palace, and who last week was banished from the capital. A large number of arrests have also been made in Constantinople, and the police profess to have discovered a widespread ramification of conspiracies. The disgrace of Mahmoud Damad is hailed with universal satisfaction, as a great part of Turkey's misfortunes during the war are attributed to his misrule at the War Office, and not to Abd-ul-Kerim and the other generals, who were completely hampered by his orders from the capital. Indeed, now that Mahmoud Damad has fallen, these generals have been allowed to exchange their dreary abode at Lemnos for the more congenial air of Rhodes.

From BULGARIA we still hear of disagreements between the Roumelian Commission and the Bulgarians, and the former, after striving hard to carry out its work amid many difficulties, has finally adjourned until April 15, a few days before the date when the time fixed for the Russian occupation comes to an end, all hope of achieving a satisfactory result while the Russians occupy the country having been abandoned. In the mean time the notion that Eastern Roumelia will after all be incorporated with Bulgaria seems to have become an idée fixe with the Bulgarians. The assembly of Bulgarian notables at Tirnova to elect a Prince, and organise the future Constitution, is announced for the 13th prox.—In BOSNIA all is quiet, a deputation of Bosnians has been to Pesth to present their respects to the Emperor of Austria, and the Novi Bazar question appears to have been temporarily settled by Austria having requested the Porte to sanction the appointment of a resident Austrian officer in that town.—In ROUMANIA the delimitation of the Dobrudscha is the chief question, the Russians having objected to the decision of the Military Commission that the new Province should extend to the gates of Silistria, on the plea that this arrangement places the fortress at the mercy of Roumania.

FRANCE.——The death of the Princess Alice has called forth great sympathy for England and her Sovereign from all shades of opinion, and the fact that the whole English nation joins in the mourning of the Royal Family is pointed to as a significant sign of the perfect stability of monarchy in England. "There," writes the Temps, "Royalty is a national institution, and has long ceased to represent exclusively the rallying point of a particular party, opinion, or interest. Placed above the rivalries of politics, the Royal Family has won in respect what it has lost in personal and direct influence. Long ago other Royal Families in other countries might have won a situation similar to that occupied by the English dynasty in the esteem and affection of the English people, but they could never take to the part of impartial executors of the national will." Another and not quite so amicable discussion has also been going on respecting England, who despite of Lord Salisbury's despatch, is popularly credited with the intention of annexing Alexandretta in order to make that town the head of the Euphrates Valley Railway. The Republicans, headed by M. Gambetta's République Française, approve this measure, and warmly favour the extension of English influence in Asia Minor, but the Conservative papers are highly indignant at English encroachments in the East, and declare that under no monarchy would they have been permitted. Nevertheless, with all their party feeling the Reactionaries could find little to censure in M. Waddington's recent speech in the Senate, in which he vigorously defended the foreign policy of the Ministry, and pointed out that the chief clauses of the Treaty of Berlin were now either accomplished facts, or in the course of being effectually carried out. Referring to the attitude of France at the Congress, he declared that she came back from the meeting as she went, free from all engagements, and not inaptly described the Treaty as a "compromise between rival influences," possessing all the more chance of durability on that account. He spoke very strongly about Greece, and declared that to satisfy her would be to remove one of the most dangerous elements of discord in the East. Her boundaries must comprise the shores of Volo and Arta, about half of Thessaly, and a portion of Thrace. There is little else to chronicle in political circles beyond that the Senate have been discussing the Budget, and have restored the small increase of salary to the Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish pastors, which was struck down by the Lower House, that the Senators of the Left have issued a circular to the country with reference to the coming Senatorial elections, and that the Ministry have complied with the King of Spain's request not to send Count Horace de Choiseul as ambassador to Madrid, but have nevertheless appointed as staunch a Republican to the post—gallant Admiral Jaures.

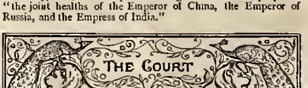
In Paris there has been a heavy fall of snow, and the cold has been intense. M. Rouland, the Governor of the Bank of France, has died suddenly, and is warmly regretted by all, as he was universally respected for his financial talent and his probity. There is little other news, save the death of M. Auguste Franc, a well-known dramatic author, and the first representation of a new three-act comic opera, Le Droit du Seigneur, by M. Leon Vasseur, at the Fantaisies Parisiennes, and of a short drama, Le Grand Père, by M. Georges Petit, at the Ambigu. M. Gigot, the Prefect of Police, has returned from London, and has instituted a reform which might be imitated over here—namely, that all persons arrested at night are examined at once, and can even be bailed out, instead of as heretofore being left in a common cell all night.

GERMANY.——The death of the Princess Alice has thrown a great gloom over the Court of Berlin, but as the details of her sad illness and the funeral on Wednesday will be found in our special article and in the "Court," we need only mention that universal sympathy is manifested with the Crown Princess as well as with Her Majesty in their bereavement.

ITALY.——Signor Cairoli having failed to reconstruct a Ministry, has definitively resigned, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the King, and Signor Depretis undertook the task, which was rendered yet more difficult by the antagonism and bitterness of the existing personal feelings. He succeeded, however, in forming a Cabinet on Wednesday, but as there is a practical Opposition of 379 in a House of 508, the Ministry is not likely to have a long life.—The Pope is still showing signs of conciliation, is said to have instructed the Catholic electors to vote for the Italian Government, and is expected to issue a circular to the Catholic Press, reproving it for its intemperance. There has been a serious earthquake at Calatagirone, Sicily. There was a panic in the church, and two women were trampled to death, and twenty persons injured.

UNITED STATES.——The little matter of the 2,000,000*l.* which remain from the Geneva award has again been before the House of Representatives, where a Bill has been discussed distributing the money. Three parties are contending for the balance; but, as The Times' correspondent remarks, nobody in Congress has yet proposed to repay the money to England.—The Senate has passed a measure regulating the method of counting the votes at the Presidential elections, and the Appropriation Committee has announced the Diplomatic Salaries Bill, restoring the reductions of the amounts at present paid which had been as voted by the Lower House.—The cotton crop this season is eleven per cent. better than that gathered last year. Gold was sold without a premium on Tuesday for the first time since specie payments were suspended in 1862—par in greenbacks being the best bid for gold.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In EGYPT the Khedive has issued two decrees defining the duties and functions of the new Ministers, Mr. Rivers Wilson having the power to deal with all matters of finance and the administration of the harbour of Alexandria, while all the other harbours and public works belong to M. Blignières' department. Signor Bamvelli has been appointed Auditor-General.—SPAIN has at last definitively concluded an Extradition Treaty with Great Britain.—In RUSSIA there has been a great demonstration of students before the Czarevitch's Palace in order to petition against certain academical grievances. The Prefect declared the demonstration illegal, and ordered it to be dispersed, and there is considerable irritation in consequence among the students.—Mr. William Anderson, the Superintendent of the Telegraph in CRETE, has been murdered with his native servant outside the gates.—From SOUTH AFRICA the news is no better, Sir Bartle Frere has sent an ultimatum to the Zulu King, and the reply was daily expected when the mail left on the 26th ult.—Señor Pardo, the President of the Peruvian Senate and ex-President of PERU, has been assassinated on the steps of the Senate.—From CHINA we hear that Mr. Pope Hennessy, the Governor of Hong Kong, has paid a visit to Canton, where he was most warmly received by the authorities. Chung How, the Ambassador to Russia, has also been entertained by Mr. Hennessy, who, at a banquet in Chung How's honour, proposed "the joint healths of the Emperor of China, the Emperor of Russia, and the Empress of India."

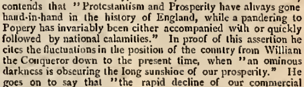


THE COURT

THE Court has been thrown into the deepest mourning by the death of the Queen's third child, the Princess Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt, who died of diphtheria at Darmstadt on Saturday, the 17th anniversary of her father's death. Full particulars will be found in another column, but we may mention that the Queen was the more overcome by the news of her daughter's death as the previous accounts of her condition had been more satisfactory. The Prince and Princess of Wales were with Her Majesty at the time the news arrived, having gone to Windsor as usual for the services always held at the Frogmore Mausoleum on the anniversary of the Prince Consort's death. These services, however, were postponed, although the Queen and the Royal Family walked down privately to the Mausoleum in the afternoon. Prince and Princess Christian also came up to the Castle, and the Princess stayed to lunch with Her Majesty. Next day Dean Stanley performed a brief private service in the White Drawing Room, the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold alone being present, and in the afternoon the Duchess of Teck paid Her Majesty a short visit. On Monday morning the Prince and Princess of Wales left Windsor for town, Prince Leopold following shortly afterwards, while the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh came down to Windsor, and lunched with the Queen. On Tuesday evening the Princess of Wales arrived to stay with Her Majesty, and on Wednesday the funeral of the Princess Alice was commemorated by a solemn service held in the private chapel of Windsor Castle, and attended by the Queen, the Princess of Wales, Princess Beatrice, and the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Duke of Connaught, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duchess of Teck, who had arrived at the Castle in the morning. The Royal Household was also present. The service was conducted by the Hon. and Rev. Gerald Wellesley, the Dean of Windsor, who read some appropriate prayers. The anthem was Elvey's "The souls of the righteous are in the hands of God," and the hymn, "Thy will be done." After the service the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duchess of Teck returned to London, the Princess of Wales and the Duke of Connaught remaining at the Castle. Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice were to leave yesterday (Friday) for the Isle of Wight for Christmas. Though much overcome by her loss the Queen has not seriously suffered in health. Mourning for the Princess will be worn by the Court until the 29th prox., being lightened on the 8th prox., while a general mourning for three weeks has been commanded. The Berlin, St. Petersburg, and Viennese Courts are also in mourning.

The Prince of Wales, accompanied by Princes Leopold and Christian, left London on Monday night to attend the funeral at Darmstadt. Crossing viâ Queenborough and Flushing, they arrived at Frankfort on Tuesday night, and next day went straight to Darmstadt, as, from fear of infection, the Prince, neither slept at Darmstadt nor visited their brother-in-law and his children. For the same reason the Emperor of Germany requested the Imperial Prince and Princess not to attend the funeral, while the Duke of Connaught, at the Queen's desire came away from Berlin without going to Darmstadt, the Imperial family being represented at the funeral by General Goltz, Colonel Panwitz, Count Matuschka, and Count Seckendorff. The Duke of Cambridge was prevented from being present by an attack of gout. The Grand Duchess' body was removed on Tuesday evening from the Palace to the Court Chapel, where a brief burial service was read by the English chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Sillitoe, and the coffin remained before the altar until next day, when the final obsequies were performed. At an early hour on Wednesday the public were admitted to the church to view the coffin, and at two o'clock the various dignitaries and members of the Diplomatic Body arrived to take part in the ceremony. When the congregation had assembled, the Grand Duke and some members of his family, the Prince of Wales, Prince Leopold, Prince Christian, the Marquis of Hertford (representing the Queen), the Grand Dukes of Mecklenburg and Baden arrived, and the service, which was performed according to the rites of the German Evangelical Communion, was read by the Grand Ducal Chaplain and the Rev. Mr. Sillitoe. This being concluded, a procession was formed, and the body was conveyed to the new Ducal Mausoleum at Rosenhohe. On reaching the Mausoleum, a short service was read, and the coffin finally consigned to the vault. After the ceremony the Prince of Wales and Prince Leopold returned to Frankfort, whence they were to come back to England on Thursday.

The Duke of Edinburgh arrived at Spithead in the Black Prince from Halifax early on Monday morning, having been somewhat delayed by fogs. The Duke came up to town at once.—The Duke of Connaught, on leaving Berlin, was seen off at the station by the Imperial Princess, the Imperial Prince being kept at home by a severe cold and sore throat. The Duke reached London early on Wednesday. His wedding will probably not be postponed, but will be celebrated very quietly. The marriage of the Princess Thyra of Denmark and the Duke of Cumberland will also take place to-day (Saturday) in the Court Chapel at Amaliensborg. The ceremony will be performed according to the Lutheran Ritual, and the Princess will be attended by six bridesmaids, while the Duke's best man, in the absence of the Prince of Wales, will be the King of Denmark's Prince William. Early in January the new-married pair will go to Vienna to visit the Duke's mother, the ex-Queen of Hanover.—Anent weddings, it is reported that King Alphonso's second sister, the Infanta Maria del Pilar, is to be married to a Prince of the Orleans family.



CHURCH NEWS

THE PARTNER OF PROTESTANTISM.——The Rev. Hely H. Smith, Rector of Tansley, Matlock, in a letter to the Record, contends that "Protestantism and Prosperity have always gone hand-in-hand in the history of England, while a pandering to Popery has invariably been either accompanied with or quickly followed by national calamities." In proof of this assertion he cites the fluctuations in the position of the country from William the Conqueror down to the present time, when "an ominous darkness is obscuring the long sunshine of our prosperity." He goes on to say that "the rapid decline of our commercial prosperity, if we may argue from past experience and analogy, is simply the inevitable consequence of the giant strides Romanism and Ritualism (which is Romanism under another name) are making in our land. The Protestant question is therefore the great political question of the day. It is to be hoped that the electors of Great Britain will bear this in mind when next they are called upon to choose their representatives."

VARIOUS.——The conduct of the Bishops with regard to the Afghan War is severely commented upon by the Nonconformist, which points out that of twenty-six prelates only eight were present in the House of Lords when the division took place, while only two paired, and that the Bishop of Oxford was alone in voting against the war. The Spectator remarks that "with the See of Durham vacant, perhaps the result is not so bad as might have been expected." The Echo has also published adverse criticism upon the attitude taken by their lordships, and thus extracted a letter from the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who defends his vote on the ground that as an Englishman he regards the war as a just one, and as a minister of the Gospel he considers that for England's power now to wane in India would be for the evangelisation of that part of the world to be retarded perhaps for centuries.—The controversy between the Lord Chief Justice and Lord Penzance respecting the Prestbury Ritual case would be extremely amusing were it not for the saddening thought that there is something deeply humiliating in the spectacle of two of the most learned lawyers and highest dignitaries of the Bench thus rushing into print for the purpose of a wordy war into which by far too much of the personal element is imported. The letter written by the Lord Chief Justice in reply to Lord Penzance makes a closely-printed pamphlet of sixty-four pages, and is full of the most scathing sarcasm; whilst the rejoinder of Lord Penzance in Tuesday's Times is perhaps even more cutting by reason of its contemptuous brevity. Lord Penzance acknowledges the receipt of the pamphlet, which he considers "less intended for his perusal than for that of the public." He learns from the Times article that it is "a model of angry controversy," and therefore thinks that he had better refrain from reading it, as by that means he shall escape another blow to his "too sensitive vanity," and remain able to subscribe himself with much respect "Yours very faithfully."—The revision of the New Testament is now complete, with the exception of some few questions which have been reserved to the end, and the consideration of any further suggestions which may be made by the American Company. The Revisionists, who number twenty-four, commenced in June, 1870, and have spent 337 days in the work, holding eighty-five sessions, the average attendance of members being fifteen.—Mr. C. F. Gardner, B.A., of Cambridge, has been chosen Secretary of the Curates' Augmentation Fund. There were 700 candidates.—The Baptist Missionary Society has lost a valuable servant by the sudden death of the Rev. Clement Bailhache, who had been for eight years one of their most active secretaries. Mr. Bailhache, who was only forty-eight years of age, had been successively minister of Baptist churches at Leeds, Watford, and Islington. He was for many years editor of the Juvenile Missionary Herald, and a frequent contributor to the Church and other Baptist periodicals.

Music

Her Majesty's Theatre.——The winter season at reduced prices closes this evening. Since our last there is little to record. Signor Bonetti has played Giorgio Germont in La Traviata, and Valentine in Faust, in both of which he gave satisfaction. He has a voice of sufficient capability, which, though by no means powerful, has evidently been well cultivated. His personal bearing, moreover, not to speak of his acting, would seem to indicate that he is no novice to the boards. In consequence of the indisposition of Madame Pappenheim Faust was substituted for Oberon at Wednesday's morning performance.

Madame Viard Louis' Concerts.——The second of these very interesting concerts was even more attractive than the first. The well varied programme, in fact, did not show one weak point. It comprised, moreover, novelty as well as excellence. To begin—a very piquant and cleverly-written Rondo Scherzoso, by Mr. F. Corder, a "Mendelssohn scholar," and student at our Royal Academy of Music, afforded general satisfaction, and well merited the applause it obtained. Then we had an entr'acte and some ballet music from Cherubini's last Parisian opera, Ali Baba (brought out in 1833), which, though it created no extraordinary impression, contains some very fine music. The Grand March, too, from the Troyens (produced at the Théâtre Lyrique in 1863), was also welcome, as a characteristic specimen of a great, though wayward, genius. The new piece, however, which excited most curiosity was a Symphony in F major, from the pen of the late Hermann Goetz, whose opera, The Taming of the Shrew, was heard not long since, indifferently performed, at Drury Lane. About this work we do not feel competent, after a single hearing, to offer a definite opinion, although our impression, we may say without hesitation, was highly favourable. As to its originality there can hardly be a doubt; and what must have especially gratified those amateurs who willingly accept new revelations of the musical art is that, while clearly the outcome of an independent mind, the Symphony in F has no taint of Wagnerism, or what is still worse (to coin another new word) Lisztism, in any part. Each of the four movements speaks for itself with convincing eloquence; and perhaps, before all, the adagio, without any of the broken and fragmentary affectation of the (ironically?) styled "Music of the Future," is one continuous stream of melody. That Goetz should have died so early after producing such a work is infinitely to be regretted. In him, as in Georges Bizet, who gave us Carmen, the art was deprived of a new, a genuine, and enthusiastic disciple. No praise can be too high for the admirable rendering of the symphony, under the direction of Mr. Weist Hill, who as a conductor has now scarcely a superior. True, thanks to the spirit and liberality of Madame Viard-Louis, the orchestra of ninety instrumentalists is one of the most complete and efficient ever heard in this country; but that to the finest orchestra a good conductor is indispensable will be readily admitted. What has been said about the execution of the symphony applies with no less truth to that of Mendelssohn's fiery overture to Victor Hugo's Ruy Blas, with which the concert began, and to the pretty minuetto for stringed instruments, by Boccherini, one of the most prolific composers of the eighteenth century. This, for the earliest introduction of which we are indebted to Mr. Weist Hill, when director of the Alexandra Palace Concerts, was encored and repeated. Madame Viard-Louis herself was originally announced for two pieces—Mozart's superb Concerto in D minor (pianoforte and orchestra) and Sterndale Bennett's exquisitely graceful Rondo Piacevole; but owing to an accident to her right hand, even now not sufficiently remedied, she was compelled to limit her exertions to the concerto. This she played from beginning to end, with great spirit, showing more than ordinary taste and expression in her reading of the Romance in B flat major, a truly Mozartean—which is equivalent to saying Orphean—melody. Madame Viard-Louis' substitute in the second part of the concert was Miss Bessie Richards, a young English pianist from whom high things may be expected. She has not often appeared in public, but has already made herself favourably known at the excellent chamber concerts held by Mr. Pettit at Langham Hall. Miss Richards belongs evidently to the school of Clara Schumann, Arabella Goddard, and such legitimate performers. Her mechanism is beyond reproach, her phrasing unaffected and well-balanced, her execution brilliant, with no attempt whatever at exaggerated display. She selected for solo Chopin's well-known Scherzo in B flat minor, a very difficult piece, but in no way to difficult for her. In fact, it could hardly have been rendered with more spirit and accuracy. In Miss Richards we have reason to look for another pianist likely to do honour to the English school. Her playing was thoroughly appreciated by the audience. The concert altogether was one deserving unqualified commendation; and if only Madame Viard-Louis succeeds in her project of establishing regular orchestral performances of a high class in London during the winter season, she will have rendered a service to the musical community (and we are growing more and more musical every day), hardly to be over-estimated.

London Ballad Concerts.——At the last concert before Christmas two new songs were introduced, namely, "The White Cockade," by Sainton-Dolby, and "London Bridge," by Molloy. They are both very good songs, and were worthily rendered by Miss Mary Davies and Mr. Maybrick.—The rest of the programme was composed of old favourites, all of which were sung by Madame Antoinette Sterling, Madame Sherrington, Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Hollins in their best manner.

Royal Aquarium, Westminster.——A series of operatic concerts, under the able management of M. Charles Dubois, was brought to a close on Saturday evening last, to the general regret of those who had been especially attracted by the high-class music rendered. We congratulate M. Dubois upon his concerts, and shall look forward to a repetition of them.

Waifs.——The Royal Italian Opera will open at the usual period next spring, under the joint direction of Messrs. Ernest and Herbert Gye. All the engagements made with artists by the late Mr. Frederick Gye hold good; and, among others, Madame Adelina Patti, happily for subscribers, has signified her intention of returning to her post.—Dr. Hans von Bülow has returned to Hanover. He has already begun a series of letters in the Leipsic Signale, narrating his most recent experiences in this "foggy" land. That no one will escape the censure of this famous controversialist may be taken for granted. His first letter, all about himself, is naturally couleur de rose.—Madame Montigny Remaury, the accomplished French pianist, has left London for Brussels, to fulfil a professional engagement.—Mr. Carl Rosa's Opera Company has been performing with great success at Birmingham.—The new concert-piece composed by Rubinstein for Madame Essipoff, the distinguished Russian pianist, is entitled "Caprice Russe."

"DO NOT SEND US AWAY!"

By the Author of "Coming Thro' the Rye."

"Do not send us away!" is the cry of hundreds of childish voices that comes to us from the East, a host of tiny outstretched hands appealing at Shadwell to us against the closure of the doors of the East London Hospital for Children through lack of funds. So urgently is money needed, that unless at once forthcoming, this small Ark by the river-side, this small "Star in the East," will before long have practically ceased to exist. Hitherto the great heart of the public has beat so warmly in its favour as to enable it, though at infinite struggle and pains, to keep its head above water, but the terrible calamities with which our nation has recently been visited have appealed so largely to the sympathies of the benevolent as to divert from those hospitals, which subsist mainly on charity, the donations that otherwise would have been bestowed upon them.

And of these noble and beneficent institutions, whose aim it is to reduce the gigantic sum total of human misery and suffering, there is surely not one more richly deserving of help than that for which I, in common with many others, make my earnest appeal to-day.

We may refuse our pity to the grown man or woman, who through improvidence, intemperance or vice, has wilfully destroyed the health he or she originally possessed, but we cannot to the poor helpless little creatures who suffer through no fault or sin of their own, who are often worse than fatherless and motherless, and to whom the one chance given them by being admitted to this hospital may be the turning-point in their existences, which shall decide whether they grow up to live healthy useful lives, competent to do their duty manfully as citizens, or gradually develope into stunted vicious creatures.

Do they not cry aloud to us, these little shadowed, blighted lives for room and air in which to grow and press towards the light? It might move any man's heart to pity to pay a visit to the wards and see the tiny creatures, some of them not more than a few days old, lying moaning on their pillows, though, if he will only reflect upon what their sufferings would have been when fighting for their lives in a squalid crowded room without a single appliance at hand capable of relieving them, he will perceive that they are indeed well off where they are. There are nearly one hundred thousand children in this district alone, which is an incredibly poor one, it may be judged therefore what are the feelings of the mothers, when, on reaching the doors that have given hospitable ingress to forty thousand patients since its inauguration, they are met by the information that in the present state of the funds no more patients can be admitted. To many of them it means death; to-morrow even or next day may be too late, to-day skilled help must come or the child dies, and then it is that the poor mothers cry aloud, "Do not send us away!"

Donations will be thankfully received by the Treasurer, Dr. Norris; the Secretary, Mr. Warner; or Messrs. Prescott, of Threadneedle Street.

Theatres

A new extravaganza brought out on Monday evening at the Strand Theatre, with the title of the Desperate Adventures of the Baby, or the Wandering Heir, has all the extravagance that the frequenters of that popular little house are accustomed to expect in a new burlesque, but is unfortunately without that degree of method in its madness which even in pieces of this kind cannot safely be dispensed with. This is a trifle of the Nemesis pattern—a combination of French farce and the modern type of showy extravaganza—differing from the latter class of entertainments in their purest form by reason of the attempt of the authors to develop a consecutive story, however wild or absurd. In this case the humorous complications arise from the loss of an infant on the day of its intended christening, and from the adventures of its three godfathers in endeavouring to trace the whereabouts of the missing heir. The scene being in Paris, we are introduced to some effective views of Parisian localities, and there is some fun in the notion of each of the godfathers finding a baby in possession of a keeper of the gardens of the Tuileries, and securing it in the belief that he has been the successful man of the party. The authors, Mr. Charles Ross and Mr. Freer, however, have been chiefly intent upon complicating their child hunt with the adventures of a certain Countess, whose secret interviews with a young nobleman excite the tempestuous jealousy of an Oriental gentleman, described as the Rajah Reaf Jam, to whom she is engaged. Out of these elements a brisk and bustling succession of incidents is evolved, including many grotesque and farcical situations; but the wit of the dialogue is rather forced. Fortunately for the success of the piece M. Marius's performance of the part of the "wily Oriental" is full of most amusing absurdities; and the grace and spirit of Miss Lottie Venne's performance in the character of the Nurse deservedly win the favour of the audience. There is moreover a good deal of singing, dancing, and orchestral music of a lively kind. Miss Violet Cameron as the Countess and Mr. Loredan as the young nobleman referred to are quite at home in singing parts in the burlesque, and Mr. Harry Cox, as the leading godfather, in the most extravagant of French agricultural holiday costumes, could hardly fail to awaken loud laughter, among a Strand audience. The piece was at all events well received. Though not one of the cleverest of the extravaganzas that have been seen on the stage of Mrs. Swanborough's theatre, it is a sufficiently lively after-piece to the revived comedy of His Last Legs, in which clever piece Mr. W. H. Vernon plays with even more than his accustomed spirit.

An amusing little vaudeville, entitled After All, has been produced at the Opera Comique by way of after piece to Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera, H.M.S. Pinafore. The story sets forth the anguish and regret of a sentimental gentleman who returns from Australia to find that the young lady of his dreams is married to an old schoolfellow and companion; but it also exhibits the dawn of feelings of a totally different description, as the misery which the supposed happy husband is enduring from his wife's temper becomes slowly but only too surely revealed. The piece is almost entirely sustained by two personages represented by Mr. Barrington and Mr. Temple, though the necessity for the occasional appearance of a servant who threatens to "give warning" like her score of predecessors on account of "missis's temper," furnishes another little part which is pleasantly sustained by Miss Jessie Bond. From first to last the lady does not appear, but the sound of her voice in dispute with a cabman below furnishes such convincing corroboration of the sentimental gentleman's dawning suspicions that he hastily disappears from the scene as the curtain descends. The trifle, which is the joint production of Mr. Frank Despres and Mr. Arthur Cellier, is acted with much spirit and humour. It is cleverly written, and is provided with some humorous solos and concerted pieces of a melodious kind. Mr. D'Oyly Carte announces that he is by the terms of the lease compelled to close his theatre for repairs after the 24th inst. It will, however, reopen, entirely renovated and redecorated, with its present programme, on the 18th of February. This day (Saturday) the last morning performance of H.M.S. Pinafore before that date will take place, followed by the appearance of Mr. George Grossmith the younger, in his drawing-room sketch, entitled A Christmas Pantomime.

The first performance of the new grand Christmas Pantomime at the Gaiety will take place this afternoon. The author is Mr. Byron; the subject Jack the Giant Killer. The Royal Aquarium pantomime, also to be produced this afternoon, is founded on the story of Aladdin.

Moore and Burgess Minstrels.——During the Christmas holidays this world-renowned entertainment will take place, as in former years, in the large St. James's Hall.

Sporting

Under this heading our weekly Notes must necessarily be brief, as frost and snow have sadly interfered with steeplechasing and "timber-topping," as also with coursing; and consequently "Story there is none to tell, sir!" However, horses, dogs, jockeys, trainers, judges, slippers, and other animals, including foxes, will enjoy a little rest, and not be unthankful to the meteorological authorities for the rest accorded to them. Skaters, per contra, are in high glee, or at least were so a few hours ago.

Aquatics.——Naturally enough, since the Trial Eights have been rowed at both the Universities, there has been a good deal of talk as to the relative prospects of each for the great Putney race. The general impression seems to be that both Oxford and Cambridge have plenty of good raw material, though it may be a trifle below the average. The great difficulty for Oxford next term will be to find a good stroke, and it seems not improbable that as many as six new hands will be wanted for the Putney crew. Cambridge is in a somewhat similar position, as she will probably lose four of the best men who were in this year's crew. There is a rumour, however, that both Gurdon and Hocken will be available; and, if this turns out to be the case, the Light Blues will start training with an advantage over the Dark.

Football.——Here, again, King Frost has forbidden several arranged and interesting matches to be played, among which may be mentioned Oxford v. Cambridge, under Rugby Rules, and two which Cambridge was to have played at Glasgow, under Association Rules, against Queen's Park and Glasgow University.—Some fair games, however, have been brought off. The Eton Ramblers have played the "Boys" at the school "In the field," and beaten them by one goal and four "rouges" to one goal and one "rouge."—At Bramall Lane, Sheffield has given Birmingham a terrible beating, the score being ten goals to none.

Cricket.——Though there is nothing suggestive of this game about our climate just now, we must not forget that at the Antipodes it is in full season, and hence the doings of Lord Harris's Eleven among the colonists are by no means without interest. They have commenced well at Adelaide by beating Sixteen Players of South Australia by four wickets. Their next match is at Melbourne against the Australian Eleven which showed such excellent form in this country last season.—Now that the results of the inter-county cricket have been tabulated, it would seem that Middlesex, which could not win a match in 1877, stands at the head of the list for 1878, not having lost an engagement. The metropolitan county, however, only played six matches, winning three and drawing three; and therefore Nottinghamshire with seven won, three lost, and four drawn, is fairly entitled to be considered the premier county, Gloucestershire, though fallen from her high estate, coming next with four wins, two lost, and four draws.

Legal

Threatening the Queen's Life.——On Thursday last week the evening papers came out with the startling announcement that a man named Madden had been arrested for threatening to shoot the Queen. The actual charge brought against the prisoner, who is a Frenchman of Irish parentage, was that of sending threatening letters—two addressed to Mr. Cross, one to the Hon. A. Liddell, and a fourth to Lord Lynns. They were written in French, and a remand was ordered that exact translations might be made. Their purport was said to be that if certain demands for money were not complied with, the writer would visit Balmoral to "change the form of Government;" but The Times report states that one of them contained a distinct threat to shoot the Queen. It was also rumoured that a pistol-shot had been heard as the Royal train was passing through an intermediate station during Her Majesty's recent journey from Scotland to Windsor. The police, however, think that the noise heard was probably only that of a fog-signal, and they have no belief in the suggestion that Madden is in any way connected with either the Socialists or the Internationalists. He is regarded as an imbecile, and it is said that he has threatened every crowned head in Europe, but in no case has he made any attempt to put his threats into execution.

The Burton Crescent Murder.——Much excitement has been created by the shocking murder which was committed last week. The victim was an old lady named Samuels, the widow of a diamond merchant, who lived almost alone, the only other occupant of the house being a Polish musician, named Borschutzki, who, on returning home about midnight on the Wednesday, found his landlady lying dead in the kitchen. He at once fetched her son, who lived near by, and the police being called in, it was found that the old lady had been beaten to death with a hat-rack studded with large nails. Her boots and wedding-ring had been stolen, the pocket of her dress had been cut or

THE T'KINT AND FORTAMPS TRIAL AT BRUSSELS—SKETCHES IN COURT torn away, and some attempt had been made to wash away the blood-stains from the floor and stairs. There was no sign of the house having been broken into, and this fact caused suspicion to fall upon a woman named Mary Donovan, a charwoman employed by the deceased. This woman, on being arrested, admitted having been at the house on the day of the murder; but said that when she left, Mrs. Samuels was engaged in conversation with a man who had called about some apartments which were to let. Donovan, who it seems is much given to drink, is said to have stayed away from her home all night on the Wednesday, and some stains, supposed to be blood, were found upon the dress and shawl which she was then wearing. There is, however, no direct evidence against her as yet, and her husband, to whom she has only recently been married, speaks of her as a kind and gentle woman, who could not possibly entertain a murderous thought. The inquest has been opened and adjourned, and Donovan is to be again examined at Bow Street this day (Saturday), when the Treasury will take up the prosecution.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Great consternation was caused on Saturday morning in the Law Courts by an announcement made by Vice-Chancellor Malins that Lord Chief Justice Cockburn was dead. It was, however, subsequently stated that there was no truth in the report, and that his lordship's health had so far improved that he hoped to resume his duties very soon. The mistake arose from the Vice-Chancellor having received verbal information of the death of a solicitor named Cowburn.—On Tuesday, Chief Justice Cockburn resumed the hearing of Mr. Robertson's libel action against Truth, Mr. Serjeant Ballantine having sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to take up the case. The trial was still going on when we went to press.—The trial of the Glasgow Bank directors has been fixed for January 20th. Another arrest has been made—that of Mr. William Scott, a partner of Innes, Wright, and Co., who is accused of having embezzled or stolen 48,000*l.*, the proceeds received for discounting bills. In the Edinburgh Court of Session the appeal made by Mr. John Hunter, of Glasgow, against the placing of his name on the list of City of Glasgow Bank shareholders, on the ground that "he only obliged the manager by giving the use of his name, paid no money, and received no dividends," has been dismissed by Lord Young, who thought that the complainant had knowingly done what was wrong with the effect of keeping up the shares.—It is said that Mr. Cross has drafted a Bill suggested by the recent calamities in the banking world. It will deal specially with the system of auditing accounts, and will be introduced in February.

THE SUNBURY WALL DECORATION is in ornamental relief like wood carving. It is waterproof, and impermeable to moisture or damp. It is almost indestructible, and the first cost is the last. It can be washed, or even scrubbed, with soap and water. It will not absorb infection. It is, therefore, highly sanitary. It has a warm and comfortable appearance. It can be adapted by architects to any style of building. It is suitable for Drawing-rooms, Dining-rooms, Morning-rooms, Billiard-rooms, Banks, Theatres and Concert-rooms, Churches and Chapels, Steam Boats and Railway Carriages. It is applicable for Dados, Panels, Cornices, Friezes, Borders, Door-panels, Cabinet-panels, Folding Screens.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

THE BUILDER.—For the internal decoration of houses its warm and comfortable appearance makes it peculiarly applicable.
ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—We need not hesitate to say that Muralis is destined to play a very important part in the present revival of the arts of wall embellishment.
THE BUILDING NEWS.—The clearness and precision of the ornamentation leaves nothing to be desired.
THE COURT CIRCULAR.—It is obvious that Muralis has a great future before it, and that it will, at no distant date, obtain a wide popularity.
WHITEHALL REVIEW.—No words of mine could convey an accurate idea of its utility and beauty.
COURT JOURNAL.—One advantage, too, it is quite proof against indentation.

THE OLD THEATRICAL PIT

WHEN the widow of an eminent equestrian manager was descanting to Alfred Bunn and a literary friend upon the magnificence of her late husband's resting-place, she added, by way of peroration, that, when their time came, she felt sure that nothing would be more in accordance with her deceased spouse's wishes than that their remains should repose with his; upon which Bunn annotated the lugubrious courtesy by the sotto voce remark, to his companion, that it was an order for two to the pit.

As a play upon words the joke was as good as it was heartless, but as a metaphor it was especially false. At the time when the jest was uttered, the pit, so far from being the place where the dead or even moribund drama found quiet, was just the locality in which the greatest efforts would be made to keep it alive. Years after the utterance of this jeu de mot, when a deservedly favourite actress visited the Alhambra, then devoted to a music hall entertainment, she exclaimed, in looking round at the crowded auditorium, thinking doubtless of the beggarly account of empty benches which she had just left, "Here are the vitals of the theatre." We doubt if she could have been quite correct in her deduction, for the amusements of a music hall are hardly those that would be attractive to an intelligent votary of the play, but if she were so, she might have accounted to herself for such desertion from the temples of Thespis, when she remembered the manner in which the most steadfast and earnest supporters of the drama had been treated by theatrical managers, driven as they were, and are, far away from the stage to make room for those who, although they pay three or four times as much for their stall as used to be charged for pit seats, yet occupy four times the space that was required by the latter.

In the early days of the drama the frequenters of the parterre had to be satisfied with but scanty comfort, many theatrical performances being given, during the years of Elizabeth's reign antecedent to Shakespeare's writing for the stage, in the yards of the inns, where the platform for the actors was erected (with its back to the gateway), and where the pit was but the standing room in front, without either protection from the elements or benches for rest. In this respect the Globe Theatre was but little if any better, and Shakespeare calls that part of his audience "groundlings," while Ben Jonson distinctly designates them "the understanding gentlemen of the ground." A chronicler has estimated that the admission at that time to the pit of such theatres as the Globe and Blackfriars was sixpence, the same charge as that made for the galleries, but that in lower theatres it was only a penny or twopence. The critic's place was not in the pit in those days; he was accommodated, at least in the so-called private play-houses, such as was the Blackfriars, with a stool on the stage, or, at any rate, was permitted to sit on the boards there, where he had pages to wait upon him, with pipes and tobacco, which Sir Walter Raleigh had taught his countrymen to like. But already the pit was beginning to obtain consideration, for we are told that at the Blackfriars, as well as at the Cockpit and Salisbury Court Theatres, where they acted by candlelight, they had pits for the gentry.

After the Restoration, the pit, at any rate at first, gave a foretaste of what it would one day become, for, in 1665 or 1666, Lacy, in the prologue to his farce of Old Troop, appeals to the gallery to protect him from the censures of the pit, which the vulgar humour of the piece deserved. Dryden, in the second prologue to his Secret Love; or, The Maiden Queen (a tragi-comedy that enabled Nell Gwyn to delight Pepys as much as she charmed the King, who afterwards graced the work "with the title of his play"), specially refers, if not in a very complimentary manner, to the critical pretensions of the occupiers of the pit, protesting against their having any voice in the matter:—

> No critic's verdict should, of right, stand good,
> They are excepted all as men of blood:
> And the same law shall shield him (the author) from their fury,
> Which has excluded butchers from a jury.

The pit, however, had more than its men of taste to distinguish it, it had also those who judged the disputes of public and managers, as Victor, in his "History of the Theatres of London and Dublin," tells us. Among other riots was one on the question of increased prices at Drury Lane in 1736, which resulted in a country gentleman being taken into custody for hissing. The magistrate was "too cunning to meddle in the affair," but the arrest aroused the indignation of the house, and, upon the manager pleading his privilege, he not being an actor, of exemption from coming on the stage, a deputation was sent round from the pit to meet him in the green room, the rest of the audience waiting for the report of their representatives. A compromise of the interests of public and management was happily arranged, which shows that the occupiers of the pit were as reasonable at the moment of victory as they had been resolute during the struggle.

But a more important dispute, and one which exhibits the acknowledged social position of the pit of those days, occurred in connection with the Licensing Act of 1738. Among other grievances resulting from this law was the shutting up of the little theatre in the Haymarket, a hardship for the actors engaged, but intended to silence the satires against Walpole which Fielding, who had the management of the theatre, used to put into the mouths of his company there. To make matters worse, however, at the very time when the English players were walking about idle and hungry, or lying in gaol and in debt, a company of French strollers were licensed to act at this same establishment, the advertisement being headed with the words, "By Authority." We have not space to recount the scene that took place on the evening when the entertainment was to be given. Victor himself was in the pit, as were two Westminster Justices—one of the latter announcing that he came there to assert the King's authority, but was told that the present actors must take their fate from the public, a statement that was preceded by the assertion that "the judicature of the Pit had been acknowledged and acquiesced to, Time immemorial." We may add that their actions were no weaker than their words, and in defiance of two files of grenadiers standing on the stage with bayonets fixed, objects of intimidation that Justice Deveil had to order off the scene, unallured by specious promises, equally unawed by the threat that the "Proclamation" should be read, the objectors carried the day and compelled the lowering of the curtain, and the abrupt conclusion of a performance of which not one word had been heard.

But there was less excuse for disturbances upon a similar question in our own days, when a French troupe tried to act Monte Christo at Drury Lane. English actors were not arbitrarily shut out of theatres then by the tyranny of authority, indeed it was an outburst of popular prejudice which we would gladly forget. Speaking of Drury Lane, though, we may refer to an effort victoriously made by the Pittites to protect their rights from the aggression of that public which used to occupy the private boxes and dress circle. Some quarter of a century ago a farewell benefit was given to Mrs. Glover, who died a day or two after the event. To make the evening as productive as possible, half the pit was parted off as reserved seats, for which variously high sums were paid; but when the public entered their old territory, and saw that they were being deprived of half what was theirs, even the charitable object in view did not restrain them; they broke down the barriers, took possession of the places, and neither entreaties nor police warnings were efficacious in moving them.

The old theatrical pit was a strong-headed, strong thinking, and compact body. We remember a drama of Bayle Bernard's, produced at Drury Lane under Mr. Anderson's management, being damned, we thought at the time somewhat severely, by a resolute pit who would not have it. When we call to mind the pits which Macready used to sway, as though there was but one mind among so many men and women, we cannot help believing that the drama and the actor have made a bad exchange in getting those exquisite occupants of the stalls in place of so much earnestness and energy.

Our readers will recollect how Edmund Kean received his wife's inquiry as to what Lord Essex thought of his first performance of Sir Giles Overreach. "D—— Lord Essex, Mary," exclaimed the enthusiastic tragedian; "the pit rose at me!" What would not a wise actor give now for such a pit?

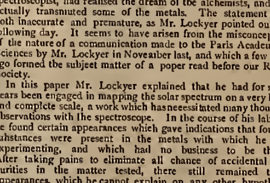
SCIENTIFIC NOTES

JUST one month ago the startling statement appeared in one of the London papers that Mr. Norman Lockyer, the eminent spectroscopist, had realised the dream of the alchemists, and had actually transmuted some of the metals. The statement was both inaccurate and premature, as Mr. Lockyer pointed out the following day. It seems to have arisen from the misconception of the nature of a communication made to the Paris Academy of Sciences by Mr. Lockyer in November last, and which a few days ago formed the subject matter of a paper read before our Royal Society.

In this paper Mr. Lockyer explained that he had for some years been engaged in mapping the solar spectrum on a very large and complete scale, a work which has necessitated many thousand observations with the spectroscope. In the course of his labours he found certain appearances which gave indications that foreign substances were present in the metals with which he was experimenting, and which had no business to be there. After taking pains to eliminate all chance of accidental impurities in the matter tested, there still remained these appearances, which he cannot explain on any other hypothesis than that of actual dissociation of the elements in question. His observations—interesting as they are—require proof before they can be said to have any direct bearing upon the elementary nature of the metals with which they deal. It has long been the opinion of chemists that many of the so-called elements may some day be proved to be of a compound nature, but they will require direct proofs before they consent to take a step which would revolutionise the science which they teach. In the mean time, Mr. Lockyer's labours will encourage others to work in the same field, and the appearances which he has recorded may possibly be traced to their true cause—be it dissociation or something else.

The so-called "rainbow ray," which has for some time been thrown across the Thames at Westminster, has roused so much speculation as to the means by which it is produced that we append an explanatory diagram. The light-source is a Serrin (electric) lamp (A), which is placed behind a compound lens, the upper half of which is shown in section at B. The dotted lines show how the rays of light are bent into one parallel beam. This lens was constructed for lighthouse use, with an oil lamp which gives a very large flame, in which case the light given would be white. But on substituting an electric arc (which in comparison with the oil lamp is merely a small point of light) without any alteration of focus, the white beam was found to break up into its constituent colours. It is suggested for use in in places in which a distinctive light is required.



The Autographic Telegraph Apparatus of M. d'Arlincourt has lately been tried at the General Post Office. But it is by no means the first machine which has been contrived for sending telegraphic messages in the actual handwriting of their originators. It was long ago shown by Davy that if an electric current were passed through paper moistened with certain chemical compounds, such compounds were decomposed or separated in such a manner that a coloured stain was the result. For instance, if a solution of prussiate of potash and ammonia be used, and the paper be placed on a zinc plate in communication with the zinc pole of a Daniell battery, a brilliant Prussian blue mark will be made on the paper, provided that the style or pen employed be in connection with the other pole of the battery. In like manner a solution of iodide of potassium and starch will give a brown stain, owing to the liberation of the iodine. Acting on these phenomena, Bakewell, in 1850, brought forward an instrument which has from time to time found many imitators.

In Bakewell's process the message is written in resinous ink, such as sealing-wax dissolved in spirit, on tin foil. The foil is then attached to a cylinder, which is so arranged that a pointer traverses every part of its surface as it revolves, the action being similar to the travelling tool of a screw-cutting lathe. A duplicate cylinder at the further station—also having a pointer, but having the tinfoil replaced by chemical paper—forms the recording instrument. The two cylinders are caused by clockwork to revolve at exactly the same rate, and an electric current passes through each pointer to the cylinders which they touch. It is evident that, supposing no interruption occurs—the pointer on each cylinder will describe a continuous spiral line—that on the first showing itself as a slight depression on the tinfoil, and on the second as a coloured mark. But the resinous ink forms a barrier through which the electricity will not flow, so that when any portion of the writing comes under the pointer, the current is broken. It follows that, this being the case, the recording pointer is no longer capable of acting upon the prepared paper. In the result, the writing upon the tinfoil is reproduced in white, upon a coloured ground formed of a multitude of fine lines. By covering the tinfoil with a varnish, and using an ink of caustic soda, the action is reversed, the copy appearing as coloured linear letters upon a white ground.

The d'Arlincourt apparatus is a modification of Bakewell's, and offers many points of improvement, which we need not enter into. By the kindness of Mr. Preece we are enabled to reproduce a pen-and-ink sketch (A), together with its copy (B), which was automatically drawn at the receiving station. It will be perceived that the latter is made up of the parallel lines due to the action of the pointer as described.

There is no doubt that in certain cases the autographic apparatus would be useful. Thus in war time the plan of a fort might be sent by telegraph, or a special correspondent might illustrate his despatches with sketches. Photography, too, might possibly be adapted to the apparatus, in which case its value would be inestimable. But as at present arranged it seems too slow in its action for the rapidity of communication which is universally demanded.

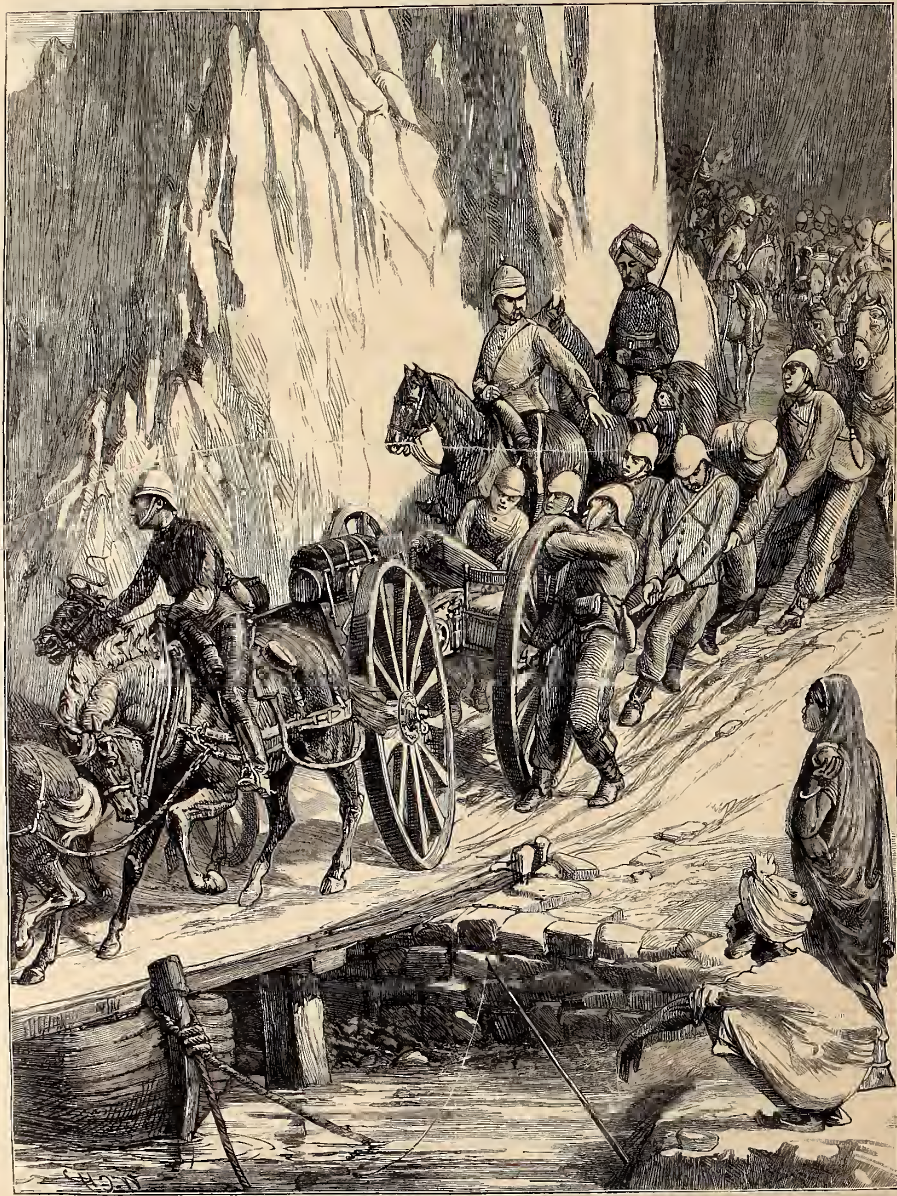
ROYAL ACADEMY.——At a General Assembly, held on the 19th inst., Mr. Henry Stacy Marks, painter, was elected an Academician.

MR. JOSEPH NASH, the well-known water-colour painter, has just died at the age of seventy-one. He commenced exhibiting at the Old Society of Painters in Water-colours as far back as 1835, showing drawings of French cathedrals and antiquities. In 1838 was published "Architecture of the Middle Ages," with illustrations from his pencil, and between 1839-1849 appeared "Mansions of England in the Olden Time," in four series, Mr. Nash's interiors, &c., being lithographed. Among Mr. Nash's pictures were "The Queen's Visit to Lincoln's Inn Hall," exhibited in 1846; "Interior Views of the Great Exhibition in 1851," "Charles V. Visiting Francis I. during his Confinement," shown at the Water-colour Society Exhibition in 1865; and "The Chapel of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey," shown at the same place in 1806.

THE TOYS, this year, of the Stereoscopic Company are much superior to any they have had before. The "secreted coin" is a capital puzzle for both young and old; it is based on the same principle as the egg trick, but is infinitely superior. The "home gilder" is no trick, but is a very useful article to have in the house; we have tried it on an old picture frame and found it most successful. The "atmospheric detonator" is a most amusing toy, which succeeds in making a loud report without any trouble or danger. "The Enchanted Mice" is an exceedingly clever and puzzling trick, the mice run about in a most life-like manner. The "Russian and Turk" is another scientific toy. The way the figures jump about is most amusing, they look exactly as if they were struggling for the mastery. The "Living Colours." These colours produce a splendid and gorgeous effect: it is a series of chemical experiments. "Cleopatra's Needle" is, as it says on the box, a very good paper-weight, but it is very little good for a trick, as it broke the first time it was used. The "Marksman" is a very ingenious sort of money-box, and affords great amusement. "Bismarck's Puzzle Box" is a very old trick, and needs no comment. The "Pistonette" is a very useful little match-box; it is much more convenient than the old-fashioned vesta cases, as there is no spring to get broken, and no trouble in getting the matches out of it.

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.——The North-Eastern Hospital for Children, Hackney Road, E., situated in one of the poorest parts of Bethnal Green, appeals for 3,000*l*. to complete and furnish their new building for fifty beds, and for 1,400*l*. to pay off a debt on the General Fund. Springing from a small dispensary established by two ladies in 1867, the Institution now includes two houses for in-patients, making up thirty beds, and a dispensary for out-patients, at which nearly 1,000 children are relieved weekly. The new building will be finished in a few months, and the number of beds will thus be raised to eighty. Contributions to be sent to the bankers, Messrs. Barclay and Bevan, 54, Lombard Street, and the Secretary, Mr. A. Nixon, 27, Clement's Lane, E.C.—The Metropolitan and National Nursing Association for Providing Trained Nurses for the Sick Poor also ask for funds to extend their work in nursing the sick poor in their own homes with a thoroughly skilled body of efficiently trained nurses. Subscriptions to be sent to the Secretary, Capt. Fortescue, at the Central Home and Offices, 23, Bloomsbury Square, W.C., or the bankers, Messrs. Cocks, Biddulph, and Co., Charing Cross.—The Church Penitentiary Association was founded in 1851 to assist in the maintenance of Houses of Mercy and Refuges throughout the country for the reception of fallen women penitents. Thirty-five are now in union with the Association. Each House of Mercy is sanctioned by the Bishop of the Diocese, and is managed by self-devoted women, a clergyman of the Church of England being Chaplain. Of the 1,170 penitents who left the various houses during the year, 483 are reported of favourably. The Association is in urgent need of increased support. Office, 32, Sackville Street, London, W.



ON THE MARCH TO THE FRONT—FIELD ARTILLERY CROSSING THE INDUS BY A BRIDGE OF BOATS AT KHOOSHIAHGURH

UNDER ONE ROOF: An Episode in a Family History

By JAMES PAYN,

AUTHOR OF "LOST SIR MASSINGBERD," "BY PROXY," ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW

IN spite of the gentleness of Mr. Ferdinand Walcot's manners, and of a certain attraction which he possessed for many persons, he was not without his enemies. His spirit was masterful, and unless he had the mastery he would sometimes become downright antagonistic. His theory of government wassomething like that of Mr. Carlyle—a despotism in able hands; but Mr. Walcot's definition would have been still more precise; it was necessary that the hands should be his own, and as they were kept always very neatly gloved, and were gentle, and even caressing, in their touch (unless when "temper," in rare cases, got the better of him), his yoke was not as a general rule resented; the majority of those who bore it were not even conscious of its existence, until there came some cause of disagreement; Lady Arden, for example, only perceived that he possessed the art of management in its highest form, and felt indebted to him for its exercise in all affairs of the household. She never dreamt that he was managing her. The young ladies, until quite recently, were not of an age to understand the system of government under which they lived, and even the Great Baba was not in rebellion against Mr. Walcot's régime, but only against Mr. Walcot. He did not recognise him as a rival sovereign, but only as a big black man who did not find favour in his eyes. Frank had never opposed him, but he had been the involuntary cause of opposition, because he had not been sent to school in accordance with his advice. At the very first opportunity, therefore, as we have seen, the iron hand had made itself felt through the velvet glove. From henceforth Frank was in his power, as other persons of a larger growth were.

He had all sorts of ways of catching his birds; if they flew headlong into his net, as in Frank's case, without even a lure, so much the better; it saved trouble, and left no traces of the lime. He never frightened them before he caught them—if he could possibly help it. But he had had some little trouble (and foresaw more of it) with one charming little songster, upon whose capture he had set his heart.

There had been a time when Evelyn Nicoll had delighted in having Uncle Ferdinand (so she had then called him) for her companion, when she had liked no one better—not excepting even George Gresham—at her pony's bridle rein in her rambles on the moor; she had listened to his fanciful weird stories with an interest that fell little of enchantment; she had hung upon his lips, as he discoursed with knowledge, admirably suited to her capacity, upon bird, and beast, and tree, with a child's hero-worship, and he had flattered himself that he had only to put forth his hand to make her captive.

Circumstances had occurred, perhaps, to hurry his ordinarily cautious movements, or perhaps he grew impatient to make sure, but certain it was that—quite in these later days—she had escaped his fingers. She had not got away, of course—he would have smiled at the possibility of such an occurrence—but something or other had given her an alarm. Only instead of fluttering (as some had done under the like circumstances) with beating heart and frightened eyes, she had become as hostile as a ruffled swan. He felt that he had all his work to do over again, though in a different manner. And not only was the iron hand in this case out of the question, but if he could have used it he would not have done so, for this bird, as sometimes happens, though very, very rarely, had caught the bird-catcher.

We have said that the only tenant of Halcombe Hall who was in open opposition to Ferdinand Walcot was Evelyn Nicoll, but there had been another rebel, who was now once more under that roof—namely, George Gresham; and in his case the bird-catcher felt no scruples. There was, in fact, a bitter quarrel between them, though known only to themselves; under the mask of a somewhat strained politeness they hated one another most cordially, and offered one more example of the fact that there is no war so virulent as civil war. It was an unequal combat, because one of the belligerents was more unscrupulous than the other: when one side poisons wells and the other shrinks from it, the former has a positive though an undue advantage; but, for all that, George Gresham was no despicable foe. The very impetuousness of his assaults, which excited the other's contempt, rather than his apprehensions, did considerable execution. To his intimates (as we have seen) George Gresham made no secret of his conviction that Ferdinand Walcot was a scoundrel; and to every one else he made it clearly understood that he regarded him with no favour. There had been a time when on one side, at all events, considerable conciliation had been attempted. As a boy, not yet emancipated from school, George had been the recipient of Mr. Walcot's generosity. The "tips" he had given him were, indeed, much larger than were prudent to be entrusted to such young hands; and he had given him to understand that he might count upon whatever he wished to obtain from his uncle, provided it was applied for through Ferdinand Walcot. To the schoolboy this arrangement seemed agreeable enough; but as he grew older, he began, as the only blood relation of his uncle, to resent the proviso attached to it: it seemed not in accordance with the fitness of things that such mediation should be necessary. Hence arose doubts, suspicions, and finally a collision with his late ally. Then war, openly declared upon the young man's side, but apparently declined by the other. Gresham appealed to his uncle, and found him kind, but deaf to all arguments against Walcot.

"You do not understand, my dear boy, the nobility of that man's nature; the thought of self is foreign to it." And then that stereotyped phrase of his, delivered with pathetic solemnity, "There is a sacred tie between us."

Mr. Walcot, though not put upon his defence, volunteered some statements as to his motives; he could afford to leave them to Sir Robert's interpretation, he said, but it was quite possible George had failed to appreciate them. Sir Robert was his own kith and kin, and it was but natural that he should consider things to be his right which were, in fact, not so; but which in all reason and justice should depend rather upon his own good behaviour. He was not a bad boy—Heaven forbid that should be the case!—but he had serious faults, which he (Mr. Walcot) had striven to amend, and received anything but thanks for his pains. He did not, however, want thanks; but only to see such amendment in the lad as would give satisfaction to his uncle. Even in such a small affair as getting up in the morning, and being in time for breakfast, he could not bring himself to turn over a new leaf, though he knew Sir Robert's particularity in the matter.

Now George was a confirmed sluggard, and his accuser knew this to be a crucial test in which he was almost sure to fail. And he did fail; he was fool enough—or, perhaps, obstinate enough—to neglect this simple means of grace which Mr. Walcot had suggested to him. And the little rift thus made between him and his uncle was skilfully widened. He had been withdrawn from Oxford and the companionship of his friend Frederic Mayne, under Walcot's advice, on the pretext of his extravagant habits—a charge he could not deny—and been left in Germany to complete his education. He had visited Halcombe during the vacations, and been received by Sir Robert with his usual kindness—never intermitted, save when he made a late appearance at the breakfast table; and eventually, as we have seen, had been selected to be the future husband of his uncle's favourite, Evelyn. He did not know that from that hour Ferdinand Walcot's dislike of him had been turned to malevolent hate; but he was quite aware that he was his foe. His fearless, careless disposition, however, had led him to pay small heed to this circumstance—preferring to consider the man the enemy of the human race rather than his own—until the present time; when he felt that his secret relations with Elise might expose him to a severe, if not a ruinous, blow.

It was at Walcot's suggestion that Evelyn had gone to fetch her from Mirton; and he therefore awaited their return with a redoubled apprehension. So strong was his presentiment of evil that he walked out upon the moor before the return of the young ladies was expected, in order that his meeting with Elise might have at least only one witness.

His first glance, on meeting the occupants of the carriage, was directed to Evelyn, and it in some sort reassured him. He felt certain, from her quiet look (for she was one who easily betrayed her emotions) that nothing had passed between her and her companion to pain her. His proposal that they should finish their journey on foot if the visitor was not too fatigued was accepted; and the three young people walked home together.

"I have been trying my German conversational powers with Miss Hurt," said Evelyn, "and I find that books cannot teach me to speak a language. I am glad she will find in you, George, at least one person who can talk to her in her native tongue. You must tell her, however, that she must consider herself a missionary in a very benighted land, and not encourage us to be indolent by speaking English."

"Perhaps it would be better if she concealed her little knowledge of it altogether," said George, laughing, but not without the reflection that this would be very convenient.

"I am afraid that would savour of duplicity," said Evelyn, gravely.

Then it flashed like lightning upon Gresham. "Evelyn knows"—he felt that she was alluding to his present conduct. "I was only joking," he replied, "of course, but I will make her understand exactly what you desire." Then added rapidly in German, "You will not use English more than is necessary, Elise, and in the case of one person, my uncle's brother-in-law, it will be better to conceal your knowledge of it as much as possible. He is the only enemy we have to fear."

The next moment George Gresham turned scarlet. He saw, by Evelyn's face, not indeed that she had understood his words of caution, for she had not; but that he had missed the first step in his career of secrecy. He had addressed the new governess as "Elise," instead of "Miss Hurt." At this moment there fortunately occurred a little incident: they met a dog-cart with a groom in it, coming up the steep hill from Halcombe. The man touched his hat respectfully.

"Where are you going, Charles?" inquired Gresham.

"To Archester, sir, to bring a young person that is expected at the Hall."

"Oh, to be sure, it is Annabel Spence," said Evelyn.

"Then Miss Hurt is not the only stranger, it seems, expected to-day," observed George, lightly.

"Hush, George," said Evelyn, rapidly. "It is scarcely necessary to remark on such a coincidence; Annabel Spence is the new ladies' maid."

"I am sure our companion is too sensible to be annoyed by any comparison of that sort," answered Gresham, lightly.

"I hope so," observed Elise, quietly, in broken English, "but nevertheless I am deeply sensible of Miss Nicoll's consideration, which is far beyond anything which a person in my position (unless, indeed, she had the happiness to have already known her) could possibly have expected."

It was now Evelyn's turn to be overwhelmed with confusion.

"I had no idea, Miss Hurt, that you could understand me," she stammered. "I was wrong to say that books cannot teach a language. I see now that it depends upon the capacity of the student."

"Not at all, Miss Nicoll," answered Elise, gently. "It depends rather upon the student's necessities. If you had had to learn German in order to earn your bread, you would have acquired it at least as well as I have English."

Gresham was delighted at the admiration that Elise's talents had thus extorted from Evelyn, and still more at the favour with which she evidently regarded her. Half his expected difficulties seemed to be already surmounted. At the same time, highly as he estimated Evelyn's nobility of character, he was not a little surprised, supposing that she really guessed how matters stood, that she had acquiesced in them so readily. His amour propre perhaps was a little wounded—though he knew Evelyn's affections were not engaged to him—at the quietness (it looked almost like satisfaction) with which she had accepted the knowledge of his attachment to somebody else.

CHAPTER XII.

THE LIKENESS

On the morning after Elise Hurt's arrival at the Hall, the family were assembled as usual in the oriel breakfast room, awaiting the beat of the gong which summoned the servants to morning prayers; for a wonder, George Gresham was on this occasion in time for that solemnity; he had made up his mind to fail in nothing that might give satisfaction to his uncle; he was full of good intentions of all sorts, among which the virtue of punctuality shone resplendent—and besides, he was very anxious to see Elise. He could indeed say nothing to her beyond a few conventional kind inquiries, and even these were only admissible between the heir of the House and the governess from the circumstance of their having been half-drowned together, but it was an inexpressible comfort to find himself in her company. She wore a dress of Millicent's, which he probably beheld not for the first time, but which had never before excited his admiration. It seemed to him, in spite of all she had gone through, that she looked fresher and prettier, and altogether more charming, than even when he had first seen her in the church at Rotterdam. If he had not known that Lady Arden and the girls had shown her every kindness, he could have read as much in her grateful and contented look, and he loved them more than ever in consequence.

"Why, George," exclaimed Sir Robert, delighted to see his lie-a-bed nephew in his place, "the German air seems to have wonderfully agreed with you; I never saw you looking so bright and wideawake at this early hour."

"Let us hope, sir, that that may rather be ascribed to the pleasure of coming home," answered the young man.

"That's well said," returned Sir Robert, smiling, "though I am not so foolish as to take the compliment to myself," and he looked slily across the room at Evelyn, who was talking to Elise. "In your delight at finding yourself once more with your uncle and the rest, you have forgotten your correspondence," and he pointed to a letter which lay upon Gresham's plate. Gresham laughed and opened the letter; and then laughed still more.

"It is from dear old Mayne," he said, "apologising for not having met me in Paris—which is fortunate, since I did not keep my appointment with him. His yacht, it seems, was delayed by the gale, so that he could not get to Boulogne; and now he has got sick of the sea and is coming to England."

"Ask him to come here," said Sir Robert, "we shall be very glad to see him."

"You are very kind, sir," answered Gresham; "I am sure he would like nothing better."

Mr. Walcot, who was as usual engaged in a somewhat voluminous correspondence, looked up at this.

"Are you sufficiently sure of your own movements for that arrangement, Sir Robert?"

"Yes, yes, there is no hurry about that matter; and whether I am at the Hall or not, Mr. Mayne can be made welcome."

It was a curious instance of the ascendancy which Mr. Ferdinand Walcot exercised at Halcombe, that this vague hint was the first intimation which the rest of the family, including even Lady Arden, had received of Sir Robert's having any intention of leaving home. His post of confidant to the Baronet was so well established, that no observation was made upon this piece of news by anybody. The only astonishment it excited was in George Gresham, who, having been so long away, was less accustomed to such proofs of Mr. Walcot's sway.

"If Mayne comes here," thought he, "he will fall out with that fellow, I reckon;" and the idea greatly enhanced the pleasure with which he looked forward to his friend's visit.

Then the servants trooped into prayers, taking their places so quickly that it reminded you, with but a slight difference, of the stage direction in The Critic, "enter, kneeling." A certain new face among them was, therefore, not at once observable to the master of the House, who besides, had his book-markers—long silk streamers worked by Evelyn in the High Church style—to arrange. Sir Robert had a fine voice, and what is more, one instinct with deep religious feeling. At a later part of the short service, when all stood up, his slight delicate figure, with his reverential face and tone, had a fine effect. He looked a true Head of a Household, to whom the welfare, ghostly and bodily, of every member of it was of genuine interest. Suddenly his voice began to fail and quiver.

Mr. Walcot was at his side in an instant.

"Go on for me, Ferdinand," he whispered, and sat down.

Lady Arden also approached him, but he waved her away. "It is only a little giddiness, my dear. Ferdinand will finish the reading." And he did so. Mr. Walcot also was a fine reader; a better one, perhaps, artistically speaking, than his brother-in-law; but the late occurrence had somewhat disturbed the attention of the little congregation.

"It was nothing," said the Master of the House, when prayers were over, and in answer to the anxious looks of those around him rather than to their inquiries; for it was well understood that Sir Robert disliked fuss to be made about his ailments. "I was a little faint, I think, for want of my breakfast."

If this was so, it was curious, since he made no attempt to eat anything beyond toying with a little toast and marmalade; but of this no one was supposed to take notice.

He was the first to rise from table, and Lady Arden followed him with her eyes, but with her eyes only. Mr. Walcot had already risen, leaving his devilled chicken only half consumed upon his plate, and left the room close at Sir Robert's heels.

Again no one hazarded a remark, but Gresham glanced significantly at Elise, as much as to say, "You see his power;" and then turned scarlet on perceiving Evelyn remarked it.

Lady Arden showed no touch of annoyance, nor perhaps did she feel any. She had been long content with the affection of her second husband, shown in a hundred material ways to her and hers; she had never possessed his confidence; and on the few occasions when she had striven to minister to him in his little troubles—which were generally understood to be "nerves"—she had not been very successful. She was homœopathic, and had suggested Pulsatilla, in which Sir Robert did not seem to have much confidence.

The Baronet passed through the folding-doors that led into his own study—which stood somewhat isolated from the house, forming one of its many projections—and threw himself into a chair.

"Great Heaven, Ferdinand," were his first words, "why did you not tell me?"

"Tell you what, my dear Arden?" inquired the other with simplicity.

"Why, about the likeness. That girl who came yesterday. I thought when I saw her face I should have dropped."

"Do you mean Annabel Spence?"

"Of course I do. Is it possible it never struck you that she is the very image of our lost Madeline?"

"The image? Surely not. Now you mention it; indeed, I do recall a resemblance—something in the look of the eyes."

"The eyes! the features—the very expression!"

"My dear Arden—making every allowance for your sensitive organisation," answered Mr. Walcot, in a tone of alarmed remonstrance; "it seems to me that your affectionate, nay, your devotional feelings towards our dear departed carry you sometimes too far. Remember, it is I alone who understand them, who appreciate them at their full value; and this exhibition of them before others——"

Sir Robert waved his hands in nervous protest.

"What does it matter—what does anything matter, in comparison with what I owe to her!"

"Very true, my dear Arden; most true, no doubt. Still, you have since contracted other obligations."

"I know it; I know it," exclaimed the other impatiently; "and I hope I have not neglected them."

"Indeed you have not; no other man alive could have been so mindful of them."

"Still I was wrong to contract them. I failed in fealty to the dead—if, indeed, I can call her dead, whose living voice is so present with me."

"Why did you do it, my dear friend?" answered the other bluntly.

"Ay; why, indeed? I did it to escape from myself. You don't know what I suffered when she left me all alone. You were not here then, Ferdinand, to comfort me."

"I wish I had been, with all my heart."

The gentleness of his tone was only equalled by its genuineness; Sir Robert held out his hand, and the other grasped it warmly.

"I have no cause to complain, Ferdinand, of any human creature, save myself. Lady Arden and the children have been everything that I could have expected of them—more than I had any right to expect. My nephew, too, dear George, is an honest, noble fellow. You don't think so, because you compare him, perhaps, with an ideal standard—he has not, of course, your sensibility."

"I said nothing against him, Arden; and I never shall do so. If I think he fails towards you in frankness and obedience, considering all the benefits you have heaped upon him, that is only my private opinion."

"Well, well, let us not talk of that, let us agree upon that single point to differ. In all others we are at one."

"I hope so, indeed, my friend."

"But oh, that girl! Why did you not prepare me for her? When she turned round and looked at me it was as though one had risen from the dead."

"I grant there is a likeness, though it did not strike me with such force. If it pains you I will frame some excuse to persuade Lady Arden to get rid of her protégée."

"No, no, no," answered Sir Robert. "Let her stay here since she has once come. The very accident of resemblance gives her a claim upon me."

Mr. Walcot bowed, with a stoop of his shoulder too gentle to be called a shrug; the action seemed to say, "This is a matter of feeling in which no one has a right to argue with you; but to me such ideas are unintelligible."

"My dear Ferdinand, I know I must seem unreasonable to the world at large," said Sir Robert, as if in answer to this movement, "but I should have hoped that you would have understood me better. You yourself are cognisant of many things beyond the ken of grosser minds."

"I have been witness to certain manifestations, Arden, it is true, that I cannot refer to any known laws, and those manifestations have, as it seemed, been connected with my lamented sister. But I hesitate to attach to them any vital meaning."

"That is because you are by nature a sceptic—that is to say, of a too logical mind, Walcot. Yet you have allowed to me that you have more than once been staggered. After all, these incidents are only links of a chain that has connected this world with the other throughout all ages."

"Still, the hearing is a sense that is very easily deceived, my dear Arden. I have thought oftentimes I have heard dear Madeleine's voice; but it might not have been hers; nay, there might have been no voice. The eye brings with it what it sees, we are told; and this is still more true with the secondary senses. If she were to tell me something only known to myself and her—if I had even seen her——",

"That may happen yet, who knows?" interrupted the other, eagerly, and yet with a touch of awe. "An angel touched Elijah and Daniel, and though it is true I am no prophet, why should not Madeline, who is an angel, favour me with her visible presence? She comes to see me in dreams."

"In a dream Milton saw his 'late espoused saint,'" observed Walcot softly.

"Yes, but Oberlin tells us that his watched him like an attendant spirit, held communion with him, and was visible to his sight. When he contemplated any important act she either encouraged him or checked him."

"That was a very remarkable case, no doubt, Arden; I remember something of it."

This might well have been, since his companion had conversed with him on the matter half a dozen times before.

"But Oberlin's experience does not overthrow my argument, though I grant it weakens it, as to the self-deception of the senses."

"That is what was said to Oberlin himself," answered Sir Robert in a tone of triumph; "when asked how he distinguished such interviews from dreams, he answered, 'How do you distinguish one odour from another?' They were perfectly distinct occurrences."

"He was a theologian and a philanthropist, and probably of an enthusiastic temperament," replied Walcot doubtfully.

"Well, I am neither one nor the other, Ferdinand; you must grant to me an unbiassed, if not a logical, mind."

"I will go further, Arden, and allow you to be logical; I never knew a man more open to reason. It is not my wish, you may be sure, to rob you of any source of consolation, and least of all of one which may proceed from kin of mine. If this thing be really as you conceive it to be, I should almost feel that I had a hand in it; that your friendship for me had at all events received the seal of approval from a quarter which, in your eyes——"

"It does—it has, Ferdinand," interrupted Sir Robert eagerly. "You are dear to me for your own sake; but ten times dearer because of the sacred tie that connects us—we cannot speak of that, however, before others. Lady Arden, for example, would not only fail to understand it, but would perchance resent it. I should be loth to give her cause of pain. You had better go to her, by the bye, and say that I am better, and will see her now."

"I will."

We have said Mr. Ferdinand Walcot had a mobile face. It changed its expression twice between Sir Robert's study and the breakfast room. In the former it implied tender assent; between the double doors it became like the mask of Grecian Comedy, grotesque in its satirical mirth; and then, in the presence of the family, it turned to cheerful contentment.

"Sir Robert would like to see you, Lady Arden; his giddiness, I am thankful to say, has passed away."

THE READER

"Essays in Romance," by John Skelton ("Shirley") (W. Blackwood and Sons).—These papers—originally published, if we remember rightly, a few years ago in Fraser—are aptly described by their collective title. Varying, as the leaves in a painter's "book of studies," from the finished sketch with sufficient condensation therein of plot and passion to furnish out a three-volumed tale, to the fragmentary scene from an ideal life or the picturesque delineation of moor-land, wood, and hill, they all plant us more or less deep within the limits of that charmed fairy-land of romance which seems somehow never very far away from those who write amidst the scenes and memories of the wild and rugged North. In a few of the stories, and more especially in the prelude, a "Word for Winter" on the Scottish coast, there is something that reminds us of the late Professor Wilson, though in "Shirley" there is a more sustained and tender gravity than in the famous Christopher of "The Recreations," and in truth the resemblance vanishes as we try to fix it, and detracts as little from the originality as from the charm and power of the essays. As a rule "Shirley" is best when he is simplest, and he is evidently most at home—among the fisher-folk of the bleak coast, where every winter the harbour-bar exacts its yearly toll of lives; among the straths of the East Highland country, where Calvinism in its straitest garb finds ready acceptance among a hardy and a "dour" race, the opposite in many ways of the softer Gael from the misty Thule of Mr. William Black's romances. Except, however, in comparison with "Elsie," or with "Nancy's Tryst," "Catarina in Venice" and "Among the High Alps" would be accounted much above the average of magazine chapters of fiction or of travel, while with less pleasantness there is on the whole even greater power in the "Passages from the Lives of Martin and of Stephen Holdfast." Altogether we have seen few essays of the kind better worth republishing in collected form, whether for genuine skill in story-

VII.

The voyage of the Challenger has been commemorated by divers writers, but the scientific side has hitherto been most prominent, and now the picturesque has its turn in Mr. J. J. Wild's handsome volume, "At Anchor" (Marcus Ward).—Herein Mr. Wild sketches with pen and pencil many of the varied and curious scenes met with during the four years' cruise, and, avoiding any lengthened description of well-known spots, allots the principal space to the islands studding the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans. Alike as artist and author, Mr. Wild does full justice to his subject, outlining the chief events of the voyage briefly and pleasantly, while his numerous illustrations are full of life and interest. The glowing tropical scenery, the icy regions of the Antarctic Ocean, and the native types are well, if rather brilliantly, reproduced by the coloured prints, and small engravings of places and people embellish nearly every page.

Shipwrecks play a prominent part in this year's Christmas literature, and wonderful are the escapes from death detailed by M. Alfred Séguin's. "The Black Crusoe" (Marcus Ward), which, by the way, greatly resembles Mr. Kingston's "Rival Crusoes." The negro Robinson follows closely in the steps of his white prototype, and his adventures are exciting enough to suit the most exacting boyish palate. The illustrations too are good and plentiful.—A wreck also introduces the hero of "The White Lily of the Sahara," by C. Eden (same publishers). Cast away on the Barbary coast, he joins an Arab tribe supporting Abd-el-Kader against the French in Algeria, and wins glory and a lovely bride. Endowed with a particularly improbable plot, the story is so full of incident and so vivaciously told as to be most amusing.—After such sensational episodes, "Esther," by Geraldine Butt (same publishers), seems rather tame, as it simply relates the history of a childish family with the usual variety of temperaments and escapades. It is adorned with four delightful pictures of the Louis XVI. period.

Leslie Keith has ingeniously converted some well-known classical legends into moral lessons for young people in "What an Old Myth May Teach" (Marcus Ward). The authoress summarises her mythological stories better than she points her moral, when she is apt to grow didactic and prosy. O. Von Glehn's illustrations are harsh and somewhat coarse.—Not a shadow of prosiness is to be found in "The Fairyland of Science," by Arabella Buckley (E. Stanford), which clothes sober facts in romantic garb, and can hardly fail to interest the dullest child. Developed from some lectures to children, these chapters contain really fascinating accounts of the different forces of nature, typified by fairies, such as heat, light, motion, sound, the action of water, the growth of plants and insects, and a variety of useful knowledge, set forth clearly and succinctly, and fully illustrated. Miss Buckley has the gift of bringing her subject most definitively before the reader, and elder people will find plenty to interest them in her pages. Indeed her fairies are far more lively and attractive than the sprites of "Tales from Fairyland" (Griffith and Farran), professedly collected at the command of her Bright Dazzlingness Gloriana, by a Soldier of the Queen. There is little fresh or spontaneous in these fairy stories, which are too "preachy."

The sallow, oblique-eyed children of the land of the Rising Sun celebrating the New Year with odd ceremonies may well be remembered by their British contemporaries in the coming New Year's festivities, after reading Mr. Chaplin Ayrton's entertaining "Child-Life in Japan" (Griffith and Farran), a most original and carefully-compiled volume, with quaint pictures by native artists, in the style so familiar on fans and screens. English little ones will find that the small Japs have very happy lives, play many a well-known game, and set a laudable example of obedience, whilst they will gather odd scraps of knowledge about Japanese customs, and enjoy at some nursery stories.—Now that many old customs are disappearing in the Mikado's Empire on the advance of civilisation, the experiences of native life in the provinces related in "Life and Adventures in Japan," by E. Warren Clark (J. Nisbet), are of great interest. Holding an appointment under the Japanese Government, the author for several years remained up the country, dwelling in a Buddhist temple, and seeing no Europeans, so that he had unusually good opportunities of observation, Mr. Clark travelled over a considerable portion of the country, and appears to have few but pleasant memories of his sojourn. Plentifully illustrated, the work is thoroughly readable.—Two more records of travel come from Messrs. Nisbet. Mr. R. M. Ballantyne contributes a cheery diary of "Six Months at the Cape," giving a laughable account of ostrich farming and peculiarities of the unpleasant-tempered birds.—Of making books on the Holy Land there is certainly no end, and Dr. Schaff's "Through Bible Lands" does not possess any striking novelty either of adventures or graphic description. The work, however, is interesting to Biblical students by reason of the details of recent identifications of Scriptural scenes.

Passing from prose to poetry, a pretty gift-book for sentimental girls is "Life Mosaic" (Nisbet), a number of Frances Ridley Havergal's graceful poems, principally on religious subjects, but including some flower lyrics.—Baroness Helga von Cramm contributes illustrations of flowers and Alpine scenes, and the pages have most tasteful floral borders. — "Longfellow's Works," the author's complete edition (Routledge), is a good plain volume, including the latest poems, such as "Keramos."—Nursery verse and gaudily-coloured pictures, evidently of German origin, are comprised in the same publisher's "Schnick-Schnack."—Returning to the poets proper, the birthday book compilers have seized Byron as their latest prey, and Mr. J. Burrows has produced a tasteful specimen of the class in "The Byron Birthday Book" (S. Tinsley).—Juvenile theatricals are frequent at Christmas, and parents and guardians with a large flock to amuse will appreciate "Plays for Young People," by J. Barmby (Tinsley), founded on good old fairy tales, and including a parody of the Princess for more advanced actors, these amusing little pieces are written in such simple jocular verse as will not overtax the talents of the young company, while some lively music is added by Mr. Rogers.

Mr. St. John's delightful naturalist sketches, "The Wild Sport and the Natural History of the Highlands" (Murray), appear in an illustrated form. The life of bird, beast, and fish so graphically described in the text had never been illustrated in the several fresh editions since the book first came out, some thirty years since, and Messrs. Harrison Weir, C. Whymper, and A. Corbould now supply the deficiency. Entering fully into the spirit of the author, the artists have in most cases depicted the actual spots described, and have produced some exquisite vignettes and larger pictures.

The Day of Rest (Strahan), well maintains its position amongst Sunday literature. This year's bulky volume includes sermonettes by well-known clerical authors, Mr. Proctor's "Astronomical Sketches for the Young," some interesting "Passages from the Life of an Early Methodist"—reminiscences of Wesley—and the usual supply of miscellaneous articles, fiction, poems, and pictures.—The benefits of honesty and industry are agreeably set forth by "Pierrot," by S. de K. (Marlborough), a somewhat sad little tale of the French Revolution.

"Chatterbox" (W. W. Gardner).—This well-known children's favourite is replete as ever with large full-page plates, of which those of animals by Harrison Weir are much the best. The text consists of stories, biographies, anecdotes, and poems, bright and interesting as are those by which this popular magazine has in previous volumes been distinguished.

MY THREE LIBRARIES

When I am in town I spend a great deal of my leisure, and a great deal more than my leisure, at what I call "my three libraries." Indeed, in the case of bookish men, London owes its main charm to these libraries. Each of them is the necessary adjunct and complement to each. In former generations no prince or philosopher ever possessed such aids and helps in reading as are afforded by the combination of these three libraries. I need hardly say that the Reading Room of the British Museum is the first and principal of these libraries. Mr. Panizzi once said that his great aim was that the poorest student might have at his command all the resources which the highest and greatest men could obtain. This has been literally and fully carried out, and has helped to make London "the school of all knowledge." The late Dean Alford, when he had had a prosperous morning among his books, used to stand up and, as it were, say grace over the good things which he had received. This must be the grateful feeling of many a student for the literary treasures which, so to speak, the nation has brought together for his personal good and enjoyment. My other two libraries are respectively the London Library and Mudie's. The advantage of these last two libraries is that we can take their books away into the country, and keep them practically as long as we like. The modus operandi is to take away the books into the country, and come to the British Museum Reading Room when we wish to extend an investigation, or, what the venerable President Routh considered the main duty of a scholar, to verify our references.

That Reading Room has often been described, but a few descriptive touches may be added. I have been very familiar with the great Reading Room ever since it was thrown open to students some twenty years ago. I give it deliberate preference over all the reading-rooms in the world, so far as I know anything of them, and I have been in some that are very pleasant. Very convenient is your little recess in the Bodleian Library, where your books may lie undisturbed day after day. Very pleasant and cheerful is the great library in the Rue Richelieu—"Royale," "Impériale," "Républicaine," as it may have happened to be called. Very grateful memories have I of other pleasant libraries at home and abroad, and, as in private duty bound, I would especially mention the library picture-gallery of Christ Church, Oxford, and the luxurious reading-rooms of the Union Societies of the two Universities. There is a comfort and completeness about the British Museum Reading Room which is to be obtained nowhere else. There is no stint of books. You may have them in piles upon your table. I think the authorities like to get the impression that you are really doing hard work of the kind, and putting the books to practical use, and then the kindness and attention you receive is remarkable in procuring books, though you get little or no help in returning them. Strangers and foreigners are treated with especial courtesy, and even good scholars may derive valuable help from some of the officials. The amount of hard work done at the Museum is prodigious. Of course there are mere schoolboys who go there to read cribs, fine ladies who come to look at prints and novels, and a certain proportion of idlers and dawdlers. But I have known various students who, through the livelong summer day, work from nine in the morning till six in the evening. Examinations without number have been passed through the help of expensive text books which poor students have not been able to buy for themselves. First-classes, fellowships, Indian appointments have been won by close application in this magnificent chamber. Then every habitué of the Museum is acquainted with some particular class of books. Those on the theological shelves are the clergy's; on the Saturday many of them are engaged in the manufacture of sermons. Many others besides the clergy are busy with those theological books. Next are the young lawyers' lists, the law books, and next to them the embryo doctors, with their works on chemistry and physiology. There many who are busy with the Belles Lettres; groups at topography, at history, at the periodicals, and so on. Chaucer says,—

> Out of old bokes in good faith
> Cometh all this new matter that men lere.

In this Reading Room you may watch the process of the butterfly new books being manufactured from old grubby tomes. All around is a scene of intense literary activity which has no exact parallel anywhere else. There are, indeed, few reviews, magazines, and newspapers, whose contributors have not derived some help from the crowded shelves. On the one hand you may find here some of the greatest authors of the day; on the other hand some of the humblest of the literary hewers of wood and drawers of water, those who will seek out pedigrees and make "elegant extracts." There is a great deal of camaraderie among those who regularly attend the Reading Room; even a kind of club life prevails there. There are houses of call and of entertainment in the neighbourhood known to the initiated. You may find in the precincts of the Museum some approximation to the old Johnsonian Club, with snatches of wit and learning hardly to be found in the palaces of Pall Mall.

In the winter months the Museum closes at four o'clock. It is in the winter early-closing months, or in the weeks during which the great Reading Room is closed altogether, that the great convenience of the London Library is perceived. The Reading Room is certainly not so handsome as the Library of the Athenæum Club, one of the most beautiful rooms in London, but its library is far superior even to the Athenæum Library, and therefore to that of any London club.

The room overlooking St. James's Square, severer in its appearance than a club library, is a handsome, home-like room, of a club character, lined with books from floor to roof, and amply furnished with all the literary journals, and a case of the newest books. It is essentially a Reading Room for scholars, and good Bishop Andrewes says that no true scholar ever goes out before twelve o'clock. However this may be, the chance visitor may generally have the place to himself before noon. There are not many new books at the London Library. There are copies taken of nearly all, but Mudie takes a hundred to its unit. The Library guarantees on a special subscription any new book to a member, but its specialities are not new books, but old. It contains the best books of all languages, between ninety and a hundred thousand of them. With the help of this library a man may carry on his literary work in the remotest part of the country, and even beyond the seas. The country member gets fifteen books at a time, and changes as often as he likes. The Committee comprises the best literary names in the country. As the afternoon wears away the room fills up, and you observe, perhaps, some of our greatest students and writers there. I have observed Dean Stanley turning over books, and Mr. Gladstone, fresh from hunting up a reference, and John Stuart Mill reading silently by the hour together. It is always pleasant to attend the annual meeting, but I remember the late Bishop Wilberforce being decidedly fretful as a long discussion went on whether the Society should or should not keep a pony cart to deliver books at the houses of the town members.

Mudie's has been often described. I find practically that the best way to secure a new book is to call early in the morning on the way to the Museum, but to view the institution in its full vigour and activity the afternoon is its best time. A recent German work speaks of it as one of the regular institutions of the country. There is a peculiar splendour about this library when you perhaps see thousands of volumes of new works piled up in heaps and pyramids with every variety of brilliant hues. How different is the fate of these volumes! Some are promoted to substantial binding for permanent use, and others are exported to the colonies, sold as waste paper, or even burned up for manure. A brilliant assemblage flows into the library during the afternoon, and it bears a more intellectual character than is the case with most London assemblages. Having hunted up rare books at the British Museum, I get the standard works from the London Library, and the new ones from Mudie's. He who belongs to the three libraries is well equipped, at least has plenty of tools to work with, albeit he more and more recognises the truth that "of making many books there is no end, and much study is a weariness to the flesh."

SCHOOLBOYS' CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS

When old Scrooge looked upon the vision of himself in his schoolboy days, he saw a solitary child, neglected by his friends, sitting in a cold, cheerless room, with its grim furniture of inked desks and forms. To him, there was no prospect of going home for the Christmas holidays; and the Breaking-up Day that was a joy to others took from him his companions, and condemned him to five weeks of loneliness, and to see the Old Year out and the New Year in, without a friend to wish him the good wishes of the season. But this, let us hope, was an exceptional case; and, even to Master Scrooge, there came a good fairy, in the pleasant shape of a loving little sister, who carried away the boy for those Christmas holidays that should be spent happily at home. And that is where all our schoolboys should pass the whole, or the greater part, of their Christmas holidays; and that is where the good fairies of modern days and stern reality—usually in the shape of an engine and railway train—have now taken the light-hearted schoolboys of Great Britain.

But, for many weeks before those boys came home, Breaking-up was a joyous thought in anticipation; until at last, lessons done and examinations over, there was a still more joyous realisation of all the hopes that had been raised for the dawning of the last day of the Michaelmas term, and the beginning of the Christmas holidays. Between the 17th and the 21st of December, troops of happy lads were liberated from the needful restraints of school, to "frisk away," like Burns' "schoolboys at th' expected warning, to joy and play;" leaping, with frolicsome glee, as did Eugene Aram's scholars, "like troutlets in a pool." From public schools and grammar schools, from colleges and institutions, from boarding-schools and seminaries, from establishments and academies for young gentlemen, from country rectories and homes of private tutors, the sons of the upper and middle classes of the land—they who are to be the fathers of the next generation, and on whom the fate of communities may depend—were sent away, north, south, east, and west, to become, for the ensuing five weeks, the joys, and, perhaps, to a slight extent, the plagues of thousands of homes, which are now all the brighter and better for their presence.

The anticipation of these Christmas holidays began to take a definite shape when the Michaelmas term had passed its meridian, and had reached that special day known to schoolboys as Stir-up Sunday. If in any particular year it should be said that Stir-up Sunday fell late, the dark saying might not be sensibly irradiated if we proffered the explanation that it was not Stir-up Sunday that was so late, but Easter that was so early. Yet what apparent abstruseness there might be in this remark, it is one that could be promptly explained by any schoolboy, and by no one better than he. For Stir-up Sunday is, to him, a sort of scholastic Hegira, containing a suggestion of flight, and providing him with a definite period from which he can arrange the simple chronological details that attend upon an eventful period of his life; and, although he may not date from it with retrospective care, yet, during his months of study and discipline he reckons up to it, and has it before him as the goal of his hopes; and, every week, he accounts himself to be seven days nearer to Stir-up Sunday.

Should you ask him, Whence that nickname? he would answer, he would tell you—not in the metre of "Hiawatha," though with something of its quaint imagery—that it was the jolliest Sunday in the Michaelmas term; and that its peculiar and appropriate doxology is condensed in the couplet,—

> Farewell, teacher; farewell, books!
> We'll have no more of your plaguy looks!

And if this explanation should not be sufficiently lucid to place you in complete possession of the meaning of the phrase, and if he should condescend to translate his speech into the language of soberness and sense, you will then discover that Stir-up Sunday is the Sunday next before Advent, and is, therefore, to schoolboys the welcome harbinger of their Christmas holidays; and that it receives its sobriquet "Stir-up" from those two words being the first in the collect for the day. That day, in the Prayer Book, is the twenty-fifth Sunday after Trinity, and, in pursuance of rubrical direction, its Collect is always used on the Sunday previous to Advent. But that Sunday may be the twenty-third, as in 1878, or the twenty-fourth, as in 1879, or even the twenty-sixth; so that, in the last case, when, in the orderly sequence of Sundays, schoolboys might have looked for the twenty-fourth to be followed, after a seven-days' interval, by the twenty-fifth, they found themselves to be cheated out of their long-looked-for Stir-up Sunday, and—through the cruel interference of Easter full moons, Golden Numbers, and Dominical Letters—to be unexpectedly presented with one of those Epiphany services that could not be used at its own proper season.

Such an instance must bring a chilling disappointment to many a youthful heart. Instead of the bright, transient gleam of a St. Luke's summer amid the deepening gloom of November, it would seem to them as though a wet blanket of fog had stiffened into ice by that interpolation of a January service into the appointments of a season when the sere and yellow leaf still clung to the oaks, and when the topmost twigs were not yet reduced to their "Christabel" allowance of "the one red leaf, the last of its clan." It would seem to them as though old Father Time was out of joint, and that the Calendar looked askew, like the one-eyed calenders of the Arabian Nights. For, with deliberation and malice aforethought, to postpone the long-expected Stir-up Sunday for another interminable æon of seven days, and to try back, in a kind of paper-chase, to the beginning of the year and Prayer Book in search of a Collect that had been purposely passed over as utterly useless in the month of January,—this clerical proceeding must appear, to the schoolboys' mind, as a specimen of priest-ridden ritual, deserving of the strongest reprobation, and demanding the most searching investigation by any Hebdomadal Board that can take cognisance of such a senseless postponement of vested rights.

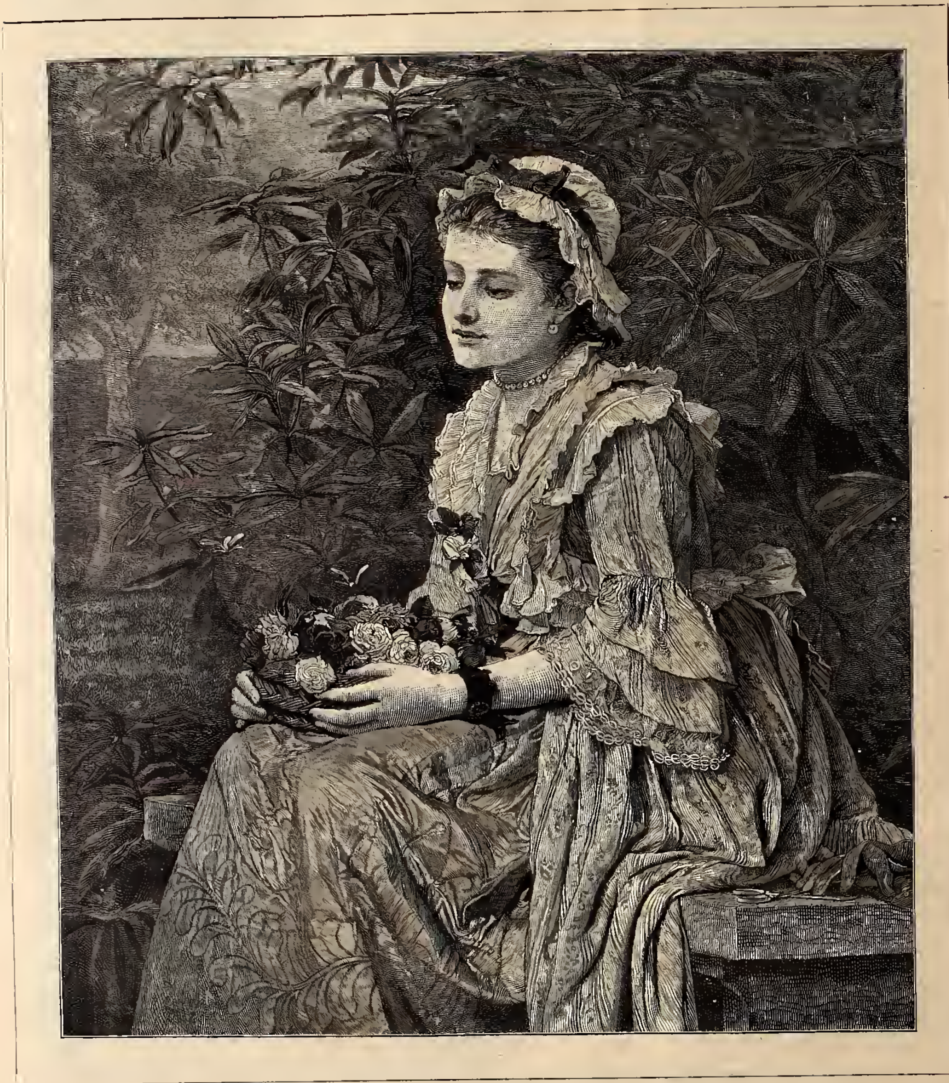
But in 1878 the itching ears were gratified, and the many thousands of schoolboys who, marshalled under the care of their Mr. Feeders and Dr. Blimbers, compactly filled their plots of church pews, heard once again, and without any postponement, those magical and stirring words, "Stir up." They would regard them in a light that had nothing whatever to do with the Collect from St. Gregory's Sacramentary; but would look upon them much in the same way that "guilty creatures sitting at a play" on Boxing Night welcome the sharp ringing of the prompter's bell that gives the signal to the leader of the band to wave his baton for the outburst of the merry overture to the merrier Christmas Pantomime. Nor are the boys' parents altogether heedless of Stir-up Sunday. To them the familiar words impressed upon their minds by their lads' schoolboy slang come as a note of warning to bid them prepare their homes for the reception of the varied specimens of the rising generation. And, to fagged schoolmasters and wearied ushers, the words also give a promise of temporary release from their onerous duties, when they may recruit their flagging energies with well-earned Christmas holiday. In short, to them, their pupils, and their pupils' families and friends, the words, "Stir up" give the signal for Christmas preparations; and, if we accept the testimony of the Rev. R. Forhy, in his "Vocabulary of East Anglia," they are regarded, by busy Norfolk housewives, as a seasonable reminder that the time has come for them to stir up the savoury ingredients that are needful for the mince-pies and plum-puddings.



"ROSES AND BUTTERFLIES"

FROM THE PICTURE BY C. E. PERUGINI, EXHIBITED IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY

The three Sundays in Advent that follow Stir-up Sunday have also received from schoolboys their own peculiar names, and are known to them as "Sing out," "Shout out," and "Hollah out," or "Let out" Sundays, which names signify the part in the congregational singing supposed to be borne, with increasing degrees of intensity, by the schoolboys expectant of the pleasures of the Christmas holidays. And, to give them greater freedom of the chest and lungs for partaking of the choral portions of the service, one or more waistcoat buttons are set free, in the order regulated by the titles of these Sundays, "Unbutton one," "Unbutton two," and "Unbutton three" Sundays. The last Sunday brings them to the concluding Sunday in their Michaelmas term, and to the very threshold of their Christmas holidays.

How Cowper tells us of the schoolboy—himself, doubtless—who so anxiously looked forward to breaking-up day, and smoothed away, daily, the notches in the indented stick, which thus bore witness to the intense desire with which he craved for his return to the pettings and comforts of home. And, although nowadays school is rarely a bugbear to boys, especially if they are such as the great-souled Dr. Arnold prayed that all English schoolboys should be—pure and gentle, brave and good, persevering and obedient—yet, to one and all, it is a sincere joy to break up for the Christmas holidays.

NAVAL EVENTS OF THE YEAR

FOREIGN

AFFAIRS IN THE EAST.——The good relations between Turkey and Russia appear to be continuing, and negotiations for the definitive Treaty of Peace began on Monday. Khaireddin Pasha also has been authorised by the Sultan to conclude a convention with Austria respecting the vexed question of Novi Bazar and Bosnia, while a special Commission has at last been appointed to consider the delimitations of Turco-Greek frontiers, consisting of Mukhtar Pasha, Vahan Effendi, and Abeddine Pasha. It is said that the Porte will offer large concessions in Thessaly in order to retain Epirus in its entirety. In fact, so far as appearance goes, the Porte seems to have turned over a new leaf with its change of Ministry and to have in every way adopted a conciliatory policy. The Sultan proposes to appoint Rustem Pasha, the late Governor of the Lebanon, to be Governor of East Roumelia, but it is thought that this selection will be neither to the liking of Russia nor of Sir Henry Layard. In the mean time the East Roumelian Commission has not, as was so confidently stated last week, broken up till April, but has merely adjourned for Christmas and the New Year. The Commissioners also seem to be getting on somewhat better both amongst themselves and with the Bulgarians, and the Russians have issued stringent official orders that their behests are to be obeyed. With regard to the long-delayed cession to Montenegro, reinforcements of troops have been sent to Scutari to prevent any forcible opposition of the Albanians to the surrender of Podgoritza; but it is feared that the Albanian League is sufficiently strong to attempt to prevent this part at least of the Berlin Treaty being fulfilled.

In CONSTANTINOPLE the caimé, or paper-money question, continues to be the great problem of the day; great dissatisfaction has been caused by the failure of the various schemes for redemption, and the notes have in consequence depreciated still further. The matter has now been left over until the decision of England with respect to the guaranteed loan is given.—The decree constituting the new gendarmérie has been issued, and foreigners are now to be admitted to the ranks.—There has been a terrible storm in the Marmora and the Dardanelles. A large number of houses in Constantinople were blown down, while a collision took place near Gallipoli between the British steamer Rinaldo and the French steamer Byzantin, in which the latter was sunk with, it is feared, 150 persons on board.

FRANCE.——The Chambers adjourned for the Christmas Holidays on Saturday, the last vote of the Lower House being the singularly ungracious act of striking out from the Budget estimates the Senatorial amendment conferring a small rise in salary upon the humbler classes of ministers of religion.—The Senatorial elections are now the great political question of the day, and the Senators of the Left have issued a most energetic circular to the electors, referring to the peace and order which has attended the ministration of M. Dufaure's Cabinet, to the complete success of the Paris Exhibition, and to the important part played by France in the Berlin Congress deliberations. "Electors!" it concludes, "you have to choose between two policies, Constitutional Republican policy which shows and defines itself, and that nameless policy of coalition without frankness which cannot lower its flag, because there are three of them, nor reveal its intentions, because it has nothing to offer to the country but a revolution followed by a war of Pretenders."

The weather in Paris has been exceptionally severe, so much so indeed that the authorities of the Mont-de-Piété has given back free of charge all blankets which have been pledged by poor people. Indeed the weather has been very severe throughout France, and there have been very heavy falls of snow in the provinces, while wolves have penetrated even to the gates of Metz. In the mean time the booths for the New Year's festival on the Boulevards are being erected, and the étrennes in the shops are as handsome and as expensive as in former years. The lottery fever shows some signs of diminishing, the prices of the tickets are falling, and it is now announced that the Exhibition of the Prizes will be opened on the 10th of January, and that the drawings will begin on the 15th. The 150,000fr. prize will be first drawn, next the prizes exceeding 80*l.* in value, then the smaller prizes, and finally two prizes of 2,000*l.* and 4,000*l.*—There has been one first representation—a one-act comedy, Les Deux Fautes, by M. Georges de Porto-Riche, at the Odéon.—Considerable speculation has arisen respecting the disappearance of a picture from the Champs de Mars Exhibition, by Jean Paul Laurens—"L'Exhumation du Pape Formose," which has been either lost or stolen.

In GERMANY the Ministerial crusade against the Socialist Press continues, while the Ultramontane journals are also suffering from the renewed energy of the Cabinet, several important organs being prohibited in Alsace and Lorraine.—Mr. Bayard Taylor, the United States Minister, has died of dropsy at Berlin.—The recent marriage of the Duke of Cumberland has raised the question in the Brunswick Landtag as to who is the rightful successor to the Grand Ducal throne. Properly speaking it is the King of Hanover, but the problem is, Who represents that House? Prussia, who is in possession, or the Duke of Cumberland, who still claims to be King of Hanover?—Diphtheria is raging in Mayence, and one of the largest boarding-schools in the town has been closed in consequence of the epidemic.

RUSSIA.——The students' demonstration before the Czarewitch's Palace seems likely to lead to serious results. The address which they wished to present consisted of a request that the authorities might cease to treat them continually as suspicious persons, but accord them the independent privileges possessed by ordinary adults. During the demonstration two hundred students were arrested, the Cossacks using their whips so freely as to injure a considerable number. The agitation continues, and, according to the Vienna correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, a state of siege has been practically established in St. Petersburg, numbers of persons are being arrested, revolutionary placards are posted up all over the town, and Baron Korf, the Prefect, has published an order threatening with severe punishment all those found in possession of arms.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In SPAIN Moneasi, the man who attempted to assassinate King Alfonso, is ill with gastric fever.—In the UNITED STATES President Hayes has issued a Message to the Senate respecting the state of commerce with South America, and pointing out that the introduction of the products of the United States into new markets ought to be promoted, and that the means of communication, more particularly with regard to postal organisation, ought to be improved. The steamers Asia and Europe, bought by the Russians for cruisers during the recent Eastern Crisis, have sailed for Russia.—From AUSTRALIA we hear that a Coalition Ministry has been formed in New South Wales, consisting of the following members: Sir Henry Parkes, Premier and Colonial Secretary; Sir John Robertson, Vice-President of the Executive Council, with a seat in the Legislative Council; Mr. James Watson, Colonial Treasurer; Mr. Francis Bathurst Sutton, Justice and Public Instruction; Mr. William Charles Windeyer, Attorney-General; Mr. James Hoskins, Secretary for Lands; Mr. John Lackey, Secretary for Public Works; Mr. Saul Samuel, Postmaster-General; Mr. Ezekiel Alexander Baker, Secretary for Mines.—From SOUTH AFRICA the news remains much the same. Cetywayo has not yet replied to Sir Bartle Frere's ultimatum, and the British preparations for war are being actively continued.

THE COURT

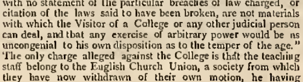
THE Queen is spending Christmas at the Isle of Wight, where Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice arrived at the end of last week. Before leaving Windsor the Queen was visited by the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and their four children, when they lunched with Her Majesty and returned afterwards to town, taking with them the Princess of Wales, who had spent three days with the Queen. The Duke of Connaught left Windsor the same day as Her Majesty, and the Princess Beatrice went to Osborne. On Saturday the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold arrived at Osborne, and the Marquis of Hertford, who had represented the Queen at the Princess Alice's funeral, also arrived. Next morning Divine Service was performed at Osborne before Her Majesty and the Royal Family, the Rev. G. Prothero officiating, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold going in the afternoon to Whippingham Church, and on Monday the Prince of Wales left Osborne. The Queen's New Year's Gifts to the poor of New Windsor, Holy Trinity, and Clewer, will be distributed on January 1st. Her Majesty has sent a donation of 200*l.* to the London poor in consequence of the distress in the metropolis.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are at Sandringham for Christmas with their children. The Princess arrived on Saturday, and next morning, with her boys and girls, attended Divine Service at St. Mary Magdalene's. The Prince returned to town at the end of last week from attending the Princess Alice's funeral, and on his way home met the Imperial Princess of Germany at Cologne, the Imperial Prince not being well enough to accompany his wife. Immediately on arriving in England the Prince of Wales went down to Osborne to see the Queen, and after spending Sunday with her joined the Princess at Sandringham.

The death of the Princess Alice, according to medical authority, resulted from failure of heart and exhaustion, not from mechanical obstruction of the larynx. The Princess, enfeebled by fatigue from nursing, and depressed by her recent bereavement, was not strong enough to resist the disease. Her illness lasted exactly a week. A commemorative service was performed in Berlin last week at the desire of the Imperial Princess. It was held at Monbijou Palace, the British chaplain officiating, and the Imperial Princess, her two eldest daughters, Princesses Charlotte and Victoria, Prince Waldemar, the English portion of her household, and the Members of the British Embassy being present. Addresses of condolence to the Queen have been voted by most metropolitan Vestries and provincial Town Councils, and similar addresses are being prepared by English residents in foreign towns and in the colonies. Sunday was observed throughout Australia as a day of mourning for the Princess.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh have gone to Eastwell Park with their children, and intend to pass several weeks there in complete retirement. The Duke will shortly be promoted to the rank of Rear Admiral.

The marriage of Princess Thyra of Denmark and the Duke of Cumberland was celebrated at Copenhagen on Saturday evening. The guests assembled at the Castle of Christiansborg, and marched in procession to the chapel, the King leading the way with the bride, whose train was borne by six bridesmaids, dressed in white, with roses, and the Queen followed with the bridegroom, who wore the uniform of an English Colonel, Bishop Martensen performed the service according to the Danish ritual, and preached a short sermon, and at its conclusion the bride and bridegroom kissed the King and Queen and were congratulated by the family, and returned to the Palace, where a grand reception was next held. Subsequently came a banquet, after which the Royal pair started for Fredensborg, the King's summer residence, to spend their honeymoon. Copenhagen was gaily illuminated and decorated, and the people crowded the streets to cheer the Duke and Duchess. Nearly every Danish corporation and society has sent some wedding present to the Duke and Duchess. Both the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales were represented at the ceremony, the British Minister at Copenhagen, Sir Lennox Wylde, acting for the Queen, and Lord Colville and Colonel Teesdale for the Prince and Princess.



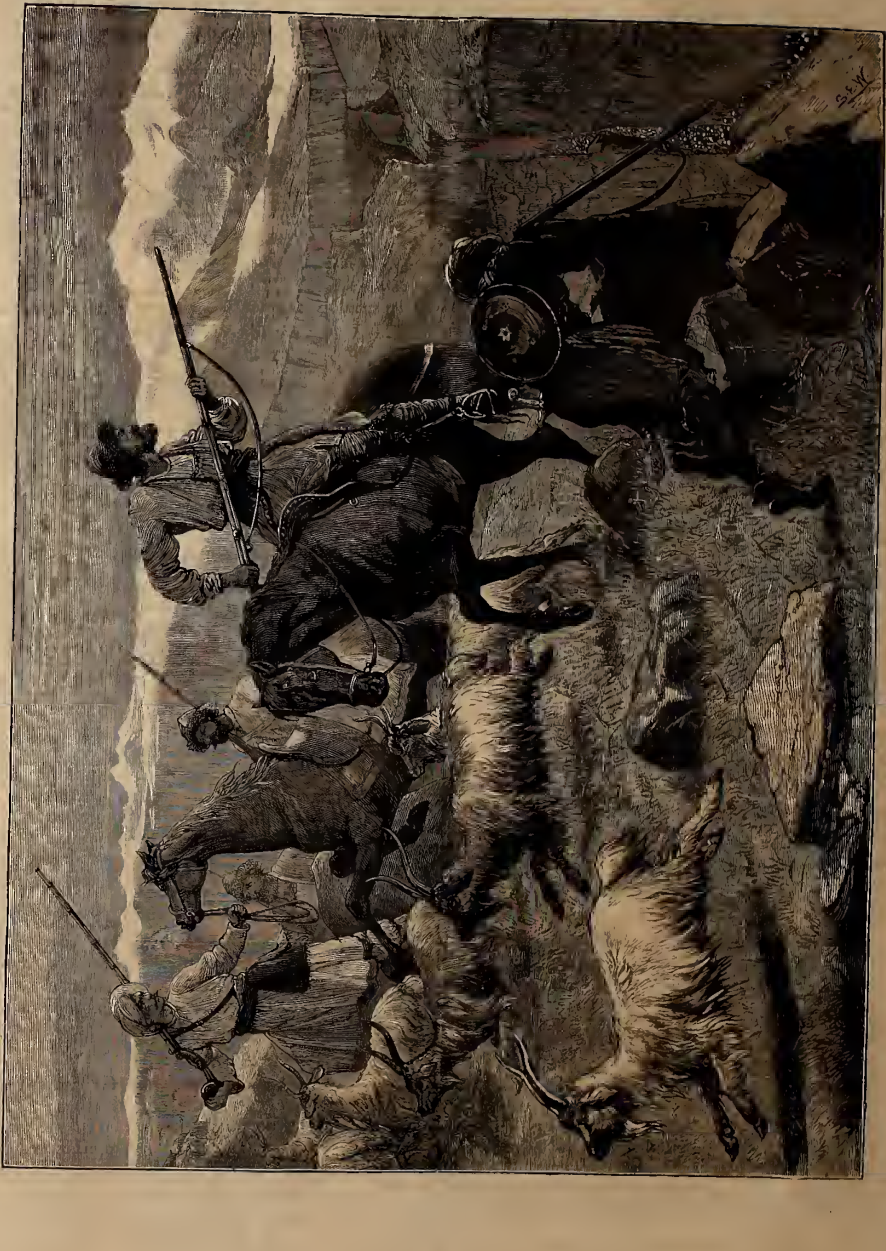
CHURCH NEWS

CUDDESDON COLLEGE.——The Bishop of Oxford has sent a long and somewhat severe letter in reply to the memorial from the laymen of his diocese. He remarks that "vague imputations with no statement of the particular breaches of law charged, or citation of the laws said to have been broken, are not materials with which the Visitor of a College or any other judicial person can deal, and that any exercise of arbitrary power would be as uncongenial to his own disposition as to the temper of the age." The only charge alleged against the College is that the teaching staff belong to the English Church Union, a society from which they have now withdrawn of their own motion, he having purposely refrained from "asking them to surrender any liberty of action which as members of the Church of England they enjoy." "As to the English Church Union," his lordship continues, "excellent as were the purposes of its foundation twenty years or more ago, it has resulted in a state of things injurious to the welfare of the Church. Stirring up rival organisations, it has divided Churchmen into hostile camps, and has brought many good men, who have had no real share in its counsels, though they are counted among its 17,000 members, into indiscriminate and unmerited obloquy. Fruitless litigation has been encouraged, and charity grievously impaired, but the heaviest indictment against it is that it called the Church Association into life. Until both Societies are dissolved there will, in my judgment, be small hope of peace for the Church." His lordship then goes on to say that "though there have been some secessions to Rome within the diocese he knows of no single instance which can be traced to Cuddesdon as its source; no English congregation which has gone over to Rome. A few great and and good men have made the Vatican their Zion, and a few neither great nor good have followed their example; but for one recruit to Rome there have probably been fifty deserters from the Church of England to the forces of unbelief, and a still larger number, alas, of victims to the fatal seductions of immorality and vice. Here are our greatest perils; our most serious losses. These alarms do little credit to our good sense. If we take them for proofs that we are religious, we deceive ourselves. To spend life, as some to do, in a round of selfish pursuits and amusements, interrupted once in eight or ten years by a 'No Popery' panic, is not a very noble career, and one which can do the Church of England no good. Her high and holy interests will be best served by the earnest devotion of her children to the increase of knowledge, the relief of misery, the cure of crying national sins, and the extension of Christ's Kingdom on earth."

VARIOUS.——There was a stormy scene at the monthly Board Meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel last week, the bone of contention being Mr. Outram Marshall's motion, ordering that the recommendation of the Examiners should be dispensed with in the case of missionary candidates nominated by Colonial Bishops. Canon Gregory gave notice that at the February meeting he should move that the motion be rescinded, and also moved that the Standing Committee should be thanked for refusing to act upon it, and requested to continue the same course of action until the matter had been reconsidered. On the other hand, the Rev. C. P. Goldie gave notice that in January he should call attention to the unconstitutional conduct of the Standing Committee. Canon Gregory and others objected to this as unfair, and wanted Mr. Goldie to bring on his motion at once. This, however, he refused to do, and Mr. Trevor then moved it without, he said, being able to say anything in its favour. After a good deal of wrangling, it was ultimately decided that both motions should come on in January.—The death of the Princess Alice was referred to on Sunday last by Dean Stanley at Westminster; by the Rev. T. Teignmouth Shore at Berkeley Chapel, Mayfair; by the Rev. C. H. Travers at St. George's Chapel, Windsor; and by many other preachers in various parts of the country.—Mr. Spurgeon, who has been ill for some weeks, resumed his duties on Sunday last at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, where on the 31st inst. a Bazaar is to be held in aid of the Testimonial Fund, which it is his intention to devote to the further development of the College and Orphanage.—A branch of the Church Association is to be formed for the parish of St. Mary, Hornsey.—The hundredth anniversary of the establishment of Sunday Schools is to be celebrated in 1880 by a series of services, conferences, and meetings, which will extend from June 4th to June 28th of that year, and it is proposed to commemorate the event by the establishment of a Centenary Fund to be devoted to the erection of a new building for the use of the Church of England Sunday School Institute.—At the third annual meeting of the London Bankers' Prayer Union, held last week, Mr. R. C. L. Bevan, who presided, said that half a century ago such a thing as a Prayer Union was not thought of. There was a great revival of religious life in the present day, and the devil was correspondingly busy. He was quite sure that no young man was able in his own strength to resist the seductive temptations of London life. Nothing but Christ would keep a man right. He advised them to be careful what they read, and never to neglect the Bible.—The half-yearly meeting of the Lawyers' Prayer Union was also held last week, Mr. Douglas, Q.C., presiding in place of the Lord Chancellor, who had been summoned to Windsor by Her Majesty the Queen. There were several speakers, the chief points dealt with being the necessity of a firm belief in revelation, and of accuracy in religious as well as legal definitions. The chairman took a very hopeful view of the present state of religious thought, citing the names of several leading lawyers and politicians to show that a large proportion of the great men of the day believed in revealed Truth.—The parishioners of St. Paul's, Norden, near Rochdale, are dissatisfied with the manner in which their Vicar, the Rev. C. H. Whitehead, performs the service. They complain that he reads much too fast and in an "irreverent tone," that the sermons rarely last more than seven minutes, and further that he has himself declared that the service is "distasteful" to him, and that he considers Sunday the "most miserable day of the week." A preliminary inquiry into his conduct has been held by an ecclesiastical committee appointed by the Bishop of Manchester, to whom a report will be sent.

MUSIC

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——The winter season was brought to an end on Saturday night with a third representation of Weber's Oberon. Although indulgence was asked for Madame Pappenheim on the plea (not to be mistaken) of a severe cold, she laboured zealously through her part, and gave the scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," with extraordinary vigour. It is to be hoped that her exertions in such depressing circumstances may have no ultimate ill effect upon her voice—a gift too precious to be trifled with. Except that Signor Bonetti played Scherasmin in lieu of Signor Mendioroz, the cast of Oberon was precisely as before. As each incident of the series of performances just terminated has been duly recorded in these columns, recapitulation would be superfluous. That success has been the result is doubtless chiefly owing to Bizet's Carmen, an opera which gains more and more by closer familiarity, and of which nineteen performances in no way lessened the attraction. Every fresh hearing of Carmen fortifies the belief that the death of its composer, whose life up to the time of its production had been a long and weary struggle, robbed the lyric drama of one who could materially have added to its glory—a musician, indeed, of unquestionable genius. That in the course of little more than two months no fewer than seventeen operas should have been brought out more or less efficiently at Her Majesty's Theatre says no little for the credit of Mr. Armit, who represents Mr. Mapleson in that gentleman's absence. We can forgive the non-forthcoming of La Forza del Destino and Mirella (the Italian version of Gounod's Mireille), if only because, in Mdlle. Ambre, he introduced to the public a new dramatic singer more than



"TIME TO BE OFF"—A SKETCH IN THE KHYBER PASS personal attacks upon a man whom, if he believed him to be dishonest, it was his duty to prosecute by the ordinary legal method.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Father Cahill, a Roman Catholic curate of Belfast, and an ardent Home Rule agitator, has obtained a verdict against the Belfast Morning News for a libellous article which accused him of being ready to sell his political opinions for an office worth 1,000*l.* per year. He claimed 2,000*l.*, but the jury only awarded him one farthing.—The woman accused of the Burton Crescent murder was again before the magistrate on Saturday, and was remanded. Technical evidence was given respecting the blood-stains on her dress, and it was stated that a wedding ring had been pledged at a pawnbroker's where she was known, though the recipient could not identify her as having pledged it, nor could the ring be recognised positively as that of the murdered woman. The accused has written to one of the relations of the deceased declaring her innocence; and as it is just possible that her protestations may be truthful, it is to be hoped that the police will not entirely confine their attention to the one "clue," and thus perchance allow the real culprit to escape. Something more ought surely to be made public about the workmen who are said to have been engaged in the house on the day of the murder.—As we briefly stated last week, the man Madden who wrote threatening letters to the Home Office has been committed for trial. His letters are clearly those of a lunatic, although there seems to be some method in the madness which demands 1,000*l.* as compensation for wrongful detention in an asylum. The "Modern Prophet," who claims to be a "spirit, immaterial, capable of piercing the earth, and disturbing the elements," and to possess a knowledge of "all abstract sciences," will probably be well taken care of in future.—It has been decided by the Edinburgh Court of Session that the trustees who held City of Glasgow Bank shares in trust for others, are liable for "calls" equally with the other shareholders.—At Liverpool a medical student has been fined for "speaking to the man at the wheel" on board one of the Mersey Ferry Boats. He ran about the deck in an excited manner shouting orders to the helmsman, until at last the captain was compelled to order some of the crew to arrest him.—The late secretary of the Greenock Guaranteed Railway Company, who issued fictitious shares to the amount of 16,000*l.*, and pocketed the proceeds, has been sentenced to penal servitude for life.—On Monday a married woman at Woolwich strangled her little daughter, and then went immediately to the police-station to give herself up. She said that she was seized with a sudden impulse to kill the child, in order that it might go to Heaven.

From the Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., City Temple.

Ladies and Gentlemen,—THE FOUNTAIN is designed to be a Family Paper, and is therefore marked by a great variety both of matter and style. In its pages will be found Prayers, Sermons, Articles, Essays, Reviews, Poems, Riddles, Puzzles, News, Illustrations, Points for Speeches, and Outlines for Sermons. THE FOUNTAIN, being under the commercial direction of an American Merchant, who has literary connections of special value, reprints the best American literature in addition to contributions by able English pens. Special regard is paid to the department of Fiction, so as to secure all its advantages without running any of its risks. The Pulpit section has been placed under my personal care, in which there will not only be fully reported sermons of my own, but, as often as practicable, a column of Sermon Seed by various writers, which preachers may find useful in suggesting topics of discourse. THE FOUNTAIN is already well known for the attention it pays to the wants and tastes of children and young people. In this department, parents will find much that will instruct and entertain their children, and gladden the whole Family circle. Allow me, therefore, very cordially to recommend to your immediate attention,

The timely use of NEURALINE frequently prevents the extraction of Teeth.

In cases of Neuralgia and Tic Doloureux NEURALINE is very effective.

Throughout the world NEURALINE is in great demand. It invariably gives relief, and sometimes cures by a single application.

Mr. EDGAR (of Butt Lighthouse, Island of Lewis) writes as follows to Sir James Matheson:—"Mrs. Edgar cannot express her thanks to Lady Matheson for the Neuraline. It proved the most successful remedy she had ever applied. The relief experienced was almost instantaneous."

NEURALINE is prepared by LEATH and ROSS, and sold by all Chemists, in bottles, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d.; by post, 1s. 3d. and 3s. Illustrated directions for using accompany each bottle.

TALON ROUGE writes in Vanity Fair as follows:—"GLYKALINE has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season, more or less, a cold in the head. I sped to the nearest chemists and obtained the longed-for remedy, and BEFORE NIGHT I WAS CURED. It is called GLYKALINE. Three drops taken at intervals of an hour infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of GLYKALINE."

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil).

HYDROLEINE. Equal to ten times the quantity of Cod Liver Oil.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil). The nauseous taste of Cod Liver Oil is removed by hydration. Easier to administer than Cod Liver Oil.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil). Entirely supersedes plain Cod Liver Oil. Contains ready-digested Cod Liver Oil. Can be taken by the most delicate stomach. Is immediately assimilated.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil). Produces rapid increase in flesh and weight.

"HYDROLEINE" has been described as partially digested oil, which will nourish and produce increase in weight in those cases where oils and fats not so treated are difficult or impossible to digest. All tendency to emaciation and loss of weight is arrested by the regular use of Hydroleine, which may be discontinued when the usual average weight has been permanently regained.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil). Superior to any emulsion or pancreatised oils ever prepared.

IN "NOTES on CONSUMPTION and WASTING DISEASES SUCCESSFULLY TREATED by HYDRATED OIL, with cases showing the immediate increase in weight produced by it," published by Ripone, Bateman, and Co., Sheffield Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields,

G. OVEREND DREWRY, M.D., Physician to the National Free Dispensary for Consumption and Wasting Diseases, Gower Street, W., Author of "Common-sense Management of the Stomach," &c.,

REFERRING to CASES Treated at the NATIONAL FREE DISPENSARY for

CONSUMPTION and WASTING DISEASES, says that

"HYDRATED OIL produces an effect such as neither Cod Liver Oil nor any preparation of it with which I am acquainted even faintly approaches."—Page 231 and on page 21,

"PATIENTS are unanimous in their statement that the appetite is much increased by taking 'Hydrated Oil,' and that so far from possessing the unpleasant taste of ordinary Cod Liver Oil, the taste of 'Hydrated Oil' is agreeable rather than the reverse, and is described by some as resembling Devonshire cream. These, I submit, are very important points, in cases usually attended by great irritability of stomach. The general improvement in strength shown within a fortnight was in many instances surprising, even to himself, who had seen already in private practice many startling results from its use. My experience, however, shows that in cases where Cod Liver Oil or an emulsion of it has been depended upon, increase of weight is rarely obtained."

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil). Economical in use: certain in result.

THE CHEMICAL PRINCIPLES upon which Hydrated Oil is prepared were first described

IN a Treatise on the ASSIMILATION and DIGESTION of FATS in the HUMAN BODY, by H. C. BARTLETT, Ph. D., F.C.S. Published by Messrs. J. and A. Churchill, New Burlington Street.

"FAT in the HUMAN BODY."— Page 41

"NOTHING appears to restore the healthy functions of the Liver and pancreas in these cases except by the frequent ingestion of oil or liquid fat, so treated artificially that it is already partially transformed by fermentation and the reaction of bile. Sent on with ability by the absorbents, it is insensibly assimilated by the digestive organs, until they gradually become strengthened, not only to provide their own nourishment, but to transform a sufficient quantity of fat to supply the inevitable waste throughout the body."

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil). From its valuable tonic effect on the nervous system, in addition to its special stimulating action on the organs concerned in the production of fat in the body, it also causes marked increase in weight in persons of naturally thin habit who do not present any evidences of disease.

THE permanence and perfection of the emulsion and the extreme solubility of the HYDRATED OIL is shown by its retaining its cream-like condition as long as the purest cod liver oil will retain its sweetness. Unlike the preparations mentioned, or simple cod liver oil, it produces no unpleasant eructation or sense of nausea, and should be taken in such very much smaller doses, according to the directions, as will ensure its complete assimilation; this at the same time renders its use economical in the highest degree.

WEAKLY INFANTS thrive on it. Appetite is improved, digestion assisted, and strength increased by HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil). A true Nerve tonic, a REAL DIGESTIVE, and POWERFUL NUTRITIVE.

ALL Persons taking HYDROLEINE are particularly urged to keep an ACCOUNT from WEEK to WEEK of their WEIGHT, that the gain and improvement may be shown.

MESSRS. J. M. RICHARDS and CO., having devoted special attention to perfecting a process by means of which uniformity in the production of HYDRATED OIL is secured, desire to direct the attention of the Medical profession and the public to this preparation, to distinguish which the name of HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil) has been registered under the Trade Marks Act by them.

ANALYTICAL REPORT

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil).

"Laboratory, 30, Duke Street, Grosvenor Square, W., July 31, 1877.

"Messrs. J. M. Richards and Co.

"Gentlemen,—In compliance with your instructions I have to report that the samples of Hydrated Oil (Hydroleine) taken by me from bulk before bottling during the last nine months have in every instance been composed in accordance with the formula given on the labels. The necessary conditions of transformation of the oil have always been attained in the manufacture, and by means of the artificial digestion so produced this preparation is far more easy of assimilation than ordinary cod liver oil, or any emulsion of fat or oil which I have analysed.—I am, faithfully yours,

"H. C. BARTLETT, Ph. D., F.C.S."
